John Hill Burton (1809-81) was the son of an officer and was born at Aberdeen, and admitted to the Scottish Bar in 1831, from 1854 was secretary to the Prison Board of Scotland, and from 1877 a Commissioner of Prisons He was an indefrtigable writer, and contributed much to Blackwood, the Westmuster, and other periodicals. His Lives of Hume (1846) and Lord Lovat and Duncan Forbes (1847) became standard works, he wrote a manual of Scots law and a treatise on bankruptcy, a small manual of political economy and a series of Narratives from Criminal Irials in Scotland But his most extensive and best-known v orl was that which began in 1853 with two volumes on the History of Scotland from the Revolution to the Extinction of the Last Jacobite Insurrection, 1689-1748, a work honestly and diligently executed, not without vicorous and picturesque passages-as the account of the battle of Killicerankic and the massacre of Glencoe, though the style is in the main rather lumbering and lacking in rhythm and He subsequently completed his Scottish history with seven more volumes, The History of Scotland from Agricola's Invasion to the Revolu tion of 1688 (1867-70), which fully sustained his reputation for laborious research, and was accepted as the most complete and, on the whole, accurate history of Scotland-though the narrative is often desultory and disproportionate, and the lack of the historical infiguration is obvious edition of the whole (1873) improved the earliest and Roman part of the work. His History of the Reign of Queen Anne (3 vols ) appeared in 1880 In 1862 he produced a very amusing and interesting volume, The Book-Hunter, containing 'sletches of the ways of book-collectors, scholars, literary investigators, desultory readers, and other persons whose pursuits revolve round books and literature. In 1864 appeared The Scot Abroad, illustrating the close and curious relations of Scotland and Scotsmen in the olden time with foreign countries A small book on The Carragorm Mountains is an exceptionally interesting vade mecuni for climbers there and lovers of hill scenery. He edited two volumes of the Scottish Privy Council Register, helped Bowring to edit Bentliam, and extracted from Bentham's works a very readable collection of Benthamiana Burton's wife prefixed a Memoir to a new edition of the Bool-Hunter (1882)

The Riding of the Parliament.

The new Parliament, whose career was to be so memorable, assembled on the 6th of May 1703. The 'Riding' of a newly assembled Parliament was an old feudal eeremony, of which the annual procession of the Royal Commissioner to the General Assembly remains a faint vestige. On this occasion it was performed with more than the usual pomp, and, in association with the legislative history of those who partook in it, left an impression more abiding than that of a vain pageant. It was remembered that all the parade and splendour of the occasion were the decorations of legislative labours which abolished the ceremonial for ever, along vith the ancient national legislature, of which the old usage was a becoming decoration. As these solemnities are in themselves curious, and form a feature of national manners, the opportunity seems appropriate for a brief account of them.

The first operation was to have the long street from the Parliament Square to Holyrood House cleared of dirt and impediments-a task of some difficulty and importance A proclamation was issued, prohibiting the use of mis cellaneous vehicles within the gites of the city during the ceremony, and for preserving strict order in the crowd A passage through the centre of the long street was railed in, and, while the magistrates provided a civic guard to the extremity of their dominion at the Nether Bow Port, the royal foot guards lined the remainder of the strect to the palace gate. It was an absolute injunction on every member, of whatever degree, that he should ride, and any attempt to evade the chivalrous feudal usage was punished with a heavy penalty. Out of consideration, however, for those respectable burgesses or ancient professional men to whom the elevation was unusual, arrangements were made for assisting them to mount and dismount at the extremities of the journey

The first movement of the day was by the officers of state, who proceeded one hour before the rest of the members to arrange matters for their reception. The Lord High Constable, with his robe and baton of office, and his guard ranged behind him, sat at the Lady Stairs, by the opening of the Parliament Close, to receive the members under his protection, being officially invested with the privilege and duty of the exterior defences of the Parliament House. He made his obeisances to the members as they dismonnted, and handed them over to the Lord Marischal, who, having the duty of keeping order and protecting the members within the House, sat at the door, in all his pomp, to receive them

The procession, according to old feudal usage began diminutively, and swelled in importance as it went. The representatives of the burghs went first, then, after a pause, came the lesser barons, or county members, and then the nobles-the highest in rank going last. A herald called each name from a window of the palace, and another at the gate saw that the mcmber took his place in the train All rode two abreast moners wore the heavy doublet of the day unadorned The nobility followed in their gorgeous robes. burghal commissioner had a lackey, and each baron two the number increasing with the rank, intil a duke had The nobles were each followed by a trun bearer, and the Commissioner was attended by a swurm of decorative officers, so that the scrvile elements in the procession must have dragged it out to a considerable It seems, indeed, to have been borrowed from length the French processions, and was full of glitter-the lackeys, over their liveries, wearing velvet coats em All the members broidered with armorial bearings were covered, save those whose special function it was to attend upon the honours-the crown, sceptre, and sword of state. These were the palladium of the nation's imperial independence, and the pomp of the procession was concentrated on the spot where they were borne—the same as they may jet be seen in Edinburgh Castle—before the Commissioner—Immediately before the sword rode the Lord Lyon, in his robe and heraldic overcoat, with his chain and baton—Behind him were clustered a clump of gaudy heralds and pursuivants, with noisy trumpeters proclaiming the approach of the procession which poured into that noble oak roofed hall, which still recalls, by its name and character, associations with the ancient legislature of Scotland

Let us, in the meantime, follow the legislative assembly into their hall, and cast a glance on the scene there presented Instead of the arrangement by parties, with which we are familiar in the British Houses of Parlia ment, the Estates were distributed according to ranks They all sat in one house, and appear to have been much nearer in form to the French States General, whose latest meeting had welcomed the accession of Louis XIII, than to the English Parliament. The Chancellor sat as chairman, and the officers of state clustered round him on what were called the steps of the throne and decorated benches at the upper end of the hall were for the exclusive use of the nobles, and a penalty was incurred by any other person sitting there. In the centre was a table, round which were seated the judges of the Court of Session and the clerks of Parliament Beneath this, on a series of plain benches, or forms, were ranged the lesser barons and burgesses, and strangers specially admitted sat at the extremity of these seats the bar there was sometimes a motley assemblage of the attendants on the higher members and state officers, and it would seem that the miscellaneous public, unless on special occasions, had access there

(From The History of Scotland)

William Forbes Skene (1809-92), Scottish historian, was born at Inverse, on Loch Nevis, the second son of Scott's friend, Skene of Rubislaw He was educated at Edinburgh and elsewhere (learning Gaelic in Laggan manse), and became in 1832 an Edinburgh Writer to the Signet. In 1881 he succeeded Hill Burton as Scottish His toriographer, and he was DCL of Oxford Among his works were The Highlanders of Scotland (1837), editions of The Dean of Lismore's Book (1861), of the Chronicles of the Picts and Scots (1867), and of Fordun's Cronica Gentis Scotorum (1871), The Four Ancient Books of Wales (1868), and The Family of Skene of Skene (1887) By far his most important work, and (though containing some debatable theses) still the standard authority on the subject, was his Celtic Scotland (3 vols 1876-80) Shene was a conscientious and painstaking scholar, with a competent knowledge of his subject, but he cherished some antiquated prejudices and had little sense of literary form

Mark Lemon (1809-70) was born in London, and in his twenty sixth year wrote a farce, the first of a long series of melodramas, operettas, and the like. Of several novels, the best perhaps was Falkner Lyle (1866), he wrote children's stories and essays, and combined the arts of lecturer and public reader. In 1841 he helped to establish Punch, of which for the first two years he was joint editor with Henry Mayhew, and thereafter sole editor till his death. His Jest Book (1864) was reissued in 1892. See the works on the history of Punch by Mayhew (1895) and Spickmann (1895)

William Rathbone Greg (1809-81), born at Manchester, was educated under Dr Lant Carpenter at Bristol, and at Ldinburgh University while he managed his father's mill it Bury, and afterwards carried on business on his own account, gaining meanwhile a prize (1842) for an essay on the Corn Laws, and publishing a courteous but negative criticism of the Creed of Christendom He now fairly embarked in literature, and (1851)wrote industriously for the quarterlies and magazines, his essays being subsequently published as books in three collections—Lssays on Political and Social Science (1854), Literary and Social Judgments (1869), and Miscellaneous Essays (1884) He became a Commissioner of Customs in 1856, and was Comptroller of II M Stationery Office from 1864 till 1877. In most of his works he showed a disbelief in the political instincts of democracy, and an expectation of little from social or other legislation The Linguas of Life (1872) received the more popularity for its open eyed and not too hopeful outlook, though there was little direct or aggressive hostility shown to accepted In Rocks Thend (1874) he took a highly pessimistic view of the future of England, foreboding the political supremacy of the lower classes, industrial decline, and the divorce of intelligence from religion Other works were Political Prob lems (1870) and Mistaken Alms (1876) He wrote clearly and calmly, but with the moral force of manifest conviction - His son, Percy (reg (1836-1899), was a poet, novelist, and somewhat wehe mently polenucal author of a History of the United States, having, after being secularist and spiritualist in turn, become the champion of something very like absolutism

From 'The Enigmas of Life'

Two glorious futures lie before us the progress of the race here, the progress of the man hereafter. History indicates that the individual man needs to be truns planted in order to excel the past He appears to have Men lised then revelled his perfection centuries ago whom we have never yet been able to surpass, rarely even to equal Our knowledge has, of course, gone on increasing, for that is a material capable of indefinite accumulation But for power, for the highest reach and range of mental and spiritual capacity in every line, the lapse of two or three thousand years has shown no sign of increase or improvement What sculptor has sur passed Phidias? What poet has transcended Eschylus, Homer, or the author of the Book of Joh? What de yout aspirant has soared higher than David or Isaiah? What statesman have modern times produced mightier or grander than Pericles? What putriot martyr truer or nobler than Socrates? Wherein, save in mere acquire nients, was Breon superior to Plato? or Newton to Thales or Pythagoras? Very early in our history individual men heat their wings against the allotted boundaries of their earthly dominions, early in history God give to the human race the types and patterns to imitate and approach, but never to transcend then, surely we see clearly intimated to us our appointed worl -namely, to ruse the masses to the true standard of harmonious human virtue and capacity, not to strive ourselves to overleap that standard, not to put our own souls or brains into a hotbed, but to put all our fello " nich into a fertile and a wholesome soil. If this he so, both our practical course and our speculative difficulties are greatly cleared. The timid fugitives from the duties and temptations of the world, the selfish coddlers and nursers of their own souls, the sedulous cul mators either of a cold intellect or of a fervent spiritualism, have alike described or mistaken their infesion, and turned their back upon the goal

A Memoir of W. K. Grey by his widox was prefixed to the eighteenth edition if The Linguist of Life (1891).

Gilbert Abbott à Beckett (1811-56), born in London and educated at Westminster, was called to the Bar in 1841, and in 1849 became a metro politan police inagistrate. Besides writing for Punch, the Fimes, and many serials, he was author of Fhe Quizziology of the British Diama, and is specially remembered as the inventor of the 'comic' blackstone and the 'comic' Histories of Lingland and Rome—the first illustrated by Crinkshahk, the last two by Leech—One son, Gilbert (1837-91), was a playwright, another, Arthur William, born in 1844, has been playwright, novelist, barrister, journalist, and editor

James David Forbes (1809-68), eminent not merely as an original investigator in various de partments of physics, but as a luminous writer and a teacher who secured the enthusiastic reverence of a series of eminent pupils, was grandson of the first Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo and son of the second, and his mother was Sir Walter Scott's first Born at Edinburgh, voung Forbes studied in the university there, and was called to the bar in 1830 From 1833 lie held the Edinburgh chair of Natural Philosophy, exchanging it in 1859 for the principalship of the United College at St Andrews. Among his contributions to science are his inves tigations on licat, light, polarisation, underground temperature, and the use of the thermometer for determining heights, but he is best known by his researches on the motion of glaciers, in connection with which subject he wrote Iravels through the Alps (1843), Norway and its Glaciers (1853), Tour of Mont Blanc and Monte Rosa (1855), and Ocia sional Papers on the Theory of Glaciers (1859) He was certainly the first to establish the viscous theory of glaciers and to secure definite measurements of their motion, he was, indeed, as Professor I'ut said, 'the Copernicus or Kepler of this science. His scientific achievements and his personal life are recorded in his Life and Letters edited by Shairp, Tait, and Adams Reilly (1873)

Thomas Carlyle

was born on the 4th of December 1795, in a plain two story house still standing in the main street of the tidy village of Ecclefechan, in the parish of Hoddam, Annandale, Dumfriesshire He was the second son of James Carlyle (1758-1832). the chief stone mason in the village, and the eldest by his second wife, Margaret Aitken (1771-1853) Carlyle was fortunate in both of his parents His father was a frugal, earnest, 'well-living Seceder' of (in his son's opinion) 'natural faculty equal to that of Burns, pugnacious, fearless iras cible, and not unmindful of the fact that he was an offshoot of a 'fighting' Border clan His mother was 'a woman of the fairest descent, that of the pious, the just, and the wise' Thomas was, like the other members of James Carlale's family—ten in all, five sons and five daughters - carefully educated He was taught the alphabet and elementary English by his father, arithmetic by his mother, and the rudiments of Latin by Mr Johnston, minister in his father's church Home tuition was supplemented by attendance at the parish school of Ecclefechan, easily recognisable in this connection as the Entepfuhl of Sartor Resartus There Carlyle learned to use 'those earliest tools of complicacy which a man of letters gets to handle -lus class-books,' and was reported by a school inspector 'complete in English' at about seven years of age. He also watched the comedy and not of the annual cattle fur in the village, 'undoubtedly the grand summary of the Entepfuhl child's culture, whither, assembling from all the four winds, come the elements of an unspeakable hurly burly' At the age of ten (1805) he proceeded to the Grammar School of Annan (the Hinterschlag Gymnasium of Sartor), where, although his teachers were 'hide bound pedants who knew Syntax enough, and of the human soul thus much, that it had a faculty called Memory, which could be acted on through the muscular integument by appliance of birch rods,' he learned to read Latin and French fluently, as well as 'some geometry, algebra, arithmetic thoroughly well, vague outlines of geography, Greek to the extent of the alphabet mainly' But his two years at Annan Academy were among the He was tyrannised over most miserable in his life by some of his fellow pupils, 'coarse, unguided, tyrannous cubs,' who ridiculed him for his sensitiveness as 'Tom the Tearful' But he 'revolted against them, and gave them shake for shake' Edward Irving, his senior by five years and the adviser and friend of later days, occasionally visited the Academy, where he also had received his early education, and Carlyle looked with interest on him as a distinguished student in the University of Edinburgh, now his own goal To Edinburgh, a distance of ninety miles, he travelled on foot in November 1809, and enrolled himself as a student in the Although 'out of England and Spain university ours was the worst of all hitherto discovered universities,' he attended its classes in arts till 1813, when he left without taking a degree Mathematics was the only subject in the college curriculum that he took kindly to, holding that 'the man who had mastered the first forty seven propositions of Euclid stood nearer to God than he had done before' Yet he took no prize in the mathematical class, although he was a favourite with the professor, Sir John Leslie, who 'alone of my professors had some genius in his business, and awoke a certain enthusiasm in me'

When Carlyle's attendance at the Arts course of Edinburgh University came to an end in 1813, he began preparation for the ministry of the Church of Scotland, and enrolled himself as a student of its Divinity Hall on the 16th of November did not attempt to attend the classes in the theological curriculum, but contented himself with observing the form known as 'keeping partial sessions' by going up to Edinburgh twice a year and delivering 'discourses' in the Hall Meanwhile he sustained himself by teaching. In 1814 he obtained by competition the post of mathematical master in Annan Academy, which was worth between £60 and £70 a year He spent his vacation with his parents at Mainhill, a farm about two nules from Lockerbie, to which his father had migrated from Ecclefechan, and where he died in 1832, having saved £1000 There Carlyle began to study German, read extensively in English literature, and wrote of his reading at great length to college friends As one of the consequences of this reading, his 'sentiments on the clerical profession' became 'mostly of the unfavourable kind' In 1816 lie left Annan for Kirkcaldy in Fifeshire, having accepted the post of assistant to the teacher of the parish school, with emoluments estimated at £100 a year He now became the intimate friend of Edward Irving, who had taken the position of head of an adventure school in Kirkcaldy read and walked together, and Carlyle was by his friend introduced to various families, including that of Mr Martin the parish minister, one of whose daughters subsequently became Irving's wife A more important introduction was that to 'by far the brightest and cleverest' of Irving's pupils, Margaret Gordon, a girl who lived in Kirkcaldy with her aunt She is commonly understood to have been the model for the dark and inconstant Blumine of Sartor, although the Strichev family, with whom Carlyle subsequently became intimate, claimed the distinction for Kitty Kil patrick, a cousin of Mrs Strachey If there can ever be said to have been anything of the nature of love making, it was put an end to by Margaret Gordon's nunt. Margaret bade Carlyle farewell in a formal letter full of wise advices, such as 'Cultivate the milder dispositions of the heart, subdue the more extravagant visions of the brain,' and possibly indicated her own feelings by closing her letter with, 'I give you not my address because I dare not promise to see you.' She subsequently married Sir Alexander Bannerman Governor of Nova Scotta

Mr and Mrs Buller spent the winter of 1822 in Edinburgh, and with them and his pupils Carlyle went in the spring of the following year to Kinnaird House near Dunkeld, on the Tay The family went to London in 1824, and Carlyle paid the capital his first visit in June of that year, living with his friend Irving, and making comments, on the whole more free than laudatory, on the men of letters, such as Coleridge, Hazlitt, Campbell, and Allan Cunningham, whom he came across friendship for the Bullers was now cooling-he describes them in a letter written at this time as 'a cold race of people' who 'love no living creature' -and he took advantage of a proposal to accom pany them to France to bring his engagement to He remained in London, however, till a close March 1825, superintending the publication in book form of his Life of Schiller He also spent some weeks in Birmingham with a friend of the name of Badams, studying the 'Black Country,' exploring Warwickshire, and endeavouring, but in vain, to get a cure for dyspepsia In the end of March he settled with his brother Alexander on the farm of Hoddam Hill, about two miles from Mainhill, and there he engaged in the translation of German At this time also Miss Welsh, after much hesitation, agreed to marry him lowing year he quarrelled with his landlord, and he and his father both removed to Scotsbrig, another farm near Ecclefechan The marriage, another farm near Ecclefechan however, took place on 17th October of that year at Templand, Dumfriesshire, the residence of Miss Welsh's grandfather The couple at once settled in 21 Comely Bank, Edinburgh Carlyle's chief work here was the preparation of four volumes of translations from Tieck, Museus, and Richter, which were published under the title of German He began a didactic novel, Wotton Romance Reinfred, but burned the bulk of the manuscript He also endeavoured, but in vain, to secure the chair of Moral Philosophy in St Andrews in succession to Dr Chalmers The most important event during this period of his life was the commencement of a connection with the Edinburgh Review whom he had met in London, introduced him to His first article, on Jean Paul Richter, appeared in June 1827 By this time he had become known in Germany That same year Goethe said to Eckermann that Carlyle was a moral force so great that he could not tell what he might produce

In May 1828 the Carlyles removed to Mrs Carlyle's property of Craigenputtock, which her husband described as 'the dreariest spot in all the British dominions,' although, as the late Professor Nichol pertinently pointed out, 'on a sunny day it is an inland home, with wide billowy straths of grass around, inestimable silence broken only by the placid bleating of sheep, and the long ridges of the Solway hills in front.' Here they lived nearly six years—years for the husband of final preparation for his 'mission,' for the wife of melancholy solitude and household drudgery for which she had not been fitted by her upbringing Carlyle subsisted during this time mainly on what he wrote for reviews, such as the Edinburgh, Foreign Quarterly, and Westminster, and Fraser's Magazine It was at Craigenputtock that he produced his most notable essays, those on Burns, Samuel Johnson, Goethe, Diderot, and Voltaire He wrote a History of German Literature, a portion of which also appeared in the form of essays By far the most notable product of this period, however, was Sartor Resartus, his most characteristic and in some respects greatest work, in which, as its hero, Diogenes Teufelsdrockh, Carlyle expounds, under the title of 'The Philosophy of Clothes,' the special philosophico poetic mysticism which had come to be his creed Saitor is further notable in the literary history of Carlyle as revealing the Germanisation of his mind and the abandonment of the comparatively simple diction of his early essays and the Life of Schiller for the thoroughly individual style of his later workseruptive, ejaculatory, but always impressive, and in certain passages rising to an epic sublimity Carlyle found some difficulty in obtaining a publisher for Sartor, but in 1833-34 it appeared in instalments in Fraser's Magazine Life at Cruigenputtock was varied by occasional visits to Edinburgh, in one of which he conceived the idea of writing his French Revolution, by a residence of six months in London, where he made the acquaintance of John Sterling and John Stuart Mill, by visits from Jeffrey, who peremptorily told him, 'Bring your blooming Eve out of your blasted Paradise,' and from Emerson, with whom he had a 'quiet night of clear, fine talk,' and by letters from Goethe, in one of which he acknowledged a lock of Mrs Carlyle's hair

In 1830 Carlyle was in such straits that he had to borrow £50 from Jeffrey to pay the expenses of his trip to London the following year But finding himself master of £200 in 1834, he resolved to try his fortune in London, and on 10th June estab lished himself in 5 Cheyne Row-'a side street off the Thames, winding as slowly by the reaches of Barnes and Battersea as Cowper's Ouse, dotted with brown sailed ships and holiday-boats'-in which he lived till his death. Here he settled down to the writing of his French Revolution, which ap This work was almost put an end peared in 1837 to in 1835 through the destruction by a servantgirl of all but four or five leaves of the manuscript of the first volume, which had been lent to John Stuart Mill Carlyle accepted £100 from Mill as compensation for his loss. At this time Carlyle was again much depressed, his melancholy finding expression in such declarations to his friends as, 'It is twenty-three months since I carned a penny by the craft of literature, and yet I know no fault I have committed I am tempted to go to

I shall quit literature, it does not America. invite me. Providence warns me to have done I have failed in this Divine Infernal Yet he never lost self-confidence. Universe? 'I can reverence no existing man. With health ind peace for one year, I could write a better book than there has been in this country for generations? The publication of the French Revolution in 1837 at last brought Carlyle reputation, and, by way of adding to his income, some of his friends induced him to deliver a course of lectures that year to a select audience on 'German Literature' This was so successful that it was followed up by courses on 'The Successive Periods of European Culture,' 'The Revolutions of Modern Europe,' and 'Heroes, Hero Worship, and the Heroic in History' His yearly earnings from these lectures varied between £135 and £300 Yet he loathed the work, writing to Emerson in 1839 'O heaven, I cannot "speak," I can only gasp and writhe and stutter, a spectacle to gods and fashionables-being forced to it by want of money' In 1838 Sartor appeared in book form, and also the first edition of his Miscellaines following year he made his first appearance in the literature of politics with a pamphlet assailing the corruptions of modern society, under the title of Clartism By 1840 all fears of poverty were over In 1842 Mrs Welsh died, leaving to the Carlyles a competence of from £200 to £300 Yet till late in life Carlyle's income from literature alone was never more than £400

In 1843 Carlyle published his Past and Present, the most picturesque, popular, and influential of This was followed all his socio political works seven years later by the more savage Latter-Day Pamphlets, which, however, created attention mainly because of the qualified approval extended by its author to slavery. Meanwhile there had appeared in 1845 Cromwell's Letters and Speeches, which is perhaps the most successful of all his works, in smuch as it completely revolutionised public opinion on its subject. In 1851 he pub lished his Life of John Sterling, which he wrote because he was not satisfied with Julius Hare's From this time onward he devoted biography himself exclusively to the preparation of his last and largest, if not also greatest, work ('Mino taur' though it was both to him and his wife), The History of Iriedrich II, commonly called Finderick the Great The first two volumes were published in 1858, and it was concluded in 1865 paration of this work led Carlyle to make two special visits to the Continent. These, with a yachting trip to Ostend, two tours in Ireland (on which subject he intended to write a book based on a darry that was published after his death), and yearly visits to his kindred and friends (like Thomas Erskine of Linlathen) in Scotland, constituted his chief distractions from his literary labours 1866 lie vas elected chairman of the committee that was formed for the defence of Mr Eyre, who had been recalled from his post of Governor of Jamaica on the ground that he had shown unneces sary severity in suppressing a negro insurrection that had broken out the previous year. This was almost the only public movement with which Carlyle identified himself, although he aided materially in establishing the London Library in 1830.

On 11th November 1865 Carlyle was elected Lord Rector of Edinburgh University by a majority of 657 votes to 310 recorded for Mr Disraeli and April 1866 he was installed amidst extraordi nary demonstrations of enthusiasm, when he de in ered an address in which he embodied his experiences of life in the form of kindly advices addressed in an easy conversational style to the Carlyle was greatly pleased with his reception, which had, among other results, the effect of causing a run on his works, although in his somewhat embittered old age he wrote 'No idea or shadow of an idea is in that address but what had been set forth by me tens of times before, and the poor gaping sea of prurient blockheadism réceives it as a kind of inspired revelation, and runs to buy my books (it is said) now when I have got quite done with their buying or refusing to buy' The success was, however, extinguished by the intelligence which reached him in Dumfries of the sudden death from heart disease of Mrs Carlyle on 21st April, as she was driving in her carriage in Hyde Park. His grief deepened into profound remorse when he discovered from certain of her letters, and from a journal which she had kept, that during a period of her married life his irritability, absorption in ambition and work, and unconscious want of consideration for her had caused her much misery and even ill-health, which she care fully concealed from him The Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle, published after his death, also proved that during the years 1855 and 1856 husband and wife were temporarily estranged owing to his liking for the society of Harriet, Lady Ashburton, although they clearly demonstrated that he never understood the cause of the estrangement. After the death of Lady Ashburton there was no friction of any real im portance These Memorials are also of intrinsic literary value, because they show that Mrs Carlyle, in addition to the 'soft invincibility, capacity of discernment, and noble loyalty of heart,' borne testimony to in the tombstone erected to her by her husband in the nave of the Abbey Church at Haddington, was one of the shrewdest critics, most vivacious letter-writers, and accomplished women of her time

Carlyle, now 'a gloomily serious, silent, and sad old man gazing into the final cliasm of things in mute dialogue with "Death, Judgment, and Eternity" (dialogue mute on both sides),' wrote no important work after his wife's death. After a visit to the second Lady Ashburton at Mentone in 1867, where he partially composed his Remainscences, he tried to settle down to his old life, one of his nieces generally superintending the household arrangements of Cheyne Row He put his affairs in order, bequeathing the revenues of Crugenputtock for the endowment of three John Welsh bursaries in the University of Edinburgh In August 1867 he published in Macmillan's Magazine, and under the title of 'Shooting Niagara,' his views of British democracy prepared an edition of his collected works, adding to them a fresh volume containing 'The Early Kings of Norway' and an 'Essay on the Portraits of John Knox.' On 18th November 1870 lie wrote a letter to the Times on the Tranco German war, declaring 'that noble, patient, deep, pious, and solid Germany should be at length welded into a nation and become Queen of the Continent, instead of vapouring, vainglorious, gesticulating, quarrelsome, restless, and oversensitive France, seems to me the hopefullest fact that has occurred in my time' He expressed in private very strong opposition to the Irish policy of Mr Gladstone. In February 1874 he accepted the Prussian Order of Merit, which was offered him as a recognition of his having written the life of Frederick the Great, who founded the Order In the same year Mr Disraeli offered him the Grand Cross of the Bath, with the alternative of a baronetcy and a pension of 'an amount equal to a good fellowship,' but he declined both, although he acknowledged the kindliness of the Premier, of whom he had spoken almost uniformly in terms of reprobation eightieth birthday, 4th December 1875, tributes of respect were showered upon him They included 'n noble and most unexpected note from Prince Bismarck' and a gold medal from a number of fervid Scottish admirers On 5th May 1877 there appeared from his pen in the Times a brief letter alluding to a rumour that the 'miraculous' Premier meditated the forcing on 'a Philo-Turk war against Russia,' and protesting against any such enterprise He passed away on 5th February 1881 at his house in Chelsea. His remains were offered a burial in Westminster Abbey, but, in accordance with his own desire, he was laid in the churchyard of Ecclefechan beside his kin

Although Carlyle was separated by a whole continent-to him a terra incognita-of passion from such predecessors in British literature as Burns and Byron, in whom he took the profoundest interest, he was so intensely individual, though not in any ignoble sense 'colossally egotistic,' that in his case, as in theirs, it is undesirable, and indeed practically impossible, to separate life from work or character from career Biography involves criticism as well as the accurate record of in cidents the Reminiscences and the Letters are as distinctly literature as Cromwell or Frederick the Great, Sartor Resartus is as much an autobiography as it is an exposition of mysticism, the fury of the Latter-Day Pamphlets is as sincere if not as pathetic as the wall of the suddenly bereaved life-partner of Jane Welsh Carlyle-'all of sunsline that remained in my life went out in that sudden moment, all of strength, too, seems to have gone,' the minute industry that discovers more of dyspepsia or of tobacco in a particular passage than of inspiration, and can tell from internal evidence where the French Revolution was recommenced after the Mill fire, is something more than love's labour lost. This intense individuality accounts at once for Carlyle's enormous influence during the latter part of his life, the 'neglect' which followed his death, and the 'reaction' in his favour that has in turn succeeded the 'neglect'-the modern interpreters of which see nothing but Carlylism in action in modern British Imperialism and the gospel according to Lord Kitchener and Mr Rudyard Kipling

During the final twenty years of his life Carlyle was vastly more influential than Coleridge or Samuel Johnson or Pope, or indeed any other clarum ac venerabile nomen in English letters, not only did he preach directly to a generation that idolised him against his will, but he preached indirectly to it through the most popular and powerful of Victorian writers like Ruskin, Tennyson, Browning, Dickens, and Thackeray negative influence of Carlyle-the effect produced by his proclamation of an 'Evodus from Hounds ditch' and his diatribes against 'atheistic science,' and especially the 'dismal' variety of it-was at least as great as the positive A competent American critic, Mr W C Brownell, is fully justified in saying 'Much of what Carlyle wrote, the gospel that he expounded so contentiously and polemically, has now become a part of what we now call our subliminal possessions. What once seemed, and of course still is, elemental has become elementary as well' The merciless and deliberately designed self revelation of the Reminiscences, and of the literature of the 'personal equation' variety which followed in the wake of the Reminiscences, was necessary to a complete understanding of Carlyle It led to his being 'forsaken' by the superficially or blindly idolatrous—whose lip service he never wished for, and despised without measure when it came to himon the ground that the idol's feet were of clay, that he had 'behaved like a brute to his wife,' that he was 'meanly jealous' of his contemporaries, and perhaps above all that he imperfectly appreciated the humour, and did not at all appreciate the forenoon gin, of Charles Lamb More cautious if not indiscriminatingly 'sympathetic' critics saw in the Remniscences and their sequelæ but confirmation of their previous conviction that Carlyle had the defects of his strength, that if he had the prophet's vision and that force of will which overcomes mountains of physical disability, he had also the prophet's intolerance alike of the small vices that go with Bohemianism and of the compreliensive and contagious hedonism which is the outcome and practice of 'art for art's sake,'

According to the popular, loose, and unscientific social classification of the time, Carlyle was a 'peasant' He had the 'peasant's' robustness of body and mind, the 'peasant's' contempt for the superficialities and even subtleties of refinement, the 'peasant's' incontinence of graphic speech, and especially of depreciatory characterisation. So he was incapable, until it was too late, of understand ing or giving those delicacies of affectionate attention which to his wife, with her 'middle-class' birth, environment, and upbringing, were of great if not supreme importance. Such defects are also responsible for most of his hasty and unjust judgments, for his ultra Covenanter's hatred and ignorance of 'art' and 'pleasure,' for his refusal even to read that type of poetry of which Keats was and still is the richest voice, his relegation of Scott to the category of mere restaurateurs, his inability to see 'one great thought in all Voltaire's six and thirty quartos,' his dismissal of the most emphatically epoch making book of modern times with 'The Origin of Species showed up the capricious stupidity of mankind, never could read a page of it and waste the least thought upon it?

Practical mysticism, finally adopted as a creed on the fateful day of 'spiritual new birth' in Leith Walk, was the centre and secret, if not the Alpha and the Omega, of Carlyle. It dominated his life and conduct, it is the adequate explanation -or the nearest approach to an adequate explanation that is now possible-of his glorious inconsistencies in religion, politics, ethics, and economics It guided him to the choice of subjects in literature, and impregnated his treatment of them, it explains the splendour of his visions, the pungency of his satire, and what he himself termed the 'conflagration' of his prose-poetry Accept the first principles of this mysticism, which may be largely German in its final development—Taine derived it from Goethe and Hegel, but it is no less suggestive of Eckhardt-but which seems to recall some 'hour of moaning midnight,' when the kirk of Dunscore 'hung spectral in the sky and being was as if swallowed up of darkness,' and acquiescence in the Carly lian gospel of liero worship, veracity, and hard work is virtually inevitable. Agree that 'life is but a thawing ice board on a sea with sunny shore,' that men are but the earthly vestures of spiritual forces, and the most famous of Carlyle's purple patches stand forth as articles of faith

Carlyle being emphatically a thinker sur generis, it is impossible to assign him a definite position in any literary class or caste. Profoundly religious, contending vehemently that 'thought without Reverence is harren, perhaps poisonous,' the sworn foe of 'atheism' and 'beaver science,' holding that strong was he that had a Church, what we can call a Church,' he yet declared that 'it is as certain as mathematics that no such thing as a miracle has ever been,' that 'all manner of pulpits are as good as broken and abolished,' and that 'the' he admired the foremost-force in that alterature

Temple of Sorrow, founded some eighteen centuries ago, now lies in ruins, overgrown with jungle, the habitation of doleful creatures' He called loudly for an 'Exodus from Houndsditch,' but he had no map of the Promised Land, and flatly declined to lead the way to it. Passionately devoted to social order, maintaining that it is the duty and mission of heroes to discipline into such order, if need be with whips and scorpions, the millions, 'mostly fools,' who inhabit the earth, he yet cannot be ticketed Conservative or Liberal Distrusting if not dreading 'Revolt,' he yet declared, 'I am not a Tory, no, but one of the deepest though perhaps the quietest of Radicals,' and denounced modern materialism-the 'gospel of wealth' and the practice of idleness-with a fierce eloquence which no disciple of Lassalle, Mary, or Bakunin has ever commanded

It is no less difficult to say in which department of literature Carlyle especially excelled, and which is likely to be his most enduring achievement. With the exception—and that a doubtful exception —of Sartor Resartus, all his masterpieces, the French Revolution, Cromwell, Frederick, the best of his lectures and essays, belong to the (in his case at all events) conjunct department of history and biography But even as a historian-even when toiling over the battlefields of the Seven Years' War-he was, and could not help being, prophet, preacher, and poet Indeed, it is because he has successfully insisted on the elements of life connoted by these three designations being fully acknowledged in history and biography that he can be claimed as a successful literary revolu In Germany Frederick is regarded as tionary his masterpiece, and naturally so, because in it he beat the German historians at their own favourite weapon of patient industry not alone in thinking that 'in Cromwell one can touch the truth itself' Carlylians of the cercle intime will ever be found worshipping at; the But as a mere effective per shrine of Sartor formance, the French Revolution is, in spite of the minor historical inaccuracies which it has been proved to contain, probably the most successful of all his works, and his view of that still imperfectly understood social convulsion is now the world's 'He stands,' says Dr Holland Rose in his inno tated edition of the book, after dealing with the inaccuracies already alluded to, 'on a far higher plane than the turgid and rhetorical Lamartine. He yields the palm to Mignet and De Tocqueville in regard to philosophic generalisations, but then we rise from a perusal of their neat and orderly chapters ignorant-that there was such a thing as the guillotine' -

Being what he was, Carlyle had no master, and is not likely to have a successor. At an early period in his career he saturated his mind with German literature, since that seemed to be nearer the truth than any other of his time, and because, as he said, 'Goethe's is the only healthy mind, of any extent, that I have discovered in Europe for long generations, it was he who first convincingly proclaimed to me, "Behold, even in this scandalous Sceptico Epicurean generation, when all is gone but hunger and cant, it is still possible that man be a man": There may be traces of Richter in Carlyle's style, although, as Professor Saintsbury points out, 'something may be traced to our own more fantastic writers in the seventeenth century, such as Sir Thomas Urquhart in Scotland and Sir Roger L'Estrange in England, much to a Scottish fervour and quaintness blending itself with and utilising a wider range of reading than had been usual with Scotsmen, most to the idiosyncrasy of the individual. It was enough for Carlyle that he made for himself a style which forced the austere Thoreau to say, 'His mastery over the language is unrivalled, it is with him a keen, resistless weapon,' which makes him the rival of Milton, Burke, and Ruskin in eloquence, of Dunbar, Swift, and Richter in humour It was Carlyle's individuality that made him the force that he was during his lifetime, it is that individuality which will cause him to be resorted to in the future for consolution and stimulus He has since his death been revealed, in all his weakness as well Yet of none of the sons of as all his strength letters may the British nation be more whole heartedly proud, because none had a higher conception of his calling, none more thoroughly carried into action his own gospel that 'no mortal has a right to wag his tongue, much less to wag his pen, without saying something, he knows not what mischief he does, past computation, scattering words without meaning, to afflict the whole world yet before they cease.'

Life in Dumfriesshire

CRAIGI IPLTTOCK 25th September 1828

You inquire with such warm interest respecting our present abode and occupations, that I am obliged to say n few words about both, while there is still room left Dumfries is a pleasant town, containing about fifteen thousand inhabitants, and to be considered the centre of the trade and judicial system of a district which possesses some importance in the sphere of Scottish activity. Our residence is not in the town itself, but tifteen nules to the north west of it, among the granite fulls and the black morasses which stretch westward through Galloway, almost to the Irish Sea. In this wilderness of heath and rock, our estate stands forth a green oasis, a track of ploughed, partly enclosed, and planted ground, where corn ripens and trees afford a shade, although surrounded by sea mews and rough woolled sheep Here, with no small effort, have we built and furnished a neat, substantial dwelling, here, in the absence of a professional or other office, we live to cultivate literature according to our strength, and in our own peculiar way We wish a joyful growth to the roses and flowers of our garden, we hope for health and peaceful thoughts to further our aims. The roses, indeed, are still in part to be planted, but they blossom already in anticipation Iwo ponies, which carry us everywhere, and the mountain air, are the best medicines for weak nerves. This daily exercise, to which I am much devoted, is my only recreation, for this nook of ours is the loneliest in Britain-six miles removed from any one likely to visit me. Here Rousseau would have been as happy as on his island of St Pierre My town friends, indeed, ascribe my sojourn here to a similar disposition, and forebode me no good result came licre solely with the design to simplify my way of life, and to seeme the independence through which I could be enabled to remain true to myself. This bit of earth is our own, here we can live, write, and think, as best pleases ourselves, even though Zeilus himself were to be crowned the monarch of literature. Nor is the solitude of such great importance, for a stage coach takes us speedily to Edinburgh, which we look upon as our British Weimer And have I not, too, at this moment, piled upon the table of my little library, a whole cartload of Freuch, German, American, and Linglish journals and penodiculs—whatever may be their worth? Of antiquarian studies, too, there is no lick I rom some of our heights I can desery, about a day's journey to the west, the hill where Agricola and his komans left a camp belind them At the foot of it I was born, and there both father and mother still live to love me so one must let time work But whither am I wander ing? Let me confess to you, I am uncertain about my future literary activity, and would gladly learn your opinion respecting it, at least pray write to me again, and speedily, that I may ever feel myself united to The only piece of any importance that I have written since I came here is an Essay on Burns Perhaps you never heard of him, and yet he is a man of the most decided genius, but born in the lowest rank of persant life, and through the entanglements of his peculiar position, was at length mournfully wreeked, so that what he effected is comparatively unimportant He died in the middle of his career, in the year 1796 We Luglish, especially we Scotch, love Burns more than any poet that haed for centuries. I have often been struck by the fact that he was born a few months before Schiller, in the year 1759, and that neither of them ever heard the other's name. They shone like stars in opposite hemispheres, or, if you will, the thick mist of earth intercepted their reciprocal light (From letter to Goethe)

Reminiscence of Craigenputtock.

We went over often from Craigenputtock (to Templand) were always a most welcome arrival, surprise oftenest, and our bits of visits, which could never be prolonged, were uniformly pleasant on both sides. One of our chief pleasures, I think almost our chief, during these moor land years. Oh those pleasant gig drives, in fine leafy twilight, or deep in the night sometimes, ourselves two alone in the world, the good 'Larry' faring its (rather too light for the job, but always soft and willing), how they rise on me now, benignantly luminous from the bosom of the grim dead night! Night! what would I give for one, the very worst of them, at this moment? Once we had gone to Dumfries, in a soft misty December day (for a portrait which my darling wanted, not of her self I), a bridge was found broken as we went down. brook unsafe by night, we had to try 'Cluden (Lower Cairn) Water' road, as all was mist and pitch darkness, on our return, road unknown except in general, and drive like no other in my memory Cairn lioarsely roaring on the left (my darling s side), 'Larry,' with but one lamp-candle (for we had put out the other, lest both might fall done), bending always to be straight in the light of that, I really anxious, though speaking only hopefully, my darling so full of trust in me, really happy and opulently interested in these equipments, in these poor and dangerous circumstances how opulent is a nobly royal heart! She had the worthless 'portrait' (pencil sketch by a wandering German, announced to us by poor and hospitable Mrs Richardson, once a 'novelist' of mark, much of a gentlewoman and well loved by us both) safe in her reticule, 'better far than none,' she clieerfully said of it, and the price, I think, had been 5s, fruit of her thrift too -well, could California have made me and her so rich, had I known it (sorry gloomy mortal) just as she did? To noble hearts such wealth is there in poverty itself, and impossible without poverty! I saw ahead, high in the mist, the minarets of Dunscore Kirk, at last, glad sight, at Mrs Broatch's cosy rough inn, we got 'Larry' fed, ourselves dried and refreshed (still seven miles to do, but road all plain), and got home safe, after a pleasant day, in spite of all Then the drive to Bore land once (George Welsh's, 'Uncle George,' youngest of the Penfillans), heart of winter, intense calm frost, and through Dumfries, at least thirty five miles for poor 'Larry' and us, very beautiful that too, and very strange, past the base of towering New Abbey, huge ruins, pierc ing grandly into the silent frosty sunset, on this hand, despicable cowhouse of Presbyterian kirk on that hand (sad new contrast to Devorgilla's old bounty), &c., &c. -of our drive home again I recollect only her invincible contentment, and the poor old cotter woman offering to warm us with a flame of dry broom, 'A'll licht a bruim coucy, if ye ll please to come in!' Another time we had gone to Dumfries Cattle Show (first of its race, which are many since), a kind of lark on our part, and really entertaining, though the day proved shockingly wet and muddy, saw various notabilities there-Sir James Grahame (buddish, proud man, we both thought by physiognomy, and did not afterwards alter our opinion much), Ramsay Macculloch (in sky-blue coat, shruingly on visit from London), &c., &c., with none of whom, or few, had we right (or wish) to speak, abundantly occu pied with seeing so many fine specimens, biped and quadruped (From Renuniscences, vol. u.)

The Philosophy of Clothes.

It was in some such mood, when wearied and fordone with these high speculations, that I first came upon the question of Clothes Strange enough, it strikes me, is this same fact of there being Tailors and Tailored. The Horse I ride has his own whole fell strip him of girths and flaps and extraneous tags I have fastened round him, and the noble creature is his own sempster and weaver and spinner, nay, his own bootmaker, jeweller, and man milliner, he bounds free through the valleys, with a perennial rain proof court suit on his body, wherein warmth and easiness of fit have reached perfection, nav, the graces also have been considered, and frills and fringes, with gay variety of colour, featly appended, and ever in the right place, are not wanting While I-good Heaven 1-have thatched myself over with the dead fleeces of sheep, the bark of vegetables, the entralls of worms, the hides of oxen or seals, the felt of furred beasts, and walk abroad a moving Rag-screen, overheaped with shreds and tatters raked from the Charnel house of Nature, where they would have rotted, to rot on me more slowly! Day after day, I must thatch myself auew, day after day, this despicable thatch must lose some film of its thickness. some film of it, frayed away by tear and wear, must be brushed off into the Ash pit, into the Laystall, till by degrees the whole has been brushed thither, and I, the dust making, patent Rag grinder, get new material to grind down O subter brutish 1 vale 1 most vile 1 For have not I too a compact all enclosing skin, whiter or dingier? Am I a botched mass of tailors' and cobblers' shreds, then, or a tightly articulated, homogeneous little Figure, automatic, nay alive? Strange enough how creatures of the human kind shnt their eyes to plainest facts, and by the mere mertia of Oblivion and Stapidity, live at ease in the midst of Wonders and Terrors. But indeed man is, and was always, a blockhead and dullard, much readier to feel and digest, than to think and con Prejudice, which he pretends to hate, is his absolute lawgiver, mere use and wont everywhere leads him by the nose, thus let but a Rising of the Sun, let but a Creation of the World happen twice, and it ceases to be marvellous, to be noteworthy, or noticeable. Perhaps not once in a lifetime does it occur to your ordinary biped, of any country or generation, be he gold mantled Prince or russet jerkined peasant, that his Vestments and his Self are not one and indivisible, that he is naked, without vestments, till he buy or steal such, and by fore thought sew and button them For my own part, these considerations, of our Clothes-thatch, and how, reaching even to our heart of hearts, it tailorises and demoralises us, fill me with a certain horror at myself and man kind, almost as one feels at those Dutch Cows, which, during the wet season, you see grazing deliberately with jackets and petticoats (of striped sacking), in the meadows of Gouda. Nevertheless there is some thing great in the moment when a man first strips himself of adventitious wrappages, and sees indeed that he is naked, and as Swift has it, 'a forked straddling animal with bandy legs,' yet also a Spirit, and unutter able Mystery of Mysteries

Sentence on King Louis

Eye witnesses have represented this scene of the Third Voting, and of the votings that grew out of it,-a seeme protracted, like to be endless, lasting, with few brief intervals, from Wednesday till Sunday morning,-as one Long night of the strangest seen in the Revolution wears itself into day, morning's paleness is spread over all faces, and again the wintry shadows sink, and the dim lamps are lit but through day and night and the vicissitudes of hours, Member after Member is mounting continually those Tribune steps, pausing aloft there, in the clearer upper light, to speak his Fate word, then diving down into the dusk and throng again Phantoms in the hour of midnight, most spectral, pan demonial 1 Never did President Vergniand, or any terrestrial President, superintend the like. A King's Life, and so much else that depends thereon, hangs trembling in the balance. Man after man mounts, the buzz hushes itself till he have spoken Death, Banish ment, Imprisonment till the Peace. Many say, Death, with what cautious well studied phrases and paragraphs they could devise, of explanation, of enforcement, of faint recommendation to mercy Many too say, Banishment, something short of Death The balance trembles, none can yet guess whitherward. Whereat anxious Patriotism bellows, irrepressible by Ushers The poor Grondins, many of them, under such herce bellowing of Patriotism, say Death, justifying, motirant, that most miserable word of theirs by some brief casuistry and Vergmand himself says, Death, justifying by jesuitry Rich Lepelletier Saint Fargean had been of the Noblesse, and then of the Patriot Lest Side, in the Constituent, and had argued and reported, there and elsewhere, not a httle, against Capital Punishment nevertheless he now says, Death, a word which may cost him dear. Manuel did surely rank with the Decided in August last, but he has been sinking and backslid ing ever since September and the scenes of September In the Convention, above all, no word he could speak would find favour, he says now, Banishment, and in mute wrath quits the place forever,-much hustled in the corridors Philippe Egulité votes, in his soul and conscience, Death at the sound of which and of whom, even Patriotism shakes its head and there runs a groan and shudder through this Hall of Doom Robespierre's vote cannot be doubtful, his speech is long the figure of shrill Sieyes ascend, hardly pausing, passing merely, this figure says, 'La Mort sans phrase, Death vitliout phrases;' and fares onward and downward Most spectral, pandemonial! And yet if the Reader fancy it of a finnereal, sorrowful, or even grive charac ter, he is far mistaken 'the Ushers in the Mountain quarter,' says Mereier, 'had become as Box keepers at the Opera,' opening and shutting of Galleries for privileged persons, for 'D'Orleans Egalite's mistresses,' or other high-dizened women of condition, rustling with laces and tricolor Gallant Deputies pass and repass thitherward, treating them with ices, refreshments and small talk, the high dizened heads beck responsive, some have their card and pin, pricking down the Ayes and Noes, as at a game of Rouge et Noir Tarther aloft reigns Mere Duchesse with her unronged Amazons, she cannot be prevented making long Ha has, when the vote is not La Mort In these Galleries there is refection, drinking of wine and brandy, 'as in open tavern, en pleine tabagie ' Betting goes on in all coffee houses of the neighbourhood But within doors, fatigue, impatience, uttermost weariness sits now on all visages, lighted up only from time to time by turns of the game have fallen asleep, Ushers come and awaken them to vote other Members calculate whether they shall not have time to run and dine Figures rise, like phantoms, pale in the dusky lamplight, ufter from this Tribune, only one word Death 'Tout est optique,' says Mercier 'The world is all an optical shadow' Deep in the Thursday night, when the Voting is done, and Secretaries are summing it up, sick Duchâtel, more spectral than another, comes borne on a chair, wrapped in blankets, in 'nightgown and nightcap,' to vote for Mercy one vote it is thought may turn the scale. Ah no! In profoundest silence, President Vergniand, with a voice full of sorrow, has to say 'I declare, in the name of the Convention, that, the punishment it pronounces on Louis Capet is that of Death ' Death by a small majority of Fifty three Nay, if we deduct from the one side, and add to the other, a certain Twenty six, who said Death but coupled some faintest ineffectual surmise of mercy with it, the majority will be but one.

Pig Philosophy

Pig propositions, in a rough form, are somewhat as follows

- I The Universe, so far as sane conjecture can go, is an immersurable Swine's trough, consisting of solid and liquid, and of other contrasts and kinds,—especially consisting of attainable and unattainable, the latter in immensely greater quantities for most pigs
- 2 Moral evil is unattrinability of Pig's wash, moral good, attrinability of ditto
- 3 What is Paradise or the State of Innocence? Paradise, called also State of Innocence, Age of Gold, and other names, vas (according to Pigs of weak judgment) unlimited Attainability of Pig's wash, perfect fulfilment of one's wishes, so that the Pig's imagination could not outrun reality a fable and an impossibility, as Pigs of sense now sec
- 4 'Define the Whole Duty of Pigs.' It is the mission of universal Pighood, and the duty of all Pigs, at all times, to diminish the quantity of unattainable and in crease that of attainable. All knowledge and device and effort ought to be directed thither and thither only, Pig Science, Pig Enthusiasm and Devotion have this one aim. It is the Whole Duty of Pigs.
- 5 Pig Poetry ought to consist of the universal recognition of the excellence of Pig's wash and ground barley, and the felicity of Pigs whose trough is in order, and who have had enough Hrumph!
- 6 The Pig knows the weather, he ought to look out what kind of weather it will be
- 7 'Who made the Pig?' Unknown, -- perhaps the Porl butcher
- 8 'Have you Law and Justice in Pigdom?' Pigs of observation have discerned that there is, or was once supposed to be, a thing called justice. Undeniably at least there is a sentiment in Pig nature called indignation, revenge, &c., which, if one Pig provoke another comes out in a more or less destructive manner hence laws are necessary, amazing quantities of laws. For quarrelling is attended with loss of blood, of life, at any rate with frightful effusion of the general stock of Hog's wash, and rum (temporary rum) to large sections of the universal Swine's trough wherefore let justice be observed, that so quarrelling be avoided
- 9 'What is justice?' Your own share of the general Swine's trough, not any portion of my share
- 10 'But what is 'my' share?' Ah! there in fact lies the grand difficulty, upon which Pig science, meditating this long while, can settle absolutely nothing. My share—hrimph'—my share is, on the whole, whatever I can contrive to get without being hanged or sent to the hulks. For there are gibbets, treadmills, I need not tell you, and rules which Lawyers have presented.
- 11 'Who are Lawyers?' Servants of God, appointed revealers of the oracles of God, who read off to us from day to day what is the eternal Commandment of God in reference to the minual claims of his creatures in this world
- 12 'Where do they find that written?' In Coke upon Lyttelton
- 13 'Who made Coke?' Unknown the maker of Coke's wig is discoverable—'What became of Coke?' Died—'And then?' Went to the undertaker, went to the——But we must pull np Sauerteig's fierce himour, confounding ever farther in his haste the four footed with the two footed animal, rushes into wilder and wilder forms of satirical torch dancing, and threatens to end in a universal Rape of Wigs, which in a person of his character looks ominous and dangerous. Here, for example, is his fifty first 'Proposition,' as he calls it

51 'What are Bishops?' Overseers of souls.—'What is a soul?' The thing that keeps the body alive —'How do they oversee that?' They tic on a kind of aprons, publish charges, I believe they pray dreadfully, mace rate themselves nearly dead with continual grief that they cannot in the least oversee it —'And are much honoured?' By the wise very much

52 'Define the Church' I had rather not — Do you believe in a Tuture State?' Yes, surely — 'What is it?' Heaven, so-called — 'To everybody?' I under stand so, hope so!— 'What is it thought to be?' Hrumph! 'No Hell, then, at all?' Hrumph

English and American Idols

Jefferson Brick, the American Editor, twitted me with the multifarious patented anomalies of overgrown worth less Dukes, Bishops of Durham, &c , which poor English Society at present labours under, and is made a solecism To which what answer could I make, except that snrely our patented anomalics were some of them extremely light, and yet, alas, that they were not the ugliest! I said 'Have you also overgrown anomalous Dukes after a sort, appointed not by patent? Over grown Monsters of Wealth namely, who have made moncy by dealing in cotton, dealing in bicon, jobbing scrip, digging metal in California, who are become glittering man mountains filled with gold and preciosi ties, revered by the surrounding flunkeys, invested with the real powers of sovereignty, and placedly admitted by all men, as if Nature and Heaven land so appointed it, to be in a sense god like, to be royal, and fit to shine in the firmament, though their real worth is-what? Brick, do you know where human creatures reach the supreme of ugliness in idols? It were hard to know! We can say only, All idols have to tumble, and the hugest of them with the heaviest fall that is our chief comfort, in America as here. The Idol of Somnauth, a mere mass of coarse crockery, not worth five shillings of anybody's money, sat like a great staring god, with two diamonds for eyes, worshipped by the neighbouring black populations, a terror and divine mystery to all mortals, till its day came. Till at last, victorious in the name of Allah, the Commander of the Faithful, riding up with grim battle axe and heart full of Moslem fire, took the liberty to smite once, with right force and rage, said ugly mass of idolatrous crockery, which thereupon shivered, with unmelodious crash and jingle, into a heap of ugly potsherds, yielding from its belly half a wagon load of gold coins You can read it in Gibbon-probably, too, in Lord Ellenborough The gold coins, the diamond eves, and other valuable extrinsic parts were carefully picked up by the Faithful, confused jingle of intrinsic potsherds was left lying, -and the Idol of Somnauth once showing what it vas, had suddenly come to a conclu Thus end all Idols, and intrinsically worthless man mountains never so illuminated with diamonds, and filled with precious metals, and tremulously worshipped by the neighbouring flunkey populations, black or white,even thus, sooner or later, without fail, and are shot hastily, as a heap of potsherds, into the highway, to be crunched under wagon wheels, and do Macadam a little service, being clearly abolished as gods, and hidden from men's recognition, in that or other capacities, forever and a day 1 You do not sufficiently bethink you, my republican Our ugliest anomalies are done by universal friend. suffrage, not by patent The express nonsense of old Feudalism, even now, in its dotage, is nothing to the involuntary nonsense of modern Anarchy called 'Free dom,' 'Republicanism,' and other fine names, which expresses itself by supply and demand! Consider it a little. The Bishop of our Diocese is to me an incredible man, and has, I will grant you, very much more money than you or I would now give him for his work. One does not even read those Charges of his, much preferring speech which is articulate. In fact, being intent on a quiet life, you generally keep on the other side of the hedge from him, and strictly leave him to his own fate. Not a credible man, -perhaps not quite a safe man to be concerned with? But what think you of the 'Bobus of Houndsditch' of our parts? He, Sausage maker on the great scale, knows the art of cutting fit bacon, and exposing it seasoned with gray pepper to advantage Better than any other man he knows this art, and I take the liberty to say it is a poor one Well, the Bisliop has an income of five thousand pounds appointed him for his work, and Bobus, to such a length has he now pushed the trade in sausages, gains from the nniversal suffrage of men's souls and stomachs ten thousand a year by it. A poor art, this of Bobus's, I say, and worth no such recompense. For it is not even good sausages he makes, but only extremely vendible ones, the cunning dog 1 Judges pronounce his sausages bad, and at the cheap price even dear, and finer palates, it is whispered, have detected alarming symptoms of horse flesh, or worse, under this cunningly-devised gray pepper spice of his, so that for the world I would not eat one of his sausages, nor would you You perceive he is not an excellent honest sausage maker, but a dishonest cunning and scan dalous sausage maker, worth, if he could get his deserts, who shall say what? Probably certain shillings a week, say forty, possibly (one shudders to think) a long round in the treadmill, and stripes instead of shillings! And yet what he gets, I tell you, from universal suffrage, and the unshackled ne plus ultra republican justice of man kind, is twice the income of that anomalous Bishop you were talking of! The Bishop I for my part do much The Bishop has human sense and prefer to Bobus breeding of various kinds, considerable knowledge of Greek, if you should ever want the like of that, know ledge of many things, and speals the English language in a grammatical manner. He is bred to courtesy, to dignified composure, as to a second nature, a gentleman every fibre of him, which of itself is something very considerable. The Bishop does really diffuse round him an influence of decorum, conrteous patience, solid adherence to what is settled, teaches practically the necessity of 'consuming one's own smoke,' and does practically in his own case burn said smoke, making lambent flame and mild illumination out of it, for the good of man in several particulars While Bobus, for twice the annual money, brings sausages, possibly of horseflesh, cheaper to market than another! Briek, if you will reflect, it is not 'aristocratic England,' it is the United Postcrity of Adam, who are grown, in some essential respects, stuplder than barbers' blocks. Barbers' blocks would at least say nothing, and not elevate, by their universal suffrages, an unfortunate Bobus to that bad height. (From Latter Day Pamphlets Hudson's Statue)

The Battle of Torgau.

For the thing is vital, if we knew it Close ahead of Mollendorf, when he is through this Pass, close on Mollendorf's left, as he wheels round on the attacking Austrians, is the south west corner of Siptitz Height. South west corner, highest point of it, summit and key of all that Battle area, rules it all, if you get cannon thither It hangs steepish on the southern side, over the Rohr graben, where this Mollendorf Austrian fight begins, but it is beautifully accessible, if you bear round to the west side,—a fine saddle shaped bit of clear ground there, in shape like the outside or seat of a saddle, Domitsch Wood the crupper part, summit of the Height the pommel, only nothing like so steep -it is here (on the southern saddle flap, so to speak), gradually mounting to the crupper and pommel part, that the agony now is And here in utter darkness, illuminated only by the musketry and cannon blazes, there ensued two hours of stiff wrestling in its kind not the fiercest spasm of all, but the final which decided all. Lestwitz, Hulsen, come sweeping on, led by the sound and the fire, 'beating the Prussian march, they,' sharply on all their drums,-Prussian march, rat tat tan, sharply through the gloom of Chros in that manner, and join themselves, with no mistake made, to Mollendorl's, to Ziethen's, left and the saddle flap there, and fall on The night is pitch dark, says Archenholtz, you cannot see your hand before Old Hulsen's bridle horses were all shot away, when he heard this alarm, far off no horse left, and he is old, and has his own bruises. He seated himself on a cannon, and so rides, and arrives, right welcome the sight of lum, doubt not! And the fight rages still for an hour and more About 9 at night all the Austrians are rolling off, eastward, castward Prussians goading them forward what they could (firing not quite done till 10) and that all important pointiel of the saddle is indisputably won. The Austrians settled them selves in a kind of half moon shape, close on the suburbs of forgau, the Prussians in a parallel half moon posture, some furlongs behind them. The Austrians sat but a short time, not a moment longer than was indispensable. Daun perceives that the key of his ground is gone from him, that he will have to send a second Courier to And, above all things, that he must forthwith get across the Elbe and away Lucky for him that he has Three Bridges (or Four, including the Town Bridge), and that his Baggage is already all aeross and standing With excellent despatch and order Daun on wheels winds himself across,-all of him that is still coherent, and indeed, in the distant parts of the Battle field, wander ing Austrian parties were admonished hitherward by the River's voice in the great darkness,-and Daun's loss in prisoners, though great, was less than could have been expected 8000 m all On Torgau field behind that final Prussian half moon, there reigned, all night, a confusion which no tongue can express. Poor wounded men by the hundred and the thousand, weltering in their blood, on the cold wet ground, not surgeons or nurses, but merciless predatory sutlers, equal to murder if neces sary, waiting on them and on the happier that were 'Unutterable!' says Archenholtz, who, though wounded, had crawled or got carried to some village The living wandered about in gloom and uncer tainty, lucky he whose haversack was still his, and a crust of bread in it water was a priceless luxnry, almost nowhere discoverable. Prussian Generals roved about with their Staff officers seeking to reform their Bat talions, to little purpose. They had grown indignant, in some instances, and were vociferously imperative and minatory, 'but in the dark who needed mind them?—they went raving elsewhere, and, for the first time, Prussian word of command saw itself futile? Pitch darkness, bitter cold, ground transpled into mire. On Siptitz Hill there is nothing that will burn further back, in the Domitsch Woods, are numerous fine fires, to which Austrians and Prussians alike gather. 'Peace and truce between us, to morrow morning, we will see which are prisoners, which are captors.' So pass the wild hours, all hearts longing for the dawn, and what decision it will bring.

WILLIAM WALLACE

Thomas Wright (1810-77), born near Ludlow of Quaker parentage, graduated at Trinity, Cambridge, and in 1836 commenced man of letters in London Elected FSA in 1837, he helped to found the Camden, Percy, and Shakespeare Societies and the Archeological Association. He published upwards of eighty works, several of them on medical England in various aspects, linguistic, social, and other. He wrote on sorcery and magic, on womankind in Western Europe, on caricature. The Celt, the Roman, and the Saxon is one of his best known works, there were also a Biographia

Britannica Literaria (1842-46), his dictionary of Obsolete and Provincial English, and his edition of the Anglo Latin twelfth century satirists, be sides Archaelogical Essays, Wanderings of an Antiquary, and many others

Thomas Crofton Croker (1798-1854) was a diligent collector of the folklore, poetical traditions, and antiquities of Ireland A native of Cork, he was apprenticed in 1814 to a Quaker merchant, and four years later got an Admiralty clerkship through John Wilson Croker, a friend, but no relation, of his father's This post he retained till 1850 1824 appeared his Researches in the South of Ireland, in 1825-27, Fairy Legends and Traditions of the South of Ireland And amongst his other works were Legends of the Lakes (1828), Daniel O'Rourke (1829), Barney Mahones (1832), My Village versus Our Village (1832), Popular Songs of Ireland (1839), and Historical Songs of Ireland (1841) The tales of Barney Mahoney and My Village are his most original works, and neither is of supreme excellence. Miss Mitford no doubt occasionally dressed her village en vaudeville, but Croker in his village errs on the opposite side-producing a series of Dutch paintings too little relieved by imagination or passion is happiest among the funciful legends of his native country, treasuring up their romantic features, quoting fragments of song, hitting off a dialogue or merry jest, or chronicling the peculi arities of his countrymen, their humours, their superstitions, their attractive and entertaining unconventionality

William Barnes (1800-86), foremost of English dialect poets, was probably England's truest pastoral poet, and was a lyrist of real power Sprung of good old yeoman stock, he was born at Rushay in the north east angle of Dorsetslire, and from school at Sturminster passed into a local solicitor's office By 1820 he was practising woodengraving, studying languages, and writing verses in Dorchester In 1822 he published Orra, a Lapland Tale, and in 1823 began schoolmaster's work at Mere in Wilts, transferred in 1835 to Dorchester A few years later his name was on the books of St. John's, Cambridge (whence in 1850 he had the degree of BD), and, ordained in 1847, added to his school duties a curicy at Whitcomb, three niles from Dorchester From 1862 he was rector of Winterborne Came, within two miles of Dorchester, and there the rest of his life was spent time he had been making himself widely known by his fine idyllic poetry in the Dorsetshire dialect, 'the bold and broad Done of England' His first volume of poems appeared in 1844, the second, the well known Havomely Rhymes, in 1859, the third in 1862, the three, collected together in 1879, and published as Poems of Rural Life in the Dorset Dialect, are marked by strughtforward simplicity and sincerity of style, with rire imaginative insight into the simple joys and sorrows of country life. But his sympathetic affection for the human life that 'clothes the soil' is paralleled by his patience in observing the quiet life of nature. and his power of reproducing artistically for others the impression it makes upon the mind. sweet air of southern England blows through every stanza lie writes, and lias liad a charm of quite singular influence on thousands who liave seen Dorsetshire but with the inward eye. His verses are none the less artistic that the art is all un conscious, and none the less attractive that the representation of man and nature in them is within its limits completely true, it need not be matter of complaint that he had eyes rather for the pathos and beauty of country life than for its squalor and misery He did not even take all Dorsetshire for his province, as Mr Hirdy his pointed out, the chief scenes of his poetic inspiration were confined to the north and north west of the county, to 'the secluded vale of Blackmore, whose margin formed the horizon of his boyhood? But though his world was Dorsetshire, he was emphatically a man of exceptional culture, it is odd to have proof that the Dorsetshire Burns, the Wessey Theoritus, was consciously and largely—if not very visibly—influ enced by the poetry of the learned humanist, Petrarch, and the philosophical Persian, Sadi. 'Ten in our Professor Palgrave said of him time equal him in variety and novelty of motive, in quantity of true, sweet inspiration and musical None have surpassed him in exquisite verse wholeness and unity of execution?

Barnes made himself well known also by his chivalrous attempt to preserve the purity of the mother-tongue He was an eager philologist, read French and Italian from his wonth up, mastered Welsh, Russi in, Hebrew, Hindustani, and Persian, but as early as 1849 published an Anglo-Saxon His Outline of English Speech craft delectus (1878) is an attempt to teach the English language in purely English words and to inspire abhorrence of Latinisms His so-called English substitutes for customary 'foreign' words can hardly be accounted happy, language is 'speech craft,' tenses are 'time takings,' adjectives are 'mark-words of sucliness,' degrees of comparison are 'pitchmarks,' and sentences like 'These pitchmarks offmark sundry things by their sundry suchnesses' make large demands He wrote several upon the reader's ingenuity works of value on philological subjects, and kept up an active interest in the progress of English scholarship almost till his death at the ape age of eighty-six.

Evenen in the Village

Now the light o' the west is a turn'd to gloom,
An' the men be at hwome vrom ground,
An' the bells be a zenden all down the Coombe,
From tower, their mwonnsome sound
An the wind is still,

An' the wind is still,
An' the house dogs do bark,
An' the rooks be a vied to the elems high an' dark,
An' the water do roar at mill.

An' the flickeren light drough the window peane Vrom the candle's dull fleame do shoot,
An' young Jemmy the smith is a gone down leane,
A playen his shrill valced flute
An' the miller's man
Do zit down at his ease
On the seat that is under the cluster o' trees, Wi' his pipe an' his cider can

May

Come out o' door, 'tis Spring t' 'tis May,
The trees be green, the yields be gay,
The weather's warm, the winter blast,
Wi' all his trun o' clouds, is past,
The zun do rise while yo'k do sleep,
To teake a higher daily zweep,
Wi' cloudless feace a flingen down
His sparklen light upon the groun'

The air's a streamen soft-come drow The windor open, let it blow In drough the house, where vire, an' door A shut, kept out the ewold avore Come, let the vew dull embers die, An' come below the open sky, An' wear your best, vor fear the groun' In colours gay mid sheame your gown An' goo an' rig wi' me a mile Or two up over geate an' stile, Drough zunny parrocks that do lead, Wi' crooked hedges, to the mead, Where elems high, in steately ranks, Do rise vrom yollow conslip banks, An' blrds do twitter vrom the spray O' bushes deck'd wi' snow white may, An' gil'cups, wi' the deaisy bed, Be under ev'ry step you tread

We'll wind up roun' the hill, an' look All down the thickly timber'd nook, Out where the squier's house do show His grey wall'd peaks up drough the row O' sheady elems, where the rook Do build her nest, an' where the brook Do creep along the meads, an' lie To catch the brightness o' the sky, An' cows, in water to their knees, Do stan' a whisken off the viees

Mother o' blossoms, and ov all That's fear a yield vrom Spring till Fall,
The gookoo over white weav'd seas
Do come to zing in thy green trees,
An' buttervlees, in giddy flight,
Do gleam the mwost by thy gay light.
Oh! when, at last, my fleshly cyes
Shall shut upon the vields an' skies,
Mid zummer's zunny days be gone,
An' winter's clouds be comen on Nor mid! draw upon the e'th, O' thy sweet ar my leätest breath,
Alassen! mid want to stay Behine for thee, O flow'ry May!

The Life of Barnes is by his daughter, Mrs Baxter (*Leader Scott 1887) the obition; appreciation in the Athenaum (Oct 16, 1886) was by Mr Thomas Hard;

Richard Henry (or Hengist) Horne (1803-1884) was born in London, and died at Margate at the age of eighty-one, after many picturesque adventures in life and letters. He was educated at Sandhurst for the East India Company's service, but did not get a nomination, his youth was spent in quest of danger by sea and land As a Mexican midshipman he went through the Mexican war, and he toyed with death in the form of sharks, shipwreck, mutiny, fire, and Returning to England, he began vellou fever his poetic career by contributing in 1828 a long poem entitled 'Hecatompylos' to the Athenaum Angrily ambitious, he made many enemies by his Exposition of the False Medium and Barriers excluding Men of Genius from the Public (1833), in which he attacked literary middlemen, and laid the-foundations of that edifice of Ishmaelitism in which he lived for half a century. His fame, indeed, was largely due to his pugnacity. He is best known by Orron, an 'epic poem' which he published in 1843, 'price one farthing' It soon went through six editions, the author having aroused public curiosity by the eccentricity of his contempt for public taste. The antithesis between the poem and its price is not great. It is an allegory, not an epic. Allegory is a theme for prose, not for poetry Who cares a straw for the allegorical element in Dante, in Spenser's Facrie Queene, or in Tennyson's Idylls? The greatest allegory in the world is The Pilgrini's Progress, it is written in prose, and could not have been written in poetry Orion is supposed to illustrate the growth of a poet's mind by means of abstract ideas embodied in persons taken from the Greek mythology Abstraction is piled on abstraction, incongruity on incongruity When Wordsworth tried to record in The Prelude 'the origin and progress of his own powers,' he spoke directly, and not through a mist of myth Horne'ş temper ıs not poetic. He has no vitalising imagination, no sense of verbal beauty, no personal vision vague poetic diction has all the qualities of verse He is often eloquent, graceful, except poetry vigorous, but he never crosses the magical border that separates the imitator from the creator chief plays, Cosmo de Medici, The Death of Marlowe, and Judas Iscarrot, are undistinguished Among his voluminous miscellanies The New Spirit of the Age (1844) is interesting only because Miss Barrett (afterwards Mrs Browning) assisted in its production His best line is

There's always morning somewhere in the world

In 1852 he went with William Howitt to Australia, where he was for a time a magistrate, and it was on his return in 1869 that 'Hengist' took the place of 'Henry' in his name.

JAMES DOUGLAS

Robert Smith Smitces (1802-64), of Ham sterley Hall, Durham, the representative of an ancient county family, started in life as a solicitor in London, and, being unsuccessful in his business, took to sporting journalism, and in 1831 became editor of the new Sporting Magazine columns he developed the character of John Jorrocks, a parvenu I ondon grocer with an ambition to shine as a Master of Foxhounds, and pub lished a collection of these articles under the title of Jorrocks's Jaunts (1838) Lockhart, who was taken by the book, suggested that the author should write a novel, and Surtees, who had now succeeded to the ancestral estate, took the advice and brought out his series of sporting novels, of which the best known are Mr Sponge's Sporting Tour (1853), Handles Cross, or the Spa Hunt (1854), Ask Mamma (1858), Plain or Ringlets? (1860), and Mr Farey Romford's Hounds (1865) They are jovial and rollicking, but rather vulgir, and one would need to be a wearer of the red coat and top boots to appreciate them to the full saving feature is their coloured etchings and other illustrations in John Leech's best style

The other Robert Surtees (1779-1834) Scott's antiquarian friend was also a squire in Durham educated at Christ Church, Oxford, who wrote a history of his county and contributed (as nuclent) to Scott's Hinstielly his own 'Barthram's Dirge and The Death of Featherstonehaugh.

George Outram (1805-56), author of 'The Annuity, and probably the first in Scotland, since the days of Sir Richard Mutland, to turn the dry processes of law to poetic account, was born at Clyde Ironworks, Glasgon, of which his father was the managing partner. Benjamin Outram the famous civil engineer, was his uncle, and Sir James Outiam, one of the defenders of Lucknow, his Educated at Edinburgh, he was called to the Bar there in 1827, and gained considerable repute in practice as a chamber counsel years later he became editor of the Glasgov Herald, and he retained this position, as well as that of part-proprietor of the paper, till his death A close friend of Professor Wilson, Outrim col laborated in the production of the Dies Borialis, which followed the more famous Noctes 1mbro His Legal Lyrus were first printed privately in 1851, and afterwards published with a biography in 1874 and 1888. His best piece is 'The Annuity,' justly reputed for its vein of peculiar dry humour A reply in similar vein, 'The Annuitant's Answer,' was written by Outram's friend, Dr Robert Chambers

The Annuity

I gaed to spend a week in Fife—
An unco week it proved to me—
For there I met a waesome wife
Lamentin' her viduity
Her grief brak' out sac fierce and fell,
I thought her heart wad burst its shell,
And—I was sac left to mysel'—
I sell't her an annuity

The bargain lookit fair encueli—
She just was turned o' saxty three,
I couldn't guessed she'd prove sac teach
By human ingenuity
But years hac come and years hac gane,
An' there she's yet as stieve's a stane—
The lumnier's growin' young again
Since she got her annuity

She's erined awa' to brine and skin,
But that, it seems, is nought to me—She's like to live although she's in
The last stage of tennity
She munches wi' her wizened gums,
An' stimps about on legs o' thrums,
But comes as sure as Christmas comes Lo ca' for her annuity

I read the tables drawn we care

l or an insurance company

Iler chance o' life was stated there

We perfect perspicinty

But tables here, or tables there,

She's lived ten years beyond her share,

An's like to live a down mair,

lo ca for her annuity

Last Yule she had a fearfu' hoast,
I thought a kind might set me free
I led her out 'mang snaw and frost,
We constant assiduity
But deal may care! the blast gaed by
And missed the auld anatomy,
It just cost me a tooth, forbye Discharging her annuity

If there's a sough of cholera
Or typhus who see gleg as she?
She buys up boths an' drugs an a'
In siecan superfluity!
She doesna need—she's fever proof.
The pest gred ower her very roof.
She taild me sae, an' then her loof.
Held out for her annuity.

Ae day she fell—her arm she brak'—
A compound fracture as could be.
Not been the cure wad undertak'
Whate'er was the gratuity
It's cured! She handles't like a flail
It does as weel in bits as hale
But I'm a broken man mysel'
Wi' her and her annuity

Her broozled flesh and broken banes
Are weel as flesh an' banes can be,
She beats the tacds that lives in stanes,
An fatten in vacuity
They die when they 're exposed to air—
They canna thole the atmosphere,
But her '—expose her onywhere,
She lives for her annuity

The water drup wears out the rock,
As this eternal juid wears ine,
I could withstand the single shock,
But not the continuity

It's pay me here, an' pay me there, An' pay me, pay me everman, I'll gang dimented wi' despair— I'm charged for her annuity

Henry Glassford Bell (1805-74) was one of the younger men of the coterie in Edinburgh who gathered about 'Christopher North,' and he was immortalised by that writer as 'Tallboys' in the famous Noctes Ambrosiana Born in Glasgow, and son of a Glasgow advocate, he was educated in Edinburgh, and for some years devoted himself to a life of letters there. He wrote for Constable's Miscellany a 'Memoir of Mary Queen of Scots,' which was translated into several languages, and lie established and edited with much success for three years the Edinburgh Literary Journal He printed privately a volume of Poems in 1824, but his first published volume, Summer and Winter Hours, appeared in 1831 My Old Portfolio, a collection of pieces in prose and verse, was published in the following year. In this year also he was admitted to the Scottish Bar, at which he soon distinguished himself. As a junior counsel in the famous trial of the Glasgow cotton spinners he attracted the notice of Sheriff Alison the historian, and in consequence was appointed a Sheriff Substitute of Lanarkshire in 1839 Twentyeight years later, on the death of Alison, he became Sheriff-Principal In various fields of letters his work ran to twelve volumes, and at the time of his death he was engaged on an edition of the poems of David Gray remembered, however, by the best poem of his early years, it is probable that many one their impression of the luckless Scottish queen, Mary, less to the pages of actual history than to a couple of works of imagination-Scott's Abbot and Bell's Mary Queen of Scots

From Mary Queen of Scots'

The scenc was changed —It was an eve of raw and surly mood,

And in a turret chamber high of ancient Holyrood

Sat Mary, listening to the rain, and sighing with the winds

That seemed to suit the stormy state of men's uncertain minds

The touch of care had blanched her cheek, her smile was sadder now,

The weight of royalty had pressed too heavy on her brow,

And traitors to her councils came, and rebels to the field,

The Stuart sceptre well she swaved, but the sword she could not wield

She thought of all her blighted hopes—the dreams of youth's brief day,

And summoned Rizzio with his lute, and bade the minstrel play

The songs she loved in other years, the songs of gay Navarre,

The songs perchance, that erst were sung by gallant Chatelar

They half beguiled her of her cares, they soothed her into smiles,

They won her thoughts from bigot zeal and fierce domestic broils.

But hark! the tramp of armed men! the Douglas battle cry!

They come, they come! and lol the scowl of Ruthven's hollow eye!

Stern swords are drawn, and daggers gleam—her words, her prayers are vain—

The ruffian steel is in his heart—the faithful Rizzio's slain!

Then Mary Stuart brushed aside the tears that trickling

'Now for my father s arm,' she said, 'my woman's heart farewell'

The scene was changed —It was a lake, with one small lonely isle,

And there, within the prison walls of its baronial pile,

Stern men stood menacing their queen, till she sliould stoop to sign

The trutorous scroll that snatched the crown from her ancestral line.

'My lords, my lords' the captive cried, 'were I but once more free,

With ten good knights on yonder shore, to aid my cause and me,

That parchment would I scatter wide to every breeze that blows,

And once more reign a Stuart queen, o er my remorseless foes '

A red spot burned upon her cheek, streamed her rich tresses down,

She wrote the words, she stood ercet—a queen without a crown!

Philip Meadows Taylor (1808-76), the son of a Liverpool merchant descended from the original John Taylor of Norwich (see Vol II p 712), was born at Liverpool, and held a mercantile post in Calcutta, but still a boy, he obtained a commission in the army of the Nizam of Hyderabad, and served him from 1826 as a skilful, strong, but kindly administrator, for savage chaos substituting order, for barbaric tyranny even handed justice, during the Mutiny he succeeded in maintaining peace. After the Mutiny the British Government gave him charge of some of the ceded districts of the Deccan, in 1860 he came home a colonel, and was created CSI He has left vivid pictures of Indian lustory, life, and manners in his romances—Confessions of a Thing (1839, new ed 1858), Tippoo Sultaun (1840), Tara (1863), Ralph Darnell (1865), Secta (1873), and A Noble Queen (1878) The Confissions of a Thug especially may almost be said to do for a phase of Indian life (happily extinct) what Hajji Baba did for Persia, without special charm of style, Taylor fascinates by the inevitable truth of his story, and surrounds his stay at-home renders with a central Indian atmosphere full of strangeness and terror His Story of my Life (1877, new ed 1881) is only less fascinating than his best romances, themselves largely founded on fact

Charles Robert Darwin,

naturalist and evolutionist thinker, was born at Shrewsbury on the 12th of February 1809, in the same year, therefore, as Tennyson, Gladstone, Abraham Lincoln, and Oliver Wendell Holmes He had a rich intellectual inheritance grandfither, Dr Erasmus Darwin (see Vol I p 572), one of the pioneers of the Evolution Theory, was a man of great originality, a shrewd observer, and a poctic genius, with-by the way -nother famous grandson, Mr Francis Galton, his father, Dr Robert Waring (1766-1848), was a wise physician, noted for his discernment-the most acute observer, his son said, 'whom I ever saw, and of a sceptical disposition, 'his mother was a daughter of Josiah Wedgwood - It does not seem far fetched to say that Charles Darwin inherited something of the imagination of his grandfullers, tempered by his father's more sceptical tendency to keep close to facts. Apart from direct inheritance there must have been a scientific tridition in the family, and it is interesting to note that both in heritance and tradition have been sustained since

As a schoolboy at Shrewsbury, Charles Darwin seems to have been more interested in games than in books, but, as he says, 'the passion for collecting, which leads a min to be a systematic naturalist, a vartuoso, or a miser, was very strong m me, and was clearly innate, as none of my sisters or brothers had this taste. At the age of sixteen he went to Edinburgh to study medicine, but soon displayed a much keener interest in marine zoology than in the conventional discipline of the medical school He was influenced by naturalists like Robert Grant and William Mac-Gillivray, and it is interesting to recall that he found opportunity to listen to some lectures by the American ornithologist Audubon, and was present at a meeting of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, where he heard Sir Walter Scott speak from the chair as President During his Edinburgh period he was much fonder of long walks and shooting than of receiving academic In 1828 he went to Cambridge instruction (Christ's), where he took a pass degree in 1831, having here again occupied himself more with sport and beetle collecting than with his examination subjects But it was during these three years, which he calls 'upon the whole the most joyful in my happy life,' that he came under Professor Henslow's potent influence, and began to become intimate with Professor Adam Sedgwick the geologist, with whom he went on a profitable geological excursion in North Wales It was in his last year at college that he read and was greatly impressed by Herschel's Introduction to the Study of Natural Philosophy, which 'stirred up in me a burning zeal to add even the most humble contribution to the noble structure of natural science.' It was then, too, that he read Humboldt's Personal Narrative, which certainly helped to lead him to embrace |

This opportunity for Il andergalice came at an appropriate time in D irv m's life, and of the voyage of the Beagle (1831-36) he says that it was the far the most important event in my life, and has determined my whole career I have always felt that I owe to the voyage the first real training or education of my mind' To reason out for himself the geological structure of new regions, to try to account for the different forms of coral islands, to fice the actual facts of the geographical distribution of ruin ils, and to seek to realise the manifold complexity of life-and notably the 'adaptations' -which the long vovage brought under his observation these were real disciplines in scientific method, and it is instructive to observe how his keen love of sport waned before a stronger interest, which led to the acquisition of his characteristic habits of 'steadiness,' 'energetic industry,' and 'concentrated attention'. The voyage gave him a wealth of impressions, a detailed acquaintance with nature as it is, and a confidence in his own powers of scientific judgment. It was then, too, that he began to have 'orcasionally vague doubts' about the trustworthiness of the Linnern doging of the fixity of species Unfortunately, however, the voyage left permanent all effects on his health, though it is probably more accurate to say that the conditions of the voyage finoured, instead of inhibiting, the expression of constitutional disabilities. As far as science is concerned, it seems just to regard the cruise of the Beagle as the Columbus vovage of biology

When Darwin came home from his voyage (1836) his father exclaimed, 'Why, the shape of his head is quite altered,' it may be fairly said that he had found his purpose in life, and that his vouthful bent was now a strenuous passion. At the age of twenty-eight he was one of the best equipped naturalists of his day, he was rich in experience and in ideas, and he had developed that (as he called it) 'dogged' persistence of inquisitive inquiry which was one of his most outstanding intellectual characteristics. He had gained, more over, that marvellous realisation of complex interrelations which is conspicuous in all his work. Settling down for a couple of years in London, he devoted himself to working up his collections and observations, he opened in 1837 his 'first note book on Transmutation of Species,' his 'prime hobby, ' lie wrote his immortal Journal, contri buted various papers to societies, and became the friend of many eminent scientific men, such as These were years of hard Lvell and Hooker work, though scarcely a day passed without suffer-In 1839 he married his cousin, Emma Wedgwood, to whose loving care of the great naturalist the world owes much sense, it was in his quiet country home that the eventful part of his life was lived It was there that he developed with persistent patience his evolution theory, which has revolutionised biology and changed the whole intellectual outlook of After a period of geological worknotably on coral reefs-Darwin gave himself for about eight years to monographing barnacles and acorn shells (Cirripedia)-an arduous task very valuable in itself, but even more valuable as training—'a piece of critical self discipline,' Huxley said, 'which manifested itself in everything he wrote afterwards, and saved him from endless errors of detail' All the time, however, he was pondering over his 'prime hobby,' the problem of the trans formation of species The famous and often quoted sentence is exceedingly characteristic 'After five years' work, I allowed myself to speculate on the subject, and drew up some short notes, these I enlarged in 1844 into a sketch of the conclusions which then seemed to be probable, from that period to the present day (1859) I have steadily pursued the same object'

On 18th June 1858 Darwin received from Alfred Russel Wallace, who was exploring in the Malay Archipelago, a manuscript evolutionary essay, which agreed very closely with his own work, and the dramatic result, brought about by the counsel of Lyell and Hooker, was the famous joint-paper by Darwin and Wallace, On the Tendency of Species to form Varieties, and on the Perpetuation of Varieties and Species by Natural Means of Silection, read before the Linnean Society 1st July 1858 There has been nothing in the history of science more magnanimous than the harmonious co operation of Charles Darwin and Alfred Russel As Professor E B Poulton says was sufficiently remarkable that two naturalists in widely separated lands should have independently arrived at the theory which was to be the turningpoint in the history of biology and of many other sciences—although such simultaneous discoveries have been known before, it was still more remarkable that one of the two should unknowingly have chosen the other to advise him upon the theory which was to be for ever associated with both their It was a magnificent answer to those who believed that the progress of scientific discovery implies continual jealousy and bitterness, that the conditions attending the first publication of the theory of natural selection were the beginning of a lifelong friendship and of mutual confidence and esteem'

In 1859 Darwin published The Origin of Spicies, which he justly called 'the chief work of my life.' Its complete title was On the Origin of Species by Means of Natural Selection, or the Preservation of Favoured Races in the Struggle for Life. This great work was followed by the now familiar series. The Fertilisation of Orchids (1862), The Variation of Plants and Animals under Domestication (1868), The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex (1871), The Expression of the Emotions in Man and Animals (1872), Insectivorous Plants (1875), Climbing Plants (1875), The Effects of Cross and Self Fertilisation in the Vegetable Kingdom (1876), Different Forms of Flowers in Plants of the same Species (1877), The Power of Movement in Plants (1880), and The Formation of Vegetable Mould through the Action of Worms (1881) Darwin died suddenly, after a brief cardiac illness, on 19th April 1882. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, a few feet from the grave of another light bringer, Sir Isaac Newton To those who realise at all how much Darwin's great life has meant to mankind, there is a sublime pathos in the simple words of retrospect which he appended to his autobiography. 'As for myself, I believe I have acted rightly in steadily following and devoting my life to science. I feel no remorse from having committed any great sin, but have often and often regretted that I have not done more direct good to my fellow creatures'

If one dare try to sum up the chief services which Darwin rendered to human thought, it seems that they were fourfold (a) By his scrupulously careful, thorough, and fair minded marshalling of the 'evidences' which suggest the doctrine of descent—the evolutionist interpretation or modal formula of the Becoming of the organic world—he gradually won the conviction of the great majority of thoughtful men. Aided by Spencer and Wallace, Huxley and Haeckel, he made an old and some what discredited suggestion current intellectual

com It is now an almost organic part of all our thinking (b) He applied the evolution idea to various sets of facts, such as the expression of the emotions and the development of instincts, and showed what a powerful intellectual organon it is (c) Along with Wallace, he formulated and developed the particular theory of Natural Selection as a directive factor in the evolution process (d) Apart from all theory, he disclosed a view of nature as a vast system of complex inter-relations—a web of life in which part is bound to part by vital bonds of adaptation and interdependence

More personally it may be noted that after Darwin went to Down he lived, while he was revolutionising biology, the quiet life of a country gentleman, interested in his garden and greenhouse, in his pigeons and poultry Happy in his family life, rich in his friends, unworried by pecuniary cares, master of his own time, undisturbed by interviewers, he devoted himself wholeheartedly to investigation and thought, hampered only by persistent ill health While he was doubtless wrong in explaining his success by saying, 'It's dogged that does it,' it was his pertinacious but never toilsome industry that enabled his fine brain to do so much as it did With the aid of his fascinating Life and Letters, we can see him, as in a Holbein picture, with all the paraphernalia of his daily pursuits round about him-his high chair, his orderly shelves, his torn-up reference books and periodicals, his portfolios of notes, his window sill laboratory, his yellow back novels! There was seldom a great life so devoid of little ness, seldom a record of thought so free from extravagance. According to his own account of his intellectual qualities in his charming auto biography, he had 'no great quickness of apprehension or wit,' 'a very limited power to follow a long and purely abstract train of thought,' 'a memory extensive yet hazy,' 'a fair share of invention, and of common-sense or judgment,' an unusual power in 'noticing things which easily escape attention, and in observing them carefully,' a great industry, 'the strongest desire to understand or explain whatever I observed—that is, to group all facts under some general laws' All this is, of course, too splendidly modest, but there is, we think, more truth in it than in some of the culogies which make him out to have been an extraordinary genius Apart from an insight which cannot be explained, his chief intellectual qualities were simply those characteristic of the scientific mood at its best-a passion and reverence for facts, an innate repugnance to obscurity and verbalism, a highly developed cautiousness and honesty in coming to conclusions, and a marvellous sense of the inter-relations of things. It is with the utmost reverence that we would note that Darwin, like many other great men of science, had very little 'philosophical sense.' He was neither aware of nor interested in the philosophical, as distinguished from the scientific, point of view kindliness, modesty, magnanimity, and devotion to truth made him, as Poulton says, 'so beloved by his circle of intimate friends that, through their contagious enthusiasm, and through the glimpses of his nature revealed in his writings, he was in all likelihood more greatly loved than any other man of his time by those who knew him not.'

In regard to the literary qualities of Darwin's voluminous writings, there is considerable discrepancy of opinion among those competen, to There are some who regard the Origin judge. of Species and the Descent of Man as fine illustra tions of English expository prose, but it seems probable that their opinion has been in some measure favourably biassed by their keen intel lectual delight in following the resistless argument. There are others who find the pages heavy and the periods inelegant, but it seems probable that their lack of appreciation is partly due to an absence of organic interest in the subject matter, and to the fitigue which the perusal of scientific discourse inevitably involves for those unfamiliar with the objective facts of nature. It must, we think, be admitted that Daiwin was so preoccupied with 'getting at the truth' that he thought little, if at all, about what we call artistic presentation. He was no stylist or rhetorician, he had very little of Huxley's gift of telling phrase or happy epigram, very little of Haeckel's power of expressing him self in picturesque and eloquently moving periods. He often doubles back to answer a possible object tion, and in his honesty mars his own sequence, he often overloads a sentence with a mass of detailed proof, he often introduces saving clauses which inhibit immediate conviction But these are the defects of his great qualities, he was working with big issues, he was dominated by the scientific mood, he did not seek to make points, but to present facts that made his points secure. His is the straightforward, direct, entirely unemo tional style of an advocate who has so much that is new and vital to say, that he cares little about details of elegance or immediate effectiveness thought 'long and intently about every sentence,' he worked most methodically from plan to sketch, from sketch to summary, from summary to the full text, and if the result did not always reward his pains, it is in any case immortal. 'There seems,' he says, 'to be a sort of fatality in my mind leading me to put at first my statement or proposition in a wrong or awkward form Formerly I used to think about my sentences before writing them down, but for several years I have found that it saves time to scribble in a vile hand whole pages as quickly as I possibly can, contracting half the words, and then correct deliberately thus scribbled down are often better ones than I could have written deliberately' But most of us would prefer Darwin's 'scribbling' to any amount of fine writing it is instinct with veracity confessions, of which, perhaps, too much has been made by some who have sought to draw moral lessons from his life. Up to the age of thirty or more, Darwin found great pleasure in poetry, pictures, and music. During his last twenty or thirty years he lost these esthetic tastes, he could not endure to read a line of poetry, even Shakespearc's, music generally set him thinking too energetically on his work, fine scenery did not cause him the exquisite delight which it formerly Novels, on the other hand, even if only moderately good, were 'a wonderful relief and pleasure' to him, and history, biography, travels, and essays on all sorts of subjects interested him as much as ever they did. In his autobiography he discusses the 'atrophy' of his higher æsthetic tastes, and laments the loss of happiness involved and the possible injurious effects. It was doubtless too severe a self analysis to say, 'My mind seems to have become a kind of machine for grinding general laws out of large collections of facts,' but it may be allowed that the scientific mood became more and more dominant in his life. It should be remembered, however, that Darwin's working day, shortened by his ill health, was methodically filled up so as to secure the maximum output, and, as it seems to us, what he severely called 'atrophy' should be more generously regarded as the natural result of extreme preoccupation with great issues

The mass of literiture which may be called Darwinian is immense and continually increasing As Asa Gray said 'Dante literature and Shakespeare literature have been the growth of centuries, but Darwinism filled teeming catalogues during the lifetime of the author' Part of this literature consists of ill-judged criticisms on the part of men who did not understand the subject, or were prejudiced by emotional and other vested interests, this has now little more than historical interest, illustrating the difficulty many men find in changing their point of view, its output line rapidly decreased since the coming of age of the Origin of Species in the middle of the eighties A second portion of the Darwinian literature consists of careful and unprejudiced criticisms which have been of much service in the development of the theory of evolution To these Darwin paid courteous and scrupulous attention, and the minor changes in successive editions of his chief works are of much interest in this connection Thirdly, there are those works-eg of Herbert Spencer and August Weismann-which have added constructively to the Darwinian edifice. It would be interesting to show that evolutionist thought has had a marked influence on general literature, but this is implied in the fact that Darwin and his fellow workers were instrumental in changing man's whole intellectual outlook. On the other hand, it is a matter for regret that there have been so few modern attempts to give to the evolutionist's vision of the drinin of life that poetic expression which Goethe proved to be so splendidly possible.

The Origin of Species

It is interesting to contemplate a tangled bank, clothed with many plants of many kinds, with birds singing on the bushes, with various insects flitting about, and with worms erawling through the damp earth, and to reflect that these claborately constructed forms, so different from each other, and dependent upon each other in so complex a manner, have all been produced by laws acting around us These laws, taken in the largest sense, being Growth with Reproduction, Inheritance which is almost implied by reproduction, Variability from the indirect and direct action of the conditions of life, and from use and disuse, a Ratio of Increase so high as to lead to a Struggle for Life, and as a consequence to Natural Selection, entailing Divergence of Character and the extinction of less improved forms Thus, from the war of nature, from famine and death, the most exalted object which we are capable of concciving, namely, the production of the higher animals, directly follows There is grandeur in this view of life, with its several powers, having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms or into one, and that, whilst this planet has gone cycling on accord lng to the fixed law of gravity, from so simple a begin ning tudless forms most beautiful and most wonderful have been, and are being, cooked

The Tree of Life

The affinities of all the beings of the same class have sometimes been represented by a great tree. I believe this simile largely speaks the truth. The green and budding twigs may represent existing species, and those produced during former years may represent the long succession of extinct species. As buds give rise by growth to fresh buds, and these, if vigorous, branch out and overtop on all sides many a feebler branch, so by generation I believe it has been with the great Tree of Life, which fills with its dead and broken branches the crust of the earth, and covers the surface with its ever branching and beautiful ramifications.

Natural Selection

If under changing conditions of life organic beings present individual differences in almost every part of their structure, and this cannot be disputed, if there be, owing to their geometrical rate of increase, in severe struggle for life at some age, season, or year, and this certainly cannot be disputed, then, considering the in finite complexity of the relations of all organic beingto each other and to their conditions of life, causing an infinite diversity in structure, constitution, and habits, to be advantageous to them, it would be a most extraordi unry fact if no variations had ever occurred useful to each being's own welfare, in the same manner as so many variations have occurred useful to man. But if variations useful to any organic being ever do occur, assuredly individuals thus characterised will have the best chance of being preserved in the struggle for life and from the strong principle of inheritance, these will tend to produce offspring similarly characterised principle of preservation, or the survival of the fittest, I have called Natural Selection

The Struggle for Existence

Nothing is easier than to admit in words the truth of the universal struggle for life, or more difficult-at least I have found it so-than constantly to bear this conclu Yet unless it be thoroughly engrained in sion in mind the mind, the whole economy of nature with every fact on distribution, rurity, abundance, extinction, and varia tion, will be dimly seen or quite misunderstood behold the face of nature bright with gladness, we often see superabundance of food, we do not see, or we forget, that the hirds which are idly singing round us mostly live on insects or seeds, and are thus constantly destroy ing life, or we forget how largely these songsters, or their eggs, or their nestlings, are destroyed by birds and beasts of prey, we do not always bear in mind that, though food may be now superabundant, it is not so at all sersons of each recurring year I should premise that I use this term [Struggle for Existence] in a large and metaphorical sense including dependence of one being on another, and including (which is more important) not only the life of the individual but success in leaving When we reflect on this struggle, we may console ourselves with the full belief that the war of nature is not incessant, that no fear is felt, that death is generally prompt, and that the vigorous, the healthy, and the happy survive and multiply

(Origin of Species pp 49, 50, 61)

Malthus and Darwinism.

In October 1838, that is, fifteen months after I had begun my systematic inquiry, I happened to read for amuse ment Malthus On Population and being well prepared to appreciate the struggle for existence which everywhere goes on from long continued observation of the habits of animals and plants, it at once struck me that under these circumstances favourable variations would tend to be preserved and unfavourable ones to be destroyed. The result of this would be the formation of new species Here then I had at last got a theory by which to work, but'I was so anxious to avoid prejudice that I deter mined not for some time to write even the briefest In June 1842 I first allowed myself the sketch of it satisfaction of writing a very brief abstract of my theory in pencil in thirty five pages, and this was enlarged during the summer of 1844 into one of two hundred and thirty pages, which I had fairly copied out and still possess. (Life and Letters, yol 1)

The 'Beagle' Voyage.

When I visited, during the voyage of H M S. Beagle, the Galapagos Archipelago, situated in the Pacific Ocean about five hundred miles from the shore of South America, I found myself surrounded by peculiar species of birds, repules, and plants, existing nowhere else in the world. Yet they nearly all bore an American stamp song of the mocking thrush, in the harsh cry of the carrion hawk, in the great candlestick like opuntias, I clearly perceived the neighbourhood of America, though the islands were separated by so many miles of ocean from the mainland, and differed much from it in their geological constitution and elimate. Still more surprising was the fact that most of the inhabitants of each suprrate island in this small archipelago were specifically different, though most closely related to each other The archipelago, with its innumerable craters and bare streams of lava, appeared to be of recent origin, and thus I fancied myself brought near to the very act of creation I often asked myself how these many peculiar animals and plants had been produced the simplest answer seemed to be that the inhabitants of the several islands had descended from each other, undergoing modification in the cour e of their descent, and that all the inhabitants of the archipelago had descended from those of the nearest land, namely America, whence colonists would naturally have been derived. But it long remained to me an inexplicable problem how the necessary degree of modification could have been effected, and it would have thus remained for ever had I not studied domestic productions, and thus acquired a just idea of the power of Selection As soon as I had fully realised this idea, I saw, on reading Malthus On Population, that Natural Selection was the inevitable result of the rapid increase of all organic beings, for I was prepared to appreciate the struggle for existence by having long studied the habits of animals

Adaptations and Inter-Relations

We see on every side of us innumerable adaptations and contrivances, which have justly excited in the mind of every observer the highest admiration I here is, for instance, a fly (Cecidomyia) which deposits its eggs within the stamens of a Scrophularia, and secretes a poison that produces a gall, on which the larva feeds, but there is another insect (Misocampus) which deposits its eggs within the body of the larva within the gall, and is thus nourished by its living prev, so that here a hymenopterous insect depends on a dipterous insect, and this depends on its power of producing a monstrous growth in a particular organ of a particular plant. So it is, in a more or less plainly marked manner, in thousands and tens of thousands of cases, with the lowest as well as the highest productions of nature.

Cats and Olover

I find from experiments that humble bees are almost indispensable to the fertilisation of the heartsease (Viola tricolor), for other bees do not visit this flower I have also found that the visits of bees are necessary for the fertilisation of some kinds of clover for instance, twenty heads of Dutch clover (Trafolium repens) yielded 2290 seeds, but twenty other heads protected from bees produced not one Again, one hundred heads of red clover (T pratense) produced 2700 seeds, but the same number of protected heads produced not a single seed Humble bees alone visit red clover, as other bees cannot reach Hence we may infer as highly probable that, if the whole genus of humble bees became extinct or very rure in England, the heartsease and red clover would become very rare or wholly disappear number of humble bees in any district depends in great measure on the number of field nuce, which destroy now the number of mice is their combs and nests, largely dependent, as every one knows, on the number Hence it is quite credible that the presence of a feline animal in large numbers in a district might determine, through the intervention first of mice and then of bees, the frequency of certain flowers in that district (Origin of Species, pp 57, 58)

Personal

Therefore my success as a man of science, whatever this may have amounted to, has been determined, as far as I can judge, by complex and diversified mental qualities and conditions. Of these, the most important have been—the love of science, unbounded patience in long reflecting over any subject, industry in observing and collecting facts, and a fair share of invention as well as of common sense. With such moderate abilities as I possess, it is truly surprising that I should have in fluenced to a considerable extent the belief of scientific men on some important points.

Whenever I have found out that I have blundered, or that my work has been imperfect, and when I have been contemptuously criticised, and even when I have been overpraised, so that I have felt mortified, it has been my greatest comfort to say hundreds of times to myself that 'I have worked as hard and as well as I could, and no man can do more than this ' (Life and Letters, vol 1.)

J ARTHUR THOMSON

Alexander William Kınglake (1809-91), born at Wilton House near Taunton, from Eton passed in 1828 to Trinity College, Cambridge was called to the Bar in 1837, acquired a considerable Chancery practice, and retired in 1856 to devote himself to literature and politics. A tour about 1835 had already given birth to Löthen (1844), one of the most brilliant and popular books of Eastern travel Returned for Bridgwater as a Liberal in 1857, he took a prominent part against Lord Palmerston's Conspiracy Bill, and denounced the French annexation of Savoy was with the French army in Algiers in 1845, and in the Crimea, where he was present at the battle of the Alma, and made the intimate acquaintance of Lord Ragian It was at Lady Ragian's request that he undertook his Invasion of the Crimea its Origin, and its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan (8 vols 1863-87), largely based upon Lord Raglan's papers The work has been blamed as prejudiced, but on the literary side it is one of the outstanding historical works of the century No doubt, as Lord Raglan's friend, he did perhaps more than justice to the English commander's merits, and his abhorrence of the character and career of Napoleon III made him a somewhat unfair judge of the Emperor's policy generally felt that the history is too long, but the picturesque details give it all the vivacity of the best special correspondent's daily reports The criticism of Napoleon was, indeed, so severe that the circulation of the history was prolibited in France during the Empire. Kinglake examined into all the episodes of the war with enormous and prinstaking particularity, and the too great detail of this record has unquestionably injured the permanent popularity its clear and lively narrative and its polished and admirable style would otherwise have secured in 1868 Kinglake was again returned for Bridgwater, but was unseated on petition. The borough was shown to be corrupt, but Kinglake was free from all suspicion of complicity in the irregular methods employed at the election.

At his death Kinglake was remembered less as the author of the bulky, elaborate, exhaustive story of the Crimean war than as the self centred, vivacious, humorous, luxurious hero of Eothen, a comparatively slight volume which defies the ordinary canons of travel book making, and owes its charm solely to the author's constantly and fully revealed personality. The most objective part is the circumstantial account of the triveller's reception by Lady Hester Stanhope, and the conversation he held with that uncanny recluse of the Lebanon clsewhere you live mainly sensitions, impressions, reflections-and in Palestine rarely of the deepest. Tiberias suggests only a disquisition on the fleas of all countries, Cairo only the aspects of a plague stricken town It is not a Sentimental Journey, indeed, but an impressionist one, with some actual objective experiences, certainly, but almost no geographical, historical, or political facts, and nothing whatever of the guide book, even of the glorified guide-book, about it. See the Memoir by Innes Shand prefixed to a new edition of Eothen (1896)

With an Osmanli Pasha

The truth is, that most of the men in authority have risen from their humble stations by the arts of the cour tier, and they preserve in their high estate those gentle powers of fascination to which they one their success. Yet unless you can contrive to learn a little of the language, you will be rather bored by your visits of ecremony, the intervention of the interpreter, or Dragomnn, as he is called, is fatal to the spirit of conversation I think I should mislead you if I were to attempt to give the substance of any particular conversation with A traveller may write and say that 'the Pasha of So and So was particularly interested in the vast progress which has been made in the application of steam, and appeared to understand the structure of our machinery, that he remarked upon the gigantic results of our manufacturing industry, showed that he possessed considerable knowledge of our Indian affairs, and of the constitution of the Company, and expressed a lively admiration of the many sterling qualities for which the people of England are distinguished? But the heap of commonplaces thus quietly attributed to the Pasha will have been founded perhaps on some such talking as this -

Pasha The Englishman is welcome most blessed among hours is this, the hour of his coming

Dragoman (to the Traveller) The Pasha pays you his compliments

Traveller Give him my best compliments in return, and say I'm delighted to have the honour of seeing him.

Dragoman (to the Pasha) His I ord hip, this I aghish man, Lord of London, Scorner of Ireland, Suppressor of France, has quitted his governments, and left his encinces to breathe for a moment, and has ero sed the broad waters in strict disguise, with a small but eternally faithful retinue of followers, in order that he might look upon the bright countenance of the Pasha among Pashas—the Pasha of the excrlasing Pashalk of Karagholookoldour

Tra eller (to his Drigoman) What on earth have you been saying about I ondon? The Pasha will be taking me for a mere coel nev. Have not I told you al east to say that I am from a branch of the family of Mudcombe Park, and that I am to be a magnistrate for the county of Bedfordshire, only I've not qualified, and that I should have been a Deputy I lentenaut, if it had not been for the extraordinary conduct of I ord Minintpromise, and that I was a candidate for Goldborough at the last election, and that I should have won easy, if my committee had not been bought? I wish to heaven that if you do say anything about me, you'd till the simple truth

Dragoman [15 stlent]

Pusha What says the friendly I and of London? Is there aught that I can grant him within the pashall of karagholool oldour?

Drageman (growing sulky and literal). This friendly Englishman—this branch of Mudeomla, -this head purveyor of Goldborough -this possible policeman of Pedfordshire is recounting his relievements, and the number of his titles.

Pasha. The end of his honours is more distant than the ends of the Larth, and the entalogue of his glorious deeds is brighter than the firmament of Heal end.

Drigoman (to the Friveller) The Pasha congratulates your Excellence

Tra eller About Goldborough? The dene he does!—but I want to get at his views in relation to the present state of the Ottoman Linpire, tell him the Houses of Parliament have met, and that there has been a Speech from the throne, pledging I ngland to preserve the integrity of the Sultan's dominions.

Dragonan (to the Pasha) This branch of Mideomle, this possible poheeman of Bedfordshire, informs your Highness that in England the talking houses have met, and that the integrity of the Sultan's dominions has been assured for ever and ever, by a speech from the velvet claur Pasha Wonderful climit! Wonderful honses -white! white! all by wheels!—white! white! all by steam!—wonderful climit! yonderful houses! wonderful people!

—white! white! all by wheels!—white! white! all by steam!

Tra eller (to the Dragoman) What does the Pasha mean by that whazing? He does not mean to say, does he, that our Government will ever abandon their pledges to the Sultan?

Dragoman No, your Excellency, but he says the I nghish talk by wheels and by steam

Traveller That's an exaggeration, but say

Pasha (after having received the communication of the Drigoman). The ships of the English swarm hile flies, their printed calcoes cover the whole earth, and by the side of their swords the blades of Damiseus are blades of grass. All India is but an item in the Ledger books of the Merchants, whose lumber rooms are filled with ancient thrones !—whire! whire! all by wheels!—whire! whire! whire! all by steam!

At the Battle of the Alma.

At this minute the fiery 03rd—it was commanded by Colonel Ainshe—came storming over the crest, and having now at last an enemy's column before it, it seemed to be almost mad with warlike joy. Its formation, of course, was disturbed by the haste and vehemence of the onset, and Campbell saw that, unless the regiment could be halted and a lattle calmed down it would go on rushing forward in disordered fury, at the risk of shattering itself against the strength of the hard, square built column which was solumnly coming to meet it

But he who could halt his men on the bank of a cool stream when they were rushing down to quench the rage of their thirst was able to quiet them in the midst of their warlike fury. Sir Colin got the regiment to halt and dress its ranks. By this time it was under the fire of the approaching column.

Campbell's charger, twice wounded already, but hitherto not much hurt, was now struck by a shot in the heart Without a stumble or a plunge the horse sank down gently to the earth, and was dead Campbell took his aide de camp's charger, but he had not been long in Shadwell's saddle when np came Sir Colin's groom with his second horse. The man, perhaps, under some former master, had been used to be charged with the 'second horse' in the hunting field At all events, here he was, and if Sir Colin was angered by the apparition, he could not deny that it was opportune. The man touched his cap, and excused himself for being where he was the dry, terse way of those Englishmen who are much accustomed to horses, he explained that towards the rear the balls had been dropping about very thick, and that, fearing some harm might come to his master's second horse, he had thought it best to bring him up to the front

When the 93rd had recovered the perfectness of its array, it again moved forward, but at the steady pace imposed upon it by the chief. The 42nd had already resumed its forward movement, it still advanced firing

There are things in the world which, eluding the re sources of the dry narrator, can still be faintly imagined by that subtle power which sometimes enables mankind to picture dim truth by fancy According to the thought which floated in the mind of the churchman who taught to All the Russias their grand form of prayer for victory, there are 'angels of light' and 'angels of darkness and horror,' who soar over the heads of soldiery destined to be engaged in close fight, and attend them into battle. When the fight grows hot, the angels hover down near to earth with their bright limbs twined deep in the wreaths of the smol e which divides the combatants But it is no coarse, bodily help that these Christian angels bring More purely spiritual than the old Immortals, they strike no blow, they snatch no man's weapon, they lift away no warrior in a cloud What the Angel of Light can bestow is valour, priceless valour, and light to lighten the path to victory, giving men grace to see the bare truth, and, seeing it, to live the mastery To regiments which are to be blessed with victory the Angel of I ight seems to beckon, and gently draw his men forward. What the Angel of Darkness can inflict is fear, horror, despair, and it is given him also to be able to plant error and vain funcies in the minds of the doomed soldier. By false dread he scares them Whether he who conceived this prayer was soldier or priest, or soldier and priest in one, it seems to me that he knew more of the true nature of the strife of good infantry than he could utter in common prose For indeed it is no physical power which rules the conflict between two well formed bodies of foot.

The mere killing and wounding which occurs whilst a fight is still hanging in doubt does not so alter the relative numbers of the combatants as in that way to govern the result. The use of the slaughter which takes place at that time lies mainly in the stress which it puts upon the minds of those who, themselves remaining unhurt, are nevertheless disturbed by the sight of what is befalling their comrades. In that way a command of the means necessary for inflicting death and wounds is one element of victory. But it is far from being the chief one. Nor is it by perfectness of discipline, nor yet by a contempt of life, that men can assure to themselves the mastery over their foes. More or less all these things are needed, but the truly governing power is that ascendency of the stronger over the weaker heart which (because of the mystery of its origin) the churchman was willing to asembe to angels coming down from on high

The turning moment of a fight is a moment of trial for the soul and not for the body, and it is therefore that such courage as men are able to gather from being gross in numbers can be easily outweighed by the warlike virtue of a few To the stately 'Black Watch' and the hot 93rd, with Campbell leading them on, there was vouchsafed that stronger heart for which the brave pious Muscovites had prayed Over the souls of the mon in the columns there was spread, first the gloom, then the swarm of vain delusions, and at last the sheer horror which might be the work of the Angel of Darkness The two lines marched straight on The three columns shook They were not yet subdued They were stub born, but every moment the two advancing battalions grew nearer and nearer, and although-dimly masking the scant numbers of the Highlanders-there was still the white curtain of smoke which always rolled on before them, yet, fitfully, and from moment to moment, the signs of them could be traced on the right hand and on the left in a long, shadowy line, and their coming was ceaseless

But, moreover, the Highlanders being men of great stature, and in strange garb, their plumes being tall, and the view of them being broken and distorted by the wreaths of the smoke, and there being, too, an ominous silence in their ranks, there were men among the Russians who began to conceive a vague terror—the terror of things unearthly, and some, they say, imagined that they were charged by horsemen strange, silent, mon strous, bestriding giant chargers The columns were full ing into that plight-we have twice before seen it this day-were falling into that plight that its officers were moving lither and thither, with their drawn swords, were commanding, were imploring, were threateningnay, were even laying hands on their soldiery, and striving to hold them fast in their places. This struggle is the last stage but one in the agony of a body of good infantry massed in close column Unless help should come from elsewhere, the three columns would have to give way

But help came. From the high ground on our left another heavy column—the column composed of the two right Sousdal battahons—was seen coming down. It moved straight at the flank of the 93rd

So now, for the third time that day, a mass of infantry some fifteen hundred strong was descending upon the un covered flank of a battalion in English array, and, coming as it did from the extreme right of the enemy's position, this last attack was aimed almost straight at the file—the file of only two men—which closed the line of the 93rd

But some witchcraft, the doomed men might fancy, was causing the earth to bear grants. Above the crest or swell of ground on the left rear of the 93rd, yet another array of the tall bending plumes began to rise up in a long, ceaseless line, stretching far into the east, and presently, in all the grace and beauty that marks a Highland regiment when it springs up the side of a hill, the 79th came bounding forward Without a halt, or with only the halt that was needed for dressing the ranks, it advanced upon the flank of the right Sousdal column, and caught the mass in its sin-caught it daring to march across the front of a Highland battalion-a battalion already near, and swiftly advancing in line Wrapped in the fire thus poured upon its flank, the hapless column could not march, could not live It broke, and began to fall back in great confusion, and the left Sousdal column being almost at the same time overthrown by the 93rd, and the two columns which had engaged the 'Black Watch being now in full retreat, the spurs of the hill and the winding dale beyond became thronged with the enemy's disordered masses

Then, again, they say, there was heard the sorrowful wail that bursts from the heart of the brave Russian in fantry when they have to suffer defeat, but this time the wall was the wail of eight battahons, and the warlike grief of the soldiery could no longer kindle the fierce intent which, only a little before, had spurred forward the Vladimir column Hope had fled

Edward FitzGerald (1809-83) was born at Bredfield House, an old Jacobean mansion near Woodbridge in Suffolk His parents were both Irish, and the father, John Purcell, took his wife's surname on her father's death in 1818 The family having returned from a sojourn in France (at St Germains and in Paris), Edward was sent in 1821 to King Edward VI's School at Bury St Edmunds, where James Spedding and J. M. Kemble were among his schoolfellows. He went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, in October 1826, whither Spedding followed him the next year. At Trinity he formed fast friendships with Thackeray and W H Thompson, afterwards Master of Trinity, and he took his degree in January 1830 father's family resided at Wherstead Lodge, near Ipswich, from 1822 to 1835, and subsequently nt Boulge Hull, near Woodbridge, there he lived with them until 1838, when he took up his separate residence in a cottage near the park gate. His life at this time was a quiet round of reading and gardening, occasionally broken by visits from or to friends, his chief friends in the neighbourhood were the Rev George Crabbe (vicar of Bredfield and son of the poet), Archdeacon Groome, and Bernard Barton, the Quaker-poet of Woodbridge, whose drughter, Lucy, he married in 1856, only soon to separate Every spring he used to make a long visit to London, where he constantly met Spedding and Thackerry, and was a frequent visitor it the Carlyles' Lord Tennyson and his brother Frederic had been his contemporaries at college, but it was in London that they became intimate, how fist the friendship was is best shown by the dedication of Tiresias In 1853 FitzGerald left the cottage and settled at Farlingay Hall, near Woodbridge, and from 1860 in the town itself, in 1874 he removed to Little Grange, a house which he had built for himself in the neighbourhood

His great outdoor amusement in these years was yachting, and every summer was spent cruising about the Suffolk coast, especially near Lowestoft and Aldborough, the latter locality being of special interest to him as the birthplace of his favourite Crabbe, and the place where he himself had first seen the sea. He thoroughly enjoyed the life on his yacht, carrying his books with him, and delighting to take his friends for short trips, when they might read and talk over well known passages He also enjoyed the rough, bluff ways of together the sailors and fishermen, and liked to collect their peculiar words and phrases But he could not escape 'the browner shade' which Gibbon ascribes to the evening of life, and the sea gradually lost its charm, one old sailor died, and another grievously disappointed him In 1871 he sold his little schooner, the Scandal, but used still to go boating on the river Deben, until that, too, he gave up for his garden, where his favourite walk was called the 'Quarter-deck.' He died suddenly at Merton Rectory, Norfolk, while paying his annual visit to his friend Crabbe He is buried at Boulge of his great characteristics was steadfastness in friendship, he was slow to form intimacies, but, once riveted, the link lasted till death ward manner was reserved, and he might sometimes seem a little wayward or petulant, but under the cold exterior there lay a tenderness like Johnson's, and a fine stroke of imagination or a noble deed would make his voice falter and his eyes fill with

The first forty two years of his life passed in quiet reading and thinking, and it was not till 1851 that he published anonymously his dialogue on youth, Euphranor, which was followed in 1852 by Polonius a Collection of Wise Saus and Modern Instances In the meantime a friend, Professor Cowell, had persuaded him to begin Spanish, and this not only opened a new world of interest, but revealed to him his own powers at once took to Calderon's plays, and afterwards to Don Quizote, and in 1853 lie published a trans lation of six of Calderon's dramas with his name This, however, he soon withdrew from attached circulation, but two more plays by the same author About 1853 were afterwards printed privately Professor Cowell interested him in Persian Sa'di's Gulistán early attracted him by its quaint stories, and in 1856 he published an anonymous version of Jámi's Salámán and Absál, he also wrote, but never printed, an abridgment in verse of 'Attár's Mantik ut Tair But the Persian poet who most attracted him, from the time of his first seeing his works in 1856 in a MS in the Bodleian Library, was 'Omar Khayyam, the astronomer-poet of the These poems were then known eleventh century only by a few current quotations, as they were first printed at Paris in 1857 by M Nicolas, but FitzGerald at once recognised their beauty, and his name and the poet's will remain indissolubly Here his genius as a translinked together lator appears at its height. He possessed to an extraordinary degree the power of reproducing on his reader the effect of the original, and, though the original ideas are often altered, condensed, and transposed in an apparently reckless way, these lawless alterations and substitutions are like those in Dryden, and they all tell, the translator becomes 'alter Menander,' not 'dimidiatus Menander' Mr Swinburne has said, 'His daring genius gave 'Omar Khayy'ım a place for ever among the greatest English poets' Later translations were of the Agamemnon of Æschylus and of Sophocles' Edipus Tyrannus and Edipus Coloneus He was great as a letter-writer in an age when letter-writing had almost ceased to be an art, indeed, his letters are among his most valuable literary bequests. For he was a master of style as he himself defined it 'The saying in the most perspicuous and succinct way what one thoroughly understands, and saying it so naturally that no effort is apparent' The di majores of his Olympus were Shakespeare, Scott, Sophocles, Lamb, Crabbe, Chaucer, and Certantes Thackeray and Dickens he ranked high, for Jane Austen and George Eliot, for Morris, Rossetti, or Swinburne, he had little appreciation painfully frank in his criticism even of his friends, speaking of Tennyson, he said 'I almost think I was wrong in telling him I could take no interest in his Holy Grail, which I should not have done had he not sent it to me! A perilous reason? And a remark about Mrs Browning's poetry, made after her death and reported to her husband, provoked Browning to a bitter retort.

To Frederic Tennyson, 1844.

I dare say I should have stayed longer in London had you been there but the wits were too much for me Not Spedding, mind who is a dear fellow. But one finds few in I ondon serious men. I mean serious even in fim with a true purpose and character whotsoever it may be. London melts away all individuality into a common limp of eleverness. I am amazed at the humour and worth and noble feeling in the country, however much railroads have mixed us up with inctropolitan civilisation. I can still find the heart of Lingland beating healthily down here though no one will believe it.

You know my way of life so well that I need not describe it to you, as it has undergone no change since I saw you I read of mornings, the same old books over and over again, having no command of new ones walk with my great black dog of an afternoon, and at evening sit with open windows, up to which China roses climb with my pipe, while the blackbirds and thrushes begin to rustle bedwards in the garden, and the nightingale to have the neighbourhood to herself We have had such a spring (biting the last ten days) as would have satisfied even you with warmth. And such verdure 1 white clouds moving over the new fledged tops of oak trees, and acres of grass striving with buttereups. How old to tell of, how new to see 1 I believe that Leshe's Inf of Constable (a very charming book) has given me a fresh love of Spring Constable loved it above all seasons he hated Autumn When Sir G Beaumont, who was of the old classical taste, asked him if he did not find it difficult to place his brown tree in his pictures, 'Not at all,' said C, 'I never put one in at all' And when Sir George was crying up the tone of the old masters' landscapes, and quoting an old violin as the proper tone of colour for a picture, Constable got up, took an old Cremona, and lald it down on the sunshing grass. You would like the In definee of all this, I have hing my room with pictures, like very old fiddles indeed but I agree with Sir George and Constable both. I like pictures that are not like nature. I can have nature better than any picture by looking out of my window. Yet I respect the man who tries to paint up to the freshness of earth and sky Constable did not wholly achieve what he tried at and purhaps the old masters chose a soberer scale of things as more within the compass of lead paint. To paint dow with lead t

I also plunge away at my old Handel of nights, and delight in the Allegro and Penseroso, full of pomp and finey. What a pity Handel could not have written music to some great Masque, such as Ben Jonson or Milton would have written, if they had known of such a musician to write for?

To Professor C E Norton, 1876

What Mr Lowell says of him [Dante] recalled to me what Tennyson said to me some thirty five or forty years ago. We were stopping before a shop in Regent Street where were two Ligures of Dante and Goethe. I (Luppose) said 'What is there in old Dante's Face that is missing in Goethe's?' And Tennyson (who e Profile then had certainly a remarkable likeness to Dante's) said. The Divine' Then Milton, I don't think I've read him these forty years the whole Scheme of the Poem, and certain Parts of it, looning as grand as anything in my Memory, but I never could read ten lines together without stumbling at some Pedantry that tipped me at once out of Paradise, or even Hell into the Schoolroom, worse than either. Tennyson again used to say that the two grandest of all Similes were those of the Ships hanging in the Air, and 'the Gunpowder one,' which he used slowly and grimly to enact, in the Days that are no more He certainly then thought Milton the sublimest of all the Gang, his Diction modelled on Virgil, as perhaps Dante's.

Spenser I never could get on with, and (spite of Mr Lowell's good word) shall still content myself with such delightful Quotations from him as one lights upon here and there—the last from Mr Lowell

Then, old 'Daddy Wordsworth,' as he was sometimes called, I am afraid, from my Christening, he is now, I suppose, passing under the Eclipse consequent on the Glory which followed his obscure Rise fifty years ago at our Cambridge, when the Battle was fighting for him by the Few against the Many of us who only laughed at 'Louisa in the Shade,' &c. His Brother was then Master of Trinity College, like all Words worths (unless the drowned Sailor) pompous and prig gish. He used to drawl out the Chapel responses so that we called him the 'Mēesemble Sinner' and his brother the 'Meeserable Poet' Poor fun enough but I never can forgive the Lakers all who first despised, and then patronised, 'Walter Scott,' as they loftily called him and He, dear, noble Fellow, thought they were quite justified Well, your Emerson has done him far more Justice than his own Countryman Carlyle, who won't allow him to be a Hero in any way, but sets up such a cantankerous narrow-minded Bigot as John Knox ın lus stead I did go to worship at Abbotsford, as to Stratford on Avon and saw that it was good to have so done If you, if Mr Lowell, have not lately read it, pray read Lockhart's account of his Journey to Douglas Dale on (I think) July 18 or 19, 1831 It is a piece of Trugedy, even to the muttering Thunder, like the Lam mermuir, which does not look very small beside Peter Bell and Co

My dear Sir, this is a desperate Letter, and that last Sentence will lead to another dirty little Story about my Duddy to which you must listen or I should feel like the Fine Lady in one of Vinburgh's Plays, 'Oh my God, that you won't listen to a Woman of Quality when her Heart is bursting with Malice 1' And perhaps you on the other Side of the Great Water may be amused with a little of your old Granny's Gossip

Well then about 1826, or 7, Professor Airy (now our Astronomer Royal) and his Brother William called on The Daddy at Rydul In the course of Conversation Daddy mentioned that sometimes when genteel Parties came to visit hun, he contrived to slip out of the room, and down the garden walk to where 'The Party's' trivelling Carriage stood This Carriage he would look into to see what Books they carried with them and he observed it was generally 'WALTER SCOTT's' It was-Airy's Brother (a very veracious man, and an Admirer of Wordsworth, but, to be sure, more of Sir Walter) who told me this It is this conceit that diminishes Words worth's stature among us, in spite of the mountain Mists he lived among Also, a little stingmess, not like Sir Walter in that I I remember Hartley Coleridge telling us at Ambleside how Professor Wilson and some one else (II C. himself perhaps) stole a Leg of Mutton from Wordsworth's Larder for the fun of the Thing

Here then is a long Letter of old world Gossip from the old Home I hope it won't tire you out it need not, you know

To Fanny Kemble 1879

My Brother keeps waiting—and hoping—for—Death which will not come perhaps Providence would have let it come sooner, were he not rich enough to keep a Doctor in the house, to keep him in Misery know if I told you in my last that he was ill, seized on by a Disease not uncommon to old Men-an internal Disorder' it is polite to say, but I shall say to you, disease of the Bladder I had always supposed he would be found dead one good morning, as my Mother was-as I hoped to be-quietly dead of the Heart which lie had felt for several Years But no, it is seen good that he shall be laid on the Rack-which he may feel the more keenly as he never suffered Pain before, and is not of a strong Nerve I will say no more of this The funeral Bell, which has been at work, as I never remember before, all this winter, is even now, as I write, tolling from St Mary's Steeple

Parlous d'autres choses, as my dear Sévigné says

I—We—have finished all Sir Walter's Scotch Novels, and I thought I would try an English one Kenul worth—a wonderful Drama, which Theatre, Opera, and Ballet (as I once saw it represented) may well reproduce. The Scene at Greenwich, where Elizabeth 'interviews' Sussex and Leicester, seemed to me as fine as what is called (I am told, wrongly) Shakespeare's Henry VIII Of course, plenty of melodrama in most other parts—but the Plot wonderful

Then—after Sir Walter—Dickens' Copperfield, which came to an end last night because I would not let my Reader read the last Chapter. What a touch when Peggotty—the man—at last finds the lost Girl, and—throws a handkerchief over her face when he takes her to his arms—never to leave her! I maintain it—a little Shakespeare—a Cockney Shakespeare, if you will but as distinct, if not so great, a piece of pure Gemus as was born at Stratford. Oh, I am quite sure of that, had I to choose but one of them, I would choose Dickens' hundred delightful Caricatures rather than Thackeray's half dozen terrible Photographs.

In Michael Kelly's Reminiscences (quite worth reading about Sheridan) I found that, on Jinuary 22, 1802, was produced at Drury Lane an Afterpiece called Urania, by the Honourable W Spencer, in which 'the scenc of Urania's descent was entirely new to the stage, and produced an extraordinary effect' Hence then the Picture which my poor Brother sent you to America.

D'autres choses encore You may judge, I suppose, by the N E wind in London what it has been hereabout Scarce a tinge of Green on the bedgerows, scarce a Bird singing (only once the Nightingale, with broken Voice), and no flowers in the Garden but the brave old Daffy downdilly and Hyacinth—which I scarce knew was so hardy I am quite pleased to find how comfortably they do in my Garden, and look so Chinese gay Two of my dear Blackbirds have I found dead—of Cold and Hunger, I suppose, but one is even now singing—across that Frineral Pell. This is so, as I write, and tell yon—Well we have Sinishine at last—for a day—'thankful for small Blessings,' &c.

I think I have felt a little sadder since March 31 that shut my seventieth Year behind me, while my Brother was—in some such way as I shall be if I live two or three years longer—Parlons d'autres—that I am still able to be sincerely yours,

The Boat-race, from 'Euphranor'

Shortly after this, the rest of us agreed it was time to be gone. We walk'd along the fields by the Church (purposely to ask about the sick Lady by the way), cross'd the Ferry, and mingled with the crowd upon the opposite shore, Townsmen and Gownsmen, with the tassell'd Fellow commoner sprinkled here and there-Reading men and Sporting men-Fellows, and even Masters of Colleges, not indifferent to the prowess of their respective Crews-all these, conversing on all sorts of topics, from the slang in Bell's Life to the last new German Revelation, and moving in ever changing groups down the shore of the river, at whose farther bend was a little knot of Ladies gathered up on a green knoll faced and illuminated by the beams of the setting sun Beyond which point was at length heard some indistinct shouting, which gradually increased, until 'They are off -they are coming 1' suspended other conversation among ourselves, and suddenly the head of the first boat turn'd the corner, and then another close upon it, and then a third, the crews pulling with all their might compacted into perfect rhythm, and the crowd on shore turning round to follow along with them, waving hats and caps, and cheering, 'Bravo, St John's '' Go it, Trinity ''-the high crest and blowing forelock of Phidippus's mare, and he himself shouting encouragement to his crew, conspicuous over all-until, the boats reaching us, we also were caught up in the returning tide of spectators, and hurned back toward the goal, where we arrived just in time to see the Ensign of Trinity lowered from its pride of place, and the Eagle of St John's soaring there instead Then, waiting a little while to hear how the winner had won, and the loser lost, and watching Phidippus engaged in eager conversation with his de feated brethren, I took Euphranor and Lexilogus under , either arm (Lyeion having got into better company else where), and walked home with them across the meadow leading to the town, whither the dusky troops of Gowns men with all their confused voices seem'd as it were evaporating in the twilight, while a Nighting de began to he heard among the flowering Chestnuts of Jesus

From 'Omar Khayyam.'

Awake I for Morning in the Bowl of Night
Has flung the Stone that puts the Stars to Flight
And Lo I the Hunter of the East has caught
The Sultan's Turret in a Noose of Light

Before the phantom of False morning died, Methought a Voice within the Tavern cried, 'When all the Temple is prepared within, Why nods the drowsy Worshipper outside?'

And, as the Cock crew, those who stood before The Tavern shouted—'Open then the Door' You know how little while we have to stay, And, once departed, may return no more'

With me along the strip of Herbage strown
That just divides the descrt from the sown,
Where name of Slave and Sultan is forgot—
And Peace to Mahmud on his golden Throne!

A Book of Verses underneath the Bough,
A Jug of Wine, a Loaf of Bread—and Thou Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow

Some for the Glories of This World, and some Sight for the Prophet's Paradise to come, Ah, take the Cash, and let the Credit go, Nor heed the rumble of a distant Drum!

Look to the blowing Rose about us—'Lo, Laughing,' she says, 'into the world I blow, At once the silken tassel of my Purse Tear, and its Treasure on the Garden throw'

I sometimes think that never blows so red The Rose as where some buried Cresar bled, That every Hyacinth the Garden wears Dropt in her Lap from some once lovely Head.

And this reviving Herb whose tender Green Fledges the River Lip on which we lean—Ah, lean upon it lightly! for who knows From what once lovely Lip it springs unseen!

Ah, my Belovéd, fill the Cup that clears
To DAY of past Regrets and future Fears
To morrow!—Why, To morrow I may be Myself with Yesterday's Sev'n thousand Years

For some we loved, the loveliest and the best That from his Vintage rolling Time hath prest, Have drunk their Cup a Round or two before, And one by one crept silently to rest

And we, that now make merry in the Room They left, and Summer dresses in new bloom, Ourselves must we beneath the Couch of Earth Descend—ourselves to make a Conch—for whom?

Ah, make the most of what we yet may spend,
Before we too into the Dust descend, Dust into Dust, and under Dust to he,
Sans Wine, sans Song, sans Singer, and—sans End!

Alike for those who for To DAY prepare,
And those that after some To MORROW stare,
A Muezzin from the Tower of Darkness cries,
'Fools! your Reward is neither Here nor There'

Why, all the Sunts and Sages who discuss'd
Of the Two Worlds so wisely—they are thrust
Like foolish Prophets forth—their Words to Scorn Are scatter'd, and their Mouths are stopt with Dust.

Myself when young did eagerly frequent Doctor and Saint, and heard great argument About it and about but evermore Came out by the same door where in I went

With them the seed of Wisdom did I sow,
And with mine own hand wrought to make it grow
And this was all the Harvest that I reap'd—
'I came like Witer, and like Wind I go'

Into this Universe, and IVh not knowing Nor Whence, like Water willy nilly flowing, And out of it, as Wind along the Waste, I know not Whither, willy nilly blowing

What, without asking, hither hurried Whence?
And, without asking, Whither hurried hence!
Oh, many a Cup of this forbidden Wine
Must drown the memory of that insolence!

We are no other than a moving row

Of Magic Shadow shapes that come and go

Round with the Sun illumined Lantern held

In Midnight by the Master of the Show,

But helpless Pieces of the Game He plays Upon this Chequer board of Nights and Days, Hither and thither moves, and checks, and slays, And one by one back in the Closet lays.

The Ball no question makes of Ayes and Noes, But Here or there as strikes the Player goes, And He that toss'd you down into the Field, He knows about it all—HE knows—HE knows!

The Moving Finger writes, and, having writ, Moves on nor all your Piety nor Wit Shall lure it back to cancel half a Line, Nor all your Tears wash out a Word of it.

Bredfield Hall.

Lo, an English mansion founded In the elder James's reign, Quaint and stately, and surrounded With a pastoral domain

With well timber'd lawn and gardens And with many a pleasant mead, Skirted by the lofty coverts Where the hare and pheasant feed.

Flank'd it is with goodly stables, Shelter'd by coeval trees So it lifts its honest gables I oward the distant German seas,

Where it once discern'd the smoke Of old sea bittles far away Saw victorious Nelson's topmasts Anchoring in Hollesley Bay

But whatever storm might riot, Cannon roar, and trumpet ring, Still amid these meadows quiet Did the yearly violet spring

Still Heaven's starry hand suspended
That light balance of the dew,
That each night on earth descended,
And each morning rose anew

And the ancient liouse stood rearing Undisturb'd her chimneys high, And her gilded vanes still veering Toward each quarter of the sky

While like wave to wave succeeding
I brough the world of joy and strife, Household after household speeding Handed on the torch of life

First, sir Knight in ruff and doublet, Arm in arm with stately dame, Then the Cavaliers indignant I or their monarch brought to shame

Languid beauties himn'd by I ely, Full wigg'd Justice of Queen Anne Tory squires who tippled freely; And the modern Gentleman Here they lived, and here they greeted, Maids and matrons, sons and sires, Wandering in its walks, or seated Round its hospitable fires

Oft their silken dresses floated Gleaming through the pleasure ground
Oft dash'd by the scarlet coated Hunter, horse, and dappled hound

Till the Bell that not in vain
Had summon'd them to weekly prayer, Call'd them one by one again
To the church—and left them there!

They with all their loves and pissions, Compliment, and song, and jest, Politics, and sports, and fashions, Merged in everlasting rest!

So they pass—while thou, old Mansion, Markest with unalter'd face How like the foliage of thy summers kace of man succeeds to race.

To most thou stand'st a record sad, But all the sunshine of the year Could not make thine aspect glad To one whose youth is buried here.

In thine ancient rooms and gardens
Buried—and his own no more Than the youth of those old owners, Dead two centuries before.

Unto him the fields around thee Darken with the days gone by O'er the solemn woods that bound thee Ancient sunsets seem to die

Sighs the self same breeze of morning Through the cypress as of old, Ever at the Spring's returning One same crocus breaks the mould

Still though 'scaping Time's more savage Handy work this pile appears, It has not escaped the rivage Of the undermining years

And though each succeeding master, Grumbling at the cost to pay, Did with coat of paint and plaster Hide the wrinkles of decay,

I et the secret worm ne'er eeases, Nor the mouse behind the wall, Heart of oak will come to pieces, And farewell to Bredfield Hall!

FixGerald's Letters and Literary Remains (3 vols 1889) were edited by Mr Aldis Wright, as also his Letters to Fanny Kemble (1895), and More Letters, under the same editorship, followed in 1991. An elaborate bibliography first printed in Netes and Queries was published as a volume by Colonel W F Prideaux in 1991. The first edition of Euphranior was a mere skeleton of what the book ultimately became a reprint of the last edition appeared in 1993.

FRANCIS HINDES GROOME

George Henry Borrow

was born at East Dereham, Norfolk, 5th July 1803. His father, Thomas Borrow, born in 1758, a fine, burly, middle class Cornishnian of eighteenthcentury type, had been obliged, owing to a youthful escapade, to leave Cornwall and to make his way bare handed in the world. Enlisting as a common soldier, Thomas Borrow rose until he became a captain in the West Norfolk Militin His duties being those of a recruiting officer, he moved about from one part of Great Britain to another East Dereham he met Miss Ann Perfrement, a Norfolk lady of Norman Huguenot descent, born The first child of the in that town in 1772 marriage was a son, John Thomas Borrow, born in 1800, who became an artist (but of no distinction), and afterwards a militia lieutenant, and died in Mexico in 1833 There is no doubt that these children were blessed with a very estimable mother Down to her death, in 1858, Borrow cherished the deepest affection for her When he was still a child the family went to Edinburgh, where he seems to have received the rudiments of his education at the High School Aiter moving about through Scotland, Ireland, and parts of England, the Borrow family returned to Norfolk. From 1816 to 1818 Borrow attended the Grammar School at Norwich, where he was a contemporary of Dr Martineau The school was a good one, but Borrow seems to have picked up not much more than a mass of miscellaneous knowledge. After leaving school he was articled to an emment firm of Norwich solicitors. He served his articles, but seems to have given no time or attention whatever to law His energies were exercised partly in the study of 'the noble art of self defence,' as sparring was then called, and partly in the study of languages It is doubtful whether he would ever have taken honours in either of these studies Yet if we are to believe his friend, William Taylor of Norwich, when a very young man he understood twelve languages-English, Welsh, Erse, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, German, Danish, French, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese But in the understanding of languages there are degrees, the more a scholar knows of a language the more chary is he of saying that he understands it. Borrow's knowledge of German was proved to be unsound as soon as he undertook translations into that language, and the Romano Lavo Lil shows that his knowledge of Romany was shaky and uncertain-not comparable with that of the late F H Groome, or of certain Romany scholars of Germany To say the truth, his method of language-learning was as unscholarly as can well be imagined Like Mezzofanti, he used to learn the vocabulary of a tongue, and then get at the grammatical laws governing it by a sort of loose ınduction Without Mezzofanti's prodigious verbal memory, but still with a very remarkable one, Borrow had a sense of philology as feeble as that of the great Italian himself, hence it is never safe for the student to follow him

At the expiration of his clerkship—his fither having died in 1824—he went to London with the hope of being able to live by literary work. His first call was upon Sir Richard Phillips the publisher, to whom he took some translated ballads for publication, and a letter of introduction from Taylor. Phillips had just retired from publishing, but he really seems to have done all that could be expected of him for a stranger who showed no capacity whatever for the production of marketable work. Readers of Lavengro will remember the sarcastic, or rather savage, way in which

After the Portrait by H W Phillips.

Phillips is delineated in the book. But Borrow, whose dislikes were so many and so violent, must, of course, not be taken too seriously when he attacks a man It is, for instance, instructive to contrast Borrow's portrait of Phillips with the portrait of him printed by another eastern counties man, an eccentic wanderer over England and the Continent-Samuel Jackson Pratt, whose Harvest Home was published by Phillips Phillips lent his town house to Pratt, and was rewarded with certain grateful verses, more remarkable for their likeness to the same author's poems 'Humanity' and 'Sympathy' than for poetic qualities In the study of literary history, nothing is more remarkable than the way in which the tastes and methods of a writer of genius may be traced to the tastes and methods of a mediocre writer who have discovered the influence of Sterne in the style of certain parts of Lavengro are no doubt right, but they would do well to examine The Gleanings of this other protégé of Phillips-the sentimental and feeble verse-writer but passionate lover of England, at a time when the horse was worshipped because its legs were believed to be the only possible source of locomotion Pratt's prose descriptions were extremely popular when Borrow was a young man, they are forgotten now, but will no doubt, with many other such descriptive books, be reprinted in the not far distant day when people in their motor-cars will meditate with a wondering smile upon simple times when men were dragged along the roads at the tails of other animals Borrow was a great reader of these same Gleanings in England, Wales, and Holland Pratt took his sentimentalism from Sterne, as did Mackenzie, but Borrow's sentimentalism, as well as his pas sionate love of England, her meadows, her trees, her roads, shows something of Pratt's influence Imperfectly equipped as Borrow was for the literary struggle for life, it is no wonder that his experiences in London were bitter. Indeed, they were much more terrible than his pride would allow him to record in Lavengro In literature adaptability is an indispensable requisite of commercial success It was Shakespeare's adaptability as much as his incomparable genius that caused his triumph same inty be said of Scott, the same may be said of Dickens Borrow had no adaptability whatever In after years the lucky accident of his being em ployed by the Bible Society gave him his chance and made him popular, but without that accident he could never have produced such work as the literary market of that time demanded There never was a more idiosyncratic writer-a writer more entirely un able to achieve that compromise between authorial temperament and the temper of the market-than Not even Charles Lamb-not even the author of John Buncle himself-was more governed by temperament than he. Idiosyncratic writers rarely succeed in arresting public attention save through the workings of some lucky accident. But The Bible in Spain, built upon Borrow's picturesque, graphic, and carefully elaborated letters to the Bible Society, for whom he acted as colporteur, opened the way for a still more idiosyn cratic and a still more precious book, Lavengro But all this was years after Borrow's London struggles, the sojourn in London at a time when he was criticising books for Phillips's Universal Review, and compiling the celebrated Trials, published in six volumes in 1825, was a life of the direst penury and gloom. Things got to be so bad with him at last that he must either succumb or quit literature altogether. But what could he turn to? There was positively nothing he could do except take to the road-not after the fashion of Captain Hind and Claude Duval, but after the fashion of the modern tramp; and so, on an afternoon in May, with £20 in his pocket that had come to him by what can only be called an accident, he left his London attic with a stick and a bundle to seek his fortune, feeling that the world was all before him where to choose.

What Borrow lacked in adaptability was in great degree compensated by his personal appearance. No one who has ever walked with him, either through the streets of London or along the country roads, could fail to remark how his appearance arrested the attention of the passers-by As a gypsy woman once remarked to the present writer, 'Everybody as ever see'd the white-headed Romany Rye never forgot him? When he chanced to meet troops marching along a country road, it was noticeable that every soldier, whether on foot or horseback, would involuntarily turn to look at Borrow's strik ing figure. He stood considerably above six feet in height, was built as perfectly as a Greek statue, and his practice of athletic exercises gave his every movement the easy elasticity of an athlete under Those East Anglians who liave bathed training with him on the east coast, or others who have done the same in the Thames or the Ouse, can youch for his having been an almost faultless model of masculine symmetry, even as an old man. With regard to his countenance, 'noble' is the only word which can be used to describe it. When he was quite a young man his thick crop of hair had be come of a silvery whiteness There was a striking relation between the complexion, which was as luminous and sometimes rosy as an English girl's, and the features-almost perfect Roman Greek in type, with a dash of Hebrew To the dark lustre of the eyes an increased intensity was lent by the No doubt, however, what most struck fair skin the observer was the marked individuality, not to say singularity, of his expression If it were possible to describe this expression in a word or two, it might, perhaps, be called a self conscious ness that was both proud and shy

On leaving his lodging Borrow shaped his course to the south-west, and had very soon cleared London and got beyond the suburban villages. After walking several miles, he took a seat on the first coach that he found passing that way Borrow, who loved to dwell upon coincidences, the world was the stage on which a great and varied romantic drama was being played this as much as anything else that made him He eventually such an interesting companion found himself, without any definite object or plan, No one was ever more im on Salisbury Plain pressed by Stonehenge at sunrise, when Nature and man's handiwork seem greeting each other, than the homeless wanderer, Borrow, v hom temperament compelled from the first to live a lonely life, whether as a hermit of the dingle Wonderful dreams of the past or among men and the future came to him among the gigantic remains of Stonehenge, which he would afterwards relate to one or two intimate friends with a glow not to be found in the finest passages of Lavengro In this neighbourhood he lingered Then he went on his way, still without any plan. Meeting a forlorn travelling tinker who had been driven from the roads by the tyranny of a notorious wandering blackguard, one Bosville, Borrow straightway fraternised with the man, and eventually bought his pony and cart and business, and at once set up as a travelling tinker himself. Having always taken a great interest in smith's work and tin work, he now travelled as an itinerant metal worker, thinking he could gain a lifelihood in this way After having been brought into contact with the gypsies, and after having narrowly escaped being poisoned by a Romany beldam who cherished a jealous lintred of him, he met near Willenhall in Staffordshire in Mumber Lane (called Mumper's Lane by the gypsies), Bosville himself Attacked by this man, Borrow had to stand up and fight for the command of the beat Borrow, at the time when glove fights were looked upon as child's play, took, as has been said before, a genuine interest in the ring was a fairly accomplished bruiser himself, but relied for his effects upon the lumbering, hard hitting of heavy weights like the famous Ben Caunt of later days Hence, being at the time of this encounter partially prostrated from a late illness, and the hard-hitting upon which he relied becoming consequently werkened, he would no doubt have been vanquished but for two of those lucky accidents which were always ready to favour him-the unexpected sympathy of one of Bosville's two female companions, 'Isopel Berners,' and the fact that Bosville, beside himself with rage, struck a tree when he intended to strike Borrow's face, and so empled himself Borrow seized this opportunity to deliver a right-hand blow straight from the shoulder, which stunned and nearly killed the 'Flaming Imman,' who, on recovery, made off, leaving 'Isopel Berners' behind Borrow now became still more thoroughly acquainted with the better class of gypsies, the 'gryengroes' or horsedealers, especially with the Petulengros Petulengros, though not so handsome as the Lovells (the Caulo Kamloes), have always been among the most intelligent of the gypsies, indeed, at this very moment a famous member of the family, Gipsy Smith, is one of the most eloquent preachers in England The days spent with 'Isopel Berners,' mainly in Mumper's Dingle, were the happiest in Borrow's life. But these soon came to an end Readers of Lavengro have often asked why he severed from the magnificent Anglo-Saxon road girl with whom he had entered into a kind of platonic partnership The truth is that this railer against 'gentility nonsense' and 'Charley o'er the waterism' had far too great a belief in respectability to marry either gypsy girl or Anglo-Saxon road-girl Not all Borrow's Odyssean wanderings, and not all his intercourse with the gypsies, ever really freed his mind from the great British and American sophism which to other races is so odious A quite recent writer has remarked that the reason why Englishmen can never be brought to understand people like the Spaniards is that they cannot realise the existence of a social structure where no man considers himself inferior because he is poor, and no man considers himself superior simply because he is well-to-do. This remark applies to Borrow as much as to any one of his contemporaries. Dark as had been Borrow's experiences in London, a period no less dark followed his separation from 'Isopel Berners'. I his is what certain writers upon Borrow call the 'veiled period' of his life.

In connection with any matter concerning Borrow it is always necessary to take into account the secretiveness of his disposition, and also his passion for posing. His fondness for the wonderful was almost childish His own love of investifica tion has led students of Borrow into a somewhat unseemly prying into matters which he wished to keep concealed-has led them into asking why Borrow drew the veil over seven years—has led them into speculating as to whether during the 'veiled period' his life was one of squalid misery, compared with which his sojourn with 'Isopel Berners' had been luxury-or whether he was really travelling, as he pretended to have been, over the world By yielding to his instinct as a born showman he excites an inquisitiveness about his private matters which would otherwise be unjustifiable Upon this subject those to whom Borrow seems to have been most reticent were his wife and her daughter. People having the peculiar pride which characterised Borrow seem to be more reticent with their family circle than even with the outer world Hence it was not until after his wife's death in 1869 that he would allude to this period even to his most intimate friends. To those who know what were Borrow's capacities for earn ing money as a wandering hedge smith it needs no revelation from documents to come to the conclusion that, as he was mainly living in England during these seven years (continuing for a considerable time his life of a wanderer, afterwards living as an obscure literary struggler in Norwich, assisted by his mother's slender store), his life during this period was not a life that so proud a man as Borrow would care to talk about. Yet it had at least one incident of a most poetic and romantic kind, not recorded in Dr Knapp's Life The 'veiled period' came to an end when Borrow obtained, through a patron and friend, the post of agent to the British and Foreign Bible Society. In this capacity he visited St Petersburg (1833-35) where he published Targum, a collection of translations Afterwards he visited Spain, Portugal, and Morocco (1835-39) In 1840 he married Mrs Mary Clarke, the well to do widow of a mival officer, with a jointure of £400 a year. He was now enabled to buy an estate on Oulton Broad, and at last become what he longed to be-a small Norfolk squire. Here he permanently settled with his wife and her daughter, and here he turned to literary work again. The first fruit of his trivels and adventures was the publication, in 1841, of Zucali, or Gypsies of Spair work had been written at various odd moments during Borrow's wanderings along the roads of Spain, in a parchment bound Spanish note book now in the possession of the present writer is curious as showing the author's method of The book did not attract much composition attention, but The Bible in Spain, published in 1843, was a great success, and Borrow for a time became a literary lion In 1844 he began to travel again, this time in south-eastern Europe, and so got much knowledge of a very interesting section of the Continental Romanies Lavengro, which appeared in 1851, was much more coolly received, in some places it was absurdly attacked the book which will maintain Borrow's place in English literature It was not until 1857 that the sequel to Lavengro, The Romany Rye, appeared, and this had a still more absurd reception from the English press It did not pass into a second edition for several years

In 1862 he published IVild IVales, describing a tour that he made in Wales in 1854 with his step daughter In this book he dwelt at some length on his experiences as an articled clerk in Norwich, but he studiously avoided touching upon the subject of the Welsh gypsies This is the more remarkable from the fact that in the Romany Rie he leaves the reader on the Welsh border In 1874, having ascertained that Leland was preparing a Romany lexicon, he hurried through the press Romano Lavo-Lil, or Word book of the Gypsy Language It is a pity for his reputation as a Romany scholar that he ever published this book. At this period he was living in Hereford Square, Brompton, where his wife died, seeing only a very few friends, including the Hake family, Mr John Murray, Mr Robert Collinson (who lived next door but one to him), and the present writer He retained as vigorously as ever his love of all kinds of athleticism, especially of sparring, wrestling, and running at the famous race, on 14th October 1861, between Deerfoot, the Seneca Indian, and Jackson, generally called the 'American Deer,' and in a note preserved by his biographer, Dr Knapp, he gives a graphic description of the Indian's peculiar method of running Up to the time of his leaving London he used to take those long walks for which in youth he had been notable, and it was at this time that he made those notes of his experiences with the gypsies located around South London that gave its only value to Romano Lavo-Lil A favourite walk of his was through Fulham over Putney Bridge to Richmond and back, and on these occasions he would take no food from eight o'clock in the morning until seven o'clock in the evening, though he was then past seventy In the summer of 1874 Borrow left London and returned to Oulton On the 26th of July 1881 he died suddenly there, in his seventy-ninth year

There has been much discussion upon Borrow's place in English literature. It is quite unique. Vital literature is that into which the writer succeeds in pouring his own life stream, there fore it depends upon two things-the inborn, unterchable capacity for literary expression, and a fortunate selection of a congenial subject. If it is true, as has been said, that every man has got within him the making of one book, Borrow was one of the most fortunate of English writers Zin cali, The Bible in Spain, Lavengro, the Romany Rye, and Wild Wales are portions of one book. This book is the literary portraiture of a man of singular temperament moving in the only atmos phere in which he was fitted to move, it is also a picture of the outdoor life of England before she succumbed to cosmopolitanism and before slie was entirely vulgarised by wealth-worship. Therefore it seems safe to prophesy that whatsoever books of the Victorian epoch are smothered and lost beneath the ever-accumulating mass of English literature, Borrow's writings will be remembered At that period-before the railways had cut England into a series of iron bordered lozenges and squaresthe meadows and dingles, notwithstanding the uncertainty of the English climate, were a Paradise for the nomad What these English retreats lack in the sunshine-pleasures of warmer and drier climates is inade up by comparative freedom from the tyranny of the only part of the animal kingdom that now baffles man-or seriously disturbs himthe insect world In sunnier climes, except, of course, in the desert countries, outdoor-life, whether in tent or van, is made almost intolerable by the assault of man's relentless insect foes. It is all very well for Shakespeare to lay the scene of the fairy world of A Midsummer Night's Dream in Greece, but the atmosphere is, and must be, that of England's beloved dingles, where alone Lysander and Demetrius could have dreamt in peace beneath a midsummer moon Although the 'gypsy gentle man' of Lavengro and the Romany Rye, working as a hedge smith in the dingle and by the road side, was working, not, as so many readers and critics of his books suppose, for amusement, but for bread-bread that must have been scant indeed to be bought for the odd supences or the few coppers that he was able to earn-no one ever got greater enjoyment from the charms of a vagabond life, no one ever woke up in the early morning with more delight, when the wild flowers of the dingle are shedding their first perfume, no one ever strode out with more exhibitation to the nearest stream for morning ablutions, than did Borrow at the time when he was living with 'Isopel Berners' A man's good fortune or ill fortune depends upon the kind of people with whom he is brought into contact quite as much Borrow's good fortune both as upon himself as a man and as a writer came to him as soon as he was brought into contact with the Contact with the vivacity of this unique gypsies race was absolutely required by Borrow's morbid temperament, and there is not in literary history a more interesting chapter than that which records

Lavengro's sojourn with the gypsies It is the peculiarity of the subject-matter which will keep Borrow's writings alive, this subject-matter is the Romany world in Great Britain and in It is important, therefore, that his relations with the gypsies should be fully understood by the student of his works. So deficient is the knowledge displayed even by thoughtful writers upon Romany subjects that Victor Hugo calls Esmeralda (of purely 'Gorgio' blood) a 'Boheminn,' and 'Isopel Berners,' the greatest hater of the Romany character that ever mixed with the gypsies, is constantly spoken of by writers upon the subject as 'Borrow's tall gypsy-girl' Nor are these instances more remarkable than is the fact that one of the most brilliant writers of our time, writing upon and editing Borrow, speaks of 'Romany ryes' and their 'rawnees' under a delusion which is evidently very common that a Romany rye is a gypsy There is no room to dwell at length upon these subjects here present writer has discussed them with some fullness in two imaginitive works of his depict ing Romany life-depicting it at a period after that of Borrow's pictures, but still at a time when the leading 'gryengroes' could be met in England and Wales-that is, before their great migration to America.

The question has often been asked of Borrow's friends, 'How did it come about that a man, shy, self-conscious, and sensitive to the last degree, became not only the Ulysses of the writing fraternity, wandering among strangers all over Europe, but also lived upon intimate terms with that proscribed race who, more than all others, are repelled by shy self consciousnessthe gypsies?' In explaining this puzzle we shall throw more light upon the depths of Borrow's personality than by giving such biographical details as are given so admirably and so fully by Dr Knapp When Borrow was talking to people in his own class of life there was always in his bearing a kind of sliy egotism. What Carlyle calls the 'armed neutrality' of social intercourse oppressed him. He seemed always to be on his guard, like one who felt himself to be moving in the enemy's camp He had a way of looking at one from the corner of his eye, as though he were observing what effect his words were having, and this give to his face an unpleasant expression of watchfulness. He seemed to be taking stock of his interlocutor and weighing him against himself But when he was with the gypsies there was no more of the shy, defiant expression with which his English friends were familiar. He threw off tne burden of restraint. The feeling of 'armed neutrality' was left behind, and he seemed to be at last enjoying the only social intercourse that could give him pleasure, this it was that enabled him to make friends so entirely with the gypsies The gypsies too have been equally misunderstood Of course by gypsies are here meant the pure Romanies, not the wandering London mongrels claimed as gypsies by professional philanthropists like that bête noire of F H Groome's, the late Mr Smith of Coalville Notwithstanding what is called 'Romany guile' (which is the growth of ages of oppression), the basis of the Romany char acter is exactly the opposite of what all writers previous to Borrow conceived it to be Even such writers of genius as Prosper Merimée can give us in Carmen only the old bloodthirsty conventional gypsy of the stage. It was not until the appearance of Borrow's books that we find in English literature any different conception of the Romany.

Borrow once, when asked by the present writer to tell a common friend what he considered to be the great charm of the gypsy character, said, 'Simplicity—frankness' And he was right, as those few Englishmen who have been really and truly admitted 'behind the tents mouth' well The contradiction between this conception of the Romany character and the popular one in all countries is easily explained. Once let the isolating wall which shuts off the Romany from the 'Gorgio' be broken through, and the communicativeness of the Romany temperament begins to show itself. The gypsies are extremely close observers, they were very quick to notice how different was Borrow's bearing towards them selves from his bearing towards people of his own race, and Borrow used to say that the would be murderess, 'old Mrs Herne, and her little grand daughter, Leonora, were the only gypsies who suspected and disliked him? Thus it came about that the gypsies and the wanderers generally were almost the only people in any country who saw the winsome side of Borrow Some men line an instinctive sympathy with the proscribed races of the world, the Inte Godfrey Leland was one of these, so was the late F H Groome, but not so pre enunently as was Borrow Not that there is anything of the Bamfylde Moore Carew about Borrow As has been said before, he was at heart a John Bull with an ineradicable belief in bourgeois respectability, and yet it was not the bourgeois but the vagabond to whom his heart was drawn Perhaps, indeed, it may be said that in order to understand Borrow it is essential to understand not only the Romanies but the other proscribed races Place any race in the position of a race maudite—the Jews of mediæval Europe (and, alas! of modern Russin), the Cagots, and the Romanies of the present time-and the primal instinct of self preservation, working through generations, must needs show itself in qualities like that which is spoken of as 'Romany guile' It was observable in the Cagots, we see it in the proscribed, There is, as a gapsy wonian races of Asia once said to the present writer and to Borrow, 'somethin' in the wind of a Gorgio that shuts the Romany's mouth and opens his eyes and ears' The result of this state of things is, of course, mevitable-it is 'Romany guile,' and Nature herself seems to have divided the entire animal kingdom into three great classes-those whom she has developed to oppress, those whom she has developed to resist oppression, and those whom she has developed to flee from it this is a great factor in her scheme of evolution The hungry stomach of the long winded wolf has caused the development of the original ungulate upon which he fed into the swift and long-winded horse whose offspring finally wins the Derby Where the oppressed race has to save itself not by fleetness of foot, but by guile, it is inevitable that natural selection should give rise to what Borrow himself used to call 'the crafty creatures' When the gypsy at the sudden sight of a 'Gorgio' near his tent 'shuts his mouth and opens his eyes and ears,' he does as the other 'crafty creatures' dohe does as the mother partridge does when she shams lameness in order to save her chickens, he does as the winged insect does that, in order to deceive its foe, mimics the leaf on which it is accustomed to settle Lavengro and the Romany Rye show that when once the barrier is broken down the 'simplicity' of the gypsy character reveals itself—becomes, indeed, the Romany's chief charm Until Borrow appeared and gave us his admirable pictures, it was impossible for any writer to approach the subject of the Romanies from the broad point of view. The only fault in his representations of them is that he not infrequently makes them talk in locutions that are too bookish to be dramatically true, the substance of the dialogue, however, is almost always true pure race the gypsies are rapidly becoming extinct in the English-speaking countries When they are extinct, Borrow's writings will be more prized than they are even now, but, apart from this, the charm of his mere style is irresistible. His own remarks upon style, especially upon that art of telling a plain story plainly which seems to be growing rarer and more difficult every day, are as penetrative as they are admirably expressed. Through Lavengro and the Romany Rye the soft flowerladen air moving in England's woods and fields seems to blow, and as years go on, and as Englishmen become more and more familiar with the vaunted charms of other countries, the truth will become more and more evident that Borrow's intense love of England was not misplaced

The Flaming Tinman

In the twinkling of an eye, the Flaming Timman, disengaging himself of his frock coat and dashing off his red night cap, came rushing in more despertely than ever. To a flush hit which he received in the mouth he paid as little attention as a wild bull would have done, in a moment his arms were around me, and in another he had hurled me down, falling heavily npon me. The fellow's strength appeared to be tremendous

'Pay lum off now,' said the vilgar woman The Flaming Tinman made no reply, but planting his knee on my breast, seized my throat with two huge horny hands. I gave myself up for dead, and probably should have been so in another minute but for the tall girl, who caught hold of the handkerchief which the fellow wore round his neek with a grasp nearly as powerful as that with which he pressed my throat.

'Do you call that fair play?' said she

'Hands off, Belle,' said the other woman, 'do you call it fair play to interfere? Hands off, or I'll be down upon you myself'

But Belle paid no heed to the injunction, and tugged so hard at the liandkerchief that the Flaming Tinman was nearly throttled, suddenly relinquishing his hold of me, he started on his feet, and aimed a blow at my fair preserver, who avoided it, but said coolly

'I'mish t'other business first, and then I'm your woman whenever you like, but finish it furly—no foul play when I'm by—I'll be the boy's second, and Moll can pick up you when he happens to knock you down'

The battle during the next ten minntes raged with considerable fury, but it so happened that during this time I was never able to knock the Flaming Tinman down, but, on the contrary, received six knock down blows myself 'I can never stand this,' said I, as I sat on the knee of Belle, 'I am afraid I must give in, the Flaming Tinman hits very hard,' and I spat out a mouthful of blood

'Sure enough you'll never beat the Flaming Tinman in the way you fight—it's of no use flipping at the Flaming Tinman with your left hand, why don't you use your right?'

'Because I'm not handy with it,' said I, and then getting up, I once more confronted the Flaming Tinman, and struck him six blows for lus one, but they were all left handed blows, and the blow which the Flaming Tinman gave me knocked me off my legs.

'Now, will you use Long Melford?' said Belle, picking

'I don't know what you mean by Long Melford,' sud I, graping for breath

'Why, this long right of yours,' said Belle, feeling my right arm—'if you do, I shouldn't wonder if you yet stand a chance.'

And now the Flaming Tinman was once more read), much more ready than myself I, however, rose from my second's knee as well as my weakness would permit me, on he came, striking lest and right, appearing almost as fresh as to wind and spirit as when lie first comincaced the combat, though his eyes were considerably swelled and his nether lip was cut in two, on he came, striking left and right, and I did not like his blows at all, or even the wind of them, which was anything but agreeable, and I gave way before him At last he aimed a blow which, had it taken full effect, would doubtless have ended the battle, but owing to his slipping, the fist only grazed my left shoulder, and came with terrific force against a tree, close to which I had been driven, before the tinman could recover himself, I collected all my strength, and struck him beneath the ear, and then fell to the ground completely exhausted, and it so happened that the blow which I struck the tinker beneath the ear was a right handed blow

'Hurrah for Long Melford!' I heard Belle exclaim, 'there is nothing like Long Melford for shortness all the world over'

At these words I turned round my head as I lay, and perceived the I laming Timman stretched upon the ground apparently senscless.

Telling a Plain Story Plainly

What struck me most with respect to these (Newgate) lives was the art which the writers, whoever they were, possessed of telling a plain story It is no easy thing to tell a story plainly and distinctly by mouth, but to tell one on paper is difficult indeed, so many snares lie in People are afraid to put down what is common on paper, they seek to embellish their narratives, as they thinl, by philosophic speculations and reflections, they are unvious to shine, and people who are unvious to shine can never tell a plain story 'So I went with them to a music booth, where they made me almost drunk with gin, and began to talk their flash language, which I did not understand,' says, or is made to say, Henry Summs, executed at Tyburn some seventy years before the time of which I am speaking. I have always looked upon this sentence as a masterpiece of the narra tive style, it is so concise and yet so very clear

Lord Beaconsfield.

Benjamin Disraeli, statesman and man of letters, was born in London on 21st December 1804 came of a Jewish family which, driven from Spain in the fifteenth century, took refuge in Venice. Thence, about the middle of the eighteenth century, Benjamin Disraeli's grandfather came to England, where he made a fortune, bought a country house, ind lived in a polished and intelligent society His son Isaac (see Vol II p 715), abandoning husiness, became a famous man of letters, and the young Benjamin, who, in his own phrase, was 'born in a library' lived from his early youth on terms of familiarity with the great men of the Deemed by his mother too sensitive to endure the rough and tumble of a public school, he was educated privately, and he has given a romantic account of his early days in Livium Grey and Contarin Fleming An impartial de scription of this remarkable boy is given by Sir Henry Layard (Autobiography and Letters, vol 1 pp 48 sqq), who, strangely enough, first saw him in boxing gloves and shirt sleeves, and who thought him unkind because he would not answer the questions put to him about the But the youth of Disrieli is by this time legendary, and even if we make full allowance for exaggeration, it must have been a dicam of splendour and nobility Determined to succeed in life, he knew that the first step necessary was to call attention to himself, and taking the motto 'Adventures are to the adventurous' for his own he acted the part of the adventurous vouth with an engaging extravagance. Meanwhile his father destined him for the law, and Disracli spent some wears years at work for which he was obviously unfit. But he was already intent upon hterary schemes, and in 1825 he visited Walter Scott and I ocklart at Chiefswood, with a proposal on I

Murray's behalf that Lockhart should edit The Representative With a magnifoquence which foreshadowed his future grandeur, Dismeli impressed upon Lockhart that he was not invited 'to be the editor of a newspaper, but the director general of an immense organ, and at the head of a band of high bred gentlemen and important interests? The fact that Murray entrusted Disracli with so delicate a mission proves that, young as lie was, he was already a personage in society over, he had dipped his own pen in the inkpot, and a year after his visit to Chiefswood he published Vivian Gist his first romance. Truly this young solicitor's clerk awoke to find himself famous Vivian Grey had all the elements which ensure success, it was young, it was daring, it was gry Though, as its author afterwards con fessed, it was 'the result of imagination, acting on knowledge not acquired by experience,' it was fresh enough and sincere enough to make the young Disraeli a reputation which his every word his every action, could but increase. The motto, 'Why, then, the world's my oyster, Which I with sword will open,' struck the dominant note of his eareer, and henceforth all avenues were open to the courageous author Soon after the publication of his first book he fell suddenly ill, and lost, as he says himself, five years of his life. In 1830, indeed, he sought change in foreign travel, which gave him the opportunity of writing to his family the witty and vivacious series of Home Letters, in which the real Disraeli is already alive and alert. Returning to England, he devoted lumself with the greatest energy to the composition of romances The Young Duke (1831) was followed by Contarine Fleming (1832) and The Wondrous Tale of Alrey (1833) These are, perhaps, the most fantastic of all their author's works, they display in the most brilliant fashion Disraeli's love of sentimental romance and bright colours. In all of them the author has a tendency to drop into blank verse, wherever the cessition of dialogue makes it possible to avoid prose. They are all written in an over ornate style, and are splended with the spoils of the teeming Orient 'Jasper and porphyry and agate'-these are the materials out of which Dismeli's famous Palladian piles are constructed On every page of these early stones there is a pose of poetry, which is less sincere, may be, than the other pose of worldliness. While Alroy sees wonders, Contarini, being 'a child of nature, 'learns to unlearn' But at the same time, for all their poetry, the chief merit of Disracli's first essays in romance is the picture of fashionable life which they present. The gambling scene in the Young Duke is a masterpiece of its land, Horace de Bernfort in Contariri Fleming, who thinks everything and everybody a bore is enii nently characteristic while the maxims which are scattered up and down these sparkling pages are the essence of worldlness. 'A smile for a friend and a succe for the world, is the vay to govern mankind, says Vivian Grey, who, though he took no other refreshment than 'guava and liqueurs,' was already determined to 'manage mankind by studying their temper and humouring their weak nesses' In truth, remarkable as are these carly novels, they would not of themselves have sufficed for immortality. If they possess the eviberance of youth, they possess also youth's absurdity, and they were presently eclipsed by their author's famous trilogy. But in the meantime Disraeli had written three burlesques - Irion in Heaven, The Infernal Marriage, and Popanilla, which for power and irony may be compared only to the highest, even to Voltaire, upon incompar whose able style they are modelled That a youth should have produced these three little masterpieces is wonderful indeed, they show no trace of inde cision, no touch of immaturity, and they prove that when Distacli handled irony lie instantly forgot the extravigances and mannerisms which at times disturbed the serenity of his

But from the first Disraeli recognised that he was a man of action as well as a man of letters

To satisfy his temperament he must discover a profession which brought fame to the adventurous The Bar was little to his mind 'Liw and bid jokes till we are forty, and then, with the most brilliant success, the prospect of gout and a coronet' Besides, said Vivian Grey, speaking for his author, 'to be a great lawyer I must give up my chances of being a great man' And to be a great man Benjamin Disraeli was determined His mind was made up when early in his life he told Lord Melbourne that he meant to be Prime His assurance was evident when, being asked at the hustings upon what he stood, he replied magnificently, 'Upon my head' But seventy years ago the first necessity of an aspirant to politics was interest, and in political interest Disraeli was sadly lacking. He was not the member of a great house for whose majority in easy borough was waiting. He was a Jew, with nothing to help him save his wits, yet he never doubted his ultimate success, and if he ran the risk of debt and embarrassment, he was playing for a big stake and he knew that he would win Meanwhile he had niade himself known to the great world. His extravigant costumes had at tained the effect which he deliberately anticipated for them, they had made him talled about, and the publication of his books had en linneed the effect. Layard declares ' he that wore waistcoats of the most gorgeous col ours and the most fantastic patterns, with much gold embroidery, velvet pantaloons , shoes adorned with ribbons? One wit declared that he was 'hanging in chains,'another that he was aspiring to the post of Lord Mayor At Gibraltar he changed his cane as the gun fired, and he was not sure whether it was this piece of coxcombry or the authorship of Vivian Grey which made him finious But he had learned the art of present ing himself to the world, the first art which is essential

From the Portrait in the National Portrait Gallery by Lockhart Boyle, after Sir John E. Millaty, R. A.

Unsuccessful in 1832, he failed again two years later, but he made the election memorable by an epigram that is still famous. 'The people,' said he, 'took Reform as some other people take stolen goods, and no questions asked.' But it was not until 1837 that he obtained a seat in the House of Commons, when he was returned for Maidstone as the colleague of Wyndham Lewis, whose widow he married in 1839.

His maiden speech was delivered on 7th December 1837 in answer to O'Connell, whom District two years before had challenged to a duel, and it was received with shouts of derisive laughter District's dandified air, his trick of deliberate and impressive speech, his pallid complexion, his black curls, his eccentric costume, were enough to provoke the scorn of a commonplace house. But District was indifferent to ridicule. He stood his ground with his customary courage, if he was howled down, he was not dismayed. The day would come said he, when they would hear him. 'When I rise hereafter in this Assembly a dropped pin shall be heard.'

No man was ever more sincere than Disraeli His works and acts were all of the same piece His filmous trilogy-Coningsby, Sybil, and Tancied -is but an expression in another medium of his political life. In the early forties the middle class was rising to greatness, and in its rise was doing its best to crush all that was above or below it To combit a dangerous situation a party had been formed of emancipated Tories, called the Young England Party, pledged to restore their lost comfort to the lower class and its dying influence to the upper The leaders of the party were Disraeli. Lord John Manners, George Smythe, and Baillie Cochrane, their aspirations are eloquently expressed in Disraeli's trilogy Coningsby (1844), in fact, struck a fresh note it was the best novel of politics ever written, and save by its author it has not been surpassed. Admirable as were the early novels, brilliant as were l'enetia and lleurretta Temple (with its magnificent portrait of D'Orsay in Count Mirabel), nothing that Disracli had yet written suggested the ease and mastery of It was, like the others, a roman delif Comnesby It is not difficult to identify the chief personages in the story Connigsby is George Smythe, Disraeli's hrilliant colleague, while Monmouth and Rigby are presentments, overcharged it is true, of the Margus of Hertford and his friend John Wilson Some years later Thackers tried his hand at the same portraiture and a comparison of Vanity Fair with Coningsby proves that in some arts of the novelist Disraeli was incomparably the But the three great novels upon better man which Districts reputation is established are not merely sketches of character, they are also serious political treatises No better sketch of English parties as they were at the passing of the Reform Bill exists than Conn gib; Trdpole and Taper, who never despaired of the Republic, are immortal So, too, is Righy, with his patriotic speeches and his 'slishing' articles As in his earliest speeches, delivered at High Wycombe, so in Coringshy Disrieli went back to Bolingbroke and the theory of the Veneurn Republic And after Bolingbroke, the political influence of Coningsby was Pitt, who was determined that 'the sovereign of Fingland should never be degraded into the position of a Venction Doge,' and the three great elements of whose system were 'a widening of our electoral system, great facilities of commerce, and the rescue of our Rom in Catholic fellow subjects from a Puritanic yoke' But Coningsby contained more than this lucid exposition of Pitt's and Bolingbroke's views, it set forth, for the first time, Disrieli's opinion of the Jewish question. In the person of Sidonia, Disraeli celebrated the Jews, who are an 'unmixed race,' and foreshadowed his own boast that he was a full Jew because he believed not only in Moses but in Calvary Indeed, Commashy is packed with wisdom. Who will ever forget the cry, 'Register, register, register?' Who will ever deny the truth of the uphorism, 'No Government can be long secure without a formid able Opposition'? Sybil (1845), maturer in style than Coningsby, is also graver in substance, in its pages Disraeli pleaded the cause of the workingman with an eloquence which Carlyle should have appreciated and did not. He was not a Chartist, yet he would have accepted many points of the But if he put the case against the capitalist with amazing force, he did not denounce an evil without proposing a remedy He dreamed of an aristocracy which was neither tyrannic il nor oppressive. 'Forvism will rise from the tomb,' s ud he, with splendid optimism 'over which Boling broke shed his last tear, to bring back strength to the Crown, liberty to the subject, and to announce that power has only one duty—to secure the social welfare of the people' In Tancred (1847), the last of the trilogy, Disraeli preached once more his favourite gospel of the East, 'The East,' he said, 'is a career,' and he prophesied thus early that Cyprus should be ours that the Orient should recognise 'the Limpress of India as its suzernin' For the rest, he declared that the two great stimulants to action were 'youth and debt,' and he drew in Takredeen a man of shifts and expedients comparable to Panurge himself. But while in this trilogy he announced his political creed, he was practising in the House of Commons what he preached in romance In 1845 he attacked Peel and his party with all the bitterness that was his He declared that 'the right honourable gentleman had caught the Whigs bathing, and walked away with their clothes? In the same spirit of raillers he asserted that Peel traced 'the steam engine back to the tea kettle his precedents are generally tea kettle precedents," and then with the note of deeper schousness pronounced the Conservative Government 'an organised hypoerisy' So he expounded the same gospel of Tory sm in book and speech, he had resolved into their elements our political parties, he had pierced 'the strange mystification by which that which was national in its constitution had become odious, and that which was exclusive was presented as popular'

For five and twenty years after the publication of Sybil Disraeli deserted fiction Once only within this period did he take up his pen, to write in George Bentinck the best political biography in the language But from the fall of Peel he was the leader of his party, and it was his business to put into practice the splendid doctrines of patriotism which he had set forth in his novels He led his party in opposition, he served it magnificently in office. In 1852, in 1858, in 1866 he was Chancellor Though he was the absolute of the Exchequer master of his party, though he represented in his own Jewish personality all that was anistocratic and orthodox in English politics, he did not attain to the position of Prime Minister until he was sixty four years of age Meanwhile he had educated the Conservatives up to his level of political in telligence, he had passed a Reform Bill which had baffled his opponents, and he reached the zenith of his power and influence when, at the Congress of Berlin (1878), he gave a practical effect to the dreams of his early life

In 1870, as an interlude to politics, he had published Lothair, in some respects his most finished presentation of English society. If its purpose is less deep than the purpose of the trilogy, it is always witty and amazingly true to life we know no better picture of the times than this admirable novel, which depends for its interest far more upon an intimate knowledge of human nature than upon the curiosity which prompts us to look for real personages in the characters of In 1880 was published Endymion, in which the author handled the old puppets with his habitual mastery, and yet invented no new drama for their performance A year later he died, and was buried at Hughenden by the side of the loyal wife who had been the companion of his many triumphs, and of the faithful friend, Mrs Willyams, who had proudly served him not the place to estimate the services which he rendered his country, but it may be said that he was not only the most skilful parliamentarian of his day—he was also a statesman whose foresight and resolution shaped the destinies of England His life, apart from politics, was distinguished by a singular rectitude and a rare amiability. Though he lived and died a poor man, harassed by debt, he always subordinated his private interests to the public weal His reputation in literature has been steadily growing since his death The old legend of 'the Hebrew conjurer' has long been forgotten, and the man who was laughed at by far less in telligent persons than Carlyle is to-day generally recognised as a great novelist. He did not always treat the English language with the respect it But if he was sometimes careless in word and grammar, he never fuled in the making of phrases. In this art his touch was as sure as Heine's own, and innumerable coins stamped with the impress of his wit have passed into the general currency. Above all, he was an acute student of men and women. He understood both the grandcur and littleness of mankind, and he revealed his knowledge to others with an uncommon sincerity. Yet no romance that he wrote is more splendid than the romance of his own life. If he cherished many ambitions, he gratified them all, and he presents the rare and liappy spectacle of a career in which literature and experience are indissoluble.

Genius and Youth.

'Nay,' said the stranger, 'for life in general there 15 but one decree Youth Is a blunder, Manhood a struggle, Old Age a regret Do not suppose, he added, smiling, 'that I hold that youth is genius, all that I say is, that genius, when young, is divine. Why, the greatest captains of ancient and modern times both conquered Italy at five and twenty ! Youth, extreme vouth, overthrew the Persian Empire. Don John of Austria won Lepanto at twenty five, the greatest battle of modern time, had it not been for the jealousy of Philip, the next year he would have been Emperor of Mauritania Gaston de Foix was only twenty two when he stood a victor on the plain of Ravenna. Every one remembers Conde and Rocrov at the same age Gustarus Adolphus died at thirty eight. I ook at his captains that wonderful Duke of Weimar, only thirty six when he died Banier himself, after all his miracles, died at forty five. Cortes was little more than thirty when he gazed upon the golden cupolas of Mexico Maurice of Saxony died at thirty two, all Europe acl nowledged the loss of the greatest captain and the profounded statesman of the age. Then there is Nelson, Clive, but these are warriors, and perhaps you may think there are greater things than war. I do not I worship the Lord of Hosts But take the most illus trious relievements of civil prudence Innocent III, the greatest of the Popes, was the despot of Christendom John de Medici was a Cardinal at at thirty seven fifteen, and according to Guiceiardini, baffled with his stateeraft Ferdinand of Aragon himself He was Pope 15 Leo 1 at thirty seven. Luther robbed even him of his richest province at thirty five. Take Ignatius Loyola and John Wesley, they worked with young brains. Ignatius was only thirty when he made his pilgrimage and wrote the "Spiritual Exercises" Pascal wrote a grent work nt sixteen, and died at thirty seven, the greatest of Frenchmen

'Ah' that fatal thirty seven, which reminds me of Byron, greater even as a man than a writer. Was it experience that guided the pencil of Raphael when he punted the palaces of Rome? He, too, died at thirty seven. Richelieu was Secretary of State at thirty one. Well then, there were Bolingbroke and Pitt, both ministers before other men left off cricket. Grotius was in great practice at seventeen, and Attorney General at twenty four. And Acquaviva, Acquavia was General of the Jesuits, ruled every Cabinet in Europe, and colonised America before he was thirty seven. What a career!' exclaimed the stranger, rising from his chair and walking up and down the room, 'the secret sway of Europe! That was indeed a position!

But it is needless to multiply instances! The history of Heroes is the listory of Youth' (From Coningsby)

A Sublime Elopement

It was clearly a runaway match—never indeed was such a sublime elopement. The four horses were coal blick, with blood red mines and tails, and they were shod with rubies. They were harnessed to a busaltic car by a single rein of flame. Waving his double pronged trident in the air, the God struck the blue breast of Cyane, and the waters instantly parted. In rushed the wild chariot, the pale and insensible Proscrpine clinging to the breast of her grim lover.

Through the depths of the hitherto unfathomed like the infernal steeds held their breathless course. The car jolted against its bed 'Save me!' exclaimed the future Queen of Hades, and she clung with renewed energy to the bosom of the dark bridegroom. The earth opened, they entered the kingdom of the Gnomes Here Pluto was popular. The lurid populace gave him a loud shout. The chariot whirled along through shadowy cities and by dim highways, swarming with a busy race of shades.

'Ye flowery meads of Enn' exclaimed the terrified Proserpine, 'shall I never view you again? What an execrable climate!'

'Here, however, indoor nature is charming,' re sponded Pluto ''Tis a great nation of manufacturers You are better, I hope, my Proscrpine. The passage of the water is never very agreeable, especially to Indies.'

'And which is our next stage?' inquired Proscrpine

'The centre of Earth,' replied Pluto. 'Travelling is so much improved that at this rate we shall reach Hades before night'

'Alas I' exclaimed Proscrpine, 'is not this night?'

'You are not unhappy, my Proserpine?'

'Beloved of my heart, I have given up everything for you! I do not repent, but I am thinking of my mother'

'Time will pacify the Lady Ceres. What is done cannot be undone. In the winter, when a residence among us is even desirable, I should not be surprised were she to pay us a visit.'

'Her prejudices are so strong,' murmured the bride 'O' my Pluto, I hope your family will be kind to me'

'Who could be unkind to Proserpine? Ours is a very domestic circle. I can assure you that everything is so well ordered among its that I have no recollection of a domestic broil?

'But marriage is such a revolution in a bachelor's establishment,' replied Proserpine, despondingly 'To tell the truth, too, I am half frightened at the thought of the Furies I have heard that their tempers are so violent'

'They mean well, their feelings are strong, but their hearts are in the right place. I flatter myself you will like my nieces, the Parers. They are accomplished, and favourites among the men'

'Indeed!'

'Oh! quite irresistible'

'My heart misgives me. I wish you had at least paid them the compliment of apprising them of our marriage'

'Cheer up For myself, I have none but pleasant anticipations I long to he at home once more by my own fireside, and patting my faithful Cerberus'

'I think I shall like Cerberus, I am fond of dogs'

- 'I am sure you will He is the most faithful creature in the world'
  - 'Is he very sierce?'
- 'Not if he takes a fancy to you, and who can help taking a fancy to Proserpine?'
  - 'Ah I my Pluto, you are in love'

(From The Infernal Marriage)

In Praise of Debt.

Fakredeen was fond of his debts, they were the source, indeed, of his only real excitement, and he was grateful to them for their stirring powers. The usurers of Syria are as adroit and callous as those of all other countries, and possess no doubt all those repulsive qualities which are the consequence of an habitual control over every generous emotion. But, instead of viewing them with feelings of vengeance or abhorrence, Fakredeen studied them nnceasingly with a fine and profound investigation, and found in their society a deep psychological interest His own rapacious soul delighted to struggle with their rapine, and it charmed him to baffle with his artifice their fraudulent dexterity. He loved to enter their houses with his glittering eye and face radiant with innocence, and, when things were at the very worst and they remorse less, to succeed in circumventing them sense, and to a certain degree, they were all his victims True, they had gorged upon his rents and menaced his domains, but they had also advanced large sums, and he had so involved one with another in their eager appetite to prey upon his youth, and had so complicated the financial relations of the Syrian coast in his own respect, that sometimes they tremblingly calculated that the erash of Fakredeen must inevitably be the signal of a general catastroplie

Even usurers have their weak side, some are vain, some envious, Fakredeen knew how to titilinte their self love, or when to give them the opportunity of immoliting a rival. Then it was, when he had baffled and deluded them, or with that fatal frankness, of which he sometimes blushingly boasted, had betrayed some sacred confidence that shook the credit of the whole coast from Scanderoon to Giza, and embroiled individuals whose existence depended on their mutual goodwill, that, langhing like one of the blue eyed hyenas of his forests, he gilloped away to Canobia, and, calling for his nargilly, mused in chuel ling calculation over the prodigious sums he owed to them, formed whimsical and airy projects for his quittance, or delighted himself by brooding over the memory of some happy expedient or some daring feat of finance

'What should I be without my debts?' he would sometimes exclaim, 'dear companions of my life that never desert me! All my knowledge of human nature is owing to them it is in managing my affairs that I have sounded the depths of the human heart, recognised all the combinations of human character, developed my own powers, and mastered the resources of others What expedient in negotiation is unknown to me? What degree of endurance have I not calculated? What play of the countenance have I not observed? Yes, among my creditors. I have disciplined that diplomatic ability, that shall some day confound and control Calanets Oh my debts, I feel your presence like that of guardian angels! If I be luxy, you prick me to action, if elate, you subduceme to reflection, and thus it is that you alone can secure that continuous yet controlled energy which conquers mankind ' (From Tancred)

The Crown and the People

And thus I conclude the last page of a work which, though its form be light and impresending, would yet aspire to suggest to its readers some considerations of a very opposite character A year ago, I presumed to offer the public some volumes that aimed at calling their attention to the state of our political parties, their origin, their history, their present position. In an age of political infidelity, of mean passions, and petty thoughts, I would have impressed upon the rising race not to despair, but to seek in a right understanding of the lustory of their country and in the energies of heroic youth the elements The present work advances another of national welfare step in the same emprise. I rom the state of Parties it now would draw public thought to the state of the People whom those parties for two centuries have governed. The comprehension and the cure of this greater theme depend upon the same agencies as the first it is the past alone that can explain the present, and it is youth that alone can mould the remedial fature The written listory of a our country for the last ten reigns has been a mere phan tisma, giving to the origin and consequence of public transactions a character and colour in every respect dissimilar to their natural form and line. In this mighty mystery all thoughts and things have assumed an aspect and title contrary to their real quality and style. Oh garely has been called Liberty, an exclusive Pricathood has been christened a National Church Sovereignts has been the title of something that has had no dominion, while ab olute power has been wielded by thou who profess themselves the servants of the People. In the selfish strife of factions, two great existences have been blotted out of the history of Lingland, the Monarch and the Multitude, as the power of the Crown has diminished, the privileges of the People have diap peared, till at length the sceptre has become a pageant, and its subject has degenerated again into a sorf

It is nearly fourteen years ago, in the popular frenzy of a mean and selfish revolution which emancipated neither the Crown nor the People, that I first took the occasion to intimate, and then to develop to the first assembly of my countrymen that I ever had the honour to address, these convictions. They have been misunderstood, as as ever for a season the fate of Truth, and they have obtained for their promulgator much misrepresentation. as must ever be the lot of those who will not follow the beaten track of a fallacious custom But Time, that brings all things, has brought also to the mind of Fing land some suspicion that the idols they have so long worshipped, and the oricles that have so long delude I There is a whisper rising them, are not the true ones in this country that Loyalty is not a phrase, Faith not a delusion, and Popular Liberty something more diffusive and substantial than the profune exercise of the sacred rights of sovereignty by political classes.

That we may live to see England once more possess a free Monarchy and a privileged and prosperous People is my prayer, that these great consequences can only be brought about by the energy and devotion of our Youth is my persuasion. We live in an age when to be young and to be indifferent can be no longer synonymous. We must prepare for the coming hour. The claims of the Future are represented by suffering millions, and the Youth of a Nation are the trustees of Posterity.

(From Sybil)

The Jewish Race

The world has by this time discovered that it is impossible to destroy the Jews. The attempt to extir pate them has been made under the mos favourable nuspices and on the largest scale, the most considerable means that man could command have been pertimciously applied to this object for the longest period of recorded time Lgyptian Pharnob, Assyrian Lings, Roman emperors, Scandinavian emsaders, Gothic princes, and holy inquisitors have alike devoted their energies to the fulfilment of this common purpose. Expatriation, exile, captivity, confiscation, torture on the most in genious and massacre on the most extensive scale, a curious system of degrading on toms and debasing lass which i ould have I roken the heart of any other peo, le, have been tried, and in vain. The Jews, after all this havoe, are probably more numerous at this date than they were during the reign of Solomon the wing are found in all lands, and, unfortunately, prospering in All which proves that it is in win for man to ritempt to baffic the increasile law of nature, which has decreed that a superior ince shall never be destroyed or absorbed by an inferior

But the influence of a great race will be felt, its prentness does not depend upon its numbers oberms the Inglish would not have vanquished the Chinese, no would the Arte , have been overthrown li, Corte., and a handful of Goths. That greatness results from its organisation, the consequences of which are shown in its energy and enterprise, in the strength of its will and the fertility of its brain. Let us observe what should be the influence of the Jeus and then a certain how it is excreised. The Jewish race connects the modern population with the early eges of the worlk, s hen the relations of the Creater with the created were more intimate than in these day, when engers in ited the earth and God Hun off even spot e with man. The Jews represent the Semitic principle, all that is spiritual in our nature. They are the tru tees of tradition and the conversators of the religious element. They are a living and the most striking evidence of the falsity of that permeious doctrine of modern times, the natural equality of man. The political equality of a particular race is a matter of minicipal arrangement, and depends entirely on political considerations and circumstances but the natural equality of man now in vogue, and taking the form of cosmopolitan fraternity is a principle which, were it possible to act on it, would deteriorate the great races and destroy all the gennis of the world What would be the consequence on the great Ang'o Saxon republic, for example, were its citizens to secode from their sound principle of reserve, and mingle with their negro and coloured populations? In the course of time they would become so deteriorated that their states would probably be reconquered and regained by the abongmes whom they have expelled, and who would then be their superiors. But though nature will never ultimately permit this theory of natural equality to be practised, the preaching of this dogma has already caused much mischief, and may occasion much more The native tendency of the Jewish race, who are justly proud of their blood, is against the doctrine of the They have also another characteristic, equality of man the faculty of acquisition. Although the European laws have endeavoured to prevent their obtaining property, they have nevertheless become remarkable for their accumulated wealth. Thus it will be seen that all the tendencies of the Jewish race are conservative. Their bias is to religion, property, and natural aristocracy and it should be the interest of statesmen that this bias of a great race should be encouraged, and their energies and executive powers enlisted in the cause of existing society.

The best Lives of Lord Beaconsfield are those by Froude (1890) and Hitchman (3rd ed 1885) but neither is satisfactory. A volume of his Letters (1830-52) was edited in 1887 by Mr Ralph Distaeli

Frederick Denison Maurice (1805-72) was the son of a Unitarian minister, and was born at Normanston near Lowestoft, whence in 1814 the family removed to Frenchy near Bristol, and in 1823 he went up to Trinity College, Cambridge, thence migrating to Trinity Hall His reputation at the university for scholarship stood high, but, being at this time a Dissenter, he left Cambridge in 1827 without taking a degree, and commenced a literary career in London He wrote for the Westminster Retriev and other serials, and for a time edited the Athenaum, then recently started His spirit had been profoundly stirred and influenced by Coleridge, and resolving to take orders in the Church of England, he in 1830 went to Oxford, where he took the degree of MA., and was ordained a priest in 1834. In that year his novel, Eustace Conway, was published without attracting much notice. He became chaplin to Guy's Hospital in 1837, in 1840 he was made Professor of Literature at King's College, London, and there he was Professor of Theology from 1846 till He was chaplain of Lincoln's Inn from 1853 1846 until 1860, when he accepted the incumbency of Vere Street Chapel, held by him until his election as Professor of Moral Philosophy it The publication in 1853 of Cambridge in 1866 his Theological Essays lost him the professorship of Theology in King's College The atonement he deelared to be not a terrible necessity but a glorious gospel, not of pardon for sin but deliver ance from sin, while Christ's definition of life eternal-and so of eternal punishment-he main tained was opposed to the popular doctrine, which he regarded as a mixture of paganism and Christianity Amongst the views set forth in this and other works were the doctrine that the 'fall of Adam' is not the centre of theology, but an incident in the early education of the race, important only as representing the weakness of man apart from Christ, that creeds, the Bible, the Church, are valuable just in so far as they set forth Christ the King as the object of the faith of man, but as substitutes for that faith are Of some fifty publications, only mischievous the most important (in many cases originally delivered as sermons or lectures) were his Moral and Metaphysical Philosophy, Rel gions of the World, Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament, Patriarchs and Lawgivers of the Old Testament, The Kingdom of Christ, The Doctrine of Sacrifice, Theological Essays, Lectures on the Ecclesiastical History of the First and Second Centuries, The Gospel of St John, The Conscience, and Social Morality Maurice strenuously controverted Mansel's views on our knowledge of God, and denounced as false any political economy founded on selfishness and not on the Cross as the ruling power of the universe. He was the mainspring of the movement known as Christian Socialism, and the president of the society for pro moting working men's associations, and was also the founder and first principal of the Working-Man's College, and the founder and the guiding spirit of the Queen's College for Women, in both of which he trught Though his views were those that came to be called 'Broad Church,' and he had many friends or followers who accepted his main positions, he vehemently repudiated the position of a party-leader His influence extended throughout all parties in the Church and far beyond the Church, and he profoundly stirred and attracted men of the most various types Charles Kingsley and Tom Hughes were disciples, J S Mill and Ruskin acknowledged his power He rather stimu Inted to like aims and sympathies than inculcated a doctrine And it was with some justice complained that his desire to avoid dogmatic definition made some of his positions hard to grasp, and that he was obscure if not confused in thought. His originality and suggestiveness are in his published writings injured by his too great copiousness, but his expositions, though they often seem too like sermons, are constantly marked by profound thoughts and eloquent appeals to heart and conscience

A bibliography of Maurice's writings was published by G J Gray in 1835. His full name was John Frederick Denison Maurice His Life based mainly on his own letters, was written by his son Major General Sir John Frederick Maurice, K.C B. (2 vols. 1884).

too narrow, and was yearning for an ampler outlook As a philosophy of life he found Benthamism gravely defective, and he shocked his own immediate Utilitarian circle by a sympathetic exposition of the Idealism of Coleridge Mill's dissatisfaction with the narrowness and hardness of the Utilitarian creed was intensified by a severe mental crisis through which he passed in the autumn of 1826, probably brought on by excessive intellectual The characteristic of the crisis was application deadness of feeling, largely due, Mill thought, to exclusive devotion to the habit of analysis inculcated by the Utilitarian philosophy He found relief in the poetry of Wordsworth Out of this experience grew two convictions somewhat alien to the creed of his father and Bentham-namely, that while happiness is the test of the results of conduct and the end of life, yet it should not be pursued as the direct end but as an ideal end, aiming at something else, happiness is found by the way other conviction was that the Utilitarians took too narrow a view of education, they considered the individual too exclusively as an active reforming being, as mainly devoted to the destruction of error and the propagation of truth-a kind of intel lectual machine. Mill now saw that self-culture, the culture of the emotional and passive susceptibilities, were a necessary part of education attitude as revealed in the essays on Bentham and Coleridge created considerable distrust among his old friends, especially the Grotes, but he never abandoned the fundamental tenets of the Utilitarian creed Under the influence of men like Maurice, Sterling, and others who had come under the sway of Coloridge, he gave to Utilitarianism a wider meaning, so as to make it include individual culture as well as intellectual propagandism and revolutionary zeal

That Mill still remained true to his early faith was made evident when his Logic appeared in 1843. It had long been his opinion that the doctrine of necessary truths and intuitions was largely responsible for the strong hold which erroneous beliefs and hurtful institutions have So long as certain beliefs can be upon society traced back to necessary truths, so long, he said, is it impossible to overthrow these beliefs, and so long will reformers spend their strength in vain in attacking institutions which draw their justification from these beliefs Mill's aim in the Logic is to trace all thought and feeling to experience philosophy upon which it rests is mainly that of James Will improved and strengthened, but in the main the principle of Association is used as the master-key with which to open the psychologic The book problems of belief and reasoning attrined extraordinary popularity, and those who dissented most widely from its views were bound to confess that Mill's work, especially the section dealing with Induction, was the product of a The Logic was followed in 1848 by master mind The Principles of Political Economy Here, too, Mill breaks away from his intellectual ancestors in some important particulars The Political Economy of James Mill and Ricardo rested on the idea of The laws of wealth, said they, absolute freedom are as fixed and inflexible as the law of gravitation In his work J S Mill makes a distinction between the laws of production and distribution former he holds to be regulated by causes beyond legislative control, but the latter, he thinks, may be modified by institutions and governmental action At this point Mill touches hands with Socialism, which his predecessors abhorred. He hoped to do in the nineteenth century for political economy what Adam Smith did for it in the eighteenth century, but instead of placing the science on an immovable basis, he succeeded in raising questions of such momentous import that since his time economic science has been in a state of chaos

In 1851 a great emotional influence came into Mill's life. In that year he married Mrs Taylor, a lady with whom, during her husband's lifetime, he had been on terms of intimacy which met with the strong disapproval of his father and his most intimate friends. The tone of eulogy in which Mill spoke and wrote of his wife completely baffled his associates Undoubtedly clever, Mrs Taylor was not a woman of transcendent abilities Carlyle. when asked about her, said 'Slie was a woman with a deal of unwise intellect, she was always wanting to know how and why and what for' It would almost seem as if Mill's emotional life, so long repressed by his father and started by a cast-iron creed, had at this epoch in his life burst its bonds and like a torrent flowed over without discriminating check. His extraordinary devotion to his wife is still to be seen in the inscription he caused to be placed on her grave at Avignon, where she died in 1858

The years 1858 to 1865 were crowded with literary work. In that period were produced the Liberty, the essay on Utilitarianism, the book on Representative Government, and the Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy and other smaller productions, including a volume of papers on Comte and Positivism In the book on Liberty, which is one of the best of his writings, Mill deals with a task which has baffled the intellect of all political thinkers-namely, the task of reconciling the freedom of the individual with the restraints rendered necessary by the needs of the social In society, restraints and compulsion there What are their justification, and how must be far are they to be allowed to interfere with the liberty of the individual? These aspects of a many sided problem are handled with a courage, lucidity, and grasp which stamped the book as epoch making in the sphere of political philosophy government, hence their fervour in the cause of education and in the attempt to form a scientific theory of government. James Mall's famous essay on Government, which Macaulay attacked so furiously, rested on the assumption that the best form of government was one in which political power was in the lands, not of a monarch or an aristocratic minority, but of a democratic majority. In a word, when power is in the hands of the Community at large the problem will be solved, for according to Bentham and his school the Community cannot have an interest opposite to its own interest, thereby it was thought government would be. no longer diverted from its proper end-the greatest happiness of the greatest number - by the sinister interests either of a king or self seeking aristocrats his Representative Government find Mill, as in his other works, calling in question some of the dogmas of his intellectual ancestors He saw, what James Mill and Bentham failed to that there may be such a thing as despotism of a majority as of a majority as well as of a minority His book is a careful discussion of the fundamental problems of Government, in which, in his usual fair-minded way, he faces difficulties without shrinking, and though fully in sympathy with democracy, courageously points out its inherent defects and dangers

The book on Representative Government raises anew questions which the old Radicals believed they had settled for ever. It was a favourite dogma of Bentham and James Mill that the evils of society had their origin in ignorance and mis-

In his essay on Bentham, Mill give indication of dissatisfaction with the narrow interpretation which the early Utilitarians gave of the emotional side of life. Happiness was conceived by Bentham in rather a crude fashion, the happiness associated with the esthetic feelings being practically ignored It was clear that in dealing with Utilitarianism Mill would come into conflict with the crude views of his predecessors. In his Utilitarianism, published in 1861, Mill, while holding fast by the greatest happiness theory of Bentham, endeavoured to give an ideal interpretation of happiness, which included elements which Bentham would have repudited. He was on the right lines, but he had the misfortune to theorise before the new miss of information regarding man's origin and development had crystallised round the evolution theory, consequently, all that is best in the old Utilitarianism has now been incorporated along with his speculations in a new and more enduring framework.

In his sophy Logic he had set himself to con struct a science of reasoning on the lines of the Experience philo sopliy, but in that book root prob lems were not dealt with exhaus tively Non he seized the oppor tunity of travelling over the entire philosophic field by reviewing the Philosophy of Sir William Hamil-What was intended to be an article swelled into a volume, and was published in 1865 Mill's startingpoint is experi-The mind, ence he holds, has no original intuitions, is not originally supplied with necessary forms of thought. All we know is derived from experience Experience of what? The answer to that determines the philosophic status of a thinker The two fundamental facts of knowledge are Matter and Mind What does experience tell us of Matter? In the course of his criticism of Hamilton, Mill reaches the conclusion that Matter can only be defined as the Permanent Possibility of Sensation—a definition which immediately links the Experience philosophy with Berkeleyan Idealism And what of Mind? Mind, we are told, may be resolved into a series of feelings with a background of possibilities of feelings, of expectations and recollections Mill, with his characteristic frankness, is aware of the difficulty of his theory The supreme difficulty is to understand how with such a theory knowledge itself is possible Grant that what we know of a material world is simply a series of scattered phenomena. Postula'e a unifying mind working according to definite laws, and there is a possibility of coherent knowledge. But deny unifying power to Mind, reduce Mind to a series of phenomena, and the question arises how out of the two forms of phenomenamaterial and mental-does a Cosmos rather than a chaos emerge? Mill's psychological theory determines his entire system of thought. If, according to it, we can know nothing of the external world beyond particular aspects of matter, and nothing of mind beyond particular aspects of feeling, obviously all our knowledge is limited to experi-Knowledge resolves itself into a recognition of particulars, and logic becomes the science of thought, whereby by means of induction and deduction the mind lays hold of the order which obtains among the various aspects of pheno-In the last analysis, Mill's conception of the world is that of a collection of facts grasped by the mind by means of the law of Association, facts existing by no necessity but resting so far as we know on the arbitrary and the accidental Insight into Mill's philosophy gives the clue to the essays on Religion which, published after his death, created widespread surprise. He was bound to admit that the present system of things was not held together by any inherent necessity The notion of necessity, he said, was the product of the law of Association, which led us to think that facts which had been always associated in our experience would always be associated in another planet things might be so arranged that two and two make five, even in this planet a supernatural revelition with accompanying miracles might well take place We have no right beforehand to lay down the conditions of the Cosmos, all we have to do is to study pheno mena as they present themselves and tabulate the results for our guidance. Thus it comes about that the Experience philosophy of Mill, with its rational induction, leads ultimately, as faine put it, to 'an abyss of cliance, an abyss of ignorance.'

Mill, who had been living at Avignon pursuing his philosophical labours, was suddenly cilled to another and very different sphere He was in 1865 invited to become Liberal candidate for West-He laid down certain unique conditions minster He refused to canvass or allow any one to canvass He announced that if elected he could He refused to not attend to local interests answer any question as to his religious views, and he declared himself to be an advocate of woman's suffrage. Mill was elected by a majority of some hundreds over his Conservative opponent, and in the House of Commons he showed himself very energetic. He was always to be found in the ranks of the progressivists, and with his usual courage never shrank from identifying himself with the unpopular cause. He never, however, was quite at home in the House He was no orator He could speak well, but his oratory was too intellectual for a popular assembly, and he never was able, had he been inclined, to sink the philosopher in the politician Mr Gladstone has left on record his belief that Mill gave a certain dignity to the House by the singular moral elevation of his character-a characteristic which led the great Liberal states man to call him the Saint of Rationalism did not long enjoy his parliamentary honours the general election in 1868 he was defeated by the Conservative candidate, Mr W H Smith (who ultimately became leader of the Conservative party), and retired to his philosophic retreat at Avignon The defeat was attributed to the fact that Mill sent a subscription to the election expenses of Mr Charles Bradlaugh, the well known anti Christian writer and lecturer Mill occupied his closing years with congenial pursuits. He was elected Lord Rector of St Andrews University, and delivered a Rectorial address on education friend said to him how good it was Mill replied that it ought to be, for he had thought about the subject all his life. He issued a new edition of his father's Analysis of the Human Mind, and busied himself with his Autobiography, which was published after his death. Suddenly his work was brought to an end Warnings of failing strength were not wanting, but though he was in his sixtyseventh year, there was nothing to cause anxiety Indeed, three days before his death he walked fifteen miles on a botanical excursion by a local endemic disease, he succumbed on 8th May 1873, and was buried at Avignon Whatever may be the ultimate fate of his speculations, Mill's name and personality will ever bulk largely in the history of nineteenth century thought

The Stationary State

I cannot regard the stationary state of capital and wealth with the unaffected aversion so generally manifested towards it by political economists of the old I am inclined to believe that it would be, on the whole, a very considerable improvement on our present condition I confess I am not charmed with the ideal of life held out by those who think that the normal state of human beings is that of struggling to get on, that the trampling, crushing, elbowing, and treading on each other's heels, which form the existing type of social life, are the most desirable lot of human kind, or anything but the disagreeable symptoms of one of the phases of industrial progress It may be a necessary stage in the progress of civilisation, and those European nations which have hitherto been so fortunate as to be preserved from it may yet have it to undergo It is an incident of growth, not a mark of decline, for it is not necessarily destructive of the higher aspirations and the heroic virtues as America, in her great civil war, has proved to the world, both by her conduct as a people and by numerous splendid individual examples, and as England, it is to be hoped, would also prove on an equally trying and exciting occasion. But it is not a kind of social perfection which philanthropists to come will feel any very eager desire to assist in realising Most fitting, indeed, it is that while riches are power, and to grow as rich as possible the universal object of ambition, the path to its attainment should be open to all, without favour or partiality. But the best state for human nature is that in which, while no one is poor, no one desires to be richer, nor has any reason to fear being thrust back by the efforts of others to push themselves forward.

There is room in the world, no doubt, and even in old countries, for a great increase of population, supposing the arts of life to go on improving, and capital to increase. But even if innocuous, I confess I see very little reason for desiring it. The density of population necessary to enable mankind to obtain, in the greatest degree, all the advantages both of co operation and social intercourse has in all most populous countries been obtained A population may be too crowded, though all be amply supplied with food and raiment. It is not good for man to be kept perforce at all times in the presence of his species A world from which solitude is extirpated is a very poor ideal Solitude, in the sense of being often alone, is essential to any depth of meditation or of character, and solitude in the presence of natural beauty or grandeur is the cradle of thoughts and aspirations which are not only good for the individual, but which society could ill do without. Nor is there much satisfaction in contem plating the world with nothing left to the spontaneous activity of nature—with every rood of land brought into cultivation, which is capable of growing food for human beings, every flowery waste or natural pasture ploughed up, all quadrupeds or birds which are not domesticated for man's use exterminated as his rivals for food, every hedgerow or superfluous tree rooted out, and scarcely a place left where a wild shrub or flower could grow without being eradicated as a weed in the name of improved agriculture. If the earth must lose that great portion of its pleasantness which it owes to things that the unlimited increase of wealth and population would extirpate from it, for the mere purpose of enabling it to support a larger, but not a better or a happier popula tion, I sincerely hope, for the sake of posterity, that they will be content to be stationary, long before necessity compels them to do it

It is scarcely necessary to remark that a stationary condition of capital and population implies no stationary state of human improvement. There would be as much scope as ever for all kinds of mental culture and moral and social progress, as much room for improving the Art of Living, and much more likelihood of its being improved, when minds ceased to be engrossed by the art of getting on Even the industrial arts might be as earnestly and as successfully cultivated, with this sole difference, that instead of serving no purpose but the increase of wealth, industrial improvements would produce their legitimate effect, that of abridging labour Hitherto it is questionable if all the mechanical inven tions yet made have lightened the day's toil of any They have enabled a greater population to live the same life of drudgery and imprisonment, and an increased number of manufacturers and others to make fortunes They have increased the comforts of the middle classes. But they have not yet begun to effect those great changes in human destiny which it is in their nature and in their futurity to accomplish Only when, in addition to just institutions, the increase of mankind shall be under the deliberate guidance of judicious foresight can the conquests made from the powers of nature by the intellect and energy of scientific discoverers become the common property of the species, and the means of improving and clevating the universal lot

(From Political Economy, vol. ii.)

The Place of Art in Education.

If we wish men to practise virtue, it is worth while trying to make them love virtue and feel it an object in itself and not a tax paid for leave to pursue other objects. It is worth training them to feel not only actual wrong or actual meanness, but the absence of noble aims and endeavours, as not merely blamable, but also degrading to have a feeling of the miserable smallness of mere self in the free of this great universe, of the collective mass of our fellow creatures, in the face of past history and of the indefinite future—the poorness and insignificance of human life if it is to be all spent in minking things comfortable for ourselves and our lin and raising ourselves and them a step or two on the social ladder. Thus feeling, we learn to respect our selves only so far as we feel capable of nobler objects, and if unfortunately those by whom we are surrounded do not share our aspirations, perhaps disapprove the conduct to which we are prompted by them, to sustain ourselves by the ideal sympathy of the great characters in history, or even in fiction, and by the contemplation of an idealised posterity shall I add, of ideal perfection, embodied in a Divine Being? Now, of this elevated tone of mind the great source of inspiration is poetry, and all literature so far as it is poetical and artistic. We may imbibe exalted feelings from Plato or Demosthenes or facitus, but it is in so far as those great men are not solely philosophers or orntors or historians, but poets and artists. Nor is it only loftiness, only the heroic feelings that are bred by poetic cultivation. Its power is as great in calming the soul as in clevating it-in fostering the milder emotions, as the most exalted. It brings home to us all those aspects of life which take hold of our nature on its unselfish side, and leads us to identify our joy and grief with the good or ill of the system of which we form a part, and all those solemn or pensive feelings which, without having any direct application to conduct, incline us to take life seriously and predispose us to the reception of anything which Who does not comes before us in the shape of duty feel himself a better man after a course of Dante or of Wordsworth, or, I will add, of Lucretius or the Georgies, or after brooding over Gray's 'Elegy' or Shelley's 'Hymn to Intellectual Beauty'? I have spoken of poetry, but all the other modes of art produce similar effects in their degree. The races and nations whose senses are naturally finer and their sensuous perceptions more exercised than ours receive the same kind of impressions from painting and sculpture, and many of the more delicately organised among ourselves do the All the arts of expression tend to keep alive and in activity the feelings they express. Do you think that the great Italian painters would have filled the place they did in the European mind, would have been universally ranked among the greatest men of their time, if their productions had done nothing for it but to serve as the decoration of a public hall or a private salon? Their Nativities and Crucifixions, their glorious Madonnas and Saints, were to their susceptible Southern countrymen the great school not only of devotional, but of all the elevated and all the imaginative feelings We colder Northerns may approach to a conception of this function of art when we listen to an oratorio of Handel or give ourselves up to the emotions excited by a Gothic cathedral Even apart from any specific emotional expression, the mere contemplation of beauty of a high order produces in no small degree this elevating effect on the character The power of natural scenery addresses itself to the same region of liunian nature which corresponds to Art There are few capable of feeling the sublimer order of natural beauty, such as your own Highlands and other mountain regions afford, who are not, at least tem porarily, raised by it above the littleness of humanity, and made to feel the puerility of the petty objects which set men's interests at variance, contrasted with the nobler pleasures which all might share To whatever avoca tions we may be called in life, let us never quash these susceptibilities within us, but carefully seek the opportunities of maintaining them in exercise prosaic our ordinary duties, the more necessary it is to keep up the tone of our minds by frequent visits to that higher region of thought and feeling, in which every worl seems dignified in proportion to the ends for which, and the spirit in which, it is done, where we learn, while eagerly seizing every opportunity of excr cising ligher ficulties and performing ligher duties, to regard all useful and honest work as a public function, which may be ennobled by the mode of performing it -which has not properly any other nobility than that which it gives-and which, if ever so humble, is never mean but when it is meanly done and when the motives for which it is done are mean motives. There is, besides, a natural affinity between goodness and the cultivation of the beautiful, when it is real cultivation and not a mere unguided instinct. He who has learnt what beauty is, if he be of a virtuous character, will desire to realise it in his own life-will keep before himself a type of perfect beauty in human character, to light his attempts at self culture. There is a true meaning in the saying of Goethe, though hable to be misunderstood and per verted, that the Beautiful is greater than the Good, for it includes the Good and adds something to it, it is the Good made perfect, and fitted with all the collateral perfections which make it a finished and completed thing Now, this sense of perfection, which would make us demand from every creation of man the very utmost that it ought to give, and render us intolerant of the smallest fault in ourselves or in anything we do, is one of the results of Art cultivation No other human pro ductions come so near to perfection as works of pure Art. In all other things we are, and may reasonably be, satisfied if the degree of excellence is as great as the object immediately in view seems to us to be worth, but in Art the perfection is itself the object If I were to define Art, I should be inclined to call it the endeavour If we meet with even a after perfection in execution piece of mechanical work which bears the marks of being done in this spirit—which is done as if the work man loved it, and tried to make it as good as possible, though something less good would have answered the purpose for which it was ostensibly made-we say that Art, when really culti he has worked like an artist vated and not mercly practised empirically, maintains, what it first gave the conception of, an ideal Beauty, to be eternally aimed at, though surpassing what can be actually attained, and by this idea it trains us never to be completely satisfied with imperfection in what we, ourselves do and are to idealise, as much as possible, every work we do, and most of all our own characters and lives

Quite a library of biographical and philosophical literature has grown up round the name of J S MIL. No formal biography has appeared, but a great deal of interesting personal details is to be found in the Life of Mill by Alex. Bain, entitled A Criticism, with Personal Recillections (1882) in the Utilitarians vol iii., by Sir Leslie Steplien (1900) and Mr L. Courtney's John Stuart Mell (1889) On the personal side the main authority is the Autobiograph) Expositions and criticisms of Mill's writings have been numerous. Specially valuable are the chapters on Mill in Taine's History of English Liter iture afterwards published separately in book form. Sir Leslie Stephen gives an acute and sympathetic estimate of Mill in his Utilitarians, and an admirable book on the subject is Dr Charles Douglas's Study of Mill's Philosophy (1805) Among others are Mr L Courtney's The Metaphysics of Mill (1879) George Grote's Review of the Work of Mr 7 S Mill (1868) and An Examination of the Utilitarian I hilosophy of Mill, by John Grote (1870). Recent British Philosophy, by Professor Masson (1865), contains a criticism of Mill's book on Sir William Hamilton and in general literature are frequent references to Mill, such as Mr John Morley's Critical Miscellanies (1877) the essay in Scherer's Essays on English Literature translated by Saintsbury (1891), Journals of Caroline Fox, Carlyle's Renums cences (1887) and Carlyle's Life (1889) by James Anthony HECTOR MACPHERSON

William Ewart Gladstone (1809-98) was born at Liverpool, the fourth son of Sir John Gladstone, MP, a wealthy corn merchant there, of Scottish birth and ancestry Educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, where he took a doublefirst in 1831, he entered the reformed Parliament next year as member for Newark, still virtually a pocket-borough of that Duke of Newcastle who claimed to 'do what he liked with his own' High Church and Conservative in his principles, Gladstone was described by Macaulay in 1839 as the 'rising hope of those stern and unbending Tories' who 'reluctantly and mutinously' followed Sir Robert Peel Gradually, however, the influence of Peel prevailed to draw him to the popular side, so that ultimately, after his electoral defeat at Oxford University in 1865, he became leader of the Liberal party His political career, in the course of which he was four times Prime-Minister, covered more than sixty years, and displayed an untiring energy and enthusiasm unparalleled in English history It is not here that the manifold aspects and incidents of that brilliant career can be described—the gradual progress in Liberalism, the masterly Budgets of the sixties, the 'reformation in a flood' which distinguished the first Ministry under his control or the Irish policy which was developed in the second, the ardour of his struggle against the imperialism of Lord Beaconsfield or the audacious energy of his latest adventure, when, in his seventy eighth year, he declared for Irish Home Rule Certainly no career in English politics has shown a more varied activity, nor has there been any English statesman who exercised more powerful influence in his day or provoked more bitter opposition. persuade Glo'ster that he has fallen over the chiffs of Dover, and says

'Ten masts at each make not the altitude Which thou hast perpendicularly fallen. Thy life 's a miracle!'

And yet but a little while after the old man is relieved from his delusion, and finds he has not fallen at all I trust that when, instead of the fictitious and adventi tious aid on which we have too long taught the Irish Lstablishment to lean, it shall come to place its trust in 11s own resources, in its own great mission, in all that it can draw from the energy of its ministers and its members, and the high hopes and promises of the Gospel that it teaches, it will find that it has entered upon a new era of existence-an era bright with hope and potent for At any rate, I think the day has certainly come when an end is finally to be put to that union, not between the Church and religious association, but be tween the Establishment and the State, which was commenced under circumstances little auspicious, and has endured to be a source of unhappiness to Ireland and of discredit and scandal to England There is more This measure is in every sense a great measure -great in its principles, great in the multitude of its dry, technical, but interesting details, and great as a testing measure, for it will show for one and all of us of what metal we are made. Upon us all it brings a great responsibility—greatest and foremost upon those who occupy this bench We are especially chargeable-nay, deeply guilty—if we have either dishonestly, as some think, or even premiturely or univisely challenged so gigantic an usue. I know well the punishments that follo s rishness in public affair, and that ought to fall upon those men, those Phaetons of politics, who, with hands unequal to the task, attempt to guide the chanot of the sun But the responsibility, though heavy, does not exclusively press upon us, it presses upon every man who has to take part in the discussion and decision upon this Bill Every man approaches the discussion under the most solemn obligations to ruse the level of his vision and expand its scope in proportion to the greatness of the matter in hand. The working of our constitutional government itself is upon its trial, for I do not believe there ever was a time when the wheels of legislative machinery were set in motion, under conditions of peace and order and constitutional regularity, to deal with a question greater or more profound And more espe cially, Sir, is the credit and fame of this great assembly involved. This assemble, which has inherited through many ages the accumulated honours of brilliant triumphs, of peaceful but courageous legislation, is now called upon to address itself to a task which would, indeed, have demanded all the best energies of the very best among your fathers and your ancestors. I believe it will prove to be worthy of the task. Should it fail, even the same of the House of Commons will suffer disparagement, should it succeed, even that fame, I venture to say, will receive no small, no insensible addition. I must not ask gentlemen opposite to concur in this view, emboldened as I am by the kindness they have shown me in listening with patience to a statement which could not have been other than tedions, but I pray them to bear with me for a moment while, for myself and my colleagues, I say we are sanguine of the issue We believe, and for my part I am deeply convinced, that when the final consumma tion shall arrive, and when the words are spoken that shall give the force of law to the work embodied in this measure—the work of peace and justice—those words will be echoed upon every shore where the name of Ireland or the name of Great Britain has been heard, and the answer to them will come back in the approxing verdict of civilised mankind

Dr John Brown (1810-82), the author of

Rab and his Triends, was the son of the Rev John Brown, an accomplished, saintly, and beloved minister of the Secession Church first at Biggar, then at Edinburgh, and the great grandson of John Brown of Haddington, the author of the Self-interfreting Bible (see Vol II p 646) He was born at Biggar, and was taught by his father till 1822, when the family removed to Edinburgh, and the boy had four years at a classical academy and the High School After the arts course at the university, he began his medical studies in 1828 and became pupil and apprentice to Syme the eminent surgeon, and after a year at Chathamthe great cholera venr—as a surgeon's assistant, he graduated M D in 1833 and commenced doctor His practice never was large, for m Edmburgh he had too many interests to be exclusively professional, his ambitions were hardly those of the fashionable or successful practitioner. His life was quiet and uneventful, save that his latter years were apt to be clouded by fits of depression. His first notable literary work was a review of the pictures at the Edinburgh exhibition of 1846, written for Hugh Miller's H itness newspaper, and republished as 'Notes on Art' In 1847 he contributed on Ruskin's Modern Painters to the North British Review 'Rab and his Friends,' originally delivered as a lecture at Biggar, was first printed in 1858 in the volume of papers called Hora Subscitua ('leisure hours')-1 name subsequently extended to the three volumes (second series, 1861, third series, 1882) which comprise almost all Dr John Brown's writings and, as finally rearranged, appeared in a new edition in 1882-84 Editors and publishers had to 'pester' him to write, for he was more than most men distrustful of his powers, believing that none should venture to publish aught 'unless he has something to say, and has done his best to say it aright? Herein lay the secret of his writing so little, and of the surpassing charm of the little he did write Dogs, children, old-world folk, friends gone before, and lowland landscapes-these are the subjects which he wrote on best, his essays on art and on medical history and biography are good, but it is not by them that he will be remembered. #### From 'Minchmoor'

Now that every body is out of town, and every place in the guide books is as well known as I rinces Street or Pall Mall, it is something to discover a full every body has not been to the top of, and which is not in Blad. Such a full is Minchineer, nearly three times as high as Arthur Seat, and lying between I weed and Yarrox.

The best was to recend it is from Imquair. You go up the wild old Sell its road a fuch passes almost right over the summit, and his which Montrose and his eavahers fled from Philiphaugh, where Sir Walter's mother remembried crossing, when a girl, in a coach and six, on her was to a ball at Peebles, several footmen marching on either side of the earlinge to prop it up or drig it out of the more we ga, and where, to our nurrement, we learned that the Duchess of Buccleuch had lately driven har ponies Pefore this we had passed the grey, oldworld entrance to Fraginir House, and looked down its grassy and untrod avenue to the pallid, forlorn mansion, stricken all over with old, and noticed the wrought iron gate embedded in a feet deep and more of soil, never having opened since the '45. There are the huge Bradnordine bears on each tile-most protesque supporters -with a superfluity of ferocity and canine teeth whole place, life the family whose it has been, seems dying out-everything subdued to settled desolution. The old race, the old religion, the grunt old house, with its small, deep, comfortless windows, the decaying trees, the still ness about the doors, the grass overrunning everything, nature reinstating heiself in her quiet way -all this males the place look as strange and pitiful among its fellows in the vale as would the Larl who built it three hundred years ago if we met him tottering along our way in the fided dress of his vouth, but it looks the Larl's house a ill, and has a dignity of its own

We soon found the Minchmoor road, and took at once to the hill, the ascent being, as often is with other ascents in this world, steepest at first. Nothing could be more beautiful than the view as we ascended, and got a look of the 'eye sweet' Tweed hills and their 'silver stream'. It was one of the five or six good days of this summer—in early morning 'soft' and doubtful, but the mists drawing up, and now the noble, tawny hills were dappled with gleams and shadows—

'Sunbeams upon distant hills gliding apace'- the best sort of day for mountain scenery—that ripple of light and shadow brings out the forms and the depths of the Iulis far better than a cloudless sky, and the horizon is generally wider

Before us and far away was the round flat head of Minchmoor, with a dark, rich bloom on it, from the thick, short heather—the hills around being green.

Bishop Colenso John William Collass, 1514-83 was born it St Austell in Cornwall and graduating in 1536 from St. John's College, Lim bridge as second wringler was elected a fellow Successively assistant master at Harrow, thor at Cambridge and rector of Forncett St Mars in Notfolk he published handbooks on algebra in 1845 and on tragonometry in 1851, and a volume of Illing Sin ins in 1853 in which same year he was appointed the first Bishop of Artill He soon inistered the Julu language, prepared a grammar and diction irv, and translated the Priver-Book and part of the Bible. In a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans (1861) he rejected the doctrine of eternal punishment. Largely through questions asked and puzzles propounded by his Julii converts he became convinced of the inprobability of many statements of facts and numbers in the Bible, and The Pentat nei aid to e book of Josena Certically Examine? (7 parts, 1862-79) brought down upon its writer in avilanche of criticism, and was condemned in both Houses of Convocation. In 1864 he was deposed from his see by his Metropolitan, Bishop Grav of Capetown, but on appeal the Priva Council declared the deposition 'null and void' (1865); and in 1866 the Court of Chancery ordered the payment of his income with arrears—though Bishop Gray next publicly excommunicated him, and consecrated a new histop, so that the tend of spiritual jurisdictions and theological controversy lasted for years. Pendennis, he had acquired expensive habits at Cambridge, among which was the taste for gambling On the authority of Sir Theodore Martin. the vivid saturical story of 'The Amours of Deuceace,' told by Mr Yellowplush, was suggested by his own experience. Years after this period he pointed out in the street at Sna a gambler whom he had not seen 'since he drove me down in his cabriolet to my bankers in the city, where I sold out my patrimony and handed it over to him? It was about the year 1834 that he was confronted with the necessity of working for a living. Although art was his selection, literature was to prevail 1836, the year of the starting of the Constitutional, Thackeray married the daughter of Colonel Shawe. of Doneraile in County Cork The marriage took place in Paris, according to Mr F T Marzials, who first made known the official record, at the British Embassy on the 20th August About a month later he began his contributions to the Constitutional, but the paper came to an end in the following summer, and Thackeray returned to London Much more important than these newspaper speculations was the connection which Thackeray formed about this period with Fraser's Magazine What were his claims to be included in the Fraserian brotherhood, in Maclise's drawing for the January number of 1835, is by no means cerftain By 1837, however, he was a member of the staff and a regular contributor

Thackers was furly launched on his career through his connection with Fraser's His opportunité had come It lies been reserted that his subsequent contributions to Punch graned him immediate popularity If the Snob Papers did more at the time to make his name known than the 'Letters of Mr C J Yellowplush,' or such a masterpiece as Catherine, or the Great Hoggarty Diamond-with which Thackeray signalised his admission to the Friserian circle—the result was due to certain fortuitous circumstances to be regarded as an instance of the ephemeral triumphing over the more weighty literary produc-When Thackery began his famous studies, which may be called an Anatomy of Snobbery, Punch was rising on the top wave of popularity, thanks to the inimit ible drawings of Leech. The subject, too, was 'in the air,' it possessed an irresistible social appeal Now, although the snob is always with us, I doubt if any member of the present generation can conceive the prodigious effect the Snob Papers produced on early Victorian society The theme was new, the exponent was a master But now the edge of the novelty is worn down, and although we acknowledge the mastery, we are conscious of certain flaws, certain excesses and insobrieties in the satirical analysis that were not perceptible to the contemporary reader regard to the correspondence of Mr C J Yellowplush, it is different. Time has not modified the force and piquancy of these amusing sketches which ran through Fraser's in 1837-38 'Miss Shum's Husband' diverts us as it must ever divert. The story of Mr Deuceace, which is told in two sections, is as clear and convincing an example of the blossoming that is the promise of genius as was ever produced by genius. This pungent and bitter little story is unmistakably prophetic-as the sketch of Crab the cynical nobleman alone may show—of the coming I anity \( \Gamma \text{iii} \) In the Epistles to the Literati the satire and burlesque of Mr. Yellowplush deal with subjects that enjoy an imperishable vitality The kind of poetry that is here satirised may take on new guises, but it never dies and ever has admirers of its specious charms Inflated nonsense in blank verse still passes for poetic draina, and unreal sentiment for pathos or Thackeray's criticism of Bulwer Lytton and Dr Lardner has been censured as savage. He lived to think it too severe, it is said, but I do not think there is any injustice in it. The story of Catherine, which appeared in Frasir's in 1839-1840, was professedly written in ridicule of certain popular or fashionable novels by Bulwer Lytton, Harrison Ainsworth, and others, in which some criminal or vicious person was endowed with the virtues proper to a hero The burlesque intent of Thackerry is now the least notable thing about Catherine, at the time, however, it served a very real purpose, and one that the author believed in all sincerity was eminently needed doubt of the seriousness of Thackerny's crusade against shams of all kinds, nor of the didactic aim that was involved in it. But, fortunately, his satiric liumour was still stronger, as was also the artistic instinct in the story-teller, hence he does not labour with his didactic aim nor put it to an extreme The reader of Catherine speedily forgets it altogether, and it seems to me that when the author recurs to it, in the person of the pseudonymous lkey Solomons, junior, it is not without a suggestion of sudden transition, as if he too had been better engaged After all, a little philosophic reflection convinces the reader that the ascription of heroic qualities to lawless characters like lack Sheppard or Paul Clifford is a very intelligible and very human foible, of which Claude Duval and even Robin Hood are yet more popular examples It would be easy to make too much of it, this, it is needless to say, is what Thackeray does not do In writing Catherine, he set out to paint vice as a thing

Of such hideous mien As to be hated needs but to be seen

He selected from The Newgate Calendar a story of murder of the most revolting kind conceivable, told with all the crudity and brutal realism of which plain prose is capable. For once those excellent attorneys Messrs Knapp and Baldwin, the compilers of that gruesome calendar, have no need, as was their wont, to moralise their tale, the horror of it, one thinks, could not be surpassed. Thackeray adopts but the mere frame work. Without using one jot of the horrible details of the narrative—deliberately, indeed, shedding the whole of it—he leives an impression of horror which far transcends the original, and is in effect the all pervading atmosphere of the story Mr Trollope has little to say of Catherine but that it is 'certainly not pleasant reading'. To say that Thackerry has provided the is to say nothing bald Newgate tale with an extraordinarily effec tive setting, in which we have something of a microcosm of early eighteenth century times and The society, of course, is none of the choicest There are those finished rascals, Corpor il Brock of Cutts's dragoons, with his comminder the showy and trivial Count von Galgenstein, and Lusign Macshane, the pretty and evil-hearted Catherine and the sottish John II iyes and young Billings complete the list of characters in the drama. All are sketched with the fine, incisive touch of the master, while the play of wit and irony is exquisitely light and spontaneous is evidence, indeed, that should have instantly proclaimed the new writer in Inascr's as a man of genius Such, for example, is the scene in the Marylebone Gardens, where Galgenstein meets Mrs Cat after many years, and that which tells of the interview between Billings and the Count Yet Catherine scarcely attracted any notice, and to this day remains underrated in general estima-It may be worth noting the reference made m Catherine to Dickens, who had lately written Oliver Twist, where Thicker's ironically remarks that 'to trend in the footsteps of the immortal Fagin requires a genius of mordinate stride' His next contribution to Praser's was Tre II story of Samuel Titmarsh and the Great Hoggarty Diamond, a story of the risks that attend specu lating in bubble companies, which appeared in Michael Angelo Titmarsh was announced as its illustrator. The story was no great success at the time, and it is said the author received an editorial intimation to shorten it. While it was in preparation he published, as Michael Angelo Titmarsh, The Paris Sketch Book, a collection of sketches grave and gay. Among these 'A Gambler's Death,' a cynical and Defoe like story, may possibly be a 'true relation' The characteristic 'Meditations at Versailles' must be noted as containing more than a limt of a famous passage in The Four Georges Thackerry's next contribution to the magazine, The Confessions of George Fitz Boodle, a d other Papers by Mr Fitz-Boodle, began to appear in 1842, and made no particular In the same year he went for a tour in Ireland, where he met Charles Lever, and the result of the tour was one of his most delightful travel books, The Irish Sketch Book, which was The opening month of the year published in 1843 following saw the first instalment in Frasers of what must be considered his second masterpiece this was The Memoirs of Barry Lyndon The work originally appeared as written by Mr Fitz Boodle, with the title The Luck of Barry Lyndon the incongruity of the association of Fitz Boodle with Mr Redmond Barry must have struck Hinckers at once, and when issued as a book it appeared as the Memoirs of Barry Indon, 'Writen by Himself' Some judges have declared that Thacker's never surpassed this brilliant and amazingly elever study It is certain he never wrote anything with more spirit and gusto than this life history of a gambler The humour and vivacity, the exuberant vinity and evnicism, the prodigious glorification of exploits the reverse of glorious, the explical tone of suave complicancy, that unfilteringly mark the whole recital constitute an example of self-portruture of the finest and most finished kind. It has been supposed by some that the idea of the character was suggested by the Memoirs of Casmova, but beyond the accident that Breek is a gamester there is nothing in common between the two books. The reference to Casanova in Barry's finious defence of caming is a more indication that the Irish adventurer I new the Italian by repute, this, of course, mercly miplies that Thackerry was well read in the subject. Redmond Barry has no real resemblance to Casanova, he never forgets-in a genealogical sense—that he is a gentleman, though a decayed one. The qualities that give Thackeray's work distinction are decidedly not to to be discovered in Casanova. While this con vincing proof of his genius was being produced in Franks, I livel erry lead established limiself as a popular contributor to Punch with burlesque and satire, verse and drawings. I rom 1842-43 until 1851 lie wrote regularly for that journal and seems to have caught the public interest with a completeness that did not it once attend the appearance of Catherine or Barry Lyrden were the 'Lectures' of Miss Tickletoby on English History and the 'History of the Next French Revolution These were followed by the amusing 'Diary' and other papers of the admirable Mr Jennes de la Pluche, with the exquisite 'Ballad' of Berkeley Square. These revelations of life in the 'hupper suckles' need but cursors reminder The drollery of Jennies's contributions on current topics remains a perennial spring of delight, though some of the old topics cease to agitate us Succeeding these came the Snot Papers in 1846, in which every conceivable type of snob is sketched, dissected, or tomplianked in a brilliant In the execution of series of saturical postraits these ridicule and sarcasm are used with an un sparing hand, but it is a light though a certain hand, in spite of the tremendous vigour of attack There is no doubt that the attraction the subject possessed for Thickern was peculiar and idiosyn cratic. It never wholly deserted him. Much of the sature is still fresh and still applicable, the account, for instance, of the costumes of Miss Snobky and Lady Snobky, as quoted from the Comt Circular, is not without parallel in our day The author's comment still holds good of some of our 'ladies' papers'--'Oli, mothers, aunts, grandmothers of England, this is the sort of writing that is put in the newspapers for you' How can you help being the mothers, daughters, &c. of snobs, so long as this balderdash is set before you?' In the year following the diverting 'Prize Novelists' began to appear These wonderful parodies of Bulwer Lytton, Lever, Disraeli, G P R. James, and others are among the best of the kind. Some, indeed, are absolutely the best such are the burlesque-parodies-for they are masterly blends of both forms-of Lever and The 'Codlingsby' is beyond James and Disraeli question the finest, and in fact unique, it was a severe and unforgettable blow to Disraeli After many years, in the last novel from his pen, he took Jus revenge with an exceedingly clever sketch of Thackeray With these diversions must be named several minor writings of the period, the Stetches and Travels in London, for example, and M A Titmarsh's Journey from Cornhill to Grand Caire, published in 1846, the result of a tour to Egypt Thackeray had made a name and was rapidly increasing in reputation Settled in Young Street, Kensington, he was now at work on the first of his great novels, Vanity Fair, which was to set him side by side with Fielding in the forefront of English novelists

In Vanity Fair the genius of Thackeray found its first complete manifestation. To his contempo raries this brilliant satirical comedy was the revelation of a master, it appeared to them as something absolutely new-new in a sense it is not easy to realise at this date. To appreciate it, one must consider the fiction then current and popular who study Thackeray's previous writings it seems a commonplace of criticism to say that Vanity Fair is naturally developed from them, and that it eveniplifies, in ampler manner and with richer effects, precisely the same gifts of humour and satire, of analysis and observation Catherine and Barry Lyndon, and the rest, are so many phases in a development of which Vanity Fair and its successors are the mevitable harvest. Here was the perfect fruition perfectly in accord with the promise. If the advance was consistently steady, the sum total of evolution was consistently logical Few writers of the first rank have so clearly revealed in the first essays of their art the personality of their genius, there are many pas sages in Thackerav's early writings that might have been virten in the prime of his fame and the maturity of his powers Previously he had appealed to the smaller audience of magazine readers Catherine, for instance, was not reprinted from Fraser's till many years later Vanity Fair, therefore, was not only something amazingly new to the public, its author was practically an unknown man In this great novel Thackeray found his range and addressed the world was a peculiar significance in describing the book as 'a Novel without a Hero,' it was in the nature of a challenge. The novelists of the day, while professing to deal with life as it is, put forth the conventionalised hero and painted in the theatric back-cloth to suit him, evading the facts of life with a bland indifference to truth or verisimilitude Thackeray would sweep away the cult of sham heroics and sham sentiment then fashionable in fiction Such was his professed aim in writing Vanity Fair It implied a new kind of novelnew, that is to say, to a generation that had forgotten Fielding and neglected Miss Austen And like the great master with whose genius he had so much affinity, with much of Fielding's serene detachment from any kind of parti pris, with a knowledge and a command of his material comparable only with Fielding, he takes the world as the stage of his social comedy 'Scenes of all sorts,' as he puts it, he gives us, in which the fool and the rogue, the weak and the brive, single eye and double-face, play their parts as in 'the world of all of us,' while the inconsistencies, the blind inconsequences, and illusions of life are set forth with an irony that has something piercing in its A cynic showman, this of Vanity conviction. Fair, it has been remarked. And if it be cynical to paint the world as it is, to show selfish, clever schemers like Becky Sharp flourishing, while simple goodness and virtue, in the persons of Dobbin and Amelia Sedley, are sorely smitten by fortune, Thackeray's comedy is cynical indeed But the deduction from this, that the author himself was a cynic and one who delighted in the display of his cynicism, is ludicrously contrary to all that is known of Thackeray's character, and completely refuted by the book itself. There have been readers who ascribe the sentiments of Miss Sharp, for instance, to the author himself Prob ably, since humour and imagination are not the property of every body, there will always be readers of this kind. We must all be cynics if, as is beyond doubt the case, we are all less interested in the love affairs of the amiable Amelia and the long delayed bliss of the constant Dobbin than in the shifts and wiles with which the immortal Becky Sharp seeks to allure Jos Sedley, Miss Crawley, Sir Pitt, and the rest. It is the social campaign of this brilliant adventuress that yields the main action of the comedy, and in all the rich and diverse characterisation of the novel Becky Sharp is undoubtedly the supreme achievement.

Vanity Fair was issued in monthly numbers from January 1847. In November of the following year Thackeray's next triumphant venture, Pendennis, was begun, in this delightful novel he further exemplifies his theory of fiction, and he paints life as it is and the society of his time, uninfluenced by any controlling force save the saturic impulse. In the Preface he announces his purpose in the memorable reference to Fielding. Since the author of Tom Jones was buried, no writer of fiction among us has been permitted to depict to his utmost power a Man. Pendennis, then, is another novel

'without'-in the conventional sense-'a Hero' Young Pen has his good qualities, but they ire inextricably combined with certain elements of werkness which the author, is was his wont, is determined the most careless reader shall not fail to observe If Pen, for example, slips on the way of right conduct, he will not allow the effect pro duced to work silently on the render Hi tekerny makes a direct appeal to the reader's conscience, and challenges him as to the truth of his presen tation of human weakness. Some, indeed, have found those interpositions of the author too em plintic, and others think them needless, but with the majority. Thacker iy's method is both useful and popular, since it promotes a certain untente cordiale Pen, however, with all his errors and his weakness, is an attractive voung gentleman, and drawn with a sense of reality that is consistent throughout. The same admirable vitality marks the worldly minded Major, the immitable Loker, the memorable Costigan, and Warrington, who more nearly approaches what ladies consider a hero than any character in the book Miss Laura Bell is perhaps somewhat colourless, and decidedly less 'real' than Amelia Sodlov In Blanche Amory, Thackers gives one of his most penetrative and characteristic studies. One is not greatly con cerned when it looks as if I'en will be captured by this artificial young lady, but it is impossible not to trenible for the impressionable Loker One of the eleverest character sketches in the novel is Mr Harry Foker, the exuberant diollers of it is sustained with wonderful spirit and un Following Pendennis-though not failing truth immediately, for Esmond came between - The Nerveomes was completed in 1854, and brought additional celebrity to the author. The story is somewhat looser in structure than I anity Pair and Pendennis, but its characteristics are the same the elements of sature and humour are as fresh and keen, both in quality and application, as ever In no other work of Thackerry are the illusions of life illustrated with greater poignance is to be noted of The Newcomes that the authors favourite moral, 'Vanitas vanitatum,' is suggested with a tender melancholy that softens the satirical The youth of Clive Newcome is printed purpose with a more genial hand, though the story closes with a gloom that insidiously affects the reader long before the curtain falls, so, too, it must be noted that the disasters that befall Colonel Newcome in his old age are not merely to be accounted among the afflictions with which the irony of circumstance overwhelms unselfish and noble The thought of affliction is entirely characters | banished by the dignity of his bearing under mis-Everybody knows the survity and beauty of the picture of Colonel Newcome's life in the Charterhouse, the exquisite and incomparable final scene, with its measureless pathos and impressive reticence, is among the imperishable things of literature

In 1852 appeared Lismond, a novel beyond ques tion first of its class in Linglish fiction, and ilso, I ini inclined to think, the finest of all the produc tions of its author. The story differs from the rest in some remarkable ways. In the first place, it is provided with a historical environment that reveals both a close study and a singularly complete issimilation of the fruits of study. The success with which Thacker is has created the atmosphere of Queen Annes age is universally idmitted, it permeates the whole book, and involves alike ladies and gentlemen prince and general, wits and men of letters. Lycellent is the still shown by Thackers in utilising his I nowledge of our Augustan age of letters There is no parade or ! osteriation. Nothing could be more lightly and, dexterously contrived than the introduction in Colonel Lismond's narrative of Steele and Addison ! And what admirable sketches those two are 1/2. It is true, I must own I have not succeeded in recog mising Colonel Lismond's sletch of Swift, but his impression of the Dein of St Patricl's is but i fleeting one, and I cannot altoge her accept Hinderny's 'Swift' in the Lections Admirable, again, is the art by which the personal relation of Colonel Esmond acquires the impersonal tone proper to a narrative. What could better become the friend of Steele, a true gentleman and brace officer, than this sinking of himself in his story ' [1] do not take Hard cray seriously when, in a mock ing humour, he called Esmond a prig, perhaps he sought thus to revenge limiself on a public that convicted him at length of having drawn a hero-In still deeper ways does Lamend differ from the other novels. With the exception of Becky Sharpil it must be admitted that the women of his novels; are much less complex characters than the men-In Indy Cistley ood and her daughter Beating? we have two characters, differing as much as mother and daughter concerrably may, each with a certain waywardness of temper complicated by: various antagonistic qualities, and both drawn with a delicacy of finish and a truth to nature that are unsurpassed. Thackeray has deliberately created a most difficult situation in their relations with There is the mother's love of the man Esmond who loves her daughter. Baldly put in these terms, Thickerty s the situation appears intolerable h indling of it is consummately masterly, without paltry evasions of the various points of the diffi culty, and without the least transgression of the immutable conditions of the case, he makes a triumphant solution - Most readers, probably, own a kind of divided allegiance to those two women, for my part, I am of the following of the inagnificent Beatrix AVho but Thackerry would have dured to work out mexorably the logical develop ment of this proud, imperious, ambitious beauty? Who would not have faltered after that fruitless i engagement of Beatrax with the Duke of Hamilton, and have fallen to some example of 'the happy ending'? Genius forbide that infelicity, and decreed the terrible crucial scene that closes the fortunes of Beatrix in this novel and stamps Thackeray as a master of his art. Between 1857 and 1859 The Virginians, a sequel to Esmond, appeared in monthly numbers Like most seauels. it is by no means equal in ability to its forerunner. though it is full of the signs of Thackeray's genius One has to confess, however, that the fortunes of the Warringtons are less interesting than the story of Harry Esmond, and the married life of Beatrix is also of a far less moving character than the days of her stormy youth I confess to a dislike of thinking that the Baroness Bernstein, in whom the Beatrix of old yet lives, could ever have become But something of disillusion was Mrs Tasker mevitable

While the novels that have been mentioned were in progress, Thackeray had gained a great popular success as a lecturer with his 'Lectures on the English Humorists,' and, in America, with the 'Four Georges' He had also written (while Vanity Fair was in progress) his 'Christmis Books' and his delightful burlesques, of which The Rose and the Ring, published in 1854, is perhaps the most charming. In 1860 Thackeray entered upon a new field of activity as editor of the Cornhill Magazine It has been said he was not a good editor, but it is certain lie minde the new magazine a prodigious success. In its pages appeared the novels Lovel the Widower and The Adventures of Philip In the amusing series of 'Roundabout Papers' he expressed his views on many topics with a gaiety and ease which make those occasional papers the most fascinating of Of his last novel, Denis Duval, which was left unfinished, it has been well observed by Sir Leslie Stephen that 'it gave great promise of a return to his old standard'-the standard of Esmond, one may observe But what might have been can only be conjectured In the early morning of the 20th of December 1863, after an attack of illness the previous evening, the great novelist died He was only in his fifty third year

Sir Pitt Crawley Proposes

The news of Lady Crawley's death provoked no more grief or comment than might have been expected in Miss Crawley's family circle. 'I suppose I must put off my party for the 3rd,' Miss Crawley said, and added, after a pause, 'I hope my brother will have the decency not to marry again' 'What a confounded rage Pitt will be in if he does!' Rawdon remarked, with his usual regard for his elder brother. Rebecca said nothing. She seemed by far the gravest and most impressed of the family. She left the room before Rawdon went away that day, but they met by chance below, as he was going away after taking leave, and had a parley together.

On the morrow, as Rebecca was gazing from the window, she startled Miss Crawley, who was placifly occupied with a French novel, by crying out in an alarmed tone, 'Here's Sir Pitt, Ma'am!' and the Baronet's knock followed this announcement

'My dear, I can't see him I won't see him Teil Bowls not at home, or go downstairs and say I'm too ill to receive any one My nerves really won't bear my brother at this moment,' eried out Miss Crawley, and resumed the novel

'She's too ill to see you, sir,' Rebeeca said, tripping down to Sir Pitt, who was preparing to ascend

'So much the better,' Sir Pitt answered 'I want to see you, Miss Beeky Come along a me into the parlour,' and they entered that apartment together

'I wawnt you back at Queen's Crawley, Miss,' the Baronet said, fixing his eyes upon her, and taking off his black gloves and his hat with its great crape hat band. His eyes had such a strange look, and fixed upon her so steadfastly, that Rebeeca Sharp began almost to tremble

'I hope to come soon,' she said in a low voice, 'as soon as Miss Crawley is better—and return to—to the dear children'

'You've said so these three months, Becky,' replied Sir Pitt, 'and still you go hanging on to my sister, who'll fling you off like an old shoe when she's wore you out. I tell you I want you. I'm going back to the Vineral Will you come back? Yes or no?'

'I daren't—I don't tlimk—it would be right—to be alone—with you, sir,' Beeky said, seemingly in great aguation

'I say agin, I want you,' Sir Pitt said, thumping the table. 'I can't git on without you I didn't see what it was till you went away. The house all goes wrong It's not the same place. All my accounts has got muddled agin. You must come back. Do come back. Dear Becky, do come.'

'Come-as what, sir?' Rebecca gasped out

'Come as Lady Crawley, if you like,' the Baronet said, grasping his crape hat 'There I will that zatusfy you? Come back and be my wife Your vit vor't.' Birth be lianged You're as good a lady as ever I see You've got more brains in your little vinger than any baronet's wife in the county Will you come? Yes or no?'

'Oh, Sir Pitt!' Rebeeca said, very much moved

'Say yes, Beeky,' Sir Pitt continued 'I'm an old man, but a good 'n I'm good for twenty years I il make you happy, zee if I don't. You shall do what you like, spend what you like, and 'as it all your own way I'll make you a zettlement. I'll do everything reg'hr Look year!' and the old man fell down on lus knees and leered at her like a satyr.

Rebecca started back a picture of consternation. In the course of this history we have never seen her lose her presence of mind, but she did now, and wept some of the most genuine tears that ever fell from her eyes.

'Oh, Sir Pitt I' she said 'Oh, sir-I-I'm married alread;' (From Vanity Fair)

Rawdon Crawley and Lord Steyne

Rawdon left her and walked home rapidly. It was nine o'clock at night. He ran across the streets and the great squares of Vanity Fair, and at length came up breathless opposite his own house. He started back and fell against the railings, trembling as he looked up. The drawing room windows were blazing with light. She had said that she was in bed and ill. He stood there for some time, the light from the rooms on his pale free.

He took out his door key and let himself into the house. He could hear laughter in the upper rooms. He was in the ball dress in which he had been captured the night before. He went silently up the stairs, leaning against the bailities at the stair head. Nobody was stirring in the house besides—all the servants had been sent away. Kawdon heard laughter within—laughter and singing. Beeky was singing a snatch of the song of the night before a house voice shouted 'Brava' Brava' 'It was Lord Steyne's

Rawdon opened the door and went in A httle table with a dinner was laid out—and wine and plate. Steyne was hanging over the soft on which Beeky sate. The wretched woman was in a brilliant full toilette, her arms and all her fingers sparkling with bracelets and rings, and the brilliants on her breast which Steyne had given her. He had her hand in his, and was bowing over it to kiss it, when Beeky started up with a faint scream as she caught sight of kawdon's white face. At the next instant she tried a smile, a horrid smile, as if to welcome her husband, and Steyne rose up, grinding his teeth, pale, and with fury in his looks.

He, too, attempted a laugh, and came forward holding out his hand "What, come had! How diversed, Crawley?" he said, the nerves of his mouth twitching as he tried to grin at the intruder

There was that in Rawdon's face which crused Beel y to fling herself before him 'I am innocent, Rawdon,' she said, 'before God, I am innocent' She clung hold of his coat, of his hands, her own were all covered with serpents, and rings, and brubbes 'I am innocent—Say I am innocent,' she said to I ord Steyne.

He thought a trap had been had for him, and was as furious with the wife as with the husband. 'You innocent!' Dainn you!' he screamed out. 'You innocent! Why, every trinl et you have on your body is paid for by me. I have given you thousands of pounds which this fellow has spent, and for which he has sold you. Innocent, by ——! You re as innocent as your mother, the ballet girl, and your husband the bully. Don't think to frighten me as you have done others. Make way, sir, and let me pass,' and Lord Steyne seized up his hat, and, with flame in his eyes, and looking his enemy fiercely in the face, marched upon him, never for a moment doubting that the other would give way.

But Rawdon Crawley, springing out, seized him by the neek cloth, until Steyne, almost strangled, writhed, and bent under his arm 'You lie, you dog' said Rawdon 'You lie, you coward and villam!' And he struct the Peer twice over the face with his open hand, and flung him bleeding to the ground. It was all done before Rebecca could interpose. She stood there trainling before him. She admired her husband, strong, brave, and victorious.

'Come here,' he said -She came up at once.

'Take off those things.'—She began, trembling, pulling the jewels from her arms, and the rings from her shaking fingers, and held them all in a heap, quivering, and looking up at him 'Throw them down,' he said, and she dropped them IIe tore the diamond ornament out of her breast, and fluing it at Lord Steyne II cut him on his bald forehead Steyne were the scar to his dying day

'Come upstairs,' Rawdon said to his wife 'Don't kill me, Rawdon,' she said He laughed savagely —'I want to see if that man hes about the money as he has about me Has he given you any?'

'No, said Rebecca, 'that is'---

'Give me your leys,' Rividon answered, and they went out together

Reduced gave him all the Leys but one, and she was in hopes that he would not have remarked the absence of that It belonged to the little desk which Amelia had given her in early days, and which she kept in a secret place. But Rawdon flung open boxes and ward robes, throwing the multifarious trumpery of their contents here and there, and at last he found the desk. The woman was forced to open it. It contained pipers, love letters many years old—all sorts of small trinkets and woman's memoranda. And it contained a poel et book with bank notes. Some of these were dated ten years back, too, and one was quite a fre h one—a no e for a thousand pounds a high Lord Steyne had given her.

'Did he give you this?' Rawdon said

'Yes,' Rebeeca answered

'I'll send it to him to day, Raydon said (for day had dawned again, and many hours had passed in this search), 'and I will pay Priggs, who was kind to the boy, and some of the debte. You will let me know where I shall sind the relation You right have spared me a hundred pounds, Bool v, out of all this—I have always shared with you.'

'I am innocent,' said Pecly And he left her without another word

What were her thou, his when he left her? She remained for hours after he a as gone, the sunshine pouring into the room, and Relecca sitting alone on the bed's edge. The drawers were all opened and their contents scattered about-dresses and feathers, scaris and trial cts a heap of tumbled vanities lying in a wreck. Her hair was falling over her shoulders, her gown was torn where Landon had wrenched the but hants out of it. She heard him go downstairs a few minntes after he left her, and the door slamming and closing on him. She knew he would never come back He was gone for ever Would he kill himself? she thought. Not until after he had met Lord Stevne She thought of her long past life, and all the dismal incidents The how dream it seemed, how miserable length, and profitless I. Should she take landanum, and end it too-have done with all hopes, schemes, debts, and triumplis? The I rench maid found her in this position —sitting in the midst of her miserable runs with clasped hands and dry eyes. The woman was her accomplice, 'Mon Dieu, Madanie, what has and in Steine's par happened?' she asked

What had happened? Was she guilty or not? She said not, but who could tell what was truth which came from those lips, or if that corrupt heart was in this case pure? All her lies and her schemes, all her selbish ness and her wiles, all her wit and genius had come to this bankruptey. The woman closed the curtains, and with some entreity and show of I induces, persuaded her mistress to he down on the bed. Then she went below and gathered up the trinkets which had been lying on the floor since Rebeeca dropped them there at her husband's orders, and Lord Steine went away.

Henry Esmond Returns from the Wars

'And now we are drawing near to home, she con tinued, 'I knew you would come, Harry, if—if it was but to forgive me for having spoken unjustly to you after that horrid—horrid misfortine I was half frantic with grief then when I saw you. And I know now—they have told me That wretch, whose name I can never mention, even has said it how you ined to even the quarrel, and would have taken it on yourself, my poor child but it was God's will that I should be punished, and that my dear lord should fall?

'He gave me lus blessing on lus death bed,' Esmond said. 'Thank God for that legacy!'

'Amen, amen' dear Henry,' said the lady, pressing his arm 'I knew it Mr Atterbury of St Bride's, who was called to him, told me so And I thanked God, too, and in my prayers ever since remembered it'

'You had spared me many a butter night had you told me sooner,' Mr Esmond said.

'I know it, I know it,' she answered, in a tone of such sweet humility as made Esmond repent that he should ever have dared to reproach her 'I know how wicked my heart has been, and I have suffered too, my dear I confessed to Mr Atterbury - I must not tell any more. He-I said I would not write to you or go to you-and it was better even that, having parted, we should part But I knew you would come back-I own that is no one's fault. And to day, Henry, in the anthem, when they sang it, "When the Lord turned the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream,' I thought yes, like them that dream—them that dream. And then it went, "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy, and he that goeth forth and weepeth shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him," I looled up from the book and saw you I was not surprised when I saw you I knew you would come, dear, and saw the gold sunshine round your head'

She smiled an almost wild smile as she looked up at him. The moon was up by this time, glittering keen in the frosty sky. He could see, for the first time now clearly, her sweet careworn face.

'Do you know what day it is?' she continued 'It is the 29th of December—it is your birthday! But last year we did not drink it—no, no My lord was cold, and my Harry was likely to die and my brain was in a fever, and we had no wine. But now—now you are come again, bringing your sheaves with you my dear' She burst into a wild flood of weeping as she spoke she laughed and sobbed on the young man's heart, crying out wildly, 'bringing your sheaves with you—your sheaves with you!'

As he had sometimes felt, gazing up from the deck at midnight into the boundless starht depths overhead, in a rapture of devout wonder at that endless brightness and beauty-in some such a way now, the depth of this pure devotion (which was, for the first time, revealed to him) quite smote upon him, and filled his heart with thanksgiving Gracious God, who was lie, weak and friendless creature, that such a love should be poured out upon him? Not in vain-not in vain has he livedhard and thankless should he be to think so-that has such a treasure given him What is ambition compared to that, but selfish vanity? To be rich, to be famous? What do these profit a year hence, when other names sound louder than yours, when you he hidden away under the ground, along with idle titles engraven on your coffin? But only true love lives after you-follows your memory with secret blessing-or precedes you, and intercedes for you Non omms moriar-if dying, I yet live in a tender heart or two, nor am lost and hopeless living, if a sainted departed soul still loves and prays for me

'If—if 'tis so, dear lady,' Mr Esmond said, 'why should I ever leave you? If God hath given me this great boon—and near or far from me, as I know now, the heart of my dearest mistress follows me, let me have that blessing near me, nor ever part with it till death separate us. Come away—leave this Europe, this place which has so many said recollections for you. Begin a new life in a new world. My good lord often talked of visiting that land in Virginia which King Charles give its—give his ancestor. Frank will give us that No man there will ask it there is a blot on my name, or inquire in the woods what my title is.'

And my children—and my duty—and my good father, Henry?' she broke out 'He has none but me now! for soon my sister will leave him, and the old man will be alone. He has conformed since the new Queen's reign, and here in Winchester, where they love him, they have found a church for him. When the children leave me, I will stry with him. I cannot follow them into the great world, where their way hes—it scares me. They will come and visit me, and you will, some times, Henry—yes, sometimes, as now, in the Holy Advent season, when I have seen and blessed you once more.'

'I would leave all to follow you,' said Mr Esmond, 'and can you not be as generous for me, dear lady?'

'Hush, boy!' she said, and it was with a mother's sweet plaintive tone and look that she spoke 'The world is beginning for you. For me, I have been so weak and sinful that I must leave it, and pray out an expiation, dear Henry. Had we houses of religion as there were once, and many divines of our Church would have them again, I often think I would retire to one and pass my life in penance. But I would love you still—yes, there is no sin in such a love as mine now, and my dear lord in heaven may see my heart, and knows the tears that have washed my sin away—and now—now my duty is here, by my children whilst they need me, and by my poor old father, and '——

'And not by me?' Henry said

"Hush 1" she said again, and raised her hand up to 'I have been your nurse You could not see me, Harry, when you were in the smallpox, and I came and sat by you Ah! I prayed that I might die, but it would have been in sin, Henry Oh! it is horrid to look back to that time It is over now and past, and it has been forgiven me. When you need me again, I will come ever so far When your heart is wounded, then come to me, my dear Be silent ! let me say all. You never loved me, dear Henry-no, you do not now, and I thank heaven for it I used to watch you, and knew by a thousand signs that it was so Do you remember how glad you were to go away to college? Twas I sent you. I told my papa that, and Mr Atterbury too, when I spoke to him in London And they both gave me absolution-bo.h-and they are godly men, having autho nty to bind and to loose And they forgave me, as my dear lord forgave me before he went to heaven?

'I think the angels are not all in heaven,' Mr Esmond said. And as a brother folds a sister to his heart, and as a mother cleaves to her son's breast, so for a few moments Esmond's beloved mistress came to him and blessed him (From Esmond)

Beatrix Esmond welcomes Captain Henry Esmond

Esmond had left a child and found a woman, grown beyond the common height, and arrived at such a dazzling completeness of beauty that his eyes inight well show surprise and delight at beholding her In hers there was a brightness so lustrous and melting that I have scen a whole assembly follow her as if by an attraction irresistible and that night the great Duke was at the playhouse after Ramillies, every soul turned and looked (she chanced to enter at the opposite side of the theatre at the same moment) at her, and not at him She was a brown beauty—that is, her eyes, hair, and eyebrous and eyelashes were dark her hair earling with rich undulations, and waving over her shoulders, but her eomplexion was as dazzling white as snow in sunshine, execut her checks which were a bright red, and her lips, which were of a still deeper crimson. Her mouth and chin, they said, were too large and full, and so they might be for a goddess in marble, but not for a woman whose eyes were fire, whose look was love, whose voice was the sweetest low song whose shape was perfect sym metry, health, decision, activity, whose foot as it planted itself on the ground was firm but flexible and who e motion, whether rapid or slow, was always perfect grace -rgile as a numph, lofts as a queen-now melting, now imperious, non sareastic-there was no single morement of hers but was beautiful. As he thinks of her, he who writes feels young again, and remembers a paragon

So she came holding her dress with one fair rounded arm, and her taper before her, trapping down the stair to greet Lsmond

'She hath put on her searlet stocking and white shoes,' says my lord, still laughing, 'Oh, my fine mistre s 1 is this the way you set your cap at the Captain?' She approached, shining smiles upon Lismond, who could look at nothing but her eyes. She advanced holding forward her head, as if she would have him I is her as he used to do when she was a child

'Stop,' she said, 'I am grown too big! Welcome, cousin Harry,' and she made him an arch cuitsey, sweep ing down to the ground almost, with the most gracious bend, looking up the while with the brightest eyes and sweetest smile. Love seemed to radiate from hir Harry eyed her with such a rapture as the first lover is described as having by Milton.

'N'est ce fas?' says my lady, in a low, sweet voice, still lianging on his arm

Esmond turned round with a start and a blush, as he met his mistress's clear eyes. He had forgotten her, rapt in admiration of the filia pulcrior

'Right foot forward, toe turned out, so now drop the curtsey, and show the red stockings, Trix They've silver clocks, Harry
The Dowager sent'em
She went to put 'em on,' cries my lord

'Hush, you stupid child 's says Miss, smothering her brother with kisses, and then she must come and kiss her mamma, looking all the while at Harry, over his mistress's shoulder. And if she did not kiss him, she gate him both her hands, and then took one of his in both hands, and said, 'Oh, Harry, we're so, so glid you're come!'

The Death of Colonel Newcome

Clive, and the boy sometimes with him, used to go daily to Grey Friars, where the Colonel still lay ill

After some days the fever which had attacked him left him, but left him so weak and enfechled that he could only go from his bed to the chair by his fireside. The serson was extremely bitter, the chamber which he inhabited was warin and spacious it was considered unadvisable to mose him until he had attained greater strength, and till warmer weather. The medical men of the House hoped he might rally in spring. My friend, Dr Goodenough, came to him, he hoped too but not with a hopeful face. A chamber, luckily vacant, hard by the Colonel's, was assigned to his friends, where we eat when we were too many for him customary attendant, he had two dear and watchful nurses, who were almost always with him-I thel and Madame de I lorae, who had pass d many a faithful year by an old man's bedside, who would have come, as to a vork of religion, to any sick couch, much more to this one, where he lay for whore life she would once gladly have given her own

But our Colonel, we all were obliged to acknowledge, was no more our friend of old day Helmm un again, and was good to every one round him, as his wont vas, especially when Boy came, his old eves lighted up vath simple happiness, and, with eagur trambling hands, he would seel under his bedelothes, or the pockets of his dressing gown, for toys or cakes, which he had caused to be purchased for his grandson There was a little laughing, red checked, white headed gown box of the school, to whom the old man had taken a great fancy One of the symptoms of his returning consciousness and recovery, as we hoped, was his calling for this child who pleased our friend by his archiness and merry ways and who, to the old gentleman's unfailing delight, used to call lum, 'Codd Colonel' 'Tell little F-Codd Colonel wants to see him,' and the little govin hos was brought to him, and the Colonel would listen to him for hour, and hear all about his lessons and his play and prattle, almost as childrehly, about Dr Raine The boys of the school, and his own early school days it must be said, had heard the noble old gentlemans touching history, and had all got to know and love him They came every thay to hear news of him, sent him in books and papers to amuse him, and some benevolent young couls—God's blessing on all honest boys, say 1 painted theatrical characters, and sent them in to Codd The little fellow was made free Colonel's grandson of gown boys, and once came thence to his grandfather in a little gown, which delighted the old man hugely Boy and he would like to be a little gown boy, and I make no doubt, when he is old enough, his father will get him that post, and put him under the tuition of my

The days went on, and our hopes, rused sometimes, began to flicker and fail. One evening the Colonel left his chair for his bed in pretty good spirits, but passed a disturbed night, and the next morning was too neak to rie Then he remained in his bed, and his friends One afternoon he asked for his visited him there little gown boy, and the child was brought to him, and sat by the bed with a very two stricken face and then gathered courage, and tried to amuse him by telling him how it was a half holiday, and they were having a cricket match with the St Peter's boys in the green, and The Colonel quite Grey Triars was in and winning understood about it, he would like to see the game he had played many a game on that green when he was a friend Dr Senior

by He grew excited, Clive dismissed his father's attle friend, and put a sovereign into his liand, and way he ran to say that Codd Colonel had come into a portune, and to buy tarts, and to see the match out. I, surre, little white haired gown boy! Heaven speed you, attle friend

After the child had gone, Thomas Newcome began o wander more and more. He talked louder, he gave he word of command, spoke Hindustance as if to his nen. Then he spoke words in French rapidly, seizing hand that was near him, and crying, 'Toujours, oujours!' But it was Ethel's hand which he took. Ethel and Clive and the nurse were in the room with itm, the nurse came to us, who were sitting in the djoining apartment, Madame de Florac was there, with my wife and Bayham.

At the look in the woman's countenance Madame e Florae started up 'He is very bad, he wanders a reat deal,' the nurse whispered. The French lady fell instantly on her knees, and remained rigid in prayer.

Some time afterwards Ethel came in with a scared ace to our pale group 'He is calling for you again, lear lady,' she said, going up to Madame de Florac, who was still kneeling, 'and just now he said he wanted rendennis to take care of his boy. He will not know ou'. She liid her tears as she spoke

She went into the room where Clive was at the ped's foot, the old man within it talked on rapidly for a while then again he would sigh and be still once more I heard him say hurriedly, 'Take care of him when I'm in India,' and then with a heart rending voice he called out, 'Léonore, Leonore!' She was kneeling by his side now The patient's voice sank into faint murmurs, only a moan now and then announced that he was not asleep

At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time. And just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said 'Adsum' and fell back. It was the word we used at school, when names were called, and lo, he, whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of The Master.

At his own wish Thackeray's family published no Life of the novelish. His daughter Mrs Richmond Ritchie, contributed valuable material to the biographical edition of his works (1898-99) her Chapters from some Memoirs (1894) give reminiscences of his later years. Mrs Ritchie also contributed to the article by Sir Leslie Stephen—the chief authority on the subject—in the Dictionary of National Biography. In the Great Writers series there is a Life by Herman Merivale and F. T. Marzials. Another biography is by Anthony Trollope in the English Men of Letters series. The Thackerays in India by Sir William Hunter, and two books by Mr. Eyre Crowe, the artist—With Thackeray in America and Thackerays Hannits and Homes—contain interesting matter the first named volume with regard to Thackerays progenitors. Tom Taylor (1817-80), born at Sunderland, studied at Glasgow and Trinity College, Cambridge, came out third classic in 1840, and was elected to a fellowship Professor of English for two years at University College, London, he was called to the Bar in 1845, and held the office of secretary to the Board of Health and the Local Government Board from 1854 till 1871, when he retired with a pension. It was computed that he produced about a hundred dramatic pieces, original and translated, many of them highly successful, such as Masks and Faces (with Charles Reade), Our American Cousin (in which Sothern created 'Lord Dundreary'), Still Waters Run Deep, The Ticket-of-Leave Man, Victims, An Unequal Match, The Contested Election, The Overland Route, The Fool's Revenge (from Victor Hugo), Twist Axe and Crown (an adaptation from a German original), and Joan of Aic The three last mentioned are historical dramas of a higher order than the others, and to Joan of Aic Mrs Tom Taylor (Laura Barker, a musical composer) contributed an original overture and entricte a Literary Fund banquet in June 1873 Tom Taylor said that, 'while serving literature as his mistress, he had served the State as his master-a jealous one, like the law, if not so jealous-and while contributing largely to literature grave and gay, by help of the invaluable three hours before breakfast, he had given the daily labour of twenty-two of his best years to the duties of a public office. Besides creating—or manufacturing—his dramatic pieces, Tom Taylor was a steady contributor to Punch, and on the death of Shirley Brooks in 1874 succeeded him as editor. He gave to biographical literature the Autobiography of B R Haydon (1853), compiled and edited from the journals of that unfortunate artist, also the Autobiography and Correspondence of the late C R Leslie, RA (1859), and the Life and Times of Sir Joshua Reynolds (1865)—the last commenced by Leshe shorth before his death was born on the 7th of I ebruary 1812 in Landport near Portsea, his father, John Dickens, being at that time a clerk in the Navy Pay Office in Portsmouth at a salary of eighty pounds a year. His mother was Elizabeth Barrow, daughter of a licutement in the navy, and Charles was the second of the eight children whom she bore to her husband ceived the rudiments of education from his mother Not being a very strong or healthy child, he was thrown back at a very early age on the com panionship of books Fielding, Sniollett, Lesage, and Cervantes were his friends when his health forbade him to take part in the sports of child Quite early, too, he visited theatres in company with James Lamert, a family connection, and thus began to acquire a taste for the stage which lasted throughout his life. At Chitham, whither the family had removed when Charles was four years old, they stayed till 1823, when John Dickens, whose salary lind by that time been increased to £350 a year, was called to duty in London at Somerset House, taking lodgings with his wife and children in Bayham Street, Camden Fown Before this Charles had had a veir or two at school under Mr Giles, a Baptist minister at Chatham John Dickens, however—v hose character has been drawn for us by Dickens himself in Mr Micawber -at this time became involved in money troubles The boy's education was in consequence utterly neglected, he blacked the fimily boots and helped his mother with the younger children, but he still maniged to get books and gratify his taste for reading. Eventually the patience of John Dickens's creditors was cylinusted, and he was arrested for debt and lodged in the Marshal Charles was provided for by being placed in a blacking warehouse, his chief occupation being the sticking of labels on bottles On this period of his life he ever afterwards looked back with detestation and bitterness. The family later on followed the father to the Marshalsea and lodged there with him Later again they moved to Camden Town, Charles, however, remaining, not in, but close to, the prison in another lodging

Fortunately this period of nilsery and degradation was not a long one. John Dickens was able at last to pay his debts and to secure his release In 1825 he left the public service on a pension, and eventually became employed as a reporter on the Morning Chronicle Charles in the meantime had been sent to school, in his thirteenth vear, at the Wellington House Academy, Hampsterd Road, where he stayed two years. After a short interval spent at another school he became a clerk in an attorney's office, first in Lincoln's Inn, and afterwards, from 1827 to 1828, in Gray's 1nn He was now, and had been for some years past, in vigorous health, and he resolved to take every opportunity to improve his education and his prospects by his He read in the British Museum, and became a slifful writer of shortland. He now obtained the post of reporter for the True Sun in the gallery of the House of Commons, and in 1835 transferred lumself to the Morning Chronicle, the managers of which soon learned to appreciate his remarkable skill and quickness. By them he was sent to incetings all over the country, and in this way acquired that varied experience both of adventures and of people which was to serve him so vigil From reporting he soon turned to The first article of the series now original work. known as Sketches by Boz appeared in the Monthly Magazine for December 1833, though it was not until the following August that he used the signature 'Boz,' the nickname of his youngest brother Begun in the Monthly Magazire, the series was continued in the Evening Chroricle, an offshoot of the Morting Chronick, to shieli Dielens vas now attached at a weekly salary of seven guineas In March 1836 the sletches appeared in book form, published by Macrone, who had paid Diel ens £150 for the copyright. On 2nd April of the same year Dicliens was married to Catherine Hogarth, the eldest daughter of his friend and colleague George Hogarth At about this time, too, Diel ens was writing in a small was for the stage. One piece, Is She His Wife? or Something Singular, a comic burletti, was produced at the St Jimes's Theatre in March 1836, another, The Stratge Gentleman, also a comic burletta, at the same theatre in the following September Now came the crisis in Dickens's career Chapman & Hall the publishers were negotiating with Seymour the artist for the publication of a series of plates illustritive of coclines sportsmen. Dickens was applied to by them to write the letterpress. At his suggestion the coclincy sporting notion was abandoned, the Pickwicl Club was adopted as a basis, and the publication of the monthly parts began in April 1836, Dickens receiving a payment of £15, 155 a Shortly before the appearance of the second number Seymour land committed suicide, and, for one number (the third), R W Buss re placed him I hackeray amongst others had applied for the vacant post, but eventually Hablot K. Brown ('Phiz') was chosen by Dickens to be his illus The success of The Pick wick Papers was trator enormous Of the first number four hundred copies were prepared, by the time the fifteenth had been reached the sale liad increased a hundredfold, and Oliver Dickens's fortune was practically made Trust began to appear (January 1837) in Bentley's Miscellany before Pickrick ended, and run on to March 1839, and long before Oliver was finished Nicholas Nichleby began After a short interval Master Humphrey's Cleck began to appear once a Originally this series was to have consisted of detached papers, humorous and saturical, and stories, this plan and the title, however, were soon absorbed into The Old Currositi Shop and The last number of this series Barnaby Rudge appeared on 27th November 1841

1842 Dickens sailed for America, with a view to breaking new ground for his next book. He was This feel received with unbounded enthusiasm ing, however, gave way to resentment upon the appearance of American Notes, and resentment was followed by a storm of obloquy when Martin Chuzzlewit (January 1843 to August 1844) showed Dickens as a merciless satirist of a large number of American characteristics and institutions year 1843 saw the appearance of The Christmas

Carol, the first of the Christmas books There were four successors-The Chines. The Cricket on the Hearth, The Battle of Life, and The Haunted Man From July 1844 to June 1845 Dickens spent the greater part of his time in Italy In January 1846 he became the first editor of the Daily News. but resigned the post ifter less than three weeks To the columns of the Daily News he contributed a series of 'Travelling Letters.' subsequently republished as Pictures from Italy In June 1846 he settled at Lausanne, where he began Dombey and Son. which he finished in The book had 1848 an immense popularity, and its pecuniary results were very large. David Copperfield immediately followed (May 1849 to November 1850) At this time, too, he carried out his plan for the establishment of a weekly magazine, Household Words was the title selected for it, and W H Wills became assistant editor House ran in monthly parts from March 1852 to September 1853, Hard Times was published in Household Words from April to August 1854, and Little Dorrit followed in monthly parts from January 1856 to June 1857 This unceasing literary labour did not, however, entirely absorb his energies, for from 1847 to 1852 he occupied himself eagerly with theatrical performances in London and the great provincial towns as actor, stage-manager, and, occasionally, as playwright. During 1855 he spared time to interest himself in various political house, he made Gadshill his permanent home 1858 he gave his first public reading, and thence forward he devoted a large part of his time and energy to this form of entertainment, which proved highly profitable to his finances, though it seriously impaired his health and strength. In the same year Dickens separated from his wife One consequence of the controversy that arose about this matter was that Dickens quarrelled with Bradbury & Evans, who had been his publishers since

1844, and returned to Chapman & Hall Household Words was given up, and All the Year Round took its place The sale of his Christmas stories in All the Year Round reached three hundred thousand this journal, too, were published A Tale of TwoCities (1850) and Great Expectations (December 1860 to August 1861) In Our Mutual Friend (1864-65) Dickens reverted to the plan of monthly numbers In November 1867, after a run of extraordinary success as a public reader in England, he sailed for America He was not in good health an inflammation of his left foot gave him very great trouble, and the strain of travel upon mind and body overtaxed his strength, but his reception in America was triumphant, and his readings had a magnificent success wherever he gave them Americans had forgiven him his criticisms, and their attendance at his readings swelled his bank-balance by nearly £20,000 He returned to England in May 1868, and began another series of readings, which, however, he was eventually ordered by his doctors to abandon. In the autumn of 1869 he set to work on The Mystery of Edwin Drood, which appeared (first number April 1870) in monthly parts, and was immediately successful On the 8th of June 1870, after working at his book all day, he had a sudden stroke, and died on the He was buried in Westminster following day Abbey on the 14th of June 1870

So ended, in his fifty-ninth year, the great and beneficent genius who through the course of a whole generation had held the minds of English-speaking

From the time when the publicafolk spell bound tion of the Pickwick Papers began to the day when death came upon him with The Mystery of Edwin Drood still unfinished, his influence had been as widespread as its strength was incontestable life, after its first few wretched years, had been in its broad public aspect a happy one, for he had been able to employ all his powers to the full extent of their capacity. He sprang quickly into fame, and from that moment was able to banish all fear of penury Thus, with the additional incentive that came to him from the enthusiastic admiration of innumerable readers, he was enabled to throw all the energies of his being into the occupation he consciously excelled in, to say everything he most wanted to say with the knowledge that every word would go straight to its mark No life could well have been more thoroughly lived or more delightful

As soon as he had died a question as to the probable endurance of his popularity was raisedchiefly, perhaps, by those who had depreciated it during his life Dickens, so it was said, depends for his force and his interest on accidents that had passed away even before he ceased to write Stage coaches have stopped running, their drivers are an extinct type how will it be possible to interest succeeding generations in the humours of Tony Weller and the mottle-faced man? The Fleet prison and the Marshalsea exist no longer who can now care about a description of their enormities? The modern sick-nurse is a gentle and refined lady will anybody believe that a Gamp or a Prig could ever have spread an aroma of gin over suffering humanity? And so forth, and so forth

In one sense these questions have been quietly answering themselves Edition after edition of the novels was published during the lifetime of He has been dead for a generation, most of the copyrights have expired, but the stream of editions continues to flow Other pub lishers have seized upon the books, and send them out in all shapes and sizes So far as mere popu larity is concerned, and so far as it can be tested by sales, this might seem to be a conclusive answer for the present. Nor must it be forgotten that in America, where there was no first-hand knowledge of the accidents to which reference has been made, where there were no Tony Wellers, no Marshalseas, and no Gamps, and no Courts of Chancery capable of spinning a case out for generations, the popularity of Dickens became at once as great as it was at home, while his readers were even more numerous France and Germany, too, gave him hosts of admirers Without pushing the point too far, it is surely to some extent permis sible to infer the verdict of posterity from the judgment of foreign readers To put it in a different way, it seems hardly conceivable that any generation of Englishmen should cease to take pleasure in these home-bred characters which have delighted foreigners utterly separated from them—at any rate so far as their outward presentment is concerned—by temperament and history

The fact is that a great part of the force of Charles Dickens's books depends not on the per manence of the institutions he describes, or of the particular occupations assigned to his characters, but on the extraordinary sympathy and insight with which he imagined them and on the living strength with which he endowed them coaches, to be sure, are not now the only method of travelling, but men still drive horses, grow stout in the occupation, and deliver caustic apoph thegms on life Sarah Gamp no longer nurses, but, apart from nursing, the great tribe of Gamp still flourishes, with all the humour, the inverted tenderness, and the indifference to mortality and its sufferings that distinguished its founder Driven from the sick bed, its members are still occupied as charwomen, caretakers, or as bedmakers in the college rooms of Cambridge. All these characters, in short, remain as true to life in a broad sense as they were when Dickens dragged them forth from their natural obscurity. The non essentials have changed, the type is still the same. Or take is different examples Messrs Dodson & Fogg, or Mr Vincent Crummles and his company whole status and many of the duties of solicitors have altered in the course of the last sixty years, but can any one deny that there have been, and are, sharp and 'downy' practitioners ready to take advantage of a foolish client, and basing their hope of costs on the riches of a more modern Pickwick? The jargon they talk is different, because the processes of law have changed, but the nature of Dodsons and Foggs is immutable As to Crummles and his flock, they are touring somewhere in the provinces at this moment, though they travel by rulway instead of along the posting roads Even now at some remote railway station that sublime manager's successor is straining a Nicholas Nickleby to his breast, exclaiming as he does so, 'Farewell, my noble, my lion-hearted boy,' while the porters and the passengers on the platform are laughing as did the lookers on round the door of the coach in which the original Nicholas departed for London So the list might be almost indefinitely extended Mrs Bardell, the amorous, with Mrs Cluppins and the rest of her satellites, Mr Justice Stareleigh, the model of grotesque judicial obtuseness, Bumble, the archetype of pudding-headed beadledom, Uncle Pumblechook, trampling pompously on the inferior poor, and cringing to the prosperous, Mr Toots, the non consequential, Captain Cuttle and Jack Bunsby, those forlorn and soft hearted mariners, helpless against the onslaughts of the implicable MacStinger, Miss Pross, the victor in single coni bat over Madame Defurge, Mr F's Aunt, with her trilogy of immortal irrelevancies-'There's mile stones on the Dover Road, 'I hate a fool,' and 'When we lived at Henley, Barnes's gander was stole by tinkers'-these and a hundred others, all as broadly conceived and as inimitably described, remain with us and have become a part of the common history and everyday life of our race.

How came Dickens to write as he did, or, indeed, to write at all? His family associations were not literary, his education, such as it was, was unliterary to the last degree No great school or university can claim him as its pupil. If we had no record except of his childish years of misery, followed by a few glimpses of him in after-life as a successful reader, an excellent actor, and an agreeable host, it might be as hard for some meticulous critics to believe that he wrote Dombey and Son, Martin Chusslewit, and A Tale of Two Cities as it is for Baconian enthusiasts to believe that Shakespeare wrote Hainlet, Othello, and A Midsummer Night's Dream John Forster's life of his friend may, however, prevent the investigator in the year 2200 from imputing the authorship of the novels to Sir Thomas Talfourd, who, be it remembered, was not only a member of Parliament and a judge, but also wrote four tragedies, one of which, at least, was produced on the stage. In short, this question cannot be answered by a set of formulae in the case of Dickens any better than in the case of any other great creator. No doubt the difficulty of accounting for Dickens, if the expression may be used, is increased by the very force He is not related either to of his originality Richardson or to Scott, and though a connection can be established between his work and the tradition bequeathed by Fielding and Smollett, he is widely separated from both of them, as from all his predecessors and contemporaries, by the form he adopted, by the point of view from which he regarded it and the treatment by which lie developed it.

What we know of Dickens is this As a boy he was what he remained all his life through—nervous, highly strung, excitable, profoundly sensitive and imaginative to the last degree, extraordinarily impressionable, and as tenacious in recollecting as he was quick in registering the impressions he received This boy, so sensitive and shrinking, found himself the sport of fate The misfortunes of his father were visited upon his innocent head with a force increased tenfold by his helplessness and his sense of the injustice of the visitation. To be degraded through a father's calamity is the sharpest stroke that can fall upon a boy, for a boy can make no allowances, he can only realise the exceeding bitterness of his own lot My father, he says in effect, is a grown man, he can fight for himself But I am made a mockery to my companions by his fall, my days are rendered hateful to me, and I cannot lift a hand to better my condition or So the Marshalsea prisoner's son, to help him forced into an occupation against which his whole being revolted and of which he could never trust himself in after-life to speak, became a lonely and a morbid boy He took refuge in books and the fancies their reading gave him, resolving, too, that if ever the chance came to him after he had grown up he would strike a blow against injustice, oppression, and hypocrisy in high places, and against all the wretchedness and pain that they brought upon gentle and innocent creatures This was the noble revenge he planned for himself His chance was to come sooner than he could have The Sketches by Boz had made him known to a few who were able to appreciate keen powers of observation, strong sympathy, a curious knowledge of human nature, and a lively and direct style of writing as displayed by a man hitherto The Pichwick Papers instantly made unknown The young man of twenty-five found him famous himself the master of the great public. He had secured an immense army to follow him, and could now lead his crusade Even in Pichwick he had shown us a good man struggling against adversity and temporarily overwhelmed by it He followed it with Oliver Tavist, in which he drew directly, not on his own special boyish experiences, but on the feelings roused by them, in order to present to us the terrible picture of a boy wronged from his birth, driven by accident into infamous surround ings, and emerging through horror and despair to justice and peace. Nicholas Nickleby takes up the tale again Nicholas himself (though, like Maitin Chuzzlewit, he is nothing but an automaton framed for the display of proper feeling and the utterance of correct phrases), Kate Nickleby, Smike, and the rest of the boys at Dotheboys Hall—they are all based on the suffering of unmerited pain they appeal to us because they are beaten down by the schemes of wicked men no less than by their own circumstances, and their appeal is brought poignantly home to us because their creator had himself suffered, and through their mouths was telling the story of his wrongs. And the same motive runs through most of the novels, strong and direct in The Old Curiosity Shop, in Martin Chuzzlewit, Dombey and Son, and David Copperfield, less forcible in some of the others, but undeniably present in nearly all Thus Dickens's booksthose, that is to say, on which his fame chiefly rests-were emphatically novels with a purpose Sometimes, as when he attacked the debtors' prisons, the Yorkshire schools, the Court of Chancery, or the Circumlocution Office, they had not only the broad purpose just indicated, but a special sub purpose of their own It is unnecessary to argue at length the question rused by those who hold that a story should be told for the story's sake only, that it depends for its excellence as a work of art only on the interest of its scheme and the literary manner in which it is presented, and that any such object as the reform of general humanity or the remedy of special abuses by the inculcation of a moral is not merely alien to the story-teller's craft, but also weakens and degrades his story We may admit that an attack on the abuses of a public institution or a Government office does not of itself necessarily make a good story the cliances, perhaps, are rather in favour of its being a bad one, but everything depends on the treat There can be no valid reason why a writer who feels strongly with regard to some particular form of loguery, injustice, or folly should not employ his humour, his knowledge of human nature, and his observation for the purpose of showing the world how mean and unworthy is the object of his dislike. It is absurd to lay down a rule which forbids novelists to have a moral purpose, or permits them to have it only when it is so carefully disguised as to be unrecognisable In short, we can delight in Scott and Dumas and Robert Louis Stevenson without ceasing to take our pleasure in Victor Hugo, in Dickens, and in Charles Reade To depreciate a novelist merely because he is also a moralist is like blaming a lighthouse because it does not happen to be a bonfire

The appearance of the Pickwick Papers revealed to the world a new and delightful force Here was a writer who had thrown off the shackles of convention, who knew the simple everyday life of humble people and portrayed it with a humour as fresh as it was irresistible, who carried his readers with him from scene to scene and incident to incident by the amizing energy of his own animal spirits and his imaginative power Certainly the publishers had neither intended nor hoped for such a result Their plan has been already described. In a happy moment for themselves and the English speaking world they pitched upon Dickens as their writer He took up the plan and developed it to suit his own ideas, altered it and added to it as he went along, and finally reduced it to something like unity. Complete unity, of course, it could not have, for no art could weld together satisfactorily the detached fragments of its beginning or make them harmonise entirely with its progress and its end The touchstone in this matter is Mr Samuel Pickwick himself eponymous President of the Pickwick Club is introduced to us as a grotesque and pompous old noodle, an object not of sympathy, but of ridicule. If we skip from the first chapter to the last page of the book, we find that Mr Pickwick 'retains all his former juvenility of spirit. He is known to all the poor people about, who never ful to take their hats off, as he passes, with great respect. The children idolise him, and so, indeed, does the whole neighbourhood' Could any one have respected or idolised the Pickwick of Chapter I? young writer was, however, to show immediately that he was capable of writing a consistent story, and of compelling the attention of his readers by an intense tragic power no less than by humour and pathos While Pickwick was appearing he was engaged upon Oliver Twist Its publication gave him a definite place in English literature Nothing so grim, so remorseless, and so direct had ever before moved the conscience of the public in the guise of fiction Its author was recognised as one who, without the vast learning of Victor Hugo. could do in English what that great master lind done in French in Notre Dame de Paris a few years before-could show the elemental passions of humanity struggling under the dominating in fluence of drdykn, and could purge the emotions by pity and terror Henceforward his own reputa tion was on his special ground his only serious But he was in the full flush of his youth and energy, and within the next six years he produced Nicholas Nickleby, The Old Curiosity Shop, and Barnaby Rudge, an astonishing record of achievement for a ninn of thirty one. For the rest, the tale of his work may be read in his biography It would be idle to pretend that he was at all times equal to his highest standard, Little Dorrit is not without tediousness, and Our Mutual Friend is the least satisfactory of all his efforts But Little Dorrit was followed by A Tale of Two Cities and Great Expectations, and after Our Mutual Friend came his last book, The Mystery of Edwin Drood, which proved him to be still possessed of all his ancient power and variety of sympathy and of interest

One part of Dickens's secret has already been in dicated he had lived amongst the common people, he knew their habits and their modes of speech, and he rendered them with the faithful accuracy of genius—which is a very different thing from the accuracy of the instantaneous photographer who can present to us fractional moments of attitude and gesture never caught by mortal eye. He has been assailed for being a dealer in exaggeration, a caricaturist. The charge may be admitted while the implication is denied. The true caricaturist is not he who gives us a gigantic head perched on a diminutive body supported by infinitesimal legs, but he who in his portrait represents with emphasis those tricks of feature, of gesture, or even of dress that reveal the inward character. In this sense It need not be con Dickens was a caricaturist tended that he always succeeded, or that in his desire for emphasis he never overdrew Mr Carker and Mr Carker's gleaming teeth are only one ex And in the satire of 'society' ample out of many But where he knew the class he Dickens failed could draw the man belonging to it, and draw him with unmatched truth and sympathy and humour If Carker is to be called for the plaintiff, the defence can retort crushingly with Miss Tox, Dr Blimber, Mr Toots, and Captain Cuttle forth and Rosa Dartle can be overwhelmed with the two Peggotys, Mrs Gummidge, Mr Micawber, Traddles, and Miss Trotwood who accuse Dickens of not being 'natural' bring forward the special exceptions In order to prove their point they are willing to forget the great mass of his characters and the richness of humour and humanity with which he dowered them. We mry grant to these accusers that Dickens's occasional use of 'label-names' was a source of some weakness to him, and for this reason If you call a character Scrooge, or Verisopht, or Gradgrind, you stamp him once for all and set him apart to be what his name indicates and nothing more sequently you may wish to develop or to change his nature, but the fital name hampers you harder to believe that a Scrooge could become generous and sympathetic and cheerful than it would be if his name had been, let us say, Roland or Oliver A man who begins by wanting 'facts, nothing but facts,' might, of course, on some future day 'bend his hitherto inflexible theories to appointed circumstances, making his facts and figures subservient to Faith, Hope, and Charity, and no longer trying to grind that heavenly trio into his dusty little mills, ' but before he does it (in a book) he ought to drop the name of Gradgrind And as to Lord Frederick Verisopht, the case is much the same. The description of his quarrel with Sir Mulberry Hawk and the subsequent duel is one of the most powerful in fiction, but it is vitiated by his absurd name. It seems hardly possible to believe that this mixture of pap and cotton-wool could have behaved like a real man, or that 'he might have lived a happy man, and died with children's faces round his bed'-unless he had merged his family label in some territorial title suggesting peace, reform, and all the domestic

The pathos of Dickens has been a subject of somewhat bitter controversy lt could move so unsentimental a critic as Jeffrey to tears, it has been assailed by later critics-on whom, by the way, Mr Swinburne has discharged some crashing thunderbolts (Quarterly Review, July 1902) Much may be admitted even by the most thorough going admirers of Dickens It was not generally in the nature of his impassioned genius to allow the situation he had created to speak for itself, or to submit to the noble and eloquent reticence which has made the death scene of Colonel Newcome a masterpiece Carried away by the intensity of his emotion, he added detail after detail and sentence after sentence, heaping pathos upon pathos in his ardent desire to impress his own sense of tears upon his readers. These, too, if they once yield to his spell, are carried away, and their hearts are wrung by the bitterness and irreparable affliction that Dickens sets before them They are inclined to resent as an intrusion upon sacred ground the subsequent appearance of the cold critic who, having analysed the bitterness and dissected the affliction, tells them that by all the rules of art they ought to have scoffed and not to have wept. They may allow his canons, but they will always prefer to abide by the test of their own feelings. Nor must it be forgotten that, even if in the case of Little Nell and Paul Dombey Dickens overcharged the vials of sentiment, he showed more than once, and notably in A Tale of Two Cities, that he could describe mortal things without a trace of the excess with which lie has been charged and direct. He had a full command of nervous English, and he used it with a joyous sort of vigour to give flesh and blood to the shapes that filled his memory and to the creatures of his imagination Reinforced, as it was, by sympathy and humour, by a drollery as refreshing as it was unexpected, and by a fierce indignation against wrong, this power became irresistible. Sometimes its very force, working under the stimulus of a violent and lurid imagination, led him astray. The wind, the speed of a post-chaise, the gloom and terror of a murky river, become under its influence portentous human elements of the story, and the story teller is lost in the rhapsodist and the prophet. On the other hand, it must be said that this imaginative power often stood him in good To cite only one instance, it would not be easy to match in our literature the tremendous descriptions of Jonas Chuzzlewit's guilty agony before and after he committed the murder the bluff humour of the guard of the coach and Mr Pecksniff's hypocritical friendliness are fitted into the terrible description of Jonas before the crime, and Mrs Gamp plays her part in the dreadful final scene. This is the Æschylean side of Dickens, just as in the apostrophes to Tom Pinch with their thee ings and thou ings there is found the sham Euripidean which led him into an excess of sentimentality, finding its expression in long passages of bad blank verse. In the construction of his stories Dickens varied very It has already been pointed out how the origin of the Pukwick Papers necessarily made the story one of detached scenes But Martin Chuzzlewit and Nicholas Nickleby, though they do possess definite plots, scarcely attain nearer to an essential unity than Pickwick Their gloomy plots are in reality subordinate to the detached incidents that give them their living interest books, however, Dickens kept a firm grasp on his central story, and made it control the incidents In nearly everything he wrote, certainly in every book that preceded Bleak House, the astounding vigour and vitality of the writer are the chief Body and soul, heart and brain, and clements muscular energy -all that he was, and all that he felt or saw-were thrown into his work, which, from the impulse of his own overwhelming animation, took upon it life and energy And if here and there a reader, and in particular a reader of reademic mind, is startled by riotous evuberance or offended by excess of sentimentality, even lic can turn for instant relief to innumerable scenes of profound and touching insight. Such passages as the dialogues between little Paul and Mrs Pipchin, or the description of David Copperfield's sorrowful sense of importance when the death of his mother was announced, reveal the master no less surely than the broad humours of the Gamps and Wellers and Micawbers it is possible to make a thousand deductions from the sum of Dickens's ments and yet to leave him securely established, we may hope for many a generation to come, in the enthusiastic and grateful affection of the race for which he wrote.

Mr Lenville's Apology

He [Mr Folair] had no doubt reported that Nicholas was in a state of extreme bodily fear, for when that young gentleman wall ed with much deliberation down to the theatre next morning at the usual hour, he found all the company assembled in evident expectation, and Mr Lenville, with his severest stage face, sitting majestically on a table, whistling defiance.

Now, the ladies were on the side of Nicholas, and the gentlemen (being jealous) were on the side of the dis appointed tragedian, so that the latter formed a little group about the redoubtable Mr Lenville, and the former looked on at a little distance in some trepidation and On Nicholas stopping to salute them, Mr Lenville laughed a scornful laugh, and made some general remark touching the natural history of puppies

'Oh '' said Nicholas, looking quietly round, 'are you there?'

'Slave'' returned Mr Lenville, flourishing his right arm, and approaching Nicholas with a theatrical stride. But somehow he appeared just at that moment a little startled, as if Nicholas did not look quite so frightened as he had expected, and came all at once to an avkward halt, at which the assembled ladies burst into a shrill laugh

'Object of my scorn and hatred '' said Mr Lenville, 'I hold ye in contempt'

Nicholas laughed in very unexpected enjoyment of this performance, and the ladies, by way of encouragement, laughed louder than before, whereat Mr Lenville assumed his bitterest smile, and expressed his opinion that they were 'minions'

'But they shall not protect ve " said the tragedian, taking an upward look at Nicholas, beginning at his boots and ending at the crown of his head, and then a downs ard one, beginning at the crown of his head and ending at his boots-which two looks, as everybody 'They shall not knows, express defiance on the stage protect ye-boy 17

Thus speaking Mr Lenville folded his arms, and treated Nicholas to that expression of face with which, in melodramatic performances, he was in the habit of regarding the tyrannical kings when they said, 'Away with him to the deepest dungeon beneath the castle moat, and which, accompanied with a little jingling of fetters, had been known to produce great effects in its time.

Whether it was the absence of the fetters or not, it made no very deep impression on Mr Lenville's adver sary, hovever, but rather seemed to increase the good humour expressed in his countenance, in which stage of the contest, one or two gentlemen, who had come out expressly to witness the pulling of Nicholas's nose, grew impatient, murmuring that if it were to be done at all it had better be done at once, and that if Mr Lenville didn't mean to do it he had better say so, and not keep them waiting there. Thus urged, the tragedian adjusted the cuff of his right coat-sleeve for the performance of the operation, and walked in a very stately manner np to Nicholas, who suffered him to approach to within the requisite distance, and then, without the smallest discomposure, knocked him down.

Before the discomfited tragedian could raise his head from the boards, Mrs Lenville (who, as has been before hinted, was in an interesting state) rushed from the rear rank of ladies, and uttering a piercing scream, threw her self upon the body

'Do you see this, monster? Do you see this?' cried Mr Lenville, sitting np, and pointing to his pro-trate lady, who was holding him very tight round the waist.

'Come,' said Nicholas, nodding his head, 'apologise for the insolent note you wrote to me last night, and waste no more time in talking '

'Never I' cried Mr Lenville.

'Yes-jes-yes,' screamed his wife. 'For my sake -for mine, Lenville-forgo all idle forms, unless you would see me a blighted corse at your feet.'

'This is affecting ' said Mr Lenville, looking round him, and drawing the back of his hand across his eyes. 'The ties of nature are strong The weal husband and the father—the father that is yet to be—relents apologise.' (From Nicholas Nichleby, Chap. NAL)

Mrs Gamp in the Home of the Moulds.

The premises of Mr Mould were hard of hearing to the boisterous noises in the great main streets, and nestled in a quiet corner, where the City strife became a drowsy hum, that sometimes rose, and sometimes fell, and sometimes altogether ceased, suggesting to a thoughtful mind a stoppage in Cheapside. The light came sparling in among the scarlet runners, as if the churchyard winked at Mr Mould, and said, 'We understand each oher,' and from the distant shop a pleasant sound arose of coffin making with a low melodious hammer, rat, tat, tat, tat, alike promoting slumber and digestion.

'Quite the buzz of insects,' said Mr Mould, closing his eyes in a perfect luxury 'It puts one in mind of the sound of animated nature in the agricultural districts.

It s exactly lil e the woodpecker tapping?

'The woodpecter tapping the hollow elm tree,' observed Mrs Mould, adapting the vords of the popular melody to the description of wood commonly used in the tride.

'Ha, ha'' laughed Mr Mould 'Not at all bad, mv We shall be glad to hear from you again, Mrs M. Hollow elm tree, eh? Ha, ha! Verv good indeed. I've seen worse than that in the Sunday papers, my love.'

Mrs Mould, thus encouraged, took a little more of the punch, and handed it to her daughters, who dutifully followed the example of their mother

'Hollow elm tree, ch?' said Mr Mould, maling a slight motion with his legs in his enjoyment of the joke. 'It's beech in the song Elm, ch? Yes, to be sure. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my soul, that's one of the best things I know! He was so excessively tickled by the jest that he couldn't forget it, but repeated trenty times, 'Llm, eh? Yes, to be sure. Elm, of course. Ha, ha, ha! Upon my life, you know, that ought to be sent to somebody who could make use of it. It's one of the smartest thing- that ever was said. Hollow elm tree, ch? Of course. Very hollow Ha, ha, ha!'

Here a knock was heard at the room door

'That's Tacker, I know,' said Mrs Mould, 'by the wheezing he makes Who that hears him now would suppose he'd ever had wind enough to carry the feathers on his head?-Come in, Tacker?

'Beg your pardon, ma'am,' said Tacker, looking in a little way, 'I thought our Governor was here'

'Well, so he is,' cried Mould

'Oh' I didn't see you, I'm sure,' said Tacker, looking in a little further 'You wouldn't be inclined to take a walking one of two, with the plun wood and a tin plate, I suppose?'

'Certainly not,' replied Mr Mould, 'much too common Nothing to say to it.'

'I told 'em it was precious low,' observed Mr Tacker 'Tell 'em to go somewhere else. We don't do that style of business here,' said Mr Mould 'Like their impudence to propose it Who is it?'

'Why,' returned Tacker, pausing, 'that's where it is, you see It's the beadle's son in law'

'The beadle's son in law, ch?' said Mould 'Well, I'll do it if the beadle follows in his cocked hat, not else. We may carry it off that way, by looking official, Lut it'll be low enough then. His cocked hat, mind!'

'I'll take care, sir,' rejoined Tacker 'Ohl Mrs Gamp's below, and wants to speak to you'

'Tell Mrs Gamp to come upstairs,' said Mould — 'Now, Mrs Gamp, what's jour news?'

The lady in question was by this time in the door way, curtsying to Mrs Mould At the same moment a peculiar fragrance was borne upon the breeze, as if a passing fairy had hiccoughed, and had previously been to a wine-vaults

Mrs Gamp made no response to Mr Mould, but curtsied to Mrs Mould again, and held up her hands and eyes, is in a devout thanksgiving that she looked so well. She was neatly but not gaudily attired, in the weeds she lind worn when Mr Pecksniff had the pleasure of making her acquaintance, and was perhaps the turn of a scale more snuffy.

'There are some happy creatures,' Mrs Gamp observed, 'as time runs back'ards with, and you are one, Mrs Mould, not that he need do nothing except use you in his most owldacious way for years to come, I'm sure, for voung you are and will be. I says to Mrs Harris,' Mrs Gamp continued, 'only t'other day-the last Monday evening fortnight as ever dawned upon this Piljian's Projiss of a mortal wale—I says to Mrs Harris when she says to me, "Years and our trials, Mrs Gamp, sets marks upon us all,"-" Say not the words, Mrs Harris, if you and me is to be continual friends, for sech is not the case Mrs Mould," I says, making so free, I will confess, as use the name' (she curtsied here), "is one of them that goes agen the observation straight, and never, Mrs Harris, whilst I've a drop of breath to draw, will I set by, and not stand up, don't think it" "I ast your pardon, ma'am," says Mrs Harris, "and I humbly grant your grace, for if ever a woman lived as would see her feller creeturs into fits to serve her friends, well do I know that woman's name is Sairey Gamp ""

At this point she was fain to stop for breath, and advantage may be taken of the circumstance to state that a fearful mystery surrounded this lady of the name of Harris, whom no one in the circle of Mrs Gamp's requaintance had ever seen, neither did any human being know her place of residence, though Mrs Gamp appeared on her own showing to be in constant communication with hier. There were conflicting rumours on the subject, but the prevalent opinion was that she was a phantom of Mrs Gamp's brain—as Messrs Doe and Roe are fictions of the law—created for the express purpose of holding visionary dialogues with her on all manner of subjects, and invariably winding up with a compliment to the excellence of her nature.

'And likeways what a pleasure,' said Mrs Gamp, turning with a tearful smile towards the daughters, 'to see them two young ladies as I know'd afore a tooth in their pretty heads was cut, and have many a day seen—ih, the sweet creeturs!—playing at berryins down in the shop, and follerin' the order book to its long home in the iron safe! But that's all past and over, Mr Mould!—as she thus got in a carefully regulated routine to that gentle man, she shook her head waggishly—'that's all past and over now, sir, in't it?'

'Changes, Mrs Gamp, changes 1' returned the under taker

'More changes, too, to come, afore we've done with changes, sir,' said Mrs Gamp, nodding yet more wag gishly than before. 'Young ladies with such faces thinks of something else besides berryins, don't they, sir?'

'I am sure I don't know, Mrs Gamp,' said Mould, with a chuckle.—'Not bad in Mrs Gamp, my dear?'

'Oh, yes, you do know, sir!' said Mrs Gamp, 'and so does Mrs Mould, your 'ansome pardner too, sir, and so do I, although the blessing of a daughter was deniged me, which, if we had had one, Gamp would certainly have drunk its little shoes right off its feet, as with our precious boy he did, and arterwards send the child a crrand to sell his wooden leg for any money it would fetch as matches in the rough, and bring it home in liquor-which was truly done beyond his years, for ev'ry individgle penny that child lost at toss or buy for kidney ones, and come home arterwards quite bold, to break the news, and offering to drown himself if that would be a satisfaction to his parents. Oh, yes, you do know, sir,' said Mrs Gamp, wiping her eye with her shawl, and resuming the thread of her discourse 'There's something besides births and berryins in the newspapers, an't there, Mr Mould?'

Mr Mould winked at Mrs Mould, whom he had by this time taken on his knee, and said, 'No doubt A good deal more, Mrs Gamp —Upon my life, Mrs Gamp is very far from bad, my dear!'

'There's marryings, an't there, sir?' said Mrs Gamp, while both the daughters blushed and tittered 'Bless their precious hearts, and well they knows it! Well you know d it too, and well did Mrs Mould, when you was at their time of life! But my opinion is, you're all of one age now For as to you and Mrs Mould, sir, ever having grandchildren'—

'Oh! Fie, sie! Nonsense, Mrs Gamp,' replied the undertaker 'Devilish smart, though Ca pi tal!' This was in a whisper 'My dear'—aloud again—'Mrs Gamp can drink a glass of rum, I dare say —Sit down, Mrs Gamp, sit down'

Mrs Gamp took the chair that was nearest the door, and casting up her eyes towards the ceiling, feigned to be wholly insensible to the fact of a glass of rum being in preparation, until it was placed in her hand by one of the young ladies, when she exhibited the greatest surprise.

Dinner at Dr Blimber's

Grace having been said by the Doctor, dinner began There was some nice soup, also roast meat, boiled meat vegetables, pie, and choese Every young gentleman had a massive silver fork, and a napkin, and all the arrange ments were stately and handsome. In particular, there was a butler in a blue coat and bright buttons who gave quite a winey flavour to the table beer—he poured it out so superbly

Nobody spole, unless spoken to, except Doctor Blumber, Mrs Blimber, and Miss Blimber, who conversed occasionally. Whenever a young gentleman was not actually engaged with his knife and fork or spoon, his eye, with an irresistible attraction, sought the eye of Doctor Blumber, Mrs Blimber, or Miss Blimber, and modestly rested there. Toots appeared to be the only exception to this rule. He sat next Mr I ceder on Paul's side of the table, and frequently looked belind and before the intervening boys to catch a glimpse of Paul

Only once during diffure was there any conversation that included the young gentlemen. It happened at the epoch of the cheese, when the Doctor, having taken a glass of port wine, and hemmed twice or three, said—

'It is remarkable, Mr Feeder, that the Romans'---

At the mention of this terrible people their implicable enemies, every young gentleman fastened his give upon the Doctor, with an assumption of the deepest interest. One of the number who happened to be drinking and who cought the Doctor's every glaring at him through the side of his tumbler, left off so hastily that he was consulsed for some moments, and in the equal ruined Doctor Blumber's point

'It is remarkable, Mr I ceder,' said the Doctor begin ning again slowly, 'that the Romans in those gorgeous and profuse entertainments of which we read in the days of the emperors, when higher had attained a height un I nown before or since, and when whole provinces were ravaged to supply the splendid means of one imperial banquet'——

Here the offender, who had been swelling and straining, and waiting in vain for a full stop, broke out violently

'Johnson,' said Mr Feeder, in a low reproachful voice 'take some water'

The Doctor, looking very stern, made a paise until the water was brought, and then resumed—

'And when, Mr I ceder'---

But Mr I ceder, who saw that Johnson must break out again, and who knew that the Doctor would never come to a period before the young gentlemen until he had finished all he meant to say, couldn't keep his eve off Johnson, and thus was enuglit in the fact of not looking at the Doctor, who consequently stopped

'I beg your pardon, sir,' said Mr I ceder, reddening

'I beg your pardon, Doctor Blunber'

'And when,' said the Doctor, raising his voice, 'when, sir, as we read, and have no reason to doubt—incredible as it may appear to the vulgar of our time—the brother of Vitellius prepared for him a feast, in which were served, of fish, two thousand disher.'—

- ' lake some water, Johnson-dishes, sir,' said Mr
  - 'Of various sorts of fowl, five thousand dishes'-
  - 'Or try a crust of bread,' said Mr I eeder
- 'And one dish,' pursued Doctor Blimber, raising his voice still higher as he looked all round the table, 'called, from its enormous dimensions, the Shield of Minerva, and made, among other costly ingredients, of the brains of pheasants'——

- "On, on, on I" (from Johnson)
- 'Moodcoils ---
- 'Ow, on, or 1'
- 'The sounds of the fish called scan'-
- 'You'll burt some vessel in your head,' said Mr Feeder 'You had better let it come.'
- And the spawn of the lamprey, brought from the Carpathian Sea,' pursued the Doctor, in his severest voice, 'when we read of costly entertainments such a these, and still remember that we have a Taus'—
- "What vould be your mother's feelings if you died of apoplexy r" said Mr I ender
  - 'A Dountian'-
  - 'And you re blue, you know,' and Mr Feeder
- "A Nero, a Tiberius a Cali, alt, a Helogabalas, and many more" pair used the Doctor, "it is, Mr Feeder-if you are do no me the honour to attend-remarkable, VERY remarkable vir

But Johnson, unable to impriest it any long r, burs at that more entrate such an overwhelming fit of coughing, that although both his immediate neighbour thinned him on the back, and Mr. Leeder himself helding but of water to his hip, and the bathy walkel him up and down several times between his own chair and the side board, like a sentry, it was full five minuter before he was mode ately composed and then there was a profound silence.

Gentlemen, said Doctor Blunker, tree to grant Cornelia, lift Dombes down monthing of whom said Inscribe a combingly seen above the table cloth. John son will repeat to me to increase morning before beak fast, without book, and from the Greek Te tunen, we first chapter of the I picke of Saint Paul to the Fpirsians. We will resume our sinkes Mr Feeder, in half an hour?

Jack Bunsby's Marriage

Here peaceful scene, and particularly the region of I intel ouse. Hole and thereabouts a ere so influential in calming the captain, that he will ed on with restored tranqualitis, and was, it fact reguling himself, under his breath, with the ballad of I ouch Peg, when on turning a corner, he was suddenly transfixed and real-red speechless by a triumphant procession that he beheld advancing towards him

This awful demonstration was headed by that deter mined woman, Mrs MacStinger, who preserving a countenance of inexorable resolution, and weiring con spiciously attached to her obdurate bosom a stupe-dous witch and appendages, which the captum recognised at a glance as the property of Bansby, conducted under her arm no other than that sagacious mariner, he, with the distraught and melancholy visage of a captive home into n foreign land, meekly resigning himself to her Belind them appeared the young MacStingers in a body, exulting Behind them, two ladies of a terrible and steadfast aspect, leading between them a short gentle man in a tall list, who likewise exulted. In the wake appeared Burshy's boy, bearing umbrellas. The whole were in good marching order, and a dreadful smartness that pervaded the party would have sufficiently announced, if the Intrepid countenances of the ladies had been want ing, that it was a procession of sacrifice, and that the victim was Bunsby

The first impulse of the captain was to run away. This also appeared to be the first impulse of Bunshy, hopeless as its execution must have proved. But a cry of recog nition proceeding from the party, and Alexander Mac Stinger running up to the captain with open arms, the captain struck

'Well, Cap'en Cuttle I' said Mrs MaeStinger, 'this is indeed a meeting! I bear no malice now Cuttle, you needn't fear that I'm a going to cast any reflections. I hope to go to the altar in another spirit Here Mrs MacStinger paused, and drawing herself up, and inflating her bosom with a long breath, said, in allusion to the victim, 'My 'usband, Cap'en Cuttle 1'

The abject Bunshy looked neither to the right nor to the left, nor at his bride, nor at his friend, but strught before him at nothing. The captain putting out his hand, Bunsby put out his, but, in answer to the cap tain's greeting, spake no word

'Cap'en Cuttle,' said Mrs MacStinger, 'if you would wish to heal up past animosities, and to see the last of your friend, my 'usband, as a single person, we should be 'appy of your company to chapel. Here is a lady here,' said Mrs MacStinger, turning round to the more intropid of the two, 'my bridesmud, that will be glad of your protection, Cap'en Cuttle.'

The short gentleman in the tall hat, who it appeared was the husband of the other lady, and who evidently exulted at the reduction of a fellow creature to his own condition, gave place at this, and resigned the lady to Captain Cuttle. The lady immediately seized him, and, observing that there was no time to lose, give the word, in a strong voice, to advance

The captain's concern for his friend, not unmingled at first with some concern for himself-for a shadowy terror that he might be married by violence possessed him, until his knowledge of the service came to his relief, and remembering the legal obligation of saying, 'I will,' he felt himself personally safe so long as he resolved, if asked any question, distinctly to reply 'I won't '-threw him into a profuse perspiration, and rendered him for a time insensible to the movements of the procession, of which he now formed a feature, and to the conversation of his fair companion But as he became less agitated, he learned from this lady that she was the widow of a Mr Bokum, who had held an employment in the Custom House, that she was the dearest friend of Mrs MacStinger, whom she considered a pattern for her sex that she had often heard of the captain, and now hoped he had repented of his past life, that she trusted Mr Bunsby knew what a blessing he had gained, but that she feared men seldom did know what such blessings were until they had lost them, with more to the same purpose,

All this time the captain could not but observe that Mrs Bokum kept her eyes steadily on the bridegroom, and that whenever they came near a court or other narrow turning which appeared favourable for flight, she was on the alert to cut lum off if he attempted escape The other lady, too, as well as her husband, the short gentleman with the tall bat, was plainly on guard, according to a preconcerted plan, and the wretched man was so secured by Mrs MacStinger, that any effort at self preservation by flight was rendered futile. This, indeed, was apparent to the mere populace, who ex pressed their perception of the fact by jeers and cries, to all of which the dread MacStinger was inflexibly in different, while Bunsby himself appeared in a state of unconsciousness.

The captain made many attempts to accost the philo sopher, if only in a monosyllable or a signal, but always fuled, in consequence of the vigilance of the guard, and the difficulty, at all times peculiar to Bunsby's constitu tion, of liaving his attention aroused by nny outward and visible sign whatever. Thus they approached the chapel, a neat whitewashed edifice, recently engaged by the Reverend Melchisedech Howler, who had consented, on very urgent solicitation, to give the world another two years of existence, but had informed his followers that then it must positively go

While the Reverend Melchisedech was offering up some extemporary orisons, the captain found an opportunity of growling in the bridegroom's car-

'What cheer, my lad, what cheer?'

To which Bursby replied, with a forgetfulness of the Reverend Mclelusedech, which nothing but his desperate circumstances could have excused-

'D--d bad'

'Jack Bunsby,' whispered the captain, 'do you do this here o' your own free will?'

Mr Bunsby answered, 'No.'

'Why do you do it, then, my lad?' inquired the captain, not unnaturally

Bunsh, still looking, and always looking with an immovable countenance, at the opposite side of the world, made no reply

'Why not sheer off?' said the captain

'Eh?' wluspered Bunsby, with a momentary gleam of 'Sheer off,' said the captain

'Where's the good?' retorted the forlorn sage 'She'd capter me agen '

'Cheer up 1 'Try!' replied the captain now's your time Sheer off, Jack Bunsby!'

Jack Bunsby, however, instead of profiting by the advice, said in a doleful whisper-

'It all began in that there cliest o' yourn ever conwoy her into port that night?'

'My lad,' faltered the captnin, 'I thought as you had come over her, not as she had come over you has got such opinions as you liave!'

Mr Bunsby merely uttered a suppressed groan

'Come!' said the captain, nudging him with his elbow, 'now's your time! Slicer off! I'll cover your retreat. The time's a flying Bunsby! it's for liberty Will you once?'

Bunsby was immovable

'Bunsby 1' whispered the captain, 'will you twice?' Bunsby wouldn't twice

'Bunshy '' nrged the captain, 'it's for liberty, will you three times? Now or never 1'

Bunshy didn't then, and didn't ever, for Mrs Mac Stinger immediately afterwards married him

David Copperfield hears of his Mother's Death

'David Copperfield,' said Mrs Creakle, leading me to a soft, and sitting down beside me, 'I want to speak to you very particularly I have something to tell you, my

Mr Creakle, at whom of course I looked, shook his head without looking at me, and stopped up a sigh with a very large piece of buttered toast

'You are too young to know how the world changes every day,' said Mrs Creakle, 'and how the people in it pass away But we all have to learn it, David, some of its when we are young, some of its when we are old, some of us at all times of our lives?

I looked at her earnestly

'When you came away from home at the end of the vacation,' said Mrs Creal le, after a paure, 'were they all well?' After another pause, 'Was your manual well?'

I trembled without distinctly I not ing why, and still lool ed at her carnestly, and ing no attempt to answer

'Because,' said she, 'I gireve to tell you that I hear this morning your mamma is very all '

A mist rose between Mrs Creal le and me, and her figure seemed to move in it for an instant. Then I felt the burning tears run down my free, and it was steady norm.

'She is very dangerously ill 'she added

I knew all now

"She Is dead "

There was no need to tell me so. I had already broken out into a desolate ery, and felt an orphan in the wide world

She was very lind to me. She kept me there all day, and left me alone sometimes, and I cried, and wore myself to sleep, and awoke and cried again. When I could cry no more, I begin to think and then the oppression on my breast was heaviest, and my first a dull pain that there was no case for

And yet my thoughts were idle, not intent on the calimity that weighed upon my heart, but filly lottering near it I thought of our house but up and husbel I thought of the little baby, who, Mrs Creal le said, hall been pining away for some time, and who, they believed, would die too. I thought of inv father's grave in the churchyard, by our house, and of my mother lying there beneath the tree I knew so well. I stood upon a chair when I was left alone, and loof ed into the glass to see how red my eyes were, and how sorrowful my face considered, after some hours were gone if in tears were really hard to flow now, as they seemed to be, what, in connection with my los, it would affect me mot to think of when I drew near home-for I was going home to the funeral. I am sensible of having felt that a dignity attrehed to me among the rest of the boys, and that I was important in my affliction

If ever child was stricken with sincere grief, I warBut I remember that this importance was a kind of satis faction to me, when I walled in the playground that afternoon while the boys were in school. When I saw them glancing at me out of the windows as they went up to their classes, I felt distinguished, and lool ed more melancholy, and walked slower. When school was over, and they came out and spoke to me, I felt it rather good in myself not to be proud to any of them, and to take exactly the same notice of them all as before.

John Forster (1812-76), the eldest son of i cattle dealer it Newcastle, inseducated for the Bir, but early devoted himself to penodical His political articles in the London Examiner, for which he commenced virting in 1833, iteracted more attention than is usually be stoned on new paper leaders, awing to their ugour ind point, consistency, and ourspoten lionesty He edited successively the Loreign Quarterly Re n e, the Dails Acas, and from 18,7 to 18,6 the Laammer He was the author of many visorous and suggestive Inographical and Instorical essits, such as the two volumes of Earl area and Quartals articles reprinted in 1858, and the elaborate series dealing with the times and slates. men of the I malish Common calth—Tre History of the Grand Lemerstrine (1869), The Arrest of the I rie Memb is (1869); Sir John Eliot, a Diegrafis (1664), and Lives of the Statemer of the Common realth (1836-39). These latter gae evidence of industrious research, but Dr Gardirer has shown that they are inserted by frequent machiners. Torster's literar memoirs are III Life and Times of Ohren Goldsn ti (1848, and and tup o ed ed 18545 one of the nost popular b ographies in Luglish Incrature, Walter Saving Landor (2 vols 1868), Fre lafe of Cearl's Dictors (3 vols 1871-74) and the Irst volume of a Ithe of South 1875. The Life of Dulens was as inted is having exposed with too great frankness the falings of his hero, a more valid objection in that in the me had of treatment adopted the biographer is almost as prominent as his subject. Torster who became secretary to the Commissioners in I muses in 1855, and a Commissioner in Lunney in 1861, was an indefitigable student and a constant and devoted found, and, as was said by the Im safter his death, those who at first sight the ight him obstinate and everbearing were reach to confess that they had in reality found him to be one of the tenderest and most generous of men

Literature and Copyright.

'It were well,' and Goldsmith on one occasion, with lutter truth, "if none but the dunces of soriely were combined to render the profession of an author ridica lons or unhappy. The profession themselves have veto learn the secret of co-operation, they have to put away internal jealousies they have to claim for them selves, as poor Goldsmith, after his fishion very leadly did, that defined position from which greater respect, and more frequent consideration in public life, could not long be withheld in fine, they have frackly to feel that their vocation, properly regarded, ranks with the worthest and that, on all occasions, to do justice to it, and to each other is the way to obtain justice from the world - If writers had been thus true to them sches the subject of copyright might have been equi tably settled when attention was first diawn to it, but while De Poe was urging the author's claim, Swift was calling De Toe a fellow that had been pilloried, and we have still to discuss as in forma painters the rights of the Lughsh author

Confiscation is a hard word, but after the decision of the highest English court, it is the word which alone describes fairly the statute of Anne for encouragement of literature. That is now superseded by another statute, having the same gorgeous name, and the same inglorious meaning, for even this last enactment, sorely resisted as it was, leaves England behind any other country in the world, in the amount of their own property secured to her authors In some, to this day, perpetual copyright exists, and though it may be reasonable, as Dr Johnson argued that it was, to sur render a part for greater efficiency or protection to the rest, yet the commonest dictates of natural justice might at least require that an author's family should not be beggared of their inheritance as soon as his own capacity to provide for them may have ceased. In every Continental country this is cared for, the lowest term secured by the most niggardly arrangement being twenty five years, whereas in England it is the munificent number of seven Yet the most laborious works, and often the most delightful, are for the most part of a kind which the hereafter only can repay The poet, the historian, the scientific investigator, do indeed find readers to day, but if they bave laboured with success, they have produced books whose substantial reward is not the large and temporary but the limited and constant nature of their sale. No consideration of moral right exists, no principle of economical science can be stated, which would justify the seizure of such books by the public before they had the chance of remunerating the genius and the labour of their producers

But though Parliament can easily commit this wrong, it is not in such case the quarter to look to for redress There is no hope of a better state of things till the author shall enlist upon his side the power of which Parliament is but the inferior expression remedy for literary wrongs must flow from a higher sense than has at any period yet prevailed in England of the duties and responsibilities assumed by the public writer, and of the social consideration and respect that their effectual discharge should have undisputed right to claim. The world will be greatly the gainer when such time shall arrive, and when the biography of the man of genius shall no longer be a picture of the most harsh struggles and mean necessities to which man's life is subject, exhibited as in shameful contrast to the calm and classic glory of his fame. With society itself rests the advent of that time

(From Forster's Goldsmith, Chap. XXII)

Samuel Smiles, born at Haddington in 1813, studied medicine at Edinburgh, and having practised for a while in his native town and in Leeds, became editor of a Leeds paper, but from 1845 till 1866 was a railway secretary. He wrote a Life of George Stephenson (1857), but it was the success of his book on Self-Help (1859), erelong translated into nearly a score of languages, which led him to become a professional author and compiler. Books on character, thrift, duty, and life and labour followed, and in 1861 his well known Lives of the Engineers (2 vols). There were further several collections of lives of men notable in the history of invention and industry, books on Boulton and Watt, on Nasmyth, Wedgwood, on John Murray the publisher, on the humble naturalists Thomas Edward and Robert Dick, as well as on Jasmin the Provençal poet and on the Huguenots in England and in France He died 16th April 1904

William Edmonstoune Aytoun (1813-65) was born in Edinburgh, from the Academy proceeded to the university, and in 1833-34 studied German at Aschaffenburg In 1835 he became, like his Whig father, a Writer to the Signet, and in 1840 was called to the Scottish Bar. To his mother he owed his love of ballad-lore and Jaco bitism, and, taking early to literary work, he entered in 1836 on his lifelong connection with Blackwood A prize poem, Judith, had commended him to Professor Wilson (Christopher North), afterwards his father-in law In 1845 he was appointed to the chair of Rhetoric and Belles-Lettres in the univer sity, and in 1852 was made Sheriff of Orkney and Shetland, his duties as supreme judicial authority for the islands not involving his absence from the courts in Edinburgh His Lais of the Scottish Cavaliers (1849), some on Macaulayan lines, some on other well known models, made him famous, and the mingled martial verve, tender regrets, and whole hearted Jacobite fervour of the lays (though not free from melodramatic elements) have secured them a permanent vitality—there have been wellnigh half a hundred editions and reprints, some of them elaborately illustrated The first of the lays, 'The Burial March of Dundee,' was printed in Blackwood in 1843 Bothwell (1856) was a poem dealing with the tragedy of Mary Queen of Scots Much of his best worl appeared first in Blackzvood, and many of his contributions, both in prose and verse, are witty and humorous, whether with or without a measure of satire and caricature-the story of the 'Glenmutchkin Railway' and 'How I became a Yeoman,' notable examples, being amongst the most popular and amusing of the Tales from Maga Tirmilian, a Spasmodic Tragedy (1854), professedly by 'T Percy Jones,' was a brilliant skit on (amongst others) George Gilfillan, 'Festus' Bailey, Sydney Dobell, and Alexander Smith, thereafter known as 'the spas modic school,' it appeared first in Blackwood as a bogus criticism with extracts, then as a complete poem But the thing, 'typifying intellect without principle,' and in some things curiously anticipating Nietzsche, contained so much power, imagination, and poetry that it was for a while accepted by many as a mere original Norman Sinclair (1861), a semi-autobiographical (and rather diffuse) novel, was one of the things that first saw the light in the magazine. Along with his friend Theodore Martin, whom he had met in college about 1832, Aytoun had produced the frmous Book of Ballads, edited by Bon Gaultier -a series of burlesque poems and parodies contributed to Fait's and Fraser's Magazines in 1842-44, and collected in 1855, and to the same poetical partnership we owe a happy translation of the ballads of Goethe (1858) The Bon Gaultier Ballads—whimsical but not unkindly-meant parodies and imitations of many poets and many styles—well nigh rivalled the Rejected Idarisses or the Ingeldsty Legends in popularity, and though some of them are rather futile, they are still constantly reissued, and have themselves become models for the imitator. Aytoun wrote poems on subjects as various as 'Chone,' 'Blind old Milton,' and 'Hermotimus,' translated from Romaic as well as from German and the classics, and edited a collection of Scottish ballads. There is a Life by Sir Theodore Martin (1867), and see Miss Masson's Pollok and Aytoun (1899)

WILLIAM LDMONSTOUNE ANDOUN
After the Bust by P Park

From 'The Burial March of Dundee'

On the heights of Killiecrankie Yester morn our army lay Slowly rose the mist in columns I rom the river's broken way. Hoar-cly roared the swollen torrent, And the Pass was wrapped in gloom, When the clansmen rose together From their lair amidst the broom Then we belted on our tartans, And our bonnets down we drew, As we felt our broadswords' edges, And we proved them to be true, And a c prayed the prayer of soldiers. And we cried the gathering cry, and we clasped the hands of kinsmen, And we snore to do or die ! Then our leader rode before us, On his war horse black as night-Well the Cameronian rebels Knew that charger in the fight '-

And a cry of exultation From the bearded warmors rose. For we loved the house of Claver'se, And we thought of good Montrose. But he raised his hand for silence-'Soldiers ! I have sworn a yow, Ere the evening star shall glisten On Schehallion's lofty brow, Either we shall rest in triumph, Or another of the Gremes Shall have died in battle harness For his country and King James! Think upon the royal martyr-Think of what his race endure-Think on him whom butchers murdered On the field of Magus Muir By his sacred blood I charge ve, By the ruined hearth and shrine-By the blighted hopes of Scotland, By your injuries and mine-Strike this day as if the anvil Lay beneath your blows the while, Be they covenanting traitors, Or the brood of false Argyle 1 Strike i and drive the trembling rebels Backwards o'er the stormy Forth, Let them tell their pale Convention How they fared within the North Let them tell that Highland honour Is not to be bought nor sold, That we scorn their prince's anger As we loathe his foreign gold Strike! and when the fight is over, If you look in vain for me, Where the dead are lying thickest Search for him that was Dundee 1' Loudly then the hills re echoed With our answer to lus call, But a deeper echo sounded In the bosoms of us all For the lands of wide Breadalbane, Not a man who heard him speak Would that day have left the battle. Burning eye and flushing cheek Told the clansmen's fierce emotion, And they harder drew their breath, For their souls were strong within them, Stronger than the grasp of Death Soon we heard a challenge trumpet Sounding in the Pass below, And the distant tramp of horses, And the voices of the foe Down we crouched amid the bracken, Till the Lowland ranks drew near, Panting like the hounds in summer, When they seent the stately deer From the dark defile emerging, Next we saw the squadrons come, Leslie's foot and Leven's troopers Marching to the tuck of drum, Through the scattered wood of birches, O'er the broken ground and heath, Wound the long battalion slowly, Till they gained the field beneath, Then we bounded from our covert Judge how looked the Saxons then,

When they saw the rugged mountain Start to life with armed men 1 Like the tempest down the ridges Swept the hurricane of steel, Rose the slogan of Macdonald-Flashed the broadsword of Lochiel I Vainly sped the withering volley Amongst the foremost of our band-On we poured until we met them Foot to foot, and hand to hand Horse and man went down like drift wood When the floods are black at Yule, And their carcasses are whirling In the Garry's deepest pool Horse and man went down before us-Living foe there tarried none On the field of Killiecrankie, When that stubborn fight was done!

And the evening star was shining On Schehallion's distant head When we wiped our bloody broadswords, And returned to count the dead There we found him gashed and gory, Stretched upon the cumbered plain, As he told us where to seek him, In the thickest of the slain And a smile was on his visage, For within his dying ear Perled the joyful note of triumph, And the elnnsmen's elamorous elicer So, amidst the battle's thunder, Shot, and steel, and scorehing flame, In the glory of his manhood Passed the spirit of the Grame !

Open wide the vaults of Athol,
Where the bones of heroes rest—
Open wide the hallowed portals
To receive another guest!
Last of Scots, and last of freemen—
Last of all that daintless race
Who would rather die unsullied
Than outlive the land's disgrace!
Sleep!—and till the latest trumpet
Wakes the dead from earth and sea,
Scotland shall not boast a braver Chicftain than oar own Dundee!

Sonnet to Britain, by the D- of W-

Halt I Shoulder arms! Recover! As you were! Right wheel! Lyes left! Attention! Stand at ease! O Britain! O my country! words like these Have made thy name a terror and a fear To all the nations. Witness Ebro's banks. Assaye, Toulouse, Nivelle, and Waterloo, Where the grim despot muttered Sainte qui peut ! And Ney fled darkling-silence in the ranks. Inspired by these, amidst the iron crash Of armies, in the centre of his troop The soldier stands-unmovable, not rash-Until the forces of the foeman droop, Then knocks the Frenchmen to eternal smash, Pounding them into mummy Shoulder, hoop ! (From Bon Gaultier)

From 'Firmilian'

Three hours of study—and what gain thereby? My brain is recling to attach the sense Of what I read, as a drunk mariner Who, stumbling o'er the bulwark, makes a clutch At the wild incongruity of ropes, And topples into mud l

Good Aristotle! I orgive me if I by thee henceforth by, And seek some other teacher. Thou hast been, For many hundred years, the bane and eurse Of all the budding intellect of man Thine earliest pupil, Alexander-he The most impulsive and tumultuous sprite That ever spurned old systems at the licel, And dashed the dust of action in the cyes Of the slow porers over antique shards-Held thee, at twenty, an especial fool And why? The grand God impulse in his heart That drove him over the oblique domain Of Asın and her kingdoms, and that urged His meteor leap at Porus' giant throat-Or the sublime illusion of the sense Which give to Thais that tremendous torch Whence whole Persepolis was set on fire-Was never I indled surely by such trash As I, this night, have heaped upon my brun! [I lings areas the book Hence, vile impostor l Who shall take his place?

What houry dotard of antiquity Shall I invite to dip his clumsy foot Within the limpid fountain of my mind, And stnmp it into foulness? Let me see-Following Salerno's doctrine, human lore Divides itself into three ficulties, The Eden rivers of the intellect There's I aw, Theology, and Medicine, And all beyond their course is barren ground So say the Academics, and they're right, If learning's to be measured by its gains. The Lawyer speaks no word without a fee -The Priest demands his titlies, and will not sing A gratis mass to help his brother's soul The purgatorial key is made of gold None else will fit the wards, -and for the Doctor, The good kind man who lingers by your couch, Compounds you pills and potions, feels your pulse, And takes especial notice of your tongue, If you allow him once to leave the room Without the proper greasing of his palm, Look out for Azrnel 1

So, then, these three Mnintain the sole possession of the schools, Whilst, out of doors, amidst the sleet and run, Thin garbed Philosophy sits shivering down, And shares a mouldy crust with Poetry!

And shall I then take Celsus for my guide, Confound my brain with dull Justinian's tomes, Or stir the dust that lies o'er Augustine? Not I, in faith! I've leaped into the air, And clove my way through rether, like a bird That flits beneath the glimpses of the moon, Right eastward, till I lighted at the foot Of holy Helicon, and drank my fill At the clear spout of Agamppe's stream

I've rolled my limbs in ecstasy along The self same turf on which old Homer lay That night he dreamed of Helen and of Troy And I have heard, at midnight, the sweet strains Come quiring from the hill top, where, enshrined In the rich foldings of a silver cloud, The Muses sang Apollo into sleep Then came the voice of universal Pan, The dread earth whisper, booming in mine ear-'Rise up, Firmilian-rise in might!' it stid, 'Great youth, baptised to song! Be it thy task, Out of the jarring discords of the world, To recreate stupendous harmonies More grand in diaptson than the roll Among the mountains of the thunder psalm! Be thou no slave of passion Lct not love, Pity, remorse, nor any other thrill That sways the actions of ungifted men, Live for thyself alone Affect thy course Let appetite thy ready handmaid be, And pluck all fruitage from the tree of life, Be it forbidden or no If any comes Between thee and the purpose of thy bent, Launch thou the arrow from the string of might Right to the bosom of the impious wretch, And let it quiver there! Be great in guilt l If, like Busiris, thou canst rack the heart, Spare it no pang So shalt thou be prepared To make thy song a tempest, and to shake The earth to its foundation—Go thy way ! I woke, and found myself in Badajoz. But from that day, with frantic might, I've striven To give due utterance to the awful shrieks Of him who first imbued his hand in gore-To paint the mental spasms that tortured Cain 1

Sir Theodore Martin, KCB, born in Edinburgh in 1816, was educated at the High School and university, and in 1846 settling in London, became a prosperous parliamentary solicitor Besides his poetical labours in collaboration with Aytoun (see page 475), he translated Horace, Catullus, Virgil, and Goethe's Faust, the Vita Nuova of Dante, the Correggio and Aladdin of the Danish poet Ehlenschlager, King Rene's Daughter, a Danish lyrical drama by Henrik Hertz, and Poems and Ballads by Heine. He was selected by Queen Victoria to write the Life of the Prince Consort (5 vols 1874-80), on its completion being made a KCB He wrote Lives also of Professor Aytoun (1867), of Lord Lyndhurst (1883), of the Princess Alice (1885), and of his own wife (1901), whom he married in 1851—Helen Frucit (1820-1898), the accomplished actress, and author of the delightful studies On Some of Shakespeare's Female Characters (1885)

Sir Arthur Helps (1813-75), born at Streatham in Surrey, passed from Eton to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he was a member of the famous Apostles' Club, along with Maurice, Trench, Monckton Milnes, and Tennyson He was private secretary first to Spring-Rice, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, next to Lord Morpeth, the Irish Secretary, and on the fall of the Melbourne Ministry he retired to enjoy twenty years of lettered leisure. Appointed Clerk to the Privy-Council (1860), he became well known to Queen Victoria, who formed a high opinion of his character and talents Thus he was employed to edit the Principal Speeches and Addresses of the late Prince Consort (1862), and the Queen's own Leaves from a Journal of Our Life in the Highlands (1868) His first work was a series of aphorisms, Thoughts in the Cloister and the Crowd, published as early as 1835, his next, Essays written in the Intervals of Business (1841) Two poor plays followed, then The Claims of Labour (1844) Friends in Council (two senes, 1847-59) was a collection of wonderfully attractive discussions on social questions, thrown into a conversational form The same familiar speakers (Milverton, Ellesmere, and Dunsford) reappeared in Realmah (1869), Couversations on War and General Culture (1871), and Tall about Animals and their Masters (1873) His strong interest in the question of slavery prompted his Conquerois of the New World (1848-52), and the greater work, The Spanish Conquest in America (4 vols 1855-61). Out of his studies for this history grew his admir able biographies of Las Casas, Columbus, Pizarro, and Cortes Other books were a Life of Thomas Brassey, Companions of my Solitude, Casimir, Marenuna, Brivia, and treatises on government and social pressure. Helps, who was made successively DCL, CB, and KCB (1872), was a most suggestive essayist, revealing everywhere acute ness, humour, a satire which gives no pain, and a keen sense of man's social responsibilities, his But though style is unusually clear and graceful many of his works—especially Friends in Council and Realmah-were eminently popular, his message was mainly to his contemporaries

Discovery of the Pacific by Balboa

Early in September 1513 Vasco Nuñez de Balboa set out on his renowned expedition for finding 'the other ear,' accompanied by a hundred and ninety men well armed, and by dogs, which were of more avail than men, and by Indian slaves to carry the burdens He went by sea to the territory of his father in law, King Careta, by whom he was well received, and accompanied by whose Indians This cacique took he moved on into Poncha's territory flight, as he had done before, seeking refinge amongst his mountains, but Vasco Nuñez, whose first thought in his present undertaking was discovery and not conquest, sent messengers to Poncha, promising not to hurt him Indian chief listened to these overtures, and came to Vasco Nuñez with gold in his hands. It was the policy of the Spanish commander on this occasion to keep his word we have seen how treacherous he could be when it was not his policy, but he now did no harm to Poncha, and, on the contrury, he secured his friendship by pre senting him with looking glasses, hatchets, and hawk bells, in return for which he obtained guides and porters from among this cacique's people, which enabled him to prosecute his journey Following Poncha's guides, Vasco Nuñez and his men commenced the ascent of the moun tains, until he entered the country of an Indian chief called

Quarequa, whom they found fully prepared to resist them The brave Indian advanced at the head of his troops. meaning to make a vigorous attack, but they could not withstand the discharge of the firearms, indeed, they believed the Spaniards to have thunder and lightning in their hands-not an unreasonable fancy-and, flying in the utmost terror from the place of battle, a total rout ensued The rout was a bloody one, and is described by an author, who gained his information from those who were present at it, as a scene to remind one of the shambles. The king and his principal men were slain. to the number of six hundred. In speaking of these people. Peter Martyr makes mention of the sweetness of their language, and how all the words might be written in Latin letters, as was also to be remarked in that of the inhabitants of Hispaniola. This writer also mentionsand there is reason for thinking that he was rightly in formed—that there was a region not two days' journey from Ouarcqua's territory, in which Vasco Nuñez found a race of black men, who were conjectured to have come from Africa, and to have been shipwreeked on this coast Leaving several of his men, who were ill, or over weary, in Quarequa's chief town, and taking with him guides from this country, the Spanish commander pursued his way up the most lofty sierras there, until, on the 25th of September 1513, he came near to the top of a mountain from whence the South Sea was visible. The distance from Poncha's chief town to this point was forty leagues, reckoned then six days' journey, but Vasco Nuñez and his men took twenty five days to do it in, suffering much from the roughness of the ways and from the want of provisions A little before Vasco Nuñez reached the licight. Quarequa's Indians informed him of his near approach to it. It was a sight which any man would wish to be alone to see. Vasco Nuñez bade his men sit down while he alone ascended and looked down upon the vast Pacifie, the first man of the Old World, so far as we know, who had done so Talling on his knees, he give thinks to God for the favour shown to him in his being the first man to discover and behold this sea, then with his hand he beckoned to his men to come up When they had come, both he and they knelt down and poured forth their thanks to God. He then addressed them in these words 'You see here, gentlemen and children mine, how our desires are being necomplished, and the end of our labours. Of that we ought to be cer tain, for as it has turned out true what King Comogre's son told of this set to us, who never thought to see it, so I hold for certain that what he told us of there being in comparable treasures in it will be fulfilled. God and his blessed mother who have assisted us, so that we should arrive here and behold this sea, will favour us that we may enjoy all that there is in it' Ivery great and original action has a prospective greatness, not alone from the thoughts of the man who relieves it, but from the various aspects and high thoughts which the same action will continue to present and call up in the minds of others to the end, it may be, of all time. And so a re markable event may go on acquiring more and more sig nificance. In this case, our knowledge that the Pacific, which Visco Nuñex then beheld, occupies more than one half of the carth's surface, is an element of thought which in our ninds lightens up and gives an ane to this first gaze of his upon those mighty waters To lum the scene might not at that moment have suggested much more than it would have done to a mere conqueror, indeed, Peter Martyr likens Vaseo Nuñez to Hammbal showing Italy to his soldiers

Sir William Smith (1813-03), who by his dictionaries of classical and Christian learning rendered great service to general culture in the nineteenth century, was the son of an Enfield houscholder He studied classics at University College, London, after being articled to a solicitor, and becoming a teacher, was soon editing classical manuals and writing for the Penny Cyclopadia His Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities. largely his own work, with contributions from scholars like J W Donaldson, Benjamin Jowett, Henry George Liddell, and George Long, appeared in 1842, and was ultimately much extended. Other dictionaries of which he was mainly editor were those of Greek and Roman biography and myth ology (1849), of ancient geography (1857), of the Bible (1860-65), of Christian antiquities (with Cheetham, 1875-80), and of Christian biography (1877-87) He also edited smaller dictionaries of classical subjects, a 'Principia' series of school books, students' manuals of various kinds, and an annotated Gibbon, he wrote a 'student's' history of Greece, and from 1867 till his death he edited the Quarterly Review LLD, DCL, and PhD of Leipzig, he was knighted in 1892

Mark Pattison (1813-84) was born at Hornby in the North Riding of Yorkshire, and brought up in the neighbouring parish of Hauxwell, of which his father had become rector. The eldest of twelve children (of whom ten were daughters), he was educated at home until he entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1832 A shy and awkward lad, diffident and hesitating, he suffered much in his first years as an undergraduate, but duly took his Bachelor's degree in 1836 with a second class in classics, was elected a Fellow of Lincoln College, and ordained deacon Under the dominant influence of Newman he give lumself first to the study of theology, wrote two Lives of the Saints, translated for the 'Library of the Fathers,' and almost followed his master into the fold of Rome. We have his own account of his spiritual growth out of the Puritanism of his home into Anglicanism, and see how the still wider horizon of the Catholic Church opened itself up before his eyes, only to disappear before 'the highest development, when all religious appear in their historical light as efforts of the human spirit to come to an understanding with that Unseen Power whose presence it feels, but whose motives are a riddle? The reaction from Newmanism reawakened his zeal for pure scholarship, he became a tutor of exceptional influence, and acting head of the college as sub rector, under Dr Radford Radford's death (1851) Pattison was kept out of the headship which was his right, and a further un successful attempt was made to deprive him of his fellowship on a technical plea. The result of his disappointment was that for ten years he took little real interest in the life of Oxford He published an article on education in the Oxford Essays, acted on a commission on education in Germany, and served for three months of 1858 as Times correspondent at Berlin Meanwhile he gave himself to severe and unbroken study, and scholars soon came to recognise his Roman hand in the columns of the Quarterly, the Westmuster, and His report on Germin the Saturday Review education appeared in 1859, his paper on 'Ten dencies of Religious Thought in England, 1688-1750,' was one of the famous Essays and Revueus (1860) At length in 1861 he was elected Rector of his college, but, though he made an exemplary head, the spring and elasticity of earlier days were gone In 1862 he married the accomplished Emilia Frances Strong, afterwards Lady Dilke, who helped him to make Lincoln a social and intellectual centre for a world much wider than the walls of Oxford Down to his last illness he lived wholly for study, maintaining the medieval rather than the modern ideal of the scholar's life. Everything he wrote was characteristic, nowhere else among contemporaries could be found such fullness of knowledge set in such terse and vigorous English Yet his standard of perfection was so high that his actual achievement is rather suggestive than representative of his powers, and the greatest project of his life—the study of Scaliger-remains a fragment printed in his collected Essays (1889) He actually published Suggestions on Academical Organisation (1868), admirably annotated editions of Pope's Essay on Man (1869) and Sattres and Epistles (1872), the monograph on Isaac Casaubon (1875), which grew out of his Scaliger studies, Milton, almost the best book in the 'English Men of Letters' series (1879), the Sounets of Milton (1883), and a collection of Sermous (1885) His volume of posthumous Memoirs (1885) was a strikingly frank judgment of himself and others, and a remarkable revelation of a singular moral and intellectual personality

George Gilfillan (1813-78), son of the Secession minister at Comrie, studied at Glasgow University, and from 1836 till his death was minister of a Secession (later United Presbyte rian) congregation in Dundee But it was by a series of papers on the literary men of the time that he became known These, ultimately pub lished as a Gallery of Literary Portraits (3 vols 1845-54), were originally contributed to a Dum fries newspaper edited by Gilfillan's friend Thomas Aird, and from the first were immensely popular and stimulating He had a high reputation as an eloquent preacher and genial liberal theologian, but henceforward wrote, edited, and compiled incessantly, being remarkable rather for the warmth and width of his literary sympathies than for his critical For Nichol, an Edinburgh publisher, he edited a comprehensive series of British poets, with memoirs, dissertations, and notes (48 vols 1853-He celebrated the Scottish Covenanters, the English Puritans, and the Secession preachers in volumes, wrote Lives of Burns, Scott, David Vedder, and others, published, besides sermons, lectures, and smaller theological works, Alpha and Ounga (1850), a volume of Bible studies, and Bards of the Bible (1851), which reached a seventh edition in 1887, and in his History of Man (1856) produced a curious melinge of autobiography and fiction (The Skilbes Library and Theological, published in 1881 after his death, were excerpts from an unfinished continuation of this work.) His only poem in verse—though much of his prose was dithy rambic, rhetorical, and full of audacious flights of fantasy—was Aight, a Poin (in nine books, 1867), which, spite of many years' polishing, turned out to be less poetic and popular than his prose.

David Livingstone (1813-73), greatest of missionary explorers, was born at Blantire in Lanarkshire, and from ten till twenty four years old worked in a cotton mill there. Resolving to become a missionary, he was trained for the service of the London Missionary Society, and sailing for Africa a fully equipped medical missionary in 1840, he laboured for years amongst the Bechuanas Repulsed by the Boers when he attempted to estab lish native missionaries in the Transvaal, he struck north and discovered Lake Ngami, and between 1852 and 1856 made his famous journey westiard across the continent to the Atlantic, amidst sick nesses, penls, and difficulties without number story of his adventures and of his discovery of the Victoria Falls of the Lambesi awakened ex traordining enthusiasm, and was recorded in his Missionary Travels (1857) He next took service under Government as chief of an expedition for exploring the Zambesi, and between 1858 and 1863, when he was recalled, studied the Zambesi, Shiré, and Rovuma rivers, discovered Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa, and became convinced that, spite of Portuguese officials and slave traders, Nyassa and its basin was the best field for inissionary and com His second book, The Zambesi mercial enterprise and its Tributaries (1865), was largely designed to His next expose the Portuguese slave-dealers. Journey, begun in 1866, was undertaken on behalf of the Royal Geographical Society, to settle vexed questions as to the sources of the Nile and the watershed of Central Africa. He discovered Lakes Moero and Bangweolo, saw the Lualaba, which he supposed to be the upper Nile, though not certain it was not (what it proved to be) the upper Congo, and, after severe illness, found Mr Stanley, or was found by him, at Ujiji on Tanganyika (in November 1871) Stanley had been sent by the New York Herald to look for and succour him, and the two examined Tanganyika and decided it was not part of the Nile basin But spite of ill health determined to solve the problem, he returned to Bangweolo, and in Ilala was found dead by his attendants (1st May 1873), who, faithful to the last, carried his body to the coast. By his strenuous and self denying labours and his singularly great and valuable geographical discoveries, he had worthily earned the resting place in Westminster Abbey to which he was borne nearly a vear after his death in Central Africa. His own Last Journals, published in 1874, bring the record of his great third journey down to within a few days of its tragic close.

The indomitable and powerful but simple and noble character of the man is reflected in his literary work, which is artless and straightforward, without any attempt at securing literary effect. His books are but an accident of his work. His most exciting adventures and his most brilliant discoveries are told in the main with the same unaffected simplicity as the most ordinary daily experiences, though episodes like his first great adventure with the lion and his first view of the Victoria Falls stand out from the background of prinfully plotted marchings and delays, daily recurring successes and failures, and frankly recorded hopes and aspirations.

Robert Mcoll (1814-37) was the son of a ruined farmer at Auchtergaven in Pertlishire After being an apprenticed grocer at Perth, he managed a circulating library at Dundee, and having steadily cultivated his mind by reading and writing, he became editor of the Leeds Times, a weekly paper representing extreme Liberal opinions He overworked lumiself in an election contest at twenty three died of consumption at Trinity near Edinburgh, and was buried in Leith. He wrote songs and occasional poems marked by simplicity, tenderness, and some humour. Some of the Scotch poems of this lad of twenty-three are still remembered by his countrymen, among the best known are 'We are Brethren a',' 'Thoughts of Heaven,' 'The Dew is on the Summers greenest Grass?

Charles Hackay (1814-89), author of 'Cheer, Boys! Cheer!' and a hundred other songs vastly popular in their day, was born, the son of a half pay naval lieutenant, at Perth His mother being dead, he spent his first eight years with a nurse in a lonely house on the Firth of Forth He was educated at the Caledonian Asylum in Hatton Garden, and later at Brussels acquired 1 knowledge of French, German, Italian, and While acting as private secretary to Spanisb an ironmister near Licge he began contributing French articles and English poems to Belgian newspapers In 1834, having returned to London, he published his first volume, Songs and Poems, and began his career as a journalist I rom the office of the Sun he passed to that of the Morning Chronicle, and in 1844 became editor of the Glasgow Argus Meanwhile he had written a History of London, a romance, Longbeard, Lord of London, and bools on The Thames and its Tributaries and on Popular Delusions, as well as two further volumes

It was while he was in Glasgow in 1846 of poetry that some of his songs were set to music by Henry Russell, and suddenly attained a world wide popularity, selling in editions of hundreds of thousands Glasgow University conferred on him the degree of LL.D in 1846, and in 1852 he became editor of the Illustrated London News In the previous year this paper had begun to issue musical supplements, each containing an original song by Mackay set to an old English air by Sir Henry Bishop These also proved immensely popular, and were afterwards collected and published as Songs by He was entertained to a banquet Charles Mackay at the Reform Club to celebrate his starting of the London Remeto in 1860, but neither this nor Robin Goodfellow, another periodical he took in hand, proved successful As Times correspondent during the American Civil War lie discovered and revealed the Fenian conspiracy in America During his later years many volumes, both of prose and poetry, Among others were a History came from his pen of the Mormons, a fantastic book on Gaelic etymology, and two interesting volumes of reminiscences By his first wife he had three sons (one of them Eric-1851-98-author of half a dozen volumes of verse) and a daughter, and Miss Maric Corelli was his adopted child

Cheer, Boys! Cheer!-The Departing Emigrants

Cheer, loys' cheer' no more of idle sorrow,

Courage, true licarts, shall bear us on our way!

Hope points before, and shows the bright to inorrow,

Let us forget the darl ness of to day

So farewell, Lingland! Much as we may love thee,

We'll dry the tears that we have shed before,

Why should we weep to sail in search of fortune?

So farewell, Lngland ! farewell evennore!

Cheer, boys! cheer! for England, mother England!
Cheer, boys! cheer! the willing strong right hand, Cheer, boys! cheer! there's work for honest labour—

Cheer, boys ' cheer '-in the new and happy land !

Cheer, boys I cheer! the steady breeze is blowing,
To float us freely o'er the ocean's breast,
The world shall follow in the track we re going,
The star of empire glitters in the West
Here we had toil, and little to reward it,
But there shall plenty smile upon our pain,
And ours shall be the mountain and the forest,
And boundless prairies ripe with golden grain

Cheer, boys! elieer! for Lingland, mother England!

Cheer, boys! elieer! united heart and hand!—

Cheer, boys! elieer! there's wealth for honest labour—

Cheer, boys ' cheer '-in the new and happy land l

Who shall be Fairest?

Who shall be furest?
Who shall be rarest?
Who shall be first in the songs that we sing?
She who is kindest
When Fortune is blindest,
Bearing through winter the blooms of the spring,

Charm of our gladness,
Friend of our saduess,
Angel of life when its pleasures take wing !
She shall be furest,
She shall be rarest,
She shall be first in the songs that we sing!

Who shall be nearest,
Noblest, and dearest,
Named but with honour and pride evermore?
He, the undaunted,
Whose banner is planted
On Glory's high ramparts and battlements hoar, Fearless of danger,
To false hood a stranger,
Looking not back while there's Duty before!
He shall be nearest,
He shall be dearest,
He shall be first in our hearts evermore

Frederick William Faber (1814-63) was born at Calverley in Yorkshire, passed from Shrewsbury School to Harrow, and thence to Balliol College, Oxford, where in 1834 he was elected a scholar of University College, in 1837 a Fellow Already he had come under the influence of Newman, and in 1845, after three years' tenure of the rectory of Elton in Huntingdonshire, he followed him into the Roman fold, and at Birmingham founded a community of converts, 'the Wilfridians,' he himself being Brother Wilfrid, from his Life of St Wilfrid (1844) With his companions he joined in 1848 the Oratory of St Philip Neri, of which a branch was then established in England by Newman, next year a branch under l'aber's care was established in London, and finally located at Brompton in 1854 Faber wrote many theological works, but his fame rests upon his hymns-'The Pilgrims of the Night,' 'The Lind beyond the Sea,' 'My God, how wonderful Thou art,' 'Souls of men, why will ye scatter?' are amongst those in use by Christians of all denominations, for though they were designed for the use of English Roman Catholic fellow believers, many of them have been heartily adopted as a fervent expression of their faith alike by English Churchmen and by evangelical Nonconformists A collection of a hundred ind fifty of them was published in 1862 Lives by J E Bowden (1869, new ed 1892) and his brother, F A. Faber (1869)

Sir John William Kaye (1814-70), son of a London solicitor, was educated at Eton and Addis combe, served in the Bengal Artillery for ten years, and was ultimately John Stuart Mill's successor as secretary of a department in the East India Company's office in London. He wrote a memorable series of works, begun by a novel in 1845, and in cluding the famous history of The War in Afghanistan (2 vols 1851) and The Sepoy War in India (3 vols 1857-58, completed by Malleson as The History of the Indian Mutuny, 6 vols 1890), besides histories of the East India Company and of Christianity in India, and Lives of Sir John Malcolm and other Indian soldiers and statesmen. His works showed not only conscientious research but much of the true historical spirit, and were written with a dignity suited to his subjects. His name was a household word in India, both amongst Anglo-Indians and natives. He was KCSI and FR.5

William Henry Giles Kingston (1814-80), though born in London, was the son of a merchant in Oporto, and there spent much of his youth. He had already published two stories and a book of Portuguese travel, when he found his life work in the immediate success of Peter the Whales (1851), the first of over a hundred and fifty similar books for boys, simple, vigorous, healthy in tone, and full of daring adventures and hair-breadth escapes Among the most popular were The Three Mid shipmen (1862), The Three Lieutenants (1874), The Three Commanders (1875), and The Three Admirals Kingston took in active interest in many philanthropic schemes, such as seamen's missions and assisted emigration. A Portuguese knight hood was conferred on him in 1842 for helping to bring about a commercial treaty with England

Samuel Phillips (1814-54), son of a Hebrew shopkecper in Regent Street, tried the stage, studied at London and Gottingen, and at Cam bridge was qualifying for orders in the Church of England when his father died. After a vain struggle with the family business, he took to writing for a livelihood, his best-known novel, Caleb Stukely (sent to Blackwood in 1842) just serving to save him and his wife from starvation. In 1845 he became a leader-writer to the Fines, a post he held all the rest of his life, he was also 'literary director' to the Crystal Palace from 1853.

Charles Reade was born at Ipsden House in Oxfordshire, on the 8th of June 1814. The youngest of eleven, he came on both sides of good lineage, his father a squire, from his mother, a clever woman of strong Evangelical convictions, he 'inherited his drumatic instinct.' After five years (largely flogging) at Iffley, and six under two other and milder private tutors, in 1831 he grined a demyship at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1835, having taken a third-class in honours, Next year was duly elected to a lay fellowship he entered at Lincoln's Inn, and in 1843 was called to the Bar, having meanwhile made the first of many tours abroad and at home, and developed a eraze for trading in violins 'I studied the great art of Fiction for fifteen years before I presumed to write a line of it,' is his own report, and it was not till 1850 that he put pen seriously to paper, 'writing first for the stage-about thirteen dramas, which nobody would play ' Through one of these dramas, however, he formed his platonic friendship with Mrs Seymour, a warm hearted actress, who from 1854 till her death in 1879 kept house for him She animated, counselled, guided him, and, apart from his quarrels and lawsuits-which were many —his life after 1852 is little except a record of the production of plays and novels, by the former of which he generally lost money, though by the latter he won profit and fame. The plays include Masks and Faces (1852), written in conjunction with Tom Taylor, and having Peg Woffington for its leading character, Gold (1853), the germ, and Sera Nunquam (1865), the dramatised form, of Never too Late, and Drink (1879), an adaptation of Zola's Of his eighteen novels may be L'Assommoir mentioned Peg Woffington (1853), Christie Johnstone (1853), with a Newhaven fisher-lass for its central figure, It is Never too Late to Mend (1856), a tale of prison abuses and life in Australia, The Closster and the Hearth (1861), its hero the fither of the great Erasmus, Hard Cash (1863), levelled against private lunatic asylums, Griffith Gaunt, or Jealousy (1866), Fonl Play (1869), in conjunction with Dion Boucicault, against ship knackers, Put I ourself in his Place (1870), against trades unions, A Terrible Temptation (1871), and A Womanhater (1877), on behalf of woman's rights. His last years clouded by sorrow and ill-health, he died at Shepherd's Bush on Good Friday, 11th April 1884, and was buried in Willesden churchyard beside his 'beloved friend'

Charles Reade has not been usually accounted one of the greatest novelists of the nineteenth century. though Sir Walter Besant unhesitatingly ranked him with Scott, Dickens, and Thackeray, but few would hesitate to place him foremost, or amongst the very foremost, of the second order He 1s sometimes coarse, theatrical sometimes rather than dramatic, and sometimes even dull, weighed down with his authorities-the blue books, the books of travel, the all too copious scrap-books and note books with which he fettered his imagination. With the greatest novelists the reader is conscious only of the story, with him one is always conscious of the story-teller, some tone or mannerism from time to time jars upon us what a story-teller he is-how he carries us with him, stirs us, saddens, gladdens, terrifies, delights! By critics, however, he has been very variously judged Thus humour and pathos have been denied him by some, and by others recognised as peculiarly his gifts, it has been affirmed that 'Reade invented the True Woman,' and contrariwise declared that 'of the woman who is essentially of our time he has never had even the faintest conception,' one enthusiastic admirer has discovered 'in the short Wandering Heir at least half-a-dozen situations all new and all strong,' and to a not unfriendly censor it appeared 'very decidedly the worst of Reade's shorter stories' These things need not perplex the admirers of Griffith Gaunt, of the fight with the pirates, of the bursting of the reservoir, and of the scenes at the gold-But it may be broadly asserted that critics pass a unanimously favourable verdict on The Closster and the Hearth, which Mr Swin burne-from whom praise is praise indeed-places 'among the very greatest masterpieces of narrative,' extolling its stirring adventure and inexhaustible incident not more than 'its tender truthfulness of sympathy, its ardour and depth of feeling, the constant sweetness of its humour, the frequent passion of its pathos' And Mr Swinburne does not understand how any competent judge of letters could possibly hesitate to affirm of Reade that 'he was at his very best, and that not very rarely, a truly great writer of a truly noble genius'

The Fight with the Bear

Gerard did not answer, for his car was attracted by a sound behind them. It was a peculiar sound, too, like something heavy, but not hard, rushing softly over the dead leaves. He turned round with some little curiosity A colossal creature was coming down the road at about sixty paces distant

He looked at it in a sort of calm stupor at first, but the next moment he turned ashy pale

'Denys!' he cried 'Oh, God! Denys!'

Denys whirled round

It was a bear as big as a cart horse.

It was tearing along with its huge head down, running on a hot scent

The very moment he saw it Denys said in a sickening whisper—

'THE CUB!'

Oh! the concentrated horror of that one word, whis pered hoarsely, with dilating eyes! For in that syllable it all flashed upon them both like a sudden stroke of lightning in the dark—the bloody trul, the murdered cub, the mother upon them, and it DEATH

All this in a moment of time. The next, she saw them. Huge as she was, she seemed to double herself (it was her long hair bristling with rage) she ruised her head big as a bull's, her swine shaped jaws opened wide at them, her eyes turned to blood and flame, and she rushed upon them, scattering the leaves about her lile a whirlwind as she came

'Shoot'' screamed Denys, but Gerard stood shaling from head to foot, useless

'Shoot, man' ten thousand devils, shoot! Too late! Tree! tree!' and he dropped the cub, pushed Gerard across the road, and flew to the first tree and climbed it, Gerard the same on his side, and as they fled, both men uttered inhuman howls like savage creatures grazed by death

With all their speed one or other would have been torn to fragments at the foot of his tree, but the bear stopped a moment at the cub

Without taking her bloodshot eyes off those she was hunting, she smelt it all round, and found, how, her Creator only knows, that it was dead, quite dead. She gave a yell such as neither of the hunted ones had ever heard, nor dreamed to be in nature, and flew after Denys. She reared and struck at him as he climbed. He was just out of reach.

Instantly she seized the tree, and with her huge teeth tore a great piece out of it with a crash. Then she reared again, dug her claws deep into the bark, and began to mount it slowly, but as surely as a monkey

Denys's evil star had led him to a dead tree, a mere shaft, and of no very great height. He climbed faster than his pursuer, and was soon at the top. He looked this way and that for some bough of another tree to spring to. There was none, and if he jumped down, he knew the bear would be upon him ere he could recover the fall, and male short vork of him. Moreover, Denys was little used to turning his back on danger, and his blood was rising at being hunted. He turned to bay

'My hour is come,' thought he 'Let me meet death like a man.' He kneeled down and grasped a small shoot to steady himself, drew his long knife, and elench ing his teeth, prepared to job the huge brute as soon as it should mount within reach

Of this combat the result was not doubtful.

The monster's head and neck were scarce vulnerable for bone and masses of hur. The man was going to sting the bear, and the bear to crack the man like a nut Gerard's heart was better than his nerves. He saw his friend's mortal danger, and passed at once from fear to blindish rage. He slipped down his tree in a moment, caught up the crossbow, which he had dropped in the road, and running furiously up, sent a bolt into the bear s body with a loud shout. The bear gave a snarl of rage and pain, and turned its head liresolutel,

'Keep aloof'' cried Denys, 'or you are a dead man'

'I care not,' and in a moment he had another holt ready and shot it fiercely into the bear, screaming, 'Take that! take that!'

Denys poured a volley of oaths down at him 'Get away, idiot!'

He was right the bear, finding so formidable and noisy a foe behind him, slipped growling down the tree, rending deep furrows in it as she slipped. Gerard ran back to his tree and climbed it swiftly. But while his legs were daughing some eight feet from the ground, the bear came rearing and struck with her fore paw, and out flew a piece of bloody cloth from Gerard's hose. He climbed, and climbed, and presently he heard as it were in the air a voice say, 'Go out on the bough!' He lool ed, and there was a long massive branch before him shooting upwards at a slight angle—he threw his body across it, and by a series of convulsive efforts worked up it to the end

Then he lool od round panting

The bear was mounting the tree on the other side. He heard her class scrape, and saw her bulge on both sides of the massive tree. Here eye not being very quick, she reached the fork and passed it, mounting the main stem. Gerard drev breath more freely. The bear either heard him, or found by scent she was wrong she paused presently she caught sight of him. She cyclhim steadily, then quietly descended to the fork.

Slowly and cautiously she stretched out a pay and tried the bough. It was a stiff only branch, cound as iron. Instinct thought the creature this. It crayled care fully out on the bough, growling savagely as it came.

Gerard looked wildly down. He vas forty feet from the ground. Death below Death moving slow but sure on him in a still more horrible form. His hair briefled. The sweat poured from him He sat helpless, fascinated, tongue tied

As the fearful monster crawled growling to vards him, incongruous thoughts coursed through his mind. Mar garet—the Vulgate, where it speaks of the rage of a she bear robbed of her whelps—Rome—Eternity

The bear crawled on And now the stupor of death fell on the doomed man, he saw the open jaws and bloodshot eyes coming, but in a mist

As in a mist he heard a twang, he glanced down, Denys, white and silent as death, was shooting up at the bear. The bear snarled at the twang, but crawled on Agun the erossbow twanged, and the bear snarled, and came nearer. Again the crossbow twanged, and the next moment the bear was close upon Gerard, where he sat, with hair standing stiff on end, and eyes starting from their sockets, palsied. The bear opened her jaws like a grave, and hot blood spouted from them upon The bough rocked. The Gerard as from a pump wounded monster was reeling, it clung, it stuck its siekles of claws deep into the wood, it toppled, its claws held firm, but its body rolled off, and the sudden shock to the branch shook Gerard forward on his stomach with his face upon one of the bear's struning paws. At this, by a convulsive effort, she raised her head up, up, till he felt her hot fetid breath. Then huge teeth snapped together loudly close below him in the air, with a last effort of buffled hate. The ponderous carcass rent the elaws out of the bough, then pounded the earth with a tremendous thump. There was a shout of triumph below, and the very next instant a cry of diemay, for Gerard had swooned, and vithout an attempt to save himself, rolled headlong from the perilous height.

Captain Dodd's Battle with the Pirates

The pirate, bold as he was, got sick of fair fighting first, he hoisted his mainsail and drev rapidly ahead, with a slight bearing to windward, and dismounted a carronade and stove in the ship's quarter boat, by way of a parting kick

The men hurled a contemptuous cheer after him, they thought they had beaten him off. Dut Dodd knew better He was but retiring a little way to make a more deadly attack than ever he would soon wear, and cross the Agra's defenceless bows, to rake her fore and aft at pistol shot distance or grapple, and board the eafecbled slup two hundred strong

Dodd flew to the helm, and with his own hands put it hard a weather, to give the deck guns one more chance, the last, of sinking or disabling the Destroyer As the ship obeyed, and a deck gun bellowed below him, he saw a vessel running out from Long Island, and coiming swiftly up on his lee quarter

It was a schooner Was she coming to his aid?

Horror 1 A black flag floated from her foremast head

While Dodd's eyes were staring almost out of his head at this death blow to hope, Monk fired again, and just then a pale face came close to Dodd's, and a solemn voice whispered in his ear 'Our amaiunition is nearly done!'

Dodd seized Sharpe's hand convulsively, and pointed to the pirates consort coming up to finish them, and said, with the calm of a brave man's despair, 'Cutlasses 1 and die hard!'

At that moment the master gunner fired his last gun It sent a clinin shot on board the retiring pirate, took off a Portuguese head and spun it clean into the sea ever so far to windward, and cut the schooner's force mast so nearly through that it trembled and nodded, and presently snapped with a loud crack, and came down like a broken tree, with the yard and sail, the latter over lapping the deck and burying itself, black flag and all, in the sea, and there, in one moment, lay the Distroyer buffeting and wriggling-like a beron on the water with his long wing broken-an utter cripple

The victorious crew raised a stunning cheer

'Silence '' roured Dodd, with his trumpet hands make sail l'

He set his courses, bent a new jib, and stood out to windward close hauled, in hopes to make a good offing, and then put his ship dead before the wind, which was now rising to a stiff breeze. In doing this he crossed the empled pirate's bows, within eighty yards, and sore was the temptation to rake him, but his ammunition being short, and his danger being imminent from the other pirate, he had the self command to resist the great temptation

He hailed the mizen top 'Can you two hinder them from firing that gun?'

'I rather think we can,' said Fullalove, 'ch, colonel?' and tapped his long rifle.

The ship no sooner crossed the schooner's bows than n Malay run forward with n linstock Pop went the colonel's ready carbine, and the Malay fell over dead, and the linstock flev out of his hand A tall Portu guese, with a movement of rige, snatched it up, and darted to the gun the Yankee rifle cracked, but a moment too late. Bang! went the pirate's bow chaser, and crashed into the Agra's side, and passed nearly through her

'Ye missed him! I'e missed him!' eried the rival theorist, joyfully He was mistaken the smoke cleared, and there was the pirate captain leaning wounded against the mainmast with a Yankee bullet in his shoulder, and his crew uttering yells of dismay and vengeance They jamped, and raged, and brandished their knives, and made horrid gesticulations of revenge, and the white eyebills of the Malays and Papuans glittered fiendishly, and the wounded captum rused his sound arm and had a signal hoisted to his consort, and she bore up in chase, and jamming her fore latine

as flat as a board, lay far nearer the wind than the Agra could, and sailed three feet to her two besides. On this superiority being made clear, the situation of the merchant vessel, though not so atterly desperate as before Monk fired his lucky shot, became pitiable If she ran before the wind, the fresh pirate would cut her off if she lay to windward, she might postpone the inevitable and fatal collision with a foe as strong as that she had only escaped by a rare piece of luck, but this would give the crippled pirate time to refit and unite to destroy her Add to this the failing ammunition and the thinned crew!

Dodd cast his eyes all round the horizon for help

The sea was blank

The bright sun was hidden now, drops of rain fell, and the wind was beginning to sing, and the sea to rise

'Gentlemen,' said he, 'let us kneel down and pray for wisdom, in this sore strait '

He and his officers kneeled on the quarter deck When they rose, Dodd stood rapt about a minute, his great thoughtful eye saw no more the eaemy, the sea, nor anything external, it was turned inward officers looked at him in silence

'Sharpe,' said he at last, 'there must be a way out of them both with such a breeze as this is now, if we could but see it '

'Ay, if,' grouned Sharpe

Dodd mused again

'About ship 'said lie, softly, like an absent man 'Ay, ay, sir'

'Steer due north!' said he, still like one whose mind was elsewhere

While the ship was coming about, he gave minute orders to the mates and the gunner, to ensure eo operation in the delicate and dangerous manœavres that were sure to be at hand

The wind was W N W he was standing north one pirate lay on his lee beam stopping a leak between wind and water, and hacking the deek clear of his broken mast and vards. The other fresh, and thirsting for the easy prey, came up to weather on him and hang on his quarter, pirate fashion

When they were distant about a cable's length, the fresh pirate, to meet the ship's change of tactics, changed his own, luffed up, and give the slip a brondside, well nimed but not destructive, the guns being loaded with

Dodd, instead of replying immediately, put his helm hard up and ran under the pirate's stern while he was jummed up in the wind, and with his five eighteen pounders raked him fore and aft, then paying off, give him three carronades crainmed with grape and canister, the rapid discharge of eight guns made the ship tremble, and enveloped her in thick smoke, loud shricks and groans were heard from the schooner the smoke cleared, the pirate's mainsul hung on deck, his jib boom was cut off like a carrot and the sail struggling, his foresail looked lace, lanes of dead and wounded lay still or writhing on his deck, and his lee scuppers ran blood into the sea Dodd squared his yards and bore

The slup rushed down the wind, leaving the schooner staggered and all abroad But not for long, the pirate wore and fired his bow chasers at the now flying Agra, split one of the carronades in two, and killed a Lascar, and made a hole in the foresail, this done, he hoisted his mainsail again in a trice, sent his wounded below, flung his dead overboard, to the horror of their foes, and came after the flying ship, yawing and firing his bow chasers. The ship was silent. She had no shot to throw away. Not only did she take these blows like a coward, hut all signs of life disappeared on lier, except two men at the wheel, and the captain on the main gangway.

Dodd had ordered the crew out of the rigging, armed them with cutlasses, and laid them flat on the forecastle. He also compelled Kenealy and Fullalove to come down out of harm's way, no wiser on the smooth bore question than they went up

The great patient ship ran environed by her foes, one destroyer right in her course, another in her wake, following her with yells of vengeance, and pounding away at her—but no reply

Suddenly the yells of the pirates on both sides ceased, and there was a moment of dead silence on the sea.

Yet nothing fresh had happened

Yes, this had happened the pirates to windward, and the pirates to leeward, of the Agra had found out, at one and the same moment, that the merchant captain they had lashed, and bullied, and tortnred was a patient but tremendous man It was not only to rake the fresh schooner lie had put his ship before the wind, but also by a double, daring masterstroke to hurl his monster ship hodily on the other Without a foresail she could never get out of her way. The pirate crew had stopped the leak, and cut away and unshipped the broken fore mast, and were stepping a new one, when they saw the huge ship bearing down in full sail Nothing easier than to shp out of her way could they get the foresail to draw, but the time was short, the deadly intention inanifest, the coming destruction swift.

After that solemn silence came a storm of cries and curses, as their seamen went to work to fit the yard and ruise the sail, while their fighting men seized their matchlocks and trained the guns. They were well commanded by an heroic, able villain. Astern the consort thundered, but the Agra's response was a dead silence more awful than broadsides

For then was seen with what majesty the enduring Anglo Saxon fights.

One of that indomitable race on the gangway, one at the foremast, two at the wheel, conned and steered the great ship down on a hundred matchlocks and a grinning broadside, just as they would have conned and steered her into a British harhour

'Starboard' said Dodd, in a deep calm voice, with a motion of his hand

"Starboard it is"

The pirate wriggled ahead a little. The man forward made a silent signal to Dodd

'Port '' said Dodd quietly

'Port it is.'

But at this critical moment the pirate astern sent a mischicvous shot and knocked one of the men to atoms at the helm

Dodd waved his hand without a word, and another man ro e from the deck, and took his place in silence, and laid his unshaking hand on the wheel stained with that man's warm blood whose place he took

The high ship was now scarce sixty yards distant, she seemed to know she reared her lofty figure head with great awful shoots into the air

But now the panting pirates got their new foresail hoisted with a joyful shout, it drew, the schooner gathered way, and their furious consort close on the Agra's heels just then sconred her deek with grape.

'Port !' said Dodd, calmly

'Port it is.'

The giant prow darted at the escaping pirate That acre of coming canvas took the wind out of the swift schooner's foresail, it flapped oh, then she was doomed! That awful moment parted the races on board her, the Papuans and Sooloos, their black faces haid and blue with horror, leaped yelling into the sea, or erouched and whimpered, the yellow Malays and brown Portuguese, though blanched to one colour now, turned on death like dying panthers, fired two cannon slap into the ship's bows, and snapped their muskets and matchlocks at their solitary executioner on the ship's gangway, and out flew their knives like crushed wasps' stings. CRASH1 the Indiaman's cutwater in thick smoke beat in the schooner's broadside down went her masts to leeward like fishing rods whipping the water, there was a horrible shriek ing yell, wild forms leaped off on the Agra, and were hacked to pieces almost ere they reached the deck-a surge, a chasm in the sea, filled with an instant rush of engulphing waves, a long, awful, grating, grinding noise, never to be forgotten in this world, all along under the ship's keel-and the fearful majestie monster passed on over the blank she had made, with a pale crew standing silent and awe struck on her deck, a cluster of wild heads and staring eyeballs bobbing like corks in her foaming wake, sole relie of the blotted out destroyer, and a wounded man staggering on the ganguay, with hands uplifted and staring eyes

Shot in two places, the head and the breast!

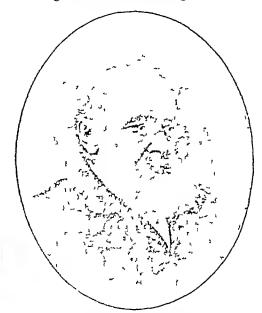

With a loud cry of pity and dismay, Sharpe, Fullalove, Kenealy, and others rushed to catch him, but, ere they got near, the captain of the triumphant ship fell down on his hands and knees, his head sunk over the ganguay, and his blood ran fast and puttered in the midst of them, on the deek he had defended so bravely

The Memoir (1827) by his brother and a nephew is not a happy piece of biography Readiana (1882) is a collection of the novelists fragments and Extracts from his works, with an Introduction by Mrs Ireland, appeared in 1891 See Mr Swinburne's Miscellautes (1886) for an estimate, and Coleman's Charles Reade at 1 Knew Him (1993) Mr Justin McCarthy's Reminiscences (1899), 1809, 1819, 18

Anthony Trollope (1815-82), third son of Mrs Frances Trollope (see page 276), was born in His child London and brought up at Harrow hood and boyhood were made singularly squalid and miserable by the disorder of his home and the misfortunes of his father, an eccentric barrister who ruined himself by bad temper and foolish specula Boarded-one can hardly say educated-at tions Harrow School and Winchester College for nearly eleven years, he was snubbed and neglected by the masters, and bullied and excluded from all games and companionship by the boys. A final catastrophe in his father's affairs in 1834 drove the family to Belgium, where Anthony somehow got the offer of a commission in an Austrian cavalry regiment, and proceeded to acquire the necessary knowledge of French and German as usher in a private school at Brussels. An appointment in the British Post-Office, however, brought him speedily back to London, and from 1834 to 1841 he was a jumor clerl in the head office at St Martin's le-Grand Notorious as a hopelessly incompetent public servant, and leading, according to his own account, a somewhat irregular life, he yet contrived to pick up a fair knowledge of English literature, mastering French and Latin for reading pur poses, and even thinking it possible he might write a novel. The turning point of his career came in 1841, when he accepted the unpromising situation of a 'surveyor's clerk' in the postal service in the vicst of Ireland Severed from the mean associations of his youth, he suddenly developed remarkable energy and ability at his work as well as an unexpected passion for foxhunting, gained the confidence of his superiors, married lrappily in 1844, and three years later realised his visions by publishing his first novel, The Macdermots of Ballycloran That effort. hovever, and its two immediate successors, The Kellys and the O Kellys (1848) and La Vendée (1850), fell almost dead from the press, and it vas not till 1855 that he attracted notice by The Wurden, the first and not the least pleasing of the 'Barsetshire' novels It was followed in 1857 by Barchester Towers, which in the formidable Mrs Proudic added a new character to English fiction, and by the other volumes of the series-Doctor Thorne (1858), Framley Parsonage (1861), The Small House at Allington (1864), and The Last Chronicle of Barset (1867) These novels, which contain the best of his vork, were the fruit of a two-vears' expedition through the south west of England for the improvement of the rural delivery of letters, but it is noteworthy that Trollope seems never to have been familiar in that cathedral town society which he is acl nowledged to have described so well. He wrote in all about fifty novels, some of which, like The Three Clerks (1858) and Orley I arm (1862), were founded on memories of his early life. Others were Castle Richmond, Can You Forgive Her? Miss Wackenzie, The Claverings, Phineas Finn, He knew he was Right, John Caldigate, Ayala's Angel, The Fixed Period, and 4n Old Man's Love His last novel, The Land Leaguers, was unfinished at his death in 1882. In addition, he utilised his business journeys and pleasure tours for the rather too hasty production of volumes on The West Indies (1859), North America (1862), Anstralia and Nev Zealand (1873), and South Africa (1878) He was one of the founders of the Fortnightly Review, became first editor of St Paul's magazine in 1867, and in 1868 stood without success as a parliamentary candidate for Beverley of his ventures outside of fiction were unlucky Dean Mericale somewhat cruelly acknowledged a presentation copy of his contribution to the series of 'Ancient Classics for English Readers' with a tribute of thanks for 'your comic Cresar,' and it must be acl nowledged that his monographs on Cicero and Thackeray are unsatisfactory Artistically his novels are faulty enough, as indeed they were bound to be from his practice of writing to time with his watch upon the desk. He is lacking, moreover, in good taste and intellectual elevation. Yet the readableness and essential healthiness of his best work are incontestable, and just as little can it be denied that he had a shrewd eye for certain aspects of life and society, a gift of character-drawing, and the knack of telling a story. Probably the best criticism of his work as a novelist is his own summing up of one of his books. The story was thoroughly English. There was a little for hunting and a little tuft hunting, some Christian virtue and some Christian cant. There was no heroism and no villain; I here was much Church, but more love making. And it was downright honest love.'

Mr Slope Bids Farewell

'Mr Slope,' said the bishop, 'it has become necessary that I should speak to you definitively on a matter that has for some time been pressing itself on my attention'

'May I ask whether the subject is in any way connected with myself?' said Mr Slope.

'It is so—certainly—yes, it certainly is connected with yourself, Mr Slope'

'Then, my lord, if I may be allowed to express a wish, I would prefer that no discussion on the subject should take place between us in the presence of a third person'

'Don't alarm yourself, Mr Slope,' said Mrs Proudie,
'no discussion is at all necessary The bishop merely intends to express his own wishes'

'I merely intend, Mr Slope, to express my own wishes—no discussion will be at all necessary,' said the bishop, reiterating his wife's words

'That is more, my lord, than we any of its can be sure of,' said Mr Slope, 'I cannot, however, force Mrs Proudic to leave the room, nor can I refuse to remain here's 1 the your lordship's vish that I should do so'

'It is his fordship's wish, certainly,' said Mrs Proudie.

'Mr Slope,' began the bishop in a solemn, serious voice, 'it grieves me to have to find fault. It grieves me much to have to find fault with a clergyman, but especially so vith a clergyman in your position'

'Why, what have I done amiss, my lord?' demanded

Mr Slope, boldly

'What have you done amiss, Mr Slope?' said Mrs Proudie, standing erect before the culprit, and raising that terrible forefinger 'Do you dare to ask the bishop what you have done amiss? Does not your conscience.

'Mrs Proudic, pray let it be understood, once for all, that I will have no words with you'

'Ah, sir, but you will have words,' said she, 'vou must have words. Why have you had so many words with that Signora Acrom? Why have you disgraced yourself, you a clergyman too, by constantly consorting with such a woman as that—with a married woman—with one altogether unfit for a clergyman's society?'

'At any rate, I was introduced to her in your drawing room,' retorted Mr Slope

'And shamefully you behaved there,' said Mrs Proudie, 'most shamefully I was wrong to allow you to remain in the house a day after what I then saw I should have insisted on your instant dismissal'

'I have yet to learn, Mrs Proudie, that you have the power to insist either on my going from hence or on my staying here '

'What' said the lady, 'I am not to have the privilege of saying who shall and who shall not frequent my own drawing room! I am not to save my servants and dependents from having their morals corrupted by improper conduct! I am not to save my own daughters from impurity! I will let you see, Mr Slope, whether I have the power or whether I have not Wou will have the goodness to understand that you no longer fill any situation about the bishop, and as your room will be immediately wanted in the palace for another chaplain, I must ask you to provide yourself with apartments as soon as may be convenient to you.

'My lord,' said Mr Slope, appealing to the bishop, and so turning his back completely on the lady, 'will you permit me to ask that I may liave from your own lips any decision that you may have come to on this matter?'

'Certainly, Mr Slope, certainly,' said the hishop, 'that is but reasonable. Well, my decision is that you had better look for some other preferment. For the situation which you have lately held I do not think that you are well suited '

'And what, my lord, has been my fault?'

'That Signora Neroni is one fault,' said Mrs Proudie, 'and a very abominable fault she is, very abominable and very disgraceful. Fie, Mr Slope, fie! You an evangelical clergyman indeed!'

'My lord, I desire to know for what fault I am turned out of your lordship's house'

'You hear what Mrs Proudie says,' said the bishop

'When I publish the history of this transaction, my lord, as I decidedly shall do in my own vindication, I presume you vill not wish me to state that you have discarded me at your wife's bidding—because she has objected to my being acquainted with another lady, the daughter of one of the prehendaries of the chapter?'

'You may publish what you please, sir,' said Mrs Proudie. 'But you will not be insane enough to publish any of your doings in Barchester. Do you think I have not heard of your kneelings at that creature's feet—that is, if she has any feet—and of your constant slobbering over her hand? I advise you to beware, Mr Slope, of what you do and say. Clergymen have been unfrocked for less than what you have been guilty of'

'My lord, if this goes on I shall be obliged to indict this woman-Mrs Proudic I mean-for defamation of character''

'I think, Mr Slope, you had better now retire,' said the bishop. 'I will enclose to you a cheque for any balance that may be due to you, and, under the present circumstances, it will of course be better for all parties that you should leave the palace at the earliest possible moment. I will allow you for your journey back to London, and for your maintenance in Barchester for a week from this date.'

'If, however, you wish to remain in this neighbour hood,' said Mrs Proudie, 'and will solemnly pledge yourself never again to see that woman, and will promise also to be more circumspect in your conduct, the hishop will mention your name to Mr Quiverful, who now wants a curate at Puddingdale. The house is, I imagine, quite sufficient for your requirements, and there will, moreover, be a stipend of fifty pounds a year'

'May God forgive you, midam, for the manner in which you have treated me,' said Mr Slope, looking at her with a very heavenly look, 'and remember this, madim, that you yourself may still have a fall,' and he looked at her with a very worldly look. 'As to the bishop, I pitt him!' And so saying, Mr Slope left the room. Thus ended the intimacy of the Bishop of Bar chester with his first confidential chaplain.

Frank Gresham's First Speech.

He felt rather sick at heart when Mr Baker got up to propose the toast as soon as the servants were gone. The servants, that is, were gone officially, but they were there in a body, men and women, nurses, cooks, and ladies' maids, coachimen, grooms, and footinen, standing in the tio doorways to hear what Master Frank would say. The old housekeeper headed the mids at one door, standing boldly inside the room, and the butler controlled the men at the other, marshalling them back with a drawn corkscrew.

Mr Baker did not say much, but what he did say, he said well. They had all scen Frank Gresham grow up from a child, and were now required to welcome as a man amongst them one who was so well qualified to carry on the honour of that loved and respected family. His young friend, Frank, was every inch a Gresham Mr Baker omitted to make mention of the infusion of De Courcy blood, and the countess, therefore, drew herself up on her chair and lool ed as though she were extremely bored. He then alluded tenderly to his own long friendship with the present squire, Francis Newbold Gresham the elder, and sat down, begging them to drink health, prosperity, long life, and an excellent wife to their dear young friend, Francis Newbold Gresham the younger

There was a great jungling of glasses, of course, made the merrier and the louder by the fact that the ladies were still there as well as the gentlemen. Ladies don't drink toasts frequently, and, therefore, the occasion coming rarely was the more enjoyed 'God bless yon, I rank'' 'Your good health, Frank!' 'And especially a good wife, Frank!' 'Two or three of them, Frank!' 'Good health and prosperity to you, Mr Gresham!' 'More power to you, Frank, my boy!' 'May God bless and preserve you, my dear boy!' and then a merry, sweet, eager voice, from the far end of the table, 'Frank' rank' do look at me, pray do, Frank, I am drink ing your health in real wine, ain't I, papa?' Such were the addresses which greeted Mr Francis Newbold Gresham the younger as he essayed to rise upon his feet for the first time since he had come to man's estate

When the clatter was at an end, and he was fairly on his legs, he cast a glance before him on the table, to look for a decanter. He had not much liked his cousin's theory of sticking to the bottle, nevertheless, in the difficulty of the moment, it was well to have any system to go by. But, as misfortune would have it, though the table was covered with bottles, his eye could not catch one. Indeed, his eye at first could catch nothing, for the things swam before him, and the guests all seemed to dance in their chairs

Up he got, however, and commenced his speech. As he could not follow his preceptor's advice as touching the bottle, he adopted his own crude plan of 'making a mark of some old covey's head,' and therefore looked dead at the doctor

'Upon my word, I am very much obliged to you, gentlemen and ladies—ladies and gentlemen I should ay—for drinking my health, and doing me so much honour, and all that sort of thing Upon my word I am Especially to Mr Baker I don't mean you, Harry, you're not Mr Baker'

'As much as you're Mr Gresham, Master Frank'

'But I am not Mr Gresham, and I don't mean to be for many a long year if I can help it, not at any rate till we have had another coming of age here'

'Bravo, Frank! and whose will that be?'

'That will be my son, and a very fine 1rd he will be, and I hope he'll make a better speech than his father Mr Baker said I was every inch a Gresham Well, I hope I am' Here the countess began to look cold and angry 'I hope the day will never come when my father won't own me for one.'

'There's no fear, no fear,' said the doctor, who was almost put out of countenance by the orator's intense gaze. The countess looked colder and more angry, and inuttered something to herself about a hear garden

'Gardez Gresham, ch? Harry I mind that when you're sticking in a gap and I'm coming after you Well, I am sure I am very much obliged to you for the honour you have all done me, especially the ladies, who don't do this sort of thing on ordinary-occasions. I wish they did, don't you, doctor? And talking of ladies, my aunt and cousins have come all the way from London to hear me make this speech, which certainly is not worth the trouble, but, all the same, I am very much obliged to them' And he looked round and made a little bow at the countess 'And so I am to Mr and Mrs Jackson, and Mr and Mrs and Miss Bateson, and Mr Baker—I'm not at all obliged to you, Harry—and to Mr Oriel and Miss Oriel, and to Mr Umbleby, and to Dr Thorne, and to Mary—I beg her pardon, I mean

Miss Thorne' And then he sat down, amid the loud plaudits of the company, and a string of blessings which came from the servants behind him

After this the ladies rose and departed As she went Lady Arabella kissed her son's forehead, and then his sisters kissed him, and one or two of his lady cousins, and then Miss Bateson shook him by the hand 'Oh, Miss Bateson,' said he, 'I thought the kissing was to go all round' So Miss Bateson laughed and went her way, and Patience Oriel nodded at him, but Mary Thorne, as she quietly left the room, almost hidden among the extensive draperies of the grander ladies, hardly allowed her eyes to meet his.

He got up to hold the door for them as they passed, and as they went he managed to take Patience by the hand, he took her hand and pressed it for a moment, but dropped it quickly, in order that he might go through the same ceremony with Mary, but Mary was too quick for him

'Frank,' said Mr Gresham as soon as the door was closed, 'bring your glass here, my boy,' and the father made room for his son close beside lumself 'The ceremony is over now, so you may leave your place of dignity' Frank sat himself down where he was told, and Mr Gresham put his hand on his son's shoulder and half caressed him, while the tears stood in his eyes 'I think the doctor is right, Baker, I think he'll never make us ashamed of him'

'I am sure he never will,' said Mr Baker

'I don't think he ever will,' said Dr Thome

The tones of the men's voices were very different Mr Baker did not care a straw about it, why should he? He had an heir of his own as well as the squire, one also who was the apple of his eye But the doctor—he did care, he had a niece, to be sure, whom he loved, perhaps as well as these men loved their sons, but there was room in his heart also for young Frank Gresham

After this small expose of feeling they sat silent for a moment or two. But silence was not dear to the heart of the Honourable John, and so he took up the running

'That's a niceish nag you give Frank this morning,' said he to his uncle 'I was looking at him before dinner. He is a Monsoon isn't he?'

'Well, I can't say I know how he was bred,' said the squire. 'He shows a good deal of breeding'

'He's a Monsoon, I'm sure,' said the Honourable John 'They all have those ears, and that peculiar dip in the back. I suppose you gave a goodish figure for him?'

'Not so very much,' said the squire.

'He's a truned hunter, I suppose?'

'If not, he soon will be,' said the squire

'Let I'rank nlone for that,' said Harry Baker

'He jumps beautifully, sir,' said Frank 'I haven't tried him myself, but Peter made him go over the bar two or three times this morning'

The Honourable John was determined to give his cousin in helping hand, as he considered it. He thought that I rank was very ill used in being put off with so in complete a stud, and thinking also that the sou had not spirit enough to attack his father himself on the subject, the Honourable John determined to do it for him

'He's the making of a very nice horse, I don't doubt I wish you had a string like him, Frank.'

Frank felt the blood rush to his face. He would not for worlds have his father think that he was discontented, or otherwise than pleased with the present lie had received that morning. He was heartily ashamed of himself in that he had listened with a certain degree of complacency to his cousin's tempting, but he had no idea that the subject would be repeated—and then repeated, too, before his father, in a manner to ver him on such a day as this, before such people as were assembled there. He was very angry with his cousin, and for a moment forgot all his hereditary respect for a De Courey.

I tell you what, John,' said he, 'do you choose your day, some day early in the season, and come out on the best thing you have, and I'll bring, not the black horse, but my old mare, and then do you try and keep near me. If I don't leave you at the back of God speed before long, I'll give you the mare and the horse too' (I rom Doctor Thorne)

Irollope's character and career are best described in his frank and amusing Intobiography (1883), in the kindly estimate in Sir Leshe Stephen's Studies of a hiographic (1902) and in the sketch in Mr Bryce's Studies in Contemporary Biography (1903)

ROBERT AITKI N

Thomas Adolphus Trollope (1810-92), elder brother of the novelist, was educated at Winchester and Oxford in happier circumstances than poor Anthony, in 1841 settled in Italy, and died at Clifton. He wrote several books on Italian history and biography, the most notable of which we The Girlhood of Catherine de Medici, A Duade of Italian Women, a History of Florence, and a Life of Pitis IV, and produced a number of novels such as La Biata, Marietta, I indisfaine Chase, Gemma, The Garstangs, and The Dream His second wife, trances Cleanor Numbers Trollope, wrote Anni Margaret's Trouble (1866), Black Spirits and White (1877), That Unfortu nate Marriage (1888), and, with her husband The Homes and Haunts of the Italian Posts (1881) See his autobiographical IVhat I Remember (1887-89)

Henry Cockton (1807-52), comic novelist, born in London, died at Bury St Edmunds, where in 1841 he had married and become a maltster Save for their illustrations, his ten works are almost wholly forgotten but one—Valentine Vox, the I cutriloquist (1840), which is largely extravaganza

John Stuart Blackic (1809-95), born in Glasgow of Kelso ancestry, was educated at Aberdeen and Edinburgh Universities, and during 1829-30 studied at Göttingen, Berlin, and Rome. In 1834 he published a good verse translation of Goethe's Faust, and passed advocate at the Edinburgh Bar, but from 1841 to 1852 was Professor of Humanity in Marischal College, Aberdeen, and then of Greek at Edinburgh till 1882 A versatile, vivacious, irrepressible writer and talker, he took an active part in educational reform, figured as the champion of Scottish nationality, and in 1874-76 rused funds for the foundation of a Celtic chair in Edinburgh University He published an admirable metrical translation of Æschylus in 1850, and one of the Huad in ballad metre in 1866, as well as several volumes of verse. His prose works dealt with subjects in moral and religious philosophy, the method of history, and the land laws, and included Self-Culture (1873), Horæ Hellemuæ (1874), and a short Life of Burns. There is a Life of Blackie by Miss Stoddart (2 vols 1895), and a shorter sketch by his nephew (1895).

William Bell Scott (1811-90), poct painter and brother of the Blake like painter David Scott, was born in Edinburgh and settled in London in 1837, but exhibited only twenty pictures between 1840 and 1869, on subjects mostly historical or From 1843 fill 1858 he was in charge of the government school of art at Newcastle, and till 1885 a South Kensington examiner principal work was the series of pictures of Northumbrian history at Wallington Hall, he also executed a series from The King's Quair at Penkill Castle near Girvan He published five volumes of poetry, a Memoir of his brother (1850), Half hour Lectures on Art (1861), Albert Durer (1869), and The Little Masters (1879) in the 'Great Artists' series He was one of Rossetu's intimates His Autobiography, edited by Professor Minto (1892), created not a little surprise and irritation by its frank personal criticisms

Sir Thomas Erskine May (1815-86), edu cated at Bedford School, became assistant librarian of the House of Commons in 1831, clerk assistant in 1886, and Clerk of the House in 1871. Successively CB and KCB, he was on his retirement (1886) created Biron Famborough. His Trialise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament (1844, 10th ed. 1901) has been translated into various languages. His Constitutional History of England, 1760-1860 (1861-63, 3rd ed. 1871), is practically a continuation of Hallam. His Democracy in Europe (1877) showed varied learning and studious impartiality.

Whitworth Elwin (1816-1900), born at his father's house of Thurning in Norfolk, studied at Crius College, Cambridge, served as curate in Somerset, and succeeding in 1849 to the family living of Booton in his native county, lived in his country rectory all the rest of his life. In 1843 he began to write in the Quarterly, and was editor, in succession to Lockhart, from 1853 to 1860, coming to London once a quarter only for a short sojourn His best articles were perhaps those on Johnson and Goldsmith, Sterne and Fielding, Gray and In 1860 he undertook to complete Croker's edition of Pope, and by 1872 had published five volumes of it, but, becoming ured of the task, left the other five volumes of the magistral edition to be edited by Mr Courthope. Like his articles in the Quarterly, his notes and introductions in the Pope are important and ad mirably written contributions to English literary history and to criticism As editor of the Quarterly

Elwin was eminently autocratic, put a swift end to the dominance of Croker, and freely altered, condensed, expanded, and reconstructed his contributors' work without respect of persons rarely or never answered letters, and often left them in piles unopened. He had strong opinions and prejudices-cared little for Tennyson and was contemptuous of Browning, Matthew Arnold, and George Eliot. He loved science, but derided Darwin and belittled Huxley and Tyndall printing and music he had equally strong and individual likes and dislikes, and he rebuilt his church on imposing lines from his own plans without professional advice. A collection of his essays was published by his son, with a Memoir, as Some Eighteenth Century Men of Letters (2 vols 1902)

Martin Farquhar Tupper (1810-89) was horn at Marylebone, son of an eminent surgeon, and studied at the Charterhouse and at Christ Church, Oxford, where in 1831 he defeated Gladstone over a theological essay. Prevented by a stammer from taking orders, he yet was called to the Bar (1835), but soon found the vocation that pleased him in a life of authorship volume, Sacra Poisis, liad been published anonymously in 1832, Geraldine (1838), designed as a continuation of Christabel, was severely handled by the critics But of his forty works, one had an amazing success—Proverbial Philosophy (1838-76) brought him and his publisher a profit of 'some thing like £10,000 spiece.' The first of the four series ran through sixty editions, by 1881 a million copies of the work had been sold in America, and it was translated into French and Danish Though Proverbial Philosophy is but a heap of platitudes in stilted prose cut into lengths which have neither rhvine nor rhythm, texts from it were quoted as authoritative, and put to strange uses-thus it is recorded that Mr Spurgeon proposed to the lady who became his wife by help of a passage from Tupper His practical inventions were less successful-safety horse shoes, glass screw-tops to bottles, steam vessels with the puddles inside, and the And his War Ballads, Rifle Ballads (in support of the Volunteer movement), and Protestant Ballads never attained to popularity Rides and Reverses of Mr Alsop Smith (1857) was a satire, on his novel, The Crock of Gold (1844), a two act melodrima was founded by Edward Fitzball Tupper was elected to the Royal Society, and received the Oxford DCL, as well as Prussian and other foreign distinctions, and he was twice received in America with enthusiasm. His home was at Albury in Sussex, from time to time he gave readings from his own works to audiences in England and Scotland In 1873 he received a pension of £120, and next year Allibone's Dutionary intimated that a baronetcy was expected to be conferred But he had some savage tomahawking to endure at the hands of the reviewers-as from Fraser in October 1852 From his huge 'archnes' (in Bozzy's self-complacent use of the word) he compiled My Life as an Author (1886)

The Child of Sensibility

Yet I hear the child of sensibility moaning at the wintry cold,

Wherein the mists of selfishness have wrapped the society of men

He grieveth, and hath deep reasons, for falsehood hath wronged his trust,

And the breaches in his bleeding heart have been filled with the briars of suspicion

For, alas, how few be friends, of whom charity liath hoped well!

MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER From a Photograph by Maull & Fox

How few there be among men who forget themselves for other!

Each one seeketh his own, and looketh on his brethren as rivals,

Masking envy with friendship, to serve his secret ends. And the world, that corrupteth all good, hath wronged that sacred name,

For it calleth any man friend, who is not known for an enemy,

And such be as the flies of summer, while plenty sitteth at thy board

But who can wonder at their flight from the cold denials of want?

Such be as vultures round a carcass, assembled together for the feast,

But a sudden noise scareth them, and forthwith are they speeks among the clouds

There be few, O child of sensibility, who deserve to have thy confidence

Yet weep not, for there are some, and such some live for thee To them is the chilling world a drear and burren scene, And gladly seek they such as thou art, for seldom find they the occasion

For, though no man excludeth himself from the high capability of friendship, let verily the man is a marvel whom truth can write a friend (From Proverbial I hilosophy)

Albert Smith (1816-60)-in full Almert RICHARD SMITH-was the son of a surgeon at Chertsey, was educated at Merchant Taylors', and having qualified in London, commenced practice with his fither, but taking to lecturing and light literature, he had erelong published over a score of books, some of them illustrated by Leech wrote much for Bentley's Miscellany and for Punch, and produced or adapted many pieces for the stage His novels include The Adventures of Mr Ledbury (1844), The Scattergood Family (1845), The Marchioniss of Bimvilliers (1846), Christopher Tadpoli (1848), and The Pottleton Legacy (1849), of his 'entertainments,' the first (after a tour in the East) was 'A Month at Constantinople,' the most successful was 'The Ascent of Mont Blanc' (1852) Edmund Yates prefixed a Life of him to an edition (1860) of the Mont Blanc

Edwin Waugh (1817-90), the Lancashire poet, was born a shoemaker's son at Rochdale, and after a little irregular schooling was apprenticed to a local printer and bookseller, he read industriously all books he could find about Lancashire and its traditions, as well as general literature, and on the expiration of his apprenticeship worked as journeyman in London and elsewhere Rochdale he on his return established a literary institute, and in 1847 was made assistant-secretary to the Lancashire Public School Association, and with his removal to Kelsal near Manchester he became one of the most active members of the Manchester Literary Club His first sketches of Lancashire life and character appeared in the Man chester Examiner, and at once attracted friendly attention to the author Among his numerous prose writings may be cited his Factory Folk during the Cotton Famine, the Besom Ben Stories (possibly the best of his humorous pieces), The Chimney-Corner (a series of exquisite village idyls), and the admirable descriptions of natural scenery in his Trifts of Heather, Irish Sketches, and Rambles in the Lake Country But it is as a singer rather than as a story teller that our author will be best remembered. For several years he had been in the habit of contributing dialect songs to various periodicals, and these pieces, first col lected in 1859 as Poims and Songs, secured for their author immediate recognition as a poet Rivalling all known north of England dialect poems, and comparing favourably with the best work of the rustic followers of Burns, these rude lyrics won the hearts of his countrymen by the power, pathos, and kindly humour with which he paints the homely ways and thoughts of his country-people, indeed, few poems enjoy such popularity in Lancashire as Waugh's 'Come whom to the childer an' me' As an expositor of dialect Waugh merits high praise shades of local patois current in villages separated by only a few miles are tenderly discriminated. and the idiom is nowhere maintained to the tedium of the general reader, but relieved by brilliant descriptive passages written in terse and pure English Outside his native country Waugh's rendering of dialect is somewhat less happy, and the specimens of the country speech of Cumber land and Ireland, as given in Jannock and Irish Statches, can scarcely be accounted a success. For some years he lived solely by writing in prose and verse, giving occasionally readings from his own pieces, and in 1882 received a small pension from the Civil List In failing licalth lie removed to New Brighton, Clieshire, where he spent his last years

The best edition of Waugh's collected works is that mediter volumes with Caldecott's illustrations (1881-89). A selection meight volumes (1892-93) has a Memoir of him by the editor, Mr. Militer

Charles William Shirley Brooks was born 29th April 1816, in London, and was the son of an architect. At the age of sixteen he was articled to his uncle, a solicitor at Osnestri, and passed the examination of the Incorporated Law Society, but drifted into journalism, and became a contributor of poetry and prose to For five sessions he was in the periodicals the reporters' gallery in the House of Commons, and wrote the parliamentary summary for the Morning Chronicle Much miscellaneous unting was done by him for this journal, and in 1853 he was its special commissioner to inquire into the condition and labour of the poor in Russia, Syrn, and Egypt. The result of his investigations was given in a series of letters, subsequently re printed in a book called Russians of the South Brooks edited the Literary Gazette 1858-59, and for a time the Home News He wrote several light and bright pieces for the stage, and two novels, Aspen Court (1853) and The Gordian Knot (1858) For a while a contributor to rival comic papers, in 1851 Brooks joined the staff of Punch, and was soon recognised as its leading contribu tor, his 'Essence of Parliament' being extremely At the death of Mark Lemon in 1870 popular he was appointed editor, and conducted the paper until his death on 23rd February 1874 On his deathbed he wrote Election Epigrams and The Situation, which appeared in Punch after his death His best poetical pieces contributed to Punch were issued in book form in 1883 under the title of Wit and Humour

Francis Edward Suncdley (1818-64), a cripple born at Marlow, took early to writing, his half dozen works including Frank Fairlegh (1850), Lewis Arundel (1852), and Harry Cover dale's Courtship (1855), in which horsemanship and hunting divide the interest with the orthodox passion Bright cheery books, these appeared originally in Sharpe's Magasine, of which he for a time was editor, and they were illustrated by Cruikshank and 'Phiz.'

Frederick William Robertson (1816-53) was born in London, the son of an artillery captain, and was educated for the army at Beverley, at Tours, at Edinburgh Academy, and at Edinburgh Resolving, however, to take orders, University he studied at Brasenose, Oxford, from 1837 to 1840, but was in nowise moved by the current Newmanism to depart from the Evangelicalism in which he had been brought up Ordained in 1840, lie for nearly a year held a curacy at Winchester, where his health broke down, but a walking tour on the Continent restored it, and at Geneva he married the daughter of a Northamptonshire In 1842 he became curate of Christ Church, Cheltenham Here he suffered much from despondency, and having passed through a severe mental struggle, he found his faith in Evangelicalism shaken by the intolerance of its partisans After preaching to the English church at Heidelberg for a time, and holding a curacy in Oxford, in 1847 he became incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, where his carnestness, originality, and wide sympathy arrested public atten-But the comprehensiveness of his Christian ideal exposed him to not a little odium—he was suspected alike by Evangelicals and High Churchmen, for he was unquestionably a Broad Church thinker, though not of the school of Maurice or of Kingsley Indeed, he could not be said to belong to any school, and while he sympathised warmly with what was best in all schools, he was strongly conscious of his differences from them, and never hesitated to denounce what he thought contrary to his own fervent conception of Christian truth, based essentially on the historical significance of the life of Christ, revealing at once sonship with God and brotherhood with man He was naturally vehement and even passionate, and his keen, perhaps morbid, sensitiveness contributed its share to the power of emotion, the spirituality of thought, the delicate suggestiveness, the infectious enthusiasm of his sermons, which, without rhetorical eloquence or striking originality, wielded a quite extraordinary influence on English religious temper During his list years he suffered from disease of the brain. He resigned in June 1853 because the vicar of Brighton had refused to confirm his nomination of a curate, and died two months later. He published but one sermon—the five series (1855-90) so well known over the English-speaking world are really recollections, sometimes dictated and sometimes written out by himself for friends, but in abbreviated form, yet even so they reveal an exceptional religious genius and an unique type of the preacher's power Expository lectures on the Epistle to the Corinthians (1859) and notes on Genesis (1877) were printed, and a volume of Lectures and Addresses (1858), reissued with additions as Literary Remains (1876). He had translated Lessing's Education of the Human Race (1858), and prepated an admirable analysis of In Importance, were privately printed. His letters are hardly inferior to his sermons in charm and power, and the Life and Litters by Mr Stopford Brooke (1865) at once took a place amongst classic English biographies. The extracts are from lectures delivered in 1852 to the Mechanics' Institute at Brighton

Poetry and the Working Classes

And this alone would be enough to show that the Poetry of the coming age must come from the Working Classes In the upper ranks, Poetry, so far at least as it represents their life, has long been worn out, siekly, and sentimental Its manhood is effete. Fendal aristocracy with its associations, the eastle and the tournament, his passed away Its last healthy tones came from the harp of Scott Byron sang its funeral dirge But tenderness, and heroism, and endurance still want their voice, and it must come from the classes whose observation is at first hand, and who speak fresh from nature's heart What has Poetry to do with the Working Classes? Men of work! we want our Poetry from you-from men who will dare to live a brive and true life, not like poor Burns, who was fevered with flattery, manful as he was, and dazzled by the vulgar splendours of the life of the great, which he despised and still longed for, but rather like Ebenezer Elliot, author of the Corn Law Rhymes. Our soldier ancestors told you the significance of high devotion and loyalty which lay beneath the smoke of battlefields. Now rise and tell us the living meaning there may be in the smoke of manufactories, and the heroism of perseverance, and the poetry of invention, and the patience of uncomplaining resigna-Remember the stirring words of one of your own poets

'There's a light about to break,
There's a day about to dawn
Men of thought, and men of action!
Clear the way!'

Poetry and War

Through the physical horrors of warfare, Poetry discerned the redeeming nobleness For in truth, when war is not prolonged, the kindling of all the higher passions prevents the access of the baser ones. A nation split and severed by mean religious and political dissensions suddenly feels its unity, and men's hearts beat together at the mere possibility of invasion. And even woman, as the author of the History of the Teninsular War has well remarked, sufferer as she is by war, yet guns, in the more chivalrous respect paid to her, in the elevation of the feelings excited towards her, in the attitude of protection assumed by men, and in the high calls to duty which arouse her from the frivolous ness and feebleness into which her existence is apt to I will illustrate this by one more anecdote from the same campaign to which allusion has been already made—Sir Charles Napier's campaign against the robber tribes of Upper Seinde.

Immortality

Again, believing in the immortality of the soul, we must still ask the question of Socrates, 'What is that which we snppose to be immortal?' Is it the per sonal and individual element in us, or the spiritual and universal? Is it the principle of knowledge or of goodness, or the union of the two? Is it the mere force of life which is determined to be, or the con sciousness of self which cannot be got rid of, or the fire of genius which refuses to be extinguished? Or is there a hidden being which is allied to the Author of all existence, who is because he is perfect, and to whom our ideas of perfection give us a title to belong? Whatever answer is given by us to these questions, there still remains the necessity of allowing the perma nence of evil, if not for ever, at any rate for a time, in order that the wicked 'may not have too good a bargain' For the annihilation of evil at death, or the eternal duration of it, seem to involve equal difficulties in the moral order of the universe. Sometimes we are led by our feelings, rather than by our reason, to think of the good and wise only as existing in another life. Why should the mean, the weak, the idiot, the infant, the herd of men who have never in any proper sense the use of reason, reappear with blinking eyes in the light of another world? But our second thought is that the hope of humanity is a common one, and that all or none have a right to immortality Reason does not allow us to suppose that we have any greater claims than others, and experience sometimes reveals to us unexpected flashes of the higher nature in those whom we have despised Such are some of the distracting thoughts which press upon us when we attempt to assign any form to our conceptions of a future state.

Again, ideas must be given through something, and we are always prone to argue about the soul from analogies of outward things which may serve to embody our thoughts, but are also partly delusive. For we cannot reason from the natural to the spiritual, or from the outward to the inward. The progress of physiological science, without bringing us nearer to the great secret, has perhaps tended to remove some erroneous notions respecting the relations of body and mind, and in this we have the advantage of the ancients. But no one imagines that any seed of immortality is to be discerned in our mortal frames. The result seems to be that those who have thought most deeply on the immortality of the soul have been content to rest their belief on the agree ment of the more enlightened part of mankind, and on the inseparable connection of such a doctrine with the existence of a God and our ideas of divine justice—also in a less degree on the impossibility of thinking other wise of those whom we reverence in this world. And after all has been said, the figure, the analogy, the argument, are felt to be only approximations in different forms to the expression of the common sentiment of the human heart. The official Life and Letters by Dr Evelyn Abbott and Professor Lewis Campbell appeared in 1897 followed by another volume of Letters (1899). Studies of him were published by Mr Tollemiche (1895) Sir Leslie Stephen (1898) and Mr C. G Montefiore (1900) And two volumes of selections from his sacred and secular writings have been published by Professor Lewis Campbell (1902)

GEORGE HENRY LEWES From n Photograph by Ellioit & Fry

George Henry Lewes (1817-78) was born in London, the grandson of the comedian Charles Lee Lewes Educated partly at Greenwich under Dr Burney, and partly in Jersey and Brittany, he spent some time in a notary's office, and then in the house of a Russian merchant, tried medicine, but could not stand the operating-room, and in 1838 went to Germany for two years. On his return to London he tried the stage as a profession, but soon was at work as a Penny Encyclopædist and Morning Chronicler, as contributor to a dozen journals, reviews, and magazines, and as editor of the Leader (1851-54), and of the Fortnightly (1865-66), which he himself had founded His versatility was remarkable, many of his innumerable articles are on dramatic subjectsthe drama in Germany, France, Italy, Spain, and Ancient Greece-but also on Browning, Tennyson, Districli, Micaulay, Dumas, and Leopardi. He had exceptional gifts as a theatrical critic. In Mr Frederic Harrison's words, he 'began life as a journalist, a critic, a novelist, a dramatist, a biographer, and an essayist, he closed it as a mathematician, a physicist, a chemist, a biologist, a psychologist, and the author of a system of abstract general philosophy. An intellect clear and sharp if not profound, a wit lively and piquant if not very rich, and a style both firm and graceful made. Lewes an eminent critic, biographer, and populariser of science and of what he accepted as philosophy.

The last twenty four years of his life were coloured by his close relations with George Eliot He had been married, but unhappily, in 1840, divorce was not practicable, but in 1854 he and Miss Evans went to Germany, and thenceforward till his death they lived as man and wife, not without embarrassment to both. Lewes greatly helped to encourage George Eliot in her literary work, though one cannot but believe that his advice and influence must in many respects have been disadvantageous Neither of his own novels, Ranthorpe (1847) and Rose, Blanche, and Violet (1848), had or could have any permanent place in literature, and their slender merits consist in direct borrowings from the French, the second, aiming to illustrate three types of character, the gay, the gentle, the decided, satirises current fallacies, follies, and delusions His successful play, The Game of Speculation, is largely a reproduction of Balzac's Mircadet, his comparatively original Noble Heart and Chain of Lvents were failures on the stage and are now forgotten

His Biographical History of Philosophy (1845) was in the third edition recast and expanded as The History of Philosophy from Thales to Comte He had a singular gift in popularising dissertations on philosophical and psychological subjects, but as he started from the Comtist position that metaphysics leads to nothing, his history of philosophy is rather a history of the vanity of philoso By degrees he drifted farther from Comte's position, and insisted that psychology was entitled to rank as a scientific study was neither trained in philosophy nor a completely equipped biologist, there is much of the amateur in all his works on philosophical subjects, which are rather unsystematic but frequently brilliant disquisitions, sometimes containing original and luminous suggestions that have been adopted by authoritative physiologists such as Wundt. associated psychology and physiology more closely than was then usual. Among works in this department are his exposition of Comile's Philosophy of the Sciences (1853), The Physiology of Common Life (1859-60), Anstotle (1864-showing that his anticipations of modern scientific results were smaller thin 15 sometimes alleged), and Problems of Life and Mind (1874-79), dealing in five volumes with the foundations of a creed, the physical basis of | mind, the study of psychology, and mind as a function of the organism Among Lenes's norks were also Seaside Studies (1858) and Studies in Autmal Life (1862), a book on The Spanish Drama (1846), an apologetic Life of Robespierre (1848). On Actors and the Art of Acting (1875) But by far his best-known work is his Life and Horks of Goethe (2 vols 1855), which not merely tool its place as the standard English Life, but was made the basis of two French works on Goethe, and hid before the end of the century passed through six teen editions in the German translation defects, no doubt, especially in the view of those who emphasise the spiritual element in Gotthe Lewes disliked mysticism, allegory, and much that Germans love, but the book is eminently interest ing and readable, and is sane and sensible and independent in criticism The Story of Goethe's Life (1873) is an abridgment.

Weimar in 1775

Weimar is an ancient city on the Ilm, a small stream rising in the Thuringian forests, and losing itself in the Saal at Jenn, a stream on which the sole navigation seems to be that of ducks, and which meanders peacefully through pleasant valleys, except during the rainy season, when mountain torrents swell its current and overflow its banks The Trent, between Trentham and Stafford—'the smug and silver Trent,' as Shakspeare calls it-will give you an idea of this stream. The town is charmingly placed in the Ilm valley, and stands some eight hundred feet above the level of the sea. 'Weimar,' says the old topographer Mathew Merian, 'is Weinin ar, because it was the wine market for Jena and its environs. Others say it was because some one here in ancient days began to plant the vine, who was hence called Il'an But of this each reader may believe just what mas er he pleases '

On a first aequaintance, Weimar seems more like a village bordering a park than a capital with a court, and having all courtly environments. It is so quiet, so simple, and though ancient in its architecture, has none of the pieturesqueness which delights the eye in most old German eities The stone coloured, light brown, and apple green houses have high peaked, slanting roofs, but no quaint gables, no caprices of architectural fancy, none of the mingling of varied styles which elsewhere charm the traveller One learns to love its quiet, simple streets and pleasant paths, fit theatre for the simple actors moving across the seene, but one must live there some time to discover its charm. The aspect it presented when Goethe arrived was of course very different from that presented now, but by diligent inquiry we may get some rough image of the place restored. First be it noted that the city walls were still erect, gates and port culls still spoke of days of warfare. Within these walls were six or seven hundred houses, not more, most of them very ancient. Under these roofs vere about seven thousand inhabitants-for the most part not handsome. The city gates were strictly guarded. No one could pass through them in eart or carriage without leaving his name in the sentinel's book, even Goethe, minister and favourite, could not escape this tiresome formality, as we gather from one of his letters to the Fran von Stein, directing her to go out alone, and meet him beyond the tions, where they still form a most conspicuous Layard erroneously identified Nimrud, feature where he exposed several palaces, with Nineveh (really at Kuyunjik) instead of with Calah his discoveries were great and brilliant, and his book on Aincoch and its Remains (1848), followed by The Ruins of Americk and Babylon (1853), after he had excavated with success at Kuyunjik and elsewhere, made him famous as 'Nineveli Layard,' although his first book had little to do with Ninesch, but with the palaces of Ashur-nasirpal, Esarhaddon, and Shalmaneser II at Calah, another capital of the Assyrian kings with enthusiasm as a great discoverer, he was presented with the freedom of the city of London, was made DCL by Oxford, and was Lord Rector of Aberdeen University 1855-56, and he became MP for Aylesbury 1852-57, for Southwark 1860-69, Foreign Under Secretary 1861-66, Chief Commissioner of Works 1868-69 In 1869 he went as British Ambassador to Spain, and in 1877 to Constantinople, where he strenuously supported Beaconsfield's policy His philo Turkish sympathies during and after the war provoked comment nt home, and in 1878, having been made a GCB, he withdrew from public life. Two volumes of basreliefs in plates were called Monuments of America (1849 and 1853), and he issued abridged editions of his two descriptive books. He was a skilled excavator and a good describer, but no archæologist, the decipherment of the inscriptions was done by Rawlinson and others But he was keenly interested in Italian art, revised Kugler's Handbook of Painting, edited a handbook to Rome, and wrote the Introduction to the English version of Morelli's great book on the Italian printers and their methods. In 1887 he published an interesting volume on his Early Adventures in Persia, Sustana, and Babyloma, his Autobiography and Jallers was edited in 1903 by the Hon W N Bruce, who made it known that a work by Layard on his diplomatic experiences would at some future date be given to the public. The extracts are from his first book

Nimroud.

It was evening as we approached the spot The spring runs had clothed the mound with the richest verdure, and the fertile meadows which stretched around it were covered with flowers of every hue. Amidst this luxuriant regetation were partly concealed a few fragments of bricks, potters, and alabaster, upon which might be traced the well defined wedges of the cunciform character. Did not the e remains mark the nature of the ruin, it might have been confounded with a natural eminence of consecutive narrow mounds, still retaining the appear ance of walls or ramparts, stretched from its base, and The river flowed at some formed a vast quadrangle distance from them its waters, swollen by the incluing of the snows on the Armenian hills, were broken into a thousand foaming whirlpools by an artificial barrier built neross the stream. On the eastern bank the soil had been washed away by the current, but a solid mass of masonry still withstood its impetuosity The Arab who guided my small raft gave himself up to religious ejaculations as we approached this formidable cataract, over which we were carried with some violence. Once safely through the danger, my companion explained to me that this on usual change in the quiet face of the river was caused by a great dam which had been built by Nimrod, and that in the autumn, before the winter rains, the huge stones of which it was constructed, squared, and united by cramps of iron, were frequently visible above the surface of the stream. It was, in fact, one of those monuments of a great people, to be found in all the rivers of Mesopo tamia, which were undertaken to ensure n constant supply of water to the innumerable canals spreading like net work over the surrounding country, and which, even m the days of Alexander, were looked upon as the works of an ancient nation. No wonder that the traditions of the present inhabitants of the land should assign them to one of the founders of the human race! The Arab was telling me of the connection between the dam and the city built by Arthur, the lieutenant of Nimrod, the vast ruins of which were now before us-of its purpose as a causeway for the mighty hunter to cross to the opposite palace, now represented by the mound of Hammum Ali-and of the histories and fate of the kings of a primitive race, still the favourite theme of the inhabitants of the plains of Shinar, when the last glow of twilight faded away, and I fell asleep as we glided onward to Brighdad

The Unearthing of a Winged Bull.

On the morning I rode to the encampment of Sheikh Abd ur rahman, and was returning to the mound, when I saw two Arabs of his tribe urging their mares to the top of their speed. On approaching me they stopped, 'Hasten, O Bey,' exclaimed one of them—'hasten to the diggers, for they have found Nimrod himself. Wallah, it is wonderful, but it is true! we have seen him with our eyes. There is no god but God,' and both joining in this pious exclamation, they galloped off, without further words, in the direction of their tents.

On reaching the ruins I descended into the new trench, and found the workmen, who had already seen me as I approached, standing near a heap of baskets and cloaks Whilst Awad advanced and asked for a present to cele brate the occasion, the Arabs withdrew the screen they had hastily constructed, and disclosed an enormous human head sculptured in full out of the nlabaster of the country They had uncovered the upper part of a figure, the re mainder of which was still buried in the earth. I saw at once that the head must belong to a winged hon or bull, similar to those of Khorsabad and Persepolis. It was in admirable preservation. The expression was calm yet majestic, and the outline of the features showed a freedom and knowledge of art scarcely to be looked for in the The cap had three horns, works of so remote a period and, unlike that of the human headed bulls hitherto found in Assyria, was rounded and without ornament at the

I was not surprised that the Arabs had been amazed and terrified at this apparation. It required no stretch of imagination to conjure up the most strange fancies. This gigantic head, blanched with age, thus rising from the bowels of the earth, might well have belonged to one of those fearful beings which are pictured in the traditions of the country as appearing to mortals, slowly ascending from the regions below. One of the workmen, on eatching the first glimpse of the monster, had thrown down his basket and run off towards Mosul as fast as his legs could carry him I learned this with regret, as I anticipated the consequences

Whilst I was superintending the removal of the earth which still clung to the sculpture, and giving directions for the continuation of the work, a noise of horsemen was heard, and presently Abd ur rahman, followed by half his tribe, appeared on the edge of the trench the two Arabs and reached the tents and published the wonders they had seen, every one mounted his mare and rode to the mound, to satisfy himself of the truth of these inconceivable reports. When they beheld the head they all cried together, 'There is no god but God, and Mohammed is his prophet!' It was some time before the sheikh could be prevailed upon to descend into the pit and convince himself that the image he saw was 'This is not the work of men's hands,' ex claimed he, 'but of those infidel giants of whom the prophet—peace be with him !- has said that they were higher than the tallest date tree, this is one of the idols which Noah-peace be with lim !-cursed before the flood. In this opinion, the result of a careful examina tion, all the bystanders concurred

Sir George Webbe Dasent (1817-96) was born in St Vincent, of which his father was Attorney-General, the family, of Norman-French extraction, had owned property in the West Indies since the Restoration He was educated at Westminster School and King's College, London, and graduated B A from Magdalen Hall, Oxford, in 1840 Through John Sterling he came to know his father 'The Thun derer,' Carlyle, Mill, Julius Hare, and Flinckeray In 1841 he went to Stockholm as secretary to the British Envoy, and during his four years' sojourn there developed his love for the Scandinavian literature and mythology, in which he was encour aged by Jakob Grimm About 1840 he had begun to write for the Times, on his return to England in 1845 he became assistant editor to Mr Delane (whose sister he married), and for twenty-five years filled this post with great ability Called to the Bar in 1852, and made DCL, he was for thirteen years Professor of English Literature and Modern History at King's College. He often acted as Civil Service examiner in English and modern languages, from 1870 to 1892 was a Civil Service Commissioner, and was knighted in 1876. He more than once visited Iceland Among his works were four novels -The Annals of an Eventful Life, Thee to One, Half a Life, and The Vikings of the Baltic, an Icelandic grammar, a translation of The Prose or Younger Edda (1842), dedicated in gratitude for encouragement to Carlyle, Popular Tales from the Norse (1859) and Tales from the Fjeld (1874), both from the Norwegian of Asbjörnsen, and translations from the Icelandic of the Saga of Burnt Njal (1861) and the Story of Gish the Outlaw (1866), as also of the Orkney and Hacon sagas for the Rolls Series in 1894 A Life of Delane by him has been withheld from publication till 'the times are ripe.' His Introduction to Asbjörnsen's Popular Tales nas a solid contribution to folklore, and nas by him considered his best piece of work, his command of terse and vigorous English is best known to the average reader from Burnt Njal He wrote frequently for the Ldinburgh, the Quarterly, and Fraser's Magazine A new edition of the Popular Tales, with a biographical Preface by his son, was issued in 1903

Sir William Stirling-Maxwell (1818-78) was the son of Mr Stirling of Keir, and it was only on the death of his uncle, Sir John Maxwell of Pollok, in 1865, and his succession to the estates, that he assumed the baroneter and changed his name to Stirling-Maxwell He was born at Kenmure House near Glasgow, graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, travelled in Italy, Spain, and the Levant (1839-42), and sat in the House of Commons as Conservative representative for Perth He repeatedly visited Spain, and lived mainly a life of learned leisure, but was Rector of the Universities of St Andrews and of Edinburgh, Chancellor of Glasgow University, DCL, and KT, and he died of fever at Venice His second wife was the Hon Mrs Norton (see page 386) His minor publications—save the first, poems published in 1839-mainly concern bibliography and His first important work was The Annals of the Artists of Spain (3 vols 1848), part of which was rewritten and published separately as I clasques and his Works (1855) book showed remarkably wide information and great good taste, proved highly entertaining, and completely eclipsed all earlier works dealing with the subject, though the style was somewhat The Closter Life of the Emperor laboured Charles I' (1852) supplied deficiencies and corrected errors in the popular account of the emperor in Robertson's History Stirling-Maxwell had access to documents unknown to Robertson, and was greatly more familiar with Spanish literature, and his story, while adding materially to what had been known of Charles's last years, rather impaired the romantic conception till then prevalent. At once accepted as authoritative and admirable by scholars like Richard Ford, Prescott, and Motley, it is still by far the most complete and interesting account in English, though Mignet in France and Gachard in Belgium have both dealt more exhaustively with the same subject. Stirling-Maxwell's most elaborate work, at which he had been working ever since he finished the Cloister Life, was not published till 1883, five years after his death-Don John of Austria, or Passages from the History of the Sixteenth Century He had bestowed much labour on precise verification of facts, and on the perfecting of the style, which is simpler and clearer than in his earlier works

Charles V, even after his retirement to the cloisters at Yuste (in February 1557), continued to wield the imperial power as firmly and almost as fully as he had done at Augsburg or Toledo, though he joined earnestly in the religious observances of the monks, and even performed special rites humself In the Closter Life Stirling-Waxwell thus tells how Charles performed a Funeral Service for Himself.

About this time [August 1558], according to the his torran of St Jerome his thoughts seemed to turn more than neurl to religion and its rites. Whenever during his stay at Yuste any of his friends, of the degree of princes or Inights of the fleece, had died, he had ever been punctual in doing honour to their memory, by causing their obseques to be performed by the frare, and these lugubrious services may be said to have formed the fes tivals of the gloomy life of the cloister The drily masses said for his own soul were always accompanied by others for the souls of his father, mother, and wife. But now he ordered further solumnities of the funeral kind to be performed in behalf of these relations, each on a different day, and attended them himself, preceded by a page bear ing a taper, and joining in the chant, in a very devout and audible manner, out of a lattered prayer book. These rites ended, he asked his confessor whether he might not now perform his own funeral, and so do for himself what would soon have to be done for him by others. Regla replied that his Majesty, please God, might hie many years, and that when his time came these services would be gratefully rendered, without his taking any thought 'But,' persisted Charles, 'would it about the matter not be good for my soul?' The monk said that certainly it would, pous works done during life being far more efficiences than when postponed till after death parations were therefore at once set on foot, a catafalque. which had served before on similar occasions, was erected. and on the following day, the 30th of August, as the monlish historian relates, this celebrated service was actually performed. The high altar, the catafalque, and the whole church shone with a blaze of wax lights, the friars were all in their places, at the altars, and in the choir, and the household of the emperor attended in deep mourning 'The pious monarch himself was there, attired in sable weeds, and bearing a taper, to see him self interred and to celebrate his own obseques! While the solumn mass for the dead was sting, he came forward and gave his taper into the hands of the officiating priest, in token of his desire to yield his soul into the hands of his Maker High above, over the I neeling throne and the gargeous vestments, the flowers, the curling incense, and the glittering altar, the same idea shone forth in that splended causas whereon Titian had pictured Charles kneeling on the threshold of the heavenly mansions prepried for the blessed. The funeral rites ended, the emperor dined in his western alcove He ate little, but he remained for a great part of the afternoon sitting in the open air and basking in the sun, which, as it descended to the horizon, best strongly upon the white walls ing a violent pain in his head, he returned to his chamber and lay down Mathisio, whom he had sent in the morn ing to Narandrilla to attend the Count of Oropesa in his illness, found him when he returned still suffering con siderably, and attributed the pain to his having remained too long in the hot sunshine. Next morning he was somewhat better, and was able to get up and go to mass, but still felt oppressed, and complained much of thirst He told his confes or, however, that the service of the day before had done him good. The sunshine again tempted him into his open gallery. As he sat there he sent for a portrait of the empress, and hung for some time, lost in thought, over the gentle face, which, with its blue eyes, auburn hair, and pensive beauty, somewhat resembled the noble countenance of that other Isabella, the great queen of Castile He next called for a picture of Our Lord Praying in the Garden, and then for a sletch of the Last Judgment, by Titran Having looked his last upon the image of the wife of his youth, it seemed as if he were now bidding farewell, in the contemplation of these other favourite pictures, to the noble art which he had loved with a love which cares and years and sick ness could not quench, and that will ever be remembered with his better fame Thus occupied, he remained so long abstracted and motionless that Mathisio, who was on the watch, thought it right to awake him from his revene On being spoken to, he turned round and complimed that he was ill. The doctor felt his pulse, and pronounced him in a fever Again the afternoon sun was shining over the great walnut tree, full into the gallery From this pleasant spot, filled with the fragrance of the garden and the murmur of the fountain, and bright with glimpses of the golden Vera, they carried him to the gloomy chamber of his sleepless nights, and laid him on the bed from which he was to rise no more.

There is a biographical note in the six volume edition of Stirling Maxwell's Works (1891), which includes The Artists of Spain (new ed.) The Cloister Life (4th ed.) and a volume of Essays, Adds sees &c.

James Anthony Froude.

Like his master, Carlyle, Froude holds a place apart among the historical writers of his age both the one and the other (due proportion guarded) are, in the first place and pre-eminently, prophets and men of letters rather than historical specialists In choosing to write history, both were primarily determined not by the simple scientific desire of ascertaining what had actually happened in the past, but by the consideration that historical narra tive was a suitable vehicle for the expression of their individual views regarding man's life and destiny In the case of Froude the distinction is forced upon us at once by the character of his work as a whole, and by the special gifts and temperament of which it is the expression. He belongs to a different order of spirits from Hallam or Macaulty or Freeman, and it is as a literary artist and a teacher of complex and illusive nature that he presents himself equally in his writings and in his mental history

James Anthony Froude was born at Dartington near Totnes, Devonshire, 23rd April 1818. His fither was Archdeacon of Totnes, and, according to his son, was a typical English Churchiman of the period preceding the uphdaval caused by the Tractarian movement. The Church 'he regarded as part of the constitution, and the Prayer book as an Act of Parlament which only folly or disloyally could quarrel with' 'Dissent in all its forms,' adds his son, 'was a crime in our house' in certain traits of the archdeacon's character we find suggestions at once of contrast and resemblance to his distinguished son. He had been 'a hard inder' in youth, and it was a marked trait in his son that all through life he was passionately fond of outdoor sports, and was never happier than then he had a roa or a gun in his hand, or was steering his yacht in the English Channel. The archidecton was 'a Fort of the old school,' and, after a fishion of his own Anthony was his course a Tort of increasing intensity to the close of his day. On the other hand, there is as 'a sort of Stoicism about Archideacon Froude's character which sometimes surprised those was had only seen him for a day or two.' His son namired the Stoical type beyond all others, wit Stocism is the last characteristic ne sheeld that of actributing to him either in volth or age Itis evident macco, that father and son tere of corntially differ ent matures, and ding the one never quite understood the other And not only with his father but also with his trockder brotners, Hurrell William, and Froude never appears to have been in contril sympathy Hur rell, has a bril lant gifts and enthus as the temper mode him one of the most distir guished figures among his contemporaries at Ox ford, was one of Newman's most ardent associates in his mis ion of de Protestantising the Church of England, and, as Anthony's future career was to show, the mission was one which appealed neither to his heart nor his As for the second brother, William, his tastes his in another direction than those of Anthony-mechanical science being the subject to which be devoted himself with all the ability which was the common inheritance of the family From his early years, we are told by a friend of the family, 'Anthony felt chilled, crushed, and fettered, and, as such an experience is never outlived, it may partly explain that undertone of austerit, which is seldom absent from anything he wrote. But, if his home was uncongenial, he was in lively sympathy with the surroundings where his home lay. It was in youth that he acquired that love of the sca which remained the chief ple is ure of his life, and it was then, also, that he acquired that interest in those 'forgotten worthies'—the naval heroes of his native Devon—to vhose e ploits he has devoted some of his most brilliant pages. And from these tv o interests we may deduce another characteristic—his passionate patriotism, which to foreigners is the predominating note of his work as a historian

After three veirs 1830 331 spent at Westminster

School, and other two at a private school at Morton, I roude proceeded to Oriel College, Oxford 71 the inc of ecvention He High Church movement which Yeuman. al allow of Orial, was the inspiring leader, was then in full flood, and from the example of hts brother Hurrell, it was to be expected that Anthony would naturally be drawn into it Nev man was prepared to give him a warm welcome from the first Froude Showed that he meant to tale a way of his He held lumself aloof from Neuman and his friends, and gave the general im pression 'that he combined in a rare and spiritual attitude is as correct as either his brother Hurrell or Newman could have wished, he speaks of the 'awful note of heres,' with pure sacramental fervour, and he virtually accepts all the astonishing miracles of the saint. As about the same date (1814) he also took Deacon's orders, it seemed as if he had definitively chosen his career

But the spell of Newman over Froude, if it was ever real, was of brief duration In 1847 lie published a volume entitled Shadows of the Clouds, under the pseudonym of Zeta, and in 1848 his Nemes's of Faith (anonymously) Taken together these two books reveal a moral and intellectual distemper which is a vivid commentary on the spiritual strain which their author had undergone Morally, they are the product of a nature which had lost its bearings in the conflict of morbid sentiments and emotions, intellectually, they prove that Froude had lost his faith not only in Tractarianism, but in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian The loss of his fellowship, his abandonment of the Church, and his resignation of the headmastership of the High School of Hobart Fown in Insminin, to which he had been appointed, were the necessary consequences of his spiritual transformation. His 'Sturm und Drang' period, the only period at which we have a glimpse into his inner life, was now at an end, and a fortunite destmy had brought him into contact with a teacher who renewed his moral basis and gave a direction to his life which he was henceforth to follow with such happy results for English literature Froude ungrudgingly acknowledged his debt to the teaching and example of Carlyle, and the whole scope and tendency of his work bear manifest proof of the extent of his obligation fundamental ideas of Carlyle-his views regarding the function of great men, his contempt for the vex populi, his deflication of force as the expression of ethical value, his antagonism to the develop ments of modern civilisation-all these are likewise the stock ideas of Froude, who saves his originality only by his individual manner of expressing them

Froude had turned his thirtieth year when he broke with his past by the publication of his Nemesis of Faith, and henceforward the world knows him only as the indefatigable author who speedily took his place among the chief literary figures of his time In the Westminster Review he began that series of papers, continued in Fraser's Magazine (of which he was editor from 1860 to 1874) and in other magazines, which are collected in the four volumes entitled Short Studies on Great Subjects The general character of these papers is the sufficient proof that their author was essentrally the 'man of letters' rather than the historical specialist The historical specialist hesitates to pass beyond his proper domain, knowing as he does what accumulated knowledge is necessary towards a well grounded judgment, but Froude in these short studies discusses philosophers and poets, theologians and saints, statesmen and commanders of every age and country. He made no pretension to add to our knowledge regarding the different subjects which he treated, but only pedantry would deny that, in adorning as he did every theme that he touched, he clothed them with an interest which it is not the least valuable function of literature to evoke.

In 1856 appeared the first two volumes of his greatest literary achievement, his History of England from the Fall of Cardinal II olses to the Spanish Armada, which, in his own words, was 'the companion of twenty years of pleasant but unintermittent labour' Like all Froude's historical work, it was conceived with a controversial intention, and it expressed at once the new influence of Carlyle and his rebound of feeling from his Trac tarian bondage In his delineation of Henry VIII, the most original part of his work, both of these tendencies were focussed, he made him a figure in the mould of Carlyle's 'heroes,' and in so doing passed judgment on the High Church view that Henry was merely the unscrupulous author of an unhappy schism Few books have been subjected to more searching criticism, but no fair reader will deny the justice of the estimate of the work as a whole pronounced by Bishop Stubbs, a historian whose methods and general views were so funda mentally opposed to Froude's own It is a book, says Bishop Stubbs, to 'which even those who differ in principle from the writer will not refuse the tribute of praise, as a work of great industry, power, and importance' Equally polemical in in tention and equally inspired by the Carlylean oracle was The English in Ireland, which appeared in three volumes between 1871 and 1874. The immediate occasion of the book was Mr Gladstone's policy of conciliation towards Ireland, and its object was to prove that only by the strong hand could Ireland be made a prosperous country and tolerable neighbour His Casar, a Sketch (1879), in which the hero is again the providential 'strong man,' Froude regarded as his best book, an opinion which was not shared by Carlyle, whose brief comment on it was-'It tells me nothing of Cæsar 3

From the beginning of his career as an author, Froude had shown that he deliberately meant that each of his books should produce a sensation, and an opportunity now came to him of surpassing all his previous efforts in this direction. As literary executor of Carlyle, it devolved on him to be at once his editor and his biographer, and by the manner in which he performed both tasks he evoked a storm of controversy which is hardly to be paralleled in the history of English literature. Of his edition of Cirlyle's Reminiscences (1881) it may be safely said that no English writer of eminence ever gave a work to the public with such cynical disregard of the primary duties of an editor take but one example of his negligence-surely Froude should have laid his hand on his heart when he made Carlyle speak of his friend Sir Henry Taylor's 'morbid vanity,' when the words he actually wrote were 'marked veracity' Inaccuracy had from the first been Froude's besetting sin, but the general public now first realised the full measure of the sins of which he was capable under this head With regard to the portrait of Carlyle which he has drawn in the biography (1882-84), there will probably be always a difference of opinion, but it is to be noted that to the great majority of those who knew Carlyle as well as Froude himself (the only fitting judges) it seemed an essentially distorted image, the creation of the idiosyncrasies of the man who drew it. Nevertheless, of all Froude's books it is doubtless the one which will preserve his name longest, the eminence and distinctiveness of its subject and the skill of the biographer combine to make it a representative book of an epoch, and as such it has its only companion in Boswell's Life of Johnson

A few pleasant incidents had diversified Froude's somewhat stormy career as a man of letters 1869 he was chosen Lord Rector of the University of St Andrews-an honour which he described as the first public recognition which he had received, in 1876 he was appointed a member of the Scottish University Commission, and in 1875 he was sent out as a commissioner to South Africa, for whose troubles he prescribed his borrowed panacea of a benevolent dictatorship Two unofficial journeys, one to the Australian colonies and the other to the West Indies, resulted in his Oceana (1886) and the West Indies, or the Bow of Ulysses (1888)—in both of which, though he expressed the hope it might be otherwise, he as usual 'trod on many corns' But the distinction of his life which he valued most came to him near its close. In 1892 he was made Regius Professor of History in Oxford, and thus, by an irony which he keenly appreciated, he came to sit in the chair of his adversary Freeman, who in serson and out of season had denounced him as a sciolist and a charlatan. He held his appointment only for two years, but in that space he crowned his long and industrious life by the most charming books that came from his hand-The Life and Letters of Erasmus (1894), Elizabethan Scamen of the Sixteenth Century (1895), and Lectures on the Council of Trent (1896) He died on the 20th of October 1894, at Salcombe, his home in his native Devon

In many passages of his writings Froude has told us how he thought history should be conceived and written. 'The address of history,' he says, 'is less to the understanding than to the higher emotions' 'History,' he says again, is 'nature's drama,' should be written like a drama, and should teach like a drama. A science of history he scouted as a vain imagination, and maintained that, if our knowledge of the past taught us anything, it was 'that we should draw no horoscopes' But, if history cannot be reduced to a science for the guidance of states, it performs a service of no less importance 'It is a voice for ever sounding across the centuries the laws of right and wrong'. In his own treatment of history Froude gave the freest play to these conceptions The essential character of his chief historical writings is that they are conceived and written as dramas Ever in his foreground there is a great central figure—hero or villain-round whom all events cluster, and with reference to whom they are selected and appraised This personage develops in his hands, not as the rigid scrutiny of facts should determine, but in the fashion in which a character grows in the mind Such are his delineations of the creative artist of Henry VIII, of Thomas Cromwell, of Mary Stewart, of Charles V, of Julius Cæsar, and, it may be added, of Carlyle-all of whom, before he has done with them, become gigantesque figures with their natural traits distorted beyond recogni-Equally characteristic of Froude as a historian is his insistence on the ethical import of persons and events In this respect he, of course, resembles his master, Carlyle, but, though he owes to Carlyle his fundamental ethical principles, it was by his own natural instincts that he was primarily concerned with the problems of human destiny In the case of Froude, as in the case of Carlyle, it was but the accident of circumstances that made him a historian and not an official preacher, and to his ethical fervour is doubtless due the polemical tone which is present in most 'Having nobody to abuse,' of what he wrote he writes to his friend [Sir] John Skelton, with reference to his Oceana, 'I am like trying to fly a kite without wind'

History thus conceived makes a wide popular appeal, and Froude possessed precisely the requisite gifts for the successful exemplification of his He was master of a style which by its theories rapidity, clearness, and idiomatic grace is unsurpassed for the purposes of pure narrative. much a man of the world as a student, he knew the range of common interests, selected his facts accordingly, and in his presentation of them had an unerring instinct as to the limits of the average intelligence. Moreover, though the only dull book he ever wrote was his romance, The Two Chiefs of Dunboy, he had in a high degree that 'picturesque sensibility' which instinctively appreliends the poetie aspects of persons and events, and can From these eminent make them visible to others ments, however, large abatements have to be made, his inaccuracy was such that in matters of fact he cannot be quoted with confidence, and there are few writers of equal intellectual force whose judgments carry less authority than Froude's Yet, after every reserve, he remains one of the most interesting and important literary figures of his time. For the general public he has done the invaluable service of making history an attractive study, and English literature owes him a debt of another kind and of not less account no writer has done more than Froude to maintain the best traditions of English prose in that middle style which is the work a-day instrument of every literature.

History

What, then, is the use of History? and what are its lessons? If it can tell us little of the past and nothing of the future, who waste our time over so barren a study?

Firs, it is a voice for ever sounding across the centuries the laws of right and wrong. Opinions after, manners change, creeds rise and fall, but the moral law is written on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or un righteous deed, for cruelty and oppression, for last or vanity the price has to be paid in last not always by the chief oficinders, but paid by some one. Justice and truth alone endure and live. Injustice and falsehood may be long lived, but doomsday comes at last to them, in I rench revolutions and other terrible ways.

That is one lesson of History Another is, that we should draw no horoscopes, that we should expect little, for what we expect will not come to pass. Revolutions, reformations—tho e vast movements into which heroes and saints have flung themselves, in the belief that they were the dawn of the millennium-have not borne the fruit which they looked for Millenniums are still far These great convulsions have the world changed -perliaps improved -but not improved as the actors in them hoped it would be Luther would have gone to work with less heart could be have foreseen the Thirty Years' War, and in the distance the theology of Tubingen Washington might have hesitated to draw the sword against Lingland could be have seen the country which he made as we see it now [February 1864].

The most reasonable anticipations full us—antecedents the most apposite mislead us, because the conditions of human problems never repeat themselves. Some new feature alters everything—some element which we detect only in its after operation.

But this, it may be said, is but a mergre outcome Can the long records of humanity, with all its joys and sorrows, its sufferings and its conquests, teach us no more than this? Let us approach the subject from another sade

If you'vere asked to point out the special features in which Shakespeare's plays are so transcendently excellent, you would mention, perhaps, among others, this, that his stories are not put together, and his characters are not conceived, to illustrate any particular law or principle. They teach many lessons, but not any one prominent above another, and when we have drawn from them all the direct instruction which they contain, there remains still something unresolved—something which the artist give, and which the philosopher cannot give.

It is in this characteristic that i e are necustomed to sai Shakespeare's supreme truth hes. He represents real life. His dramas teach as life teaches—neither less nor more. He builds his fabrics as include does, on right and wrong, but he does not struggle to make nature more systematic than she is. In the subtle interflow of good and evil—in the unmerited sufferings of innocence—in the disproportion of penalties to desert—in the seeming blindness with which justice, in intempting to assert itself, overwhelms innocent and guilty in a common ruin—Shalespeare is true to real experience. The mysters of life he leaves as he finds it, and, in his most tremen dous positions, he is addressing rather the intellectual emotions than the understanding—knowing well that the understanding in such things is at fault, and the sage as ignorant as the child

(From 'The Science of History in Short Studies or Great Subjects, vol 1)

Flight of Mary Stuart from Holyrood to Dunbar after the Murder of Rizzio

The important point gained, Darnley would not awake suspicion by returning to the Queen, he sent her word privately that 'all was well,' and at eight in the evening Stewart of Traquair, Captain of the Royal Guard, Arthur Erskine, 'whom she would trust with a thousand lives,' and Standen, a young and gillant gentlemm, assembled in the Queen's room to arrange a plan for the escape from Holyrood The first question was where she was to go Though the gates were no longer occupied, the Palace would doubtless be watched, and to nttempt flight and to fail would be certain ruin. In the Castle of Edinburgh slie would be safe with Lord Erskine, but she could reach the Castle only through the streets, which would be beset with enemies, and unfit as she was for the exertion, she determined to make for Dunbar

She stirred the blood of the three youths with the most touching appeal which could be made to the generosity of man. Pointing to the child that was in her womb, she adjured them by their loyalty to save the unborn hope of Scotland. So addressed, they would have flung themselves insked on the pikes of Morion's troopers. They swore they would do her bidding be it what it would, and then, 'after her sweet manner and wise directions, she dismissed them till midnight to put all in order as she herself excellently directed.'

'The rendezvous appointed with the horses was near the broken tombs and demolished sepultures in the ruined Abbey of Holyrood' A secret passage led un derground from the palace to the vaults of the abbey, and at midnight Mary Stuart, accompanied by one ser vant and her husband—who had left the lords under pretence of going to bed—'erawled through the charnel house, among the bones and skulls of the antient kings,' and 'came out of the earth' where the horses were shivering in the March midnight nir

The moon was clear and full 'The Queen with incredible animosity was mounted en croup belind Sir Arthur Erskine upon a beautiful English double gelding' 'the King on a courser of Naples,' and then away—past Restalrig, past Arthur's Seat, neross the bridge and neross the field of Musselburgh, past Seton, past Prestonpans, fast as their horses could speed, 'six in all—their Minjesties, Erskine, Traquair, and a chamberer of the Queen' In two hours the heavy gate of Dunbar had closed behind them, and Mary Stuart was safe. (From the History of England, Chap. VLIV.)

Froude's account of the escape is based on a letter of Standens. The King is Darnley, and animosily means 'spirit' Prestonnias is nearer Edinburgh than Seton, and should accordingly come first.

Character of Erasmus

Trouble enough and naviety enough! Yet in the midst of had health and furious monks—it is the noblest feature in him—his industry never slackened, and he drew out of his difficulties the materials which made his name immortal. He was for ever on the wing searching libraries, visiting learned men, consulting with politicians or princes. His correspondence was enormous. His letters on literary subjects are often treatises in themselves, and go where he would his eyes were open to all things and persons. His writings were passing He was always adding and through edition on edition correcting, while new tracts, new editions of the Fathers, show an acuteness of attention and an extent of reading which to a modern student seems beyond the reach of any single intellect. Yet he was no stationary scholar confined to desk or closet. He was out in the world, travelling from city to city, gathering materials among all places and all persons, from palace to vallage alehouse, and missing nothing which had meaning or amusement in it. In all literary lustory there is no more extra ordinary figure. Harassed by orthodox theologians, uncertain of his duties in the revolutionary tempest, doubtful in what country to find rest or shelter, anxious for his future, anxious for his life (for he I new how Orthodoxy hated him, and he had no wish to be a martyr in an ambiguous cause), he was putting together another work which, like Moria, was to make his name immortal Of his learned productions, brilliant as they were, Erasmus thought but little. He considered them hastily and inaccurately done, he even wondered how any one could read them But his letters, his Moria, and now the Colloquies, which he was composing in his intervals of leisure, are pictures of his own mind, pictures of men and things which show the hand of an artist in the highest sense, never spiteful, never malicious, always delightful and amusing, and finished photographs of the world in which he lived and moved. The subject might be mean or high, a carver of genius will make a work of art out of the end of a broomstick. The jour ney to Brindisi was a common adventure in a fly boat, Horace has made it live for ever Erasmus had the true artist's gift of so liandling everything that he touched, vulgar or sublime, that human interest is immediately awal ened, and in these Colloquies, which are the record of what he himself saw and heard, we have the human inhabitants of Europe before us as they then were in all countries except Spain, and of all degrees and sorts, bishops and abbots, monks and parish priests, lords and commoners, French grisettes, soldiers of fortune, treasure seekers, quacks, conjurers, tavern keepers, there they all stand, the very image and mirror of the time Miserable as he often considered hunself, Erismus shows nothing of it in the Colloquies No bitterness, no complainings, no sour ansterity or would be virtuous earnestness, but everywhere a genial human sympathy which will not be too hard upon the wretchedest of rogues, with the healthy apprehension of all that is innocent and good

(From Life and Letters of Erasmus, Lecture 11)

Froude left injanctious that no authorised biography of him should be written. For the early part of his life our chief sources of information are his Exaa, entitled 'The Oxford Connter Reformation (Short Studies, vol 11) and Canon Mozley s Reminiscences (vol. 11). Regarding his later life there are interesting details in The Table Talk of Shirley ([Sir] John Skelton) See also Mr Pollards article in the Appendix to the Dictionary of National Biography and Mr David Wilson's Mr Fronde and Carlyle (1898). Estimates of Froude are given by Sir Leslie Stephen (National Review January 1901) and by Mr Goldwin Smith (North American Review clix, 677). In 1903 in reply to criticism by Mr Alexander Carlyle and Sir James Crichton Browne, there appeared a posthumous volume, entitled My Neutons with Carlyle, in which Froude defended his estimates of Carlyle and his wife and main tained his own fairness as executor printing a letter from his to-executor Sir James Stephen completely approving Froudes discharge of his trust. The Nemesis of Froude was a rejoinder by Sir James Crichton Browne

P HUME BROWN

Ernest Jones (1819-69)-in full, Ernest CHARLES JONES-Chartist poet, was the son of Major Charles Jones, equerry to the Duke of Cum berland who became King of Hanover The major lived long on his German estate, and the son, born at Berlin, was carefully educated at Luneburg, and early became a poet and a politician to England with his father in 1838, was popular in society, published a highly romantic novel, The Wood Spirit (1841), and in 1841 was called to the Bar In 1846 he threw himself strongly into the Chartist movement, supported Feargus O'Connor energetically on the platform and in the press, and was believed to have resigned brilliant prospects to become a political agitator. In 1848 lie was active as far north as Aberdeen, but, arrested at Manchester, was sentenced to two years' imprison ment for seditious speeches. On his release lie was for a while the leader of the lost cause, and in his Notes to the People wrote a history of the democratic movement and edited a People's Paper When the Chartists disappeared as a party he, to the disgust of the faithful remnant, was content to energise as a mere Radical and advocate land nationalisation About the same time he re sumed practice at the Bar, and began to write industriously—at first sensational novels and tales, such as The Lass and the Lady, The Maid of Warsaw, Woman's Wrongs, Beldagan Church, The Painter of Florence Landor praised enthusi astically the poem that gave name to The Battle Day and other Poems (1855) In 1857 Jones published The Revolt of Hindostan (privately printed in 1850), a poem said to liave been written with his own blood in an old Praver-book while he was in prison, Corayda and other Poems ap peared in 1859. He continued to issue pamphlets and lecture in the democratic cause, had stood unsuccessfully for Parliament repeatedly from 1847 on, and was expected to get in for Manchester as Radical member when he suddenly died best-known lyrics were 'The Song of the Poor,' 'The Song of the Day-labourers,' 'The Song of the Factory Slave,' and 'The Song of the Poorer Classes?

Augus Bethune Reach (1821-56), born at Inverness, came to London in 1842, and wrote much for Punch, for many of the magazines, and for the newspapers His two novels were Clement Lorimer (1848, illustrated by Cruikshank) and Leonard Lindsay (1850), but, spite of failing health, he produced innumerable saturcal and social sketches and dramatic trifles

Thomas Mavne Reid (1818-83), known as a story-teller to a world wide circle of readers as 'Captain Mayne Reid' (he dropped the 'Thomas'), was born at Ballyroney, County Down, a Scoto Irish Presbyterian minister's son, his mother being of Scottish Borderer blood, and was himself educated for the ministry in Ulster But with quite other ambitions he in 1840 emigrated to New Orleans, and either by stress of circumstances or a happ instinct entered on the oddly diversified career that in his novels he turned to such good account. Successively storekeeper and negro-overseer, schoolmaster and play-actor, hunter and snarpshooter in the Indian wars, he from time to time plunged into journalism, but in 1847 he took service in the United States army, and as heutenant distinguished himself in the Mexican war—especially at the storming of Chapultepee, where he was so severely wounded that his life was despaired of, and he never completely recovered from his injuries When convalescent he began his first novel, The Rifle Rangers (pub lished 1850) But in 1849, a United States captain, he came to Europe to offer his sword to the Hun garian revolutionists Finding that the revolutionary move already ment had crushed. becn cstablished himself in or near London and embarked on the business of novel writing, and this lienceforward the work of his life. varied only by un lucky building speculations and three years' journalistic en terprise in New York

Ilis last years he spent at Ross in Herefordshire In a long succession of novels-well over thirty in number-he utilised to the full the strangely varied adventures of his own early career vigorous style and the profusion of daring feats, perils, hurbreadth escapes, and romantic episodes riveted the attention of two or three generations of young readers. His romances are lacking in artistic form, but at times he attained to high excellence in narrative style and in description of scenery and character Among the best known of his stories (in v luch he sometimes at least took Tenimore Cooper as model) are The Scalp Hunters (1851), The Boy Hunters (1852), The Young Voyageurs (1953), The War Trail (1857), The Maroon (1862), The Headless Horseman (1866), The Castaways (1870), and The Free Lances (1881) Many of these tales were translated into French and German

Mayne Peid found time to write also books on natural history for loss and on croquet. The Henterr published by his widow in 1890 was in 1900 expanded into a full reord of his life and adventures. Ebenezer Jones (1820-60) was born at Isling ton, of a Welsh family, and was bred a Calvinist. In 1837 he was forced by his father's long illness to turn clerk in a City warehouse, his hours were from eight to eight six days a week. But long ere this he had been writing verses, and now he was powerfully stimulated by influences so various as those of Shelley, Carlyle, and Robert Owen. In 1843 he published his Studies of Sensation and Event, poems amazingly unequal, crude, eccenting and faulty, or even at times 'excruciatingly bad,' yet 'full of the very essence of poetry,' as was ulu mately recognised by Browning and Ros-But at the setti time-spite of kindly encouragement from Bryan Waller and llengist Horne-Jones sav his work was rejected by the world, and he published no more, save a pamplilet on the Land Monopely (1849), which antici rated Henry George by thirty years in proposing to nationalise the land, and three powerful poems, 'To Snow,' the Death,' and 'When the world is burning, not long before his death. He had by professional work as an accountant.

1844 he had married a niece of Edwin Atherstone (see page 146), but the marriage brought only misery and a separation. See three articles by Mr Watts Dunton in the Atheneum (1878), and two notices by Sumner Jones (Ebenezers elder brother, himself a poet) and W J Linton prefixed to a reprint of the Studies (1879)

John Tulloch (1823–86), born at Bridge of Earn, studied at St Andrews and Edinburgh, and after holding charges in Dundee and elsewhere, was in 1854 appointed Principal and Professor of Divinity in St Mary's College, St Andrews. In 1879–80 he was the editor of Fraser He wrote on theism, on the Reformation and its leaders (1859 and 1861), on Pascal, on sin, and on modern religious thought (1884–85) But his principal work was Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in the Seventeenth Century (1872, new ed 1886), a standard authority Mrs Oliphant wrote his Life (1888)

Philip James Bailey.

Philip James Bailey (1816-1902), poet, was born at Nottingham on 22nd April 1816 His father, Thomas Bailey, owned and edited the Nottingham Mercury from 1845 to 1852 Educated at various schools in his native town, in 1831 he matriculated at Glasgow University, which in 1901 conferred on him the degree of LLD In 1836 he settled at Basford, just out of Nottingham, and devoted himself to the production of his masterpiece, Festus, which was published anonymously by William Pickering in 1839 In 1840 he was called to the Bar at Lincoln's Inn, but he never In 1856 he received a Civil List practised pension of £100 From 1864 to 1876 he lived in Jersey, travelling from time to time in Switzerland, France, and Italy Returning to England, he resided near Ilfracombe till 1885, when he moved to Blackheath In his later years lie lived in retirement with his wife, whose death in 1896, after a union of thirty three years, tried him sorely On 6th September 1902, at the age of eighty six, he died at his house in the Ropewalk, Nottingham He was never in close touch with literary circles, though about 1870 he was sometimes present at Westland Marston's symposia, where Rossetti, Swinburne, 'Orion' Horne, and other celebrities were wont to meet. He was sweet, gentle, and rather timid in nature. Superbly handsome in physique and countenance, he rivalled Tennyson in the art of looking like a poet

No poem like Festus has ever been written by a boy of twenty. It is a miracle of mature im maturity Its vogue was almost Byronic Twelve editions have been issued in England, and over The poem was praised by thirty in America Tennyson, Thackeray, Buly er Lytton, and other eminent men 'I can scarcely trust myself,' wrote Tennyson, 'to say how much I admire it, for fear of falling into extravagance' The success of Festus stereotyped Bulley's poetic impulse, which was wasted in vain attempts to imitate himself Angel World (1850), The Mystic (1855), The Age (1858, a weak satire), and The Universal Hymn (1867) failed The poet rishly tried to propitinte oblivion by incorporating 'The Angel World' and portions of the other poems in later editions of Testus The result was disastrous generation recoiled in dismay from a philosophical poem of over forty thousand lines, and Festus joined the limbo of books that are revered unread If the poem is to recapture its first fame, its earlier and better form must be restored

Festus is a variant of that Taust legend which has haunted literature since its birth in the Book of Job. It owes little to Goethe or to Marlowe, their Fausts are incarnations of pessimism, Festus is an incarnation of optimism. It has been called an epic drama, but although it is divided into fifty-two scenes, the action is epic rather than dramatic. The sublimity of its action equals, and its moral altitude surpasses, other epics. Modern thought sees for beyond the spiritual horizon of Homer, Virgil, Dante, and Milton. Their poetry is imperishable, much of their morality is outworn. Festus presents a loftier view of God and Man than any other world-poem. In it deity is more humane and humanity more divine. It adumbrates a prophetic ideal of a divine humanity which will ultimately transmute all evil into all good. Doomsnian of time, Festus impersonates the destiny of humanity, moving through cycles of sin and suffering towards that harmony with itself which is harmony with the Infinite. Lucifer, who guides him through the universe of sensation, is not the more conventional fiend of Marlowe or of Goetlie, but a subtle symbol of the evil that is half good and the good that is half evil. The action sweeps through celestral, terrestrial, and infernal space towards its stupendons culmination, the apotheosis of I estus, the last man, whose attainment of spiritual sovereignty is the signal for the end of all things. Magnificent is the passage in which Festus describes the withering of the world.

The earth is breaking up, all things are thawing, River and mountain mich into their atoms, A little time and atoms will be all. The sea boils, and the mountains rise and sink Like marble bubbles bursting into death. O thou Hereafter, on whose shore I stand, Waiting each toppling moment to engulf me, What am I? Say, thou Present say, thou Past, I e three wise children of Eternity! A life, a death, and an immortal? all? Is this the threefold mystery of man? The lower darker Trinity of earth?

'Tis vain to ask. Nought answers me, not God The air grows thick and dark The sky comes down The sun draws round him streaky clouds, like God Gleaning up writh. Hope hith leapt off my heart, Like a false sibyl, fear smote, from her seat, And overturned it I am bound to die God, why wilt thou not save? The great round world Hath wasted to a column 'neath my feet I'll hurl me off it, then, and search the depth Of space in this one infinite plunge Farewell To earth and heaven and God Doom, spread thy lap, I come, I come But no, may God forbear To judge the tempted purpose of my heart. Me hath he stablished here, and he will save, And I can smile destruction in the face Let his strong hand compress the marble world, And wring the starry fire blood from its heart, Still on this earth core I rejoice in God, I know him and believe in him as Love, And this divinest truth he hath inspired, Merey to man is justice to himself Open thine arms, O death, thou fine of woe And warranty of bliss. I feel the last Red mountainous reinnant of the earth give way The stars are rushing upwards to the light, My limbs are light and liberty is mine The spirit's infinite purity consumes The sullied soul Lternal destiny Opens its bright abyss I am God's Gol Man, die !

Judged solely and separately by the moral and spiritual grandeur of its imaginative conception, Testus is not inferior to any other epic. Issuing with volcanic intensity out of the fiery heart of youth, it moves majestically aniid the stars. The poet, unlike Antreus, falters only when he touches It is in the more familiar scenes that his genius flags. Youth is not ripely humorous or nobly patient, and in the frantic haste of his feverish toil, Bailey failed to fuse all the episodes and incidents, characters and conceptions, into a lucid and In architectonic symmetry harmonious whole Festus is as far below the great epics as it is above them in imaginative conception knew better than he built. His soul outran his hand, his imagination outsoared his technique The poem lacks not only the vaster rhythms and deeper harmonies, but it is full of minor technical flaws Metrical irregularities abound, the lyrical interludes are feeble, many of the characters are shadowy The amorous ratiocinations of Festus, Angela, Clara, Helen, and Elissa mar the austerity of the theme. Doubtless they are meant to show the regenerative nobility of womanhood, but this platonic parliament of platonic loves brings a breath of incongruity into the severe heroism of the action. Neverthe less in spite of its manifold defects, Festus stands unchallengeably among the great spiritual epics of the world Its profound significance will be gradually perceived as religion emerges from the mists and morasses of mechanical theologies, for it foreshadows the only Christian philosophy which can endure Bailey, indeed, was far in advance of his time and of our time. His mystical optimism is equally repugnant to scientific and to religious materialism, but as science and religion abandon their unreal antagonisms for common and co-ordinated research in the unexplored field of spiritual experience, his imaginative solution of the problem of life will find a juster evaluation. Like all possible solutions, it is and must always be a splendid hypothesis, but until a still more magnificent hypothesis be evolved, it will be supreme.

In the realm of absolute poetry Testus has never been adequately appraised. It occupies a lonely pinnacle whose altitude has not yet been measured by a comparative criticism which is apt to overvalue purely literary skill and purely technical What is Bailey's place in Victorian literature ' In our judgment, not far below Tenny son and Browning At its best, his blank verse is as fine as any since Marlowe or since Milton. His imaginative energy is of the first order sees in flashing symbols, he thinks in thunder and lightning His passionate mind pours out mighty torrents of majestic imagery An artificer of terse phrase and gnomic epigram, his incandescent style is shaped by the powerfully wielded hammer of his imagination on the iron anvil of his thought. In his work there are faint vestiges of Miltonic and Shakespearian influence, his lyrics are debased by Byronisms, but of other poets there is barely an On the other hand, many poets, both con temporary and posterior, dead and living, great and small, have borrowed from Bailey Festus is a vast quarry of poetry out of which many a block has been and will be hewn, and although its author is not yet numbered by literary pundits among the great poets of the nineteenth century, it is certain that a critic will arise, or soon or late, to do for him what Addison did for Milton In the meantime, this brief estimate may help to broaden the basis of a reputation hitherto perilously poised on the sliding sands of religious whim

The best passages in Festus are too long to be quoted here, and too fine to be mutilated, but the quality of its poetry may be shown by a few characteristic lines

The visionary landscapes of the skies,
The golden capes far stretching into licaven
It was the rush of God's world winnowing wing Earth heaves with tomblets as the sea with waves
Love's heart turns sometimes faint, like a sick pearl
Why, deathling, wilt thou long for heaven?
Lips like rosebuds peeping out of snow
Nought happens but what happens to oneself
A wreck

Whose board scarce floats flush with the face of death
The dreamy struggles of the stars with light

To most man's life but showed A bridge of groans across a stream of tears

God's hand hath scooped the hollow of the world I feel death blowing hard at the lamp of life. Art is man's nature, nature is God's art. Like autumn's leaves distained with dusky gold To live like light or die in light like dew Drowned lands and verdurous meadows submarine And age but presses with a halo's weight

It is the sun, God's crest upon his azure shield, the heavens Loaded with golden rain of annual stars. The heavens grow darker as they purer grow Time's sun, declining down the eternal skies, Leaves his last shining shadow upon the sea.

Bailey's blank verse often reaches a serene spontaneity of verbal beauty. In such passages as Lucifer's address to Night, the large rhythm moves on the surface of the thought as the waves move on the surface of the sea

Night comes, world jewelled, as my bride should be Start forth the stars in myriads at the sign Of light, divine usurper, as to wage War with the lines of darkness, and the moon, Pale ghost of light, comes haunting the cold earth After the sun's red sea death, quietless Immortal Night, I love thee Thou and I Are of one strain, the eldest blood of God He makes, we mar, together, all things, all But our own selves.

The poem marches with spacious strides through a dazzling prgernt of symbol and simile, massively epic in its grandeur

As when by sunset hues Invited, some fair falcon, whose broad eye Mirrors the welkin, through air's shadowy blue Wheeling with wing unwavering, every plume Stretched tense, 'mid sky serencly balanced, calls Forth from his eyric, crown of sea faced crag, Her nughtier mate, these twain each other now In unconceived ellipse, curve following curve, Redoubled runbow like, outsweep, thrice o'er Snatch from ambition's touch the zenith mock With playful fall the expectant earth, now, thwart, In arbitrary and intercircling flights, Their mutual orbits emulous, this below Echolng the other's ery on high, till heaven Closes, by hint of stars, the rapt contest.

The whole range of poetic vision is found in The audacity of the theme would be ridiculous were it not made sublime by the most solemn, the most sombre, and the most tremendous images, swift, simple, concrete, concentrated, direct. The dream of Festus is an impassioned and piercing fintasy

Up we flew Sheer through the shining air, far past the sun's Broad blazing disk, -past where the great, great snake Binds in his bright coil half the host of heaven,-Past that great sickle saved for one day's work When he who sowed shall reap creation's field,-Past those bright diademed orbs which show to man

His crown to come, up through the starry strings . Of that high harp close by the feet of God, Which he, methought, took up and struck, till heaven In love's immortal madness rang and reeled, The stars fell on their faces, and far off The wild world halted, shool his burning mane, Then, like a fresh blown trumpet blast, went on, Or like a god gone mad On, on we flew, I and the spirit, far beyond all things Of measure, motion, time, and aught ereate, Where the stars stood on the edge of the first nothing, And looked each other in the free and fled ,-Past even the last long starless void, to God, Whom straight I heard, methought, commanding thus Immortal, I am God Hie back to earth And say to all that God doth say-love God! Lucifer God visits men a dreaming I, awake. Testus And my dream changed to one of general doom

Wilt hear it?

Ay, say on. 'Tis but a dream Lucifer Festus God made all mind and motion cease, and lo! The whole was death and peace An endless time Obtained in which the power of all made failed God bade the worlds to judgment and they came, Pale, trembling, corpse like To the souls therein Then spake the Maker deathless spirits, rise! And straight they thronged around the throne. His arm The Almighty then uplift, and smote the worlds Once, and they fell in frigments like to spray And vanished in their native void. He shook The stars from heaven like raindrops from a bough, Like tears they poured adown ereation's face Spirit and space were all things Matter, death, And time left nought, not even a wake, to tell Where once their track o'er being

Magnificent, too, is the pæan which Festus chants to the sun

Shepherd of worlds and harmonist of heaven, The music of whose golden lyre is light

The holiest mystery of poetic magic trembles in such lines as these

Jewels are baubles only, whether pearls From the sea's lightless depths, or diamonds Culled from the mountain's crown, or chrysolith, Cat's eye, or moonstone, or hot carbunele, That, from the bed of Eden's sunnest stream Extracted, lamped the ark, what time the roar Of lions pining for their free sands smote The hungry darkness.

Not even Shakespeare confronted the irony of existence with a more august regard

Long we live thinking nothing of our fate, For in the morn of life we mark it not, It falls behind but as our day goes down We catch it lengthening with a grant's stride, And ushering us unto the feet of night.

Not even Milton carved sterner thoughts in more adamantine phrase than the inspired singer who sang of Men who walk up to fame as to a friend, Or their own house, which from the wrongful heir They have wrested, from the world's hard hand and gripe,

Men who, like death, all bone and all unarmed, Have ta'en the giant world by the throat and thrown him,

And made him swear to maintain their name and fame At peril of his life, who shed great thoughts As easily as an oak looseneth its golden leaves. In a kindly largesse to the soil it grew on, Whose names are ever on the world's broad tongue, Like sound upon the falling of a force, Whose words, if winged, are with angel's wings, Who play upon the heart as on a harp, And make our eyes bright as we speak of them, Whose hearts have a look southwards, and are open To the whole noon of nature, these I have waked And wept o'er night by night, oft pondering thus Homer is gone, and where is Jove? and where The rival cities seven? His song outlives Time, tower, and god—all that then was, save heaven

Not even Wordsworth has surpassed the heavy beauty of the four glamour-laden words into which Bailey pours the cosmic romance of the soul

The rieli star travelled stranger

Not even Dante forged imaginative utterance more fierily poignant than the simple words in which Festus, with sword like pathos, addresses the spirit of his Beatrice

Immortal, from thine eye Wipe out the tear of time

And where in all poetry can we find a more tremulously ecstatic sob of love than this?—

Come to the light, love Let me look on thee
Let me make sure I linve thee. Is it thou?
Is this thy hand? Are these thy velvet lips, Thy lips so lovable? Nay, speak not yet,
For oft, as I have dreamed of thee, it was Thy speaking woke me. I will dream no more Am I alive? And do I really look Upon these soft and sea blue eyes of thine, Wherein I half believe I can espy
The riches of the sea? Nay, heavenly hued,
As though they had gained from gazing on the skies Their high and starry beauty. These dark rolled locks!

Oh God, art thou not glad, too, he is here?

Shimmering with romantic innuendo, these lines are the very voice of love, uttering an ecstasy of sobbing joy and trembling rapture that suddenly flames into a glory of divine invocation tran scendently daring in its triumphant egoism. The angels in Festus are mystically incorporeal

Light as a leaf they step, or the arrowy Footing of breeze upon a waveless pool, Sndden and soft, too, like a waft of light, The beautiful immortals come to me

Often the poet chisels out of verbal marble a subtle beauty that rivals the rhythmic curves of plastic art. Here is a statue of death which a Michelangelo could hardly better

Behold there Death! Throned on his tomb, entombed in his throne, Just as he ceased he rests for aye, his scythe

Still wet out of his bloody swath, one hand Tottering sustains, the other strikes the cold Drops from his bony brow, his mouldy breath Tainteth all air

Another nuance of visionary glamour glimmers in this ravishing nightscape

Eve came, the dewy night stole forth dim veiled, Arcturis, heavenly oxherd, bowed his knee Star cusped, upon the hill, as though with all His worlds he worshipped God, his conquering head Bowed 'neath the orb gemmed crown, hollow with heaven.

God o'er him holds as one who had striven with God, And gained the day o'er deity

And yet another in this magical symphony of gloom

Wave

On wave of darkness, like the shadowy tides Of that tenebrous sea which billowing breaks Soundless on linar promontories

The poet brandishes the bright sword of optimism in the procession of mortality

Life's more than breath and the quick round of blood, 'Tis a great spirit and a busy heart, The coward and the small in soul scarce do live. One generous feeling, one great thought, one deed Of good, ere night, would make life longer seem Than if each year might number a thousand days, Spent as is this by nations of mankind. We live in deeds, not years, in thought, not breaths, In feelings, not in figures on a dial We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best Life's but a means unto an end, that end, To those who dwell in Him, He most in them, Beginning, mean, and end of all things, God The dead have all the glory of the world Why will we live and not be glorious? We never can be deathless till we die. It is the dead win battles, and the breath Of those who through the world drive like a wedge, Tearing earth's empires up, nears death so close It dims his well worn scythe But no, the brave Die never Being deathless, they but change Their country's arms, for more, their country's heart. Give then the dead their due 'tis they who saved us, Saved us from woe and want and servitude. The rapid and the deep, the fall, the gulph, Have likenesses in feeling and in life, And life so varied hath more loveliness In one day, than a creeping century Of sameness

The heroically youthful optimism of Festus fulls like a snowflake on the feverish lips of the modern pessimist. It rejects the superstitious creeds of cynicism and the blind dogmas of materialism, affirming that life is lifeworthy, being an endless pursuit of an eternal ideal by everlasting runners.

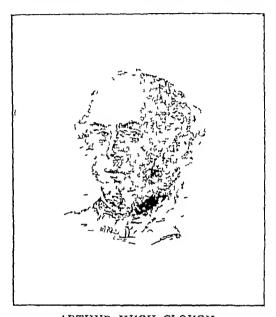

Star on star the heavens fulfil Their issne, and truth quickens here the soul Dipped in substantial lighting of the sun Spiritual, and with the eternal saving saved

JAMES DOUGLAS

At thur Hugh Clough (1819-61) was born at Liverpool, the son of a cotton-merchant of good Denbighshire stock, who in 1822 emigrated to Charleston in South Carolina. There the boy lived a home-life of singular happiness, until in 1828 he was sent back to school first at Chester, and next year at Rugby, where Dr Arnold profoundly impressed him. Here he gained every honour the school had to bestow, became a powerful swimmer and a crack goalkeeper, and edited and wrote much for the Rugby Magazine November 1837 he went to Balliol College, Oxford, astonished all who knew his powers by obtaining only a second-class in 1841, but in 1842 was elected a Fellow of Oriel. As tutor from 1843 he laboured for five years, usually spending the long vacation among the Welsh mountains, by the Cumberland lakes, or in the Scottish Highlands For a time he fell under the spell of Newman's influence, but this was soon followed by a period of severe in ward struggle, erelong he shook himself free of the neo Catholic movement, and in 1848 felt it his duty to withdraw from Oriel A little earlier in the same year he had published his first long poem, The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich, a 'Long Vacation pastoral' in rough hexameter verse. He next spent some time in travelling in France and Italy, part of the time with Emerson, and was appointed on his return (October 1849) Warden of University Hall, London His life here was far from congenial, but he found much help in the warm friendship of Carlyle At Rome, in 1849, he had produced his Amours de Voyage, also in heximeter, and at Venice, during a holiday in 1850, he wrote Dipsy clius, a poem of much deeper significance, in which the representative of idealism is vanguished by the spirit of the world In 1852 he resigned his office, and sailed to America in the same ship with Lowell and Thackeray, but an examinership in the Education Office soon recalled him to England, and in June 1854 he married He took a keen interest in the work of his wife's cousin, Florence Nightingale, his life was truly described as uneventful but full of work. In the spring of 1856 he was nominated secretary to a Commission for examining military schools on the Continent, but his health now began to give way, and after visits to Greece, Constantinople, the Pyrenees, and Italy, he was carried off at Florence by paralysis succeeding a malarial fever

Clough's poetry reflects with singular sincerity all the spiritual unrest and conflict of his life, his passionate love of truth, and intense longing for reality. His hexameters are extraordinarily rugged, at times even harsh and unrhythmical, though in the later editions of the Bothie (originally called The Bothie of Toper na Fuosich) their uncouthness was much toned down. Even at the best this peculiarity imparts an air of something approaching burlesque. His few short laries are much more perfect in form and matter, but his best gift was doubtless his humour, which is of a rare and indeed exceptional quality, and is well exemplified in the prose epilogue to Dipsychus. He had command also of pithos and of irony, possessed the gift of character drawing, conveyed a sense of joy in life and the beauties of nature, and was perhaps too trenchant in satire and sceptical speculation. His defects repel many readers, and Mr Swinburne pronounces him simply a bad poet. Lowell, on the other hand, thinking more of matter than form, is recorded in his Life. have said the Bothie was to his thinking one of the most charming books ever written, and he the forecast its author's true significance. 'We have a foreboding that Clough, imperfect as he was in many respects, and dving before he had subdued his sensitive temperament to the sterner requirements of his art, will be thought a hundred years hence to have been the truest expression in verse of the moral and intellectual tendencies, the doubt and struggle towards settled convictions, of the period in which he lived? Clough is the subject of Matthew Arnold's elegy Thyrsis, one of the finest tributes of passionate admiration to the dead in the English language, and almost worthy to be compared with In Memoriam

Woman and Man

Oh, if they knew and considered, unhappy ones! oh, could they see, could

But for a moment discern, how the blood of true gallantry kindles,

How the old knightly religion, the chivalry semi quixotic, Stirs in the veins of a man at seeing some delicate woman

Serving him, toiling—for him, and the world, some tenderest girl, now

Over weighted, expectant, of him, is it? who shall, if only his Cambridge lectures. Neither a profound metaphysician nor a precise logician, he was a picturesque rather than a deeply read or accurate historian, and his lectures were rather severely liandled by the critics. Water Babies (1863), called 'a fairy-tale for a land baby,' took a place of its own in the literature of fantasy for children, other works were, besides many volumes of sermons, Glaucus, on the wonders of the shore (1854), The Heroes, Greek fairy-tales (1856), Town Geology (1872), Prose Idylls (1873), Health and Education (1874). In 1869 Kingsley resigned his professorship and was appointed a canon of

Chester, in 1871 he made his voyage to the tropics, of v hose scenery he had written so enthu siastically, and on his return to Eversley from the West Indies he gave to the world one of its most charming books of travel, At Last 1873 he was appointed a canon of Westminster and chaplain to the Queen, he died at Eversley on 23rd January 1875 By nature he was hottempered, frank, and combative, his 'muscular Christianity' (a phrase he himself disliked) was cheerful and robust. He had to live down much animosity and suspicion alike on political and theological grounds, and though ultimately he became apparently reconciled to the existing social order, he remained to the last an outspolen Broad-Churchman and an eager polemic. His controversy with Newman, in which the Cardinal secured a great dialectical success, has already been referred to at page 338 Many of Kingsley's essays are charming

His poetry, like his prose vorks, reflects his eager, strenuous, open, sympathetic character, and is frank, simple, and straightforward, not seeking to probe spiritual depths, but not without its own characteristic charm. Two lyrics have by universal consent become everywhere well known as proverbs—'The sands of Dee' and 'Three fishers went sailing,' both tender, musical, simple, and perfect in their own way, but they are less characteristic of the man and his temperament than verses that ring with his own joy in free and strenuous life—'The Last Buccanier,' 'The Outlaw,' the 'Ode to the North-East Wind,' 'The Delectable Day'

Sixteenth Century Lotus-Eaters

Forth Amyas went, with Ayacanora as a guide, some five miles upward along the forest slopes, till the girl whispered, 'There they are,' and Amyas, pushing him self gently through a thicket of bamboo, beheld a scene which, in spite of his wrath, kept him silent, and perhaps softened, for a minute.

On the farther side of a little lawn, the stream leaped through a chasm beneath overarching vines, sprinkling eternal freshness upon all around, and then sank foam ing into a clear rock basin, a bath for Dian's self. On its farther side, the crag rose some twenty feet in height, bank upon banl of feathered ferns and cushioned moss, over the rich green beds of which dropped a thousand orchids, scarlet, white, and orange, and made the still pool gorgeous with the reflection of their gorgeousness At its more quiet outfall, it was half hidden in linge fantastic leaves and tall flowering stems, but near the waterfall the grassy bank sloped down toward the stream, and there, on palm leaves strewed upon the turf, beneath the shadow of the crags, lay the two men whom Amyas sought, and whom, now he had found them, he had hardly heart to wake from their delicious dream

For what a nest it was which they had found! The air was heavy with the scent of flowers, and quivering with the murmur of the stream, the humming of the colibris and insects, the cheerful song of birds, the gentle cooing of a hundred doves, while now and then, from far away, the musical wail of the sloth or the deep toll of the bell bird came softly to the ear. What was not there which eye or ear could need? And what which palate could need either? For on the rock above, some strange tree, leaning forward, dropped every now and then a luscious apple upon the grass below, and huge wild plantains bent beneath their load of fruit.

There, on the stream bank, lay the two renegades from civilised life. They had cast away their clothes, and painted themselves, life the Indians, with arnotta and indigo. One lay lazily picking up the fruit which fell close to his side, the other sat, his back against a cushion of soft moss, his hands folded languidly upon his lap, giving himself up to the soft influence of the narcotic coca juice, with half shut dreamy eyes fixed on the ever lasting sparkle of the waterfall—

'While beauty, born of murmuring sound, Did pass into his face.'

Somewhat apart crouched their two dusky brides, crowned with fragrant flowers, but working busily, like true women, for the lords whom they delighted to honour. One sat plaining palm fibres into a basket, the other was boring the stem of a huge milk tree, which rose like some mighty column on the right hand of the lawn, its broad canopy of leaves unseen through the dense underwood of on his breast. Amyas stood spell bound. The effect of the narcotic was all but miraculous in his eyes. The sustained eloquence, the novel richness of diction in one seemingly drowned in sensual sloth, were in his eyes the possession of some evil spirit. And yet he could not answer the Evil One. His English heart, full of the divine instinct of duty and public spirit, told him that it must be a he but how to prove it a he? And he stood for full ten minutes searching for an answer, which seemed to fly farther and farther off the more he sought for it

A rustle 'n roar! a shrick! and Amyas lifted his eyes in time to see a huge dark har shoot from the crag above the drenmer's head, among the group of girls. A dull crash, as the group flew asunder, and in the midst, upon the ground, the tawny limbs of one were writhing beneath the fangs of a black jaguar, the rarest and most terrible of the forest kings. Of one? But of which? Was it Ayacanora? And sword in hand, Amyas rushed midly forward before he reached the spot those tortured limbs were still.

It was not Ayacanora, for, with a shrick which rang through the woods, the wretched dreamer, wakened thus at last, sprang up and felt for his sword. Fool! he had left it in his hammool! Screaming the name of his dead bride, he rushed on the jaguar as it crouched above its prey, and seizing its head with teeth and nails, worried it, in the ferocity of his madness, like a mastiff dog

The brute wrenched its head from his grasp, and rused its dreadful paw. Another moment, and the husband's corpse would have lain by the wife's. But high in air gleamed Amyrs's blade down, with all the weight of his huge body and strong arm, fell that most trusty steel, the head of the jaguar dropped grinning on its victim's corpse.

'And all stood still who saw him fall, While men might count a score'

'O Lord Jesus,' said Amyas to himself, 'thou hast answered the devil for me' And this is the selfish rest for which I would have bartered the rest which comes by working where thou hast put me!'

They bore away the lithe corpse into the forest, and buried it under soft moss and virgin mould, and so the fair clay was transfigured into fairer flowers, and the poor gentle untaught spirit returned to God who gave it. And then Amyas went sadly and silently back again, and Parracombe walked after him, lile one who walks in sleep. Ebsworthy, sobered by the shock, entreated to come too, but Amyas forbade him gently. 'No, lad, you are forgiven. God forbid that I should judge you or any man. Sir John shall come up and marry you, and then, if it still be your will to stay, the Lord forgive you, if you be wrong, in the meanwhile, we will leave with you all that we can spare. Stay here, and pray to God to make you, and me too, wiser men.'

And so Amyas departed He had come out stern and proud, but he came back again like a little child

The Last Buccanier

Oh England is a pleasant place for them that's rich and high,

But England is a cruel place for such poor folks as I, And such a port for mariners I ne'er shall see again As the pleasant Isle of Avès, beside the Spanish Main

There were forty craft in Aves that were both svift and

All furnished well with small arms and cannons round about.

And a thousand men in Aves made laws so fair and free To choose their valuant captains and obey them loyally

Thence we sailed against the Spaniard with his hoards of plate and gold,

Which he wrung with cruel tortures from Indian folk of old.

Likewise the merchant captains, with hearts as hard as stone,

Who flog men and keel haul them, and starte them to the bone

Oh the palms grew high in Aves, and fruits that shone like gold,

And the colibris and parrots they were gorgeous to behold,

And the negro maids to Aves from bondage fast did flee, To welcome gallant sailors, a sweeping in from sea.

Oh sweet it was in Aves to hear the landward breeze A swing with good tobacco in a net between the trees, With a negro lass to fan you, while you listened to the

Of the breakers on the reef outside, that never touched the shore

But Scripture saith, in ending to all fine things must be, So the King's ships sailed on Aves, and quite put down were we

All day we fought his challdogs, but they burst the booms at night,

And I fled in a piragua, sore wounded, from the fight

Nine days I floated starving, and a negro lass beside, Till for all I tried to cheer her, the poor young thing she died,

But as I lay a gasping, a Bristol sail came by,
And brought me home to Lingland here, to beg-until I die

And now I'm old and going—I'm sure I can't tell where,

One comfort is, this world's so hard, I can't be worse off there

If I might but be a sea dove, I'd fly across the main, To the pleasant Isle of Aves, to look at it once again.

Ode to the North-East Wind

Welcome, wild North easter I Shame it is to see Odes to every zephyr, Ne'er a verse to thee Welcome, black North easter l O er the German foam, O'er the Danish moorlands, From thy frozen home Tired we are of summer, Tired of gaudy glare, Showers soft and steaming, Hot and breathless air Tired of listless dreaming, Through the lazy day Jovial wind of winter Turn us out to play!

Sweep the golden reed beds, Crisp the lazy dyke, Hunger into madness Every plunging pike Fill the lake with wild fowl, Fill the marsh with snipe, While on dreary moorlands Lonely curley pipe. Through the black fir forest Thunder harsh and dry, Shattering down the snowflakes Off the curdled sky Hark 1 The brave North-easter 1 Breast high lies the scent, On by holt and headland, Over heath and bent Chime, ye dappled darlings, Through the sleet and snow Who can override you? Let the horses go ! Chime, ye dappled darlings, Down the rouring hlast, You shall see a for die Tre an hour be past. Go I and rest to morrow, Hunting in your dreams, While our slates are ringing O'er the frozen streams Let the luscious South wind Breathe in lovers' sighs, While the lazy gallants Bask in ladies' eyes. What does he but soften Heart alike and pen? 'Tis the hard grey weather Breeds hard English men What's the soft South wester? 'Tis the ladies' breeze, Bringing home their true loves Out of all the seas But the black North caster, Through the snow storm hurled, Drives our English hearts of oak Seaward round the world Come, as came our fathers, Herilded by thee, Conquering from the eastward, Lords by land and sea Come, and strong within us Stir the Vikings' blood, Bracing brain and sinew, Blow, thou wind of God !

Young and Old.

When all the world is young, lad,
And all the trees are green,
And every goose a swan, lad,
And every lass a queen,,
Then hey for boot and horse, lad,
And round the world away,
Young blood must have its course, lad,
And every dog his day

When all the world is old, lad, And all the trees are brown, And all the sport is stale, lad, And all the wheels run down, Creep home, and take your place there,
The spent and maimed among,
God grant you find one face there
You loved when all was young

His widow published his Life and Letters in 1876 (2 vols.) and there is a monograph on Kingsley as a 'Christian Socialist and reformer by Kaufmann (1892). A collected edition of his works appeared in twenty-eight volumes in 1879 81, an édition de luxe of the Life and Work was issued in 1901-3 in mineteen volumes of which the sixteeoth was occupied by the poems. Mrs Harrison distinguished as a novelist under the pen name of Lucas Malet, is his youngest daughter.

George Henry Kingsley (1827-92), the second brother in a gifted family, was born at Islington, was educated at King's College School, and graduated in medicine at Edinburgh and at His devotion to professional duty in a time of cholera was commemorated by his brother in Truo Years Ago In attendance on patients he travelled much, and lie wrote, besides Notes on Sport and Travel, one famous book, South Sea Bubbles, by the Larl and the Doctor-his compagnon de vojage on this occasion being the Earl of Pembroke.—His daughter, Mary Henrietta Kingsley, was educated mainly at home on account of her weak health, and early became a voracious but desultory reader of books of all kinds after the death of both father and mother slie resolved to trivel and study the minners and customs of uncivilised peoples She made two journeys in the Congo country, in the Cameroons, and on the Ogowc, her Travels in West Africa (1897), besides being 'rich in incident and bub bling over with racy humour,' showed a marvellous instinct for looking at savage rites, religions, and usages from the native point of view, and her original and unconventional views on some missionary methods, and on the services of the traders to Europe and civilisation, provoked criticism, but proved the writer's absolute good faith and scrupulous desire to do justice to all aspects She had planned another voyage to of truth study 'fishes and fetishes,' but at Cape Town volunteered to nurse sick Boer prisoners, and fell a victim to enteric fever in the Simon's Town hospital

Henry Kingsley (1830-76), the younger brother of Charles, was born at Barnack rectory, near Stamford, and was brought up at Clovelly From King's College, London, and Chelsea he passed in 1850 to Worcester College, Oxford, but went down in 1853 without a degree, and started for the Australian gold-diggings never talked of his colonial experiences, but is known to have been for a time in the mounted police He turned up again at Chelsea in 1858, and next year wrote at Eversley The Recollections of Geoffry Hamlyn, which, like The Hillyars and the Burtons (1865), is full of the strong, vivid life of the antipodes Still, Ravenshoe (1861) is his masterpiece Austin Elliot (1863), Mademoiselle Mathilde (1868), and Stretton (1869) deserve men-

If there is, let me tell you that I feel more kind and hearty toward you and Hamlyn for coming to me like this to day than I've felt toward any man this twenty year. By the bye, let no man go to the gallows without clearing himself as far as he may. Do you know that I set on that red haired villain, Moody, to throttle Bill Lee, because I hadn't pluck to do it myself?'

'Poor Lee '' said the Major

'Poor devil' said Hawker 'Why, that man had gone through every sort of villainy, from' (so and so up to so and so, he said, I shall not particularise) before my beard was grown Why, that man laid such plots and snares for me when I was a lad, that a bishop could not have escaped. He egged me on to forge my own father's name. He drove me on to ruin And now, because it suited his purpose to turn honest, and act as faithful domestic to my wife for twenty years, he is mourned for as an exemplary character, and I go to the gallows. He was a meaner villain than ever I was '

I never meant her any harm You may tell her all this if you judge right, but I leave it to you Time's up, I see I am't so much of a coward, am I, Jeff? Good bye, old lad, good bye'

F HINDES GROOML.

Mary Wollstonecraft Shelley (1797-1851), born in London, was the only child of William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft In her seventeenth year she eloped to the Continent with Shelley, and after living with him for two years, she was married to him when his first wife, Harriet, had committed suicide. In the summer of 1816 Byron, Shelley, and Mary were living on the banks of the Lake of Geneva, and the Shelleys often passed their evenings with Byron at his house at Diodati Having during a week of rain amused themselves with reading German ghost stories, they agreed to write something in imitation of them Thus began Byron's tale of the Vampire, which Polidon, his physician, completed and published as his patron's But the most memorable result of the story-telling compact was Mrs Shelley's romance of Frankenstein, recognised on its publication in 1817 as worthy of Godwin's daughter and Shelley's wife. is on the model of St Leon A native of Geneva, Frankenstein is sent to the University of Ingolstadt, where, having already dabbled in magic and mystery, he pores over books on physiology, makes chemical experiments, visits sepulchres and dissecting rooms, and after days and nights of incredible labour and fatigue succeeds in discovering the secret of life. Full of his discovery, he proceeds to create a man, and after revolting experiments constructs a gigantic figure eight feet high, and, a veritable modern Demiurgus, breathes into its nostrils the breath of life. The Monster ultimately becomes a terror to his creator, haunts him like a spell, murders his friend, and strangles his bride. Frankenstein pursues him to the Arctic regions, and then perishes of cold and anguish, while the Monster disappears from the scene, resolved to put a period to his unhallowed existence.

From the Portrait (1841) by R Rothwell, R.H A, in the National Portrait Gallery

After the death of her husband, Mrs Shelleywho was left with an only surviving son to inherit the baronetcy-returned to London, and devoted herself to literary pursuits, producing Valperga (1823), The Last Man (1826), Perkin Waibeck, Lodore (1835, largely autobiographical), and other works of fiction, none of which merited the success of Frankenstein, though several of them contain admirable passages Her father-in-lan, when making her an allowance, insisted on the suppression of the volume of Shelley's Posthumous Poems which she had issued in 1824. She wrote industriously and gracefully for the annuals, contributed biographies of foreign artists and men of letters to the Cabinet Cyclopædia, edited and wrote prefaces to Shelley's Poetical Works (1839), and also edited Shelley's Essays, Letters from Abroad, Translations and Fragments (1840) Her last book was a record of her travels with her son in Italy and Germany She was buried at Bournemouth There are Lives by Mrs Julian Marshall (1889) and Mrs W M Rossetti (in the 'Eminent Women Series, 1890).

Geraldine Endsoi Jewsbury (1812-80) was born at Measham, Derbyshire, and from 1854 lived at Chelsea, to be near her intimate friends, the Carlyles The Half-Sisters and The Sorrows of Gentility were by far the best known of the series of novels which included also Zoe, Marian Withers, Constance Herbert, and Right or Wrongnot to speak of stories for children and short tales of various kinds Delicate health alone prevented her from becoming a regular writer for the Times, she was for many years a constant contributor to the Athenaum and a member of its staff, her theo logical views were 'advanced,' and her brilliant and humorous conversational gifts 'made her a social force in literary and artistic circles' Her indiscreet gossip unduly affected Froude's view of the relations between Mr and Mrs Carlyle her Letters to Mrs Carlyle, edited by Mrs Ireland (1892) -Her sister, Maria Jane (1800-33), wrote poetry, articles in the annuals and in the Athenæum, Phantasmagoria, or Sketchis of Life and Character (1825), Letters to the Young (1828), and The Three Histories (of an enthusiast, a nonchalant, and a realist, 1830) Wordsworth addressed his poem of Liberty to her She mar ried in 1832 an Indian chaplain, the Rev W K Fletcher, and died of cholera at Poonah

Lady Georgiana Fullerton (1812-85), a daughter of the first Earl Granville, was born at Tivall Hall in Staffordshire, and in 1833 married Alexander George Fullerton, an officer in the Her father was ambassador in Paris, and the young couple were for the first eight years of their married life in Lord Granville's household The husband became a Catholic in 1843, and Lady Georgiana, two years after publishing her first story, Ellen Middleton (1844), also became a convert to Catholicism The rest of her life was mainly devoted to charitable and religious works and the writing of tales of religious sub ject or tendency-amongst them Grantley Manor (1847), Too Strange not to be True (1864), Coustance Sherwood (1864), A Stormy Life (1864), Mrs Gerald's Niece (1871), and A Will and a Way (1881) Two were written and first pub lished in French-La Comtesse de Bonneval (1857) and Rose Leblanc (1861) She published two volumes of verse, and wrote or translated the story of several saintly lives After her son's death she became one of the Tertiaries of the order of St Francis, she helped in establishing the Sisters of St Vincent de Paul in England, and was herself one of the founders of a minor order of women. Dying at Bournemouth, she was buried in the cemetery of the Sacred Heart at Roehampton Several of her novels are still read and reprinted, the most popular, Too Strange not to be True, being the history of a pious but much-afflicted French emigrant to Canada. See her Life by Father Coleridge, from the French of Mrs Craven (1888), and Miss Yonge in Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign (1897)

Hrs Henry Wood (1814-87), novelist, whose maiden name was Ellen Price, was born at Worcester, married early Mr Henry Wood, a ship agent living in France, and after his death settled in London, and commenced writing for the New Monthly Magazine and Bentley's Miscellany Her temperance story, Danesbury House (1860), was followed by East Lynne (1861), which had an almost unexampled success Having found her public, Mrs Wood poured forth upwards of thirty more novels, perhaps the best The Channings (1862) The Shadorv of Ashlydyat (1863), Osrvald Cray (1864), A Life's Secret (1867), Dene Hollow (1871), Within the Maze (1872), and Pomeroy Abbey (1878). Her work rarely rises above the commonplace, though she revealed some power in the analysis of character in her anony-In 1867 mous Johnny Ludlow stories (1874-80) she acquired the monthly Argosy, and her novels went on appearing in it long after her death novelist of her day was more popular with girls of the middle class Her son published Memorials of her in 1895

Charlotte Brontë, third child of the Rev Patrick Bronte and Mary Branwell, his wife, was born at Thornton, Bradford, 21st April 1816 Her father was an Irishman of County Down, a man of strong character and some literary talent. His wife, who was a native of Penzance, died of cancer on 15th September 1821, leaving behind her six children. By this time Patrick Bronte had removed to Haworth, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, where he remained to his death. It was a large village of nearly five thousand inhabitants, most of the people being engaged in the woollen manufacture.

The motherless children were cared for by their aunt, Miss Branwell, and they displayed an extriordinary precocity of talent Their father treated them as his intellectual equals, and discussed with them the public affairs of the day They had very little intercourse with their neighbours, their refuge was in the unenclosed, untilled, heathery moors, with their becks and hollows eldest daughters were sent, in July 1824, to a school for clergymen's daughters at Cowan Bridge near Kirby Lonsdale, and Charlotte and Emily followed in September A low fever broke out in the school, and Maria and Elizabeth became seriously ill, and were taken home only to die. Though Charlotte was but eight years old, the liabit of observation had set in, and she attributed the death of her sisters to their cruel treatment in the school, an injury avenged in the opening scenes of Jane Eyre At Haworth, where the diminished family now gathered, Miss Branwell gave the girls lessons, and their father told them the news The three sisters, Charlotte, Emily Jane, and Anne, and their brother, Branwell, devoted themselves to writing, and Charlotte composed in a few years some twenty or thirty tales as well as many poems In 1831 she went again to school at Roe Head, a country house between Leeds and Huddersfield, and made the friendship of Ellen Nussey and Mary and Martha Taylor On her letters to Miss Nussey our knowledge of her life is mainly based Mary and Martha Taylor suggested the Rose and Jessy Yorke of Shirley Returning to her home in 1832, Miss Brontë found that her brother Bran well had contracted vicious habits, and he was to the last a source of increasing misery to the family She had experiences as a school teacher, and as a governess at a salary of £20 a year, the discipline of teaching was pronounced 'equally painful and priceless? The sisters began to think of starting a school, and in February 1842 Charlotte and Emily went to Brussels in order to improve their knowledge of foreign languages. They entered the school kept by M Héger and his wife in the Rue d'Isabelle.

There can be no doubt that this was the decisive event in Miss Brontë's life. It was then she began to live and to write out of her heart nearly twenty-six, and had written incessantly but without the smallest success. Though she had received two proposals of marriage, her heart had never been touched. She had never met a man of intellect, culture, and imagination Yet through all the years she craved for intellectual sympathy, and at last she found it. M Heger, then twentysix, was a man of accomplishment, enthusiastic, passionate, tender, and religious in his nature. His pupil regarded him with steadily growing affection and admiration. He recognised her gifts and pitied her loneliness After spending nine months at Brussels, the Bronte girls returned to Haworth Vicarrage on the death of their aunt Emily remained at home to keep house for her futher, but Charlotte returned to Brussels wrote to Miss Nussey 'I returned to Brussels after nunt's death against my conscience, prompted by what then seemed an irresistible impulse was punished for my selfish folly by a total withdrawal, for more than two years, of happiness and peace of mind' The attempts to explain away these words make them only more significant During her second period at Brussels Charlotte Bronte instructed M Héger and his brother-inlaw in English She suffered much from low spirits, and on one occasion paid a visit to the confessional She says to Emily 'I actually did confess—n real confession, a confession doubtless not of sin but of pain. By the advice of her friend Mary Taylor she suddenly returned on 18th January 1844. A month after she wrote 'I suffered much before I left Brussels I thmk however long I live I shall not forget what the parting with M Higer cost me.' She carried on a correspondence with her teacher for eighteen months, but it was sharply ended through the intervention of Madame Héger. There was nothing dishonourable in the episode, and it is obvious that M. Héger never felt for his pupil anything more than friendship. But the result was deep and abiding

She returned to a very gloomy home. Her brother Branwell, who had become thoroughly vicious—an opium eater, a drunkard, and a confirmed liar—was dismissed from a situation as tutor, returned to his father's house, and after years of steady deterioration, during which his sisters endured unspeakable agonies, died in September 1848. He was intellectually the weakest of the family, there is little trace of talent in his writings. The enforced contact with shameless vice from which the sisters had to suffer left its mark upon their works.

Miss Bronte's thoughts turned to literature, and the three sisters put together a little volume of verses, published at their expense, in May 1846, by Messrs Aylott & Jones The sisters adopted the pseudonyms Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell corresponded with their initials. One or two critics recognised the excellence of Ellis Bell's work, but it appears that only two copies of the book were Later on Miss Bronte reissued the volume with additional poems from the literary remains of Ellis and Acton Bell Miss Bronte had written n novel, The Professor, based on her Brussels experience, and sent it to various publishers manuscript shows that the title originally chosen was The Master It went to six publishers, and was returned without comment, but Mr W S Williams, the reader to Messrs Smith, Elder, & Co., and a critic of rare discernment, saw its value, and Miss Bronte was advised to write a novel of the threevolume size. The Professor made only two regulation volumes, otherwise it would probably have been accepted. The book did not appear till after Miss Bronte's death, and has been unaccountably depreciated by critics, it is, however, an exquisitely fresh and tender love story, and the herome, Frances Evans Henri, is perhaps the most charming in Charlotte Bronte's gallers gives full proof of the writer's power, and Miss Brontë herself never swerved in her high estimate of its value. It is a story of the love between a master and his pupil, a subject from which Miss Brontës thoughts never moved far Messrs Smith and Elder couched their refusal of the tale in such reasonable and courteous terms as were almost an encouragement. Miss Bronte replied that she had a second narrative in three volumes now in progress and nearly completed, to which she had endeavoured to impart a more vivid interest than belonged to The Professor The pub lishers desired to see the manuscript, which was despatched to them on 24th August. It was accepted, printed, and published by 16th October, and in a very short time, and without the aid of the critics, attained a great success. One of its reviewers thus commenced his article 'Since the publication of Grantley Manor no novel has created so much sensation as Jane Ejie' The secret of Miss Bronte's triumph is not at all obscure. She combined passion with power of expression. The glow and energy of the story held its readers captive. Very soon there came fierce protests against its unconventionality. Miss Rigby (see page 387), in the Quarterly Review, went so far is to suggest that the writer might be a woman 'who for some sufficient reason had long forfeited the society of her sex,' and the North British Review followed suit by saying that 'if Jane Eyre be the production of a woman, she must be a woman unsexed? Doubtless the book was unusually outspoken The obsession of Branwell's conduct and conversation at the time she wrote it goes further than anything else to account for this There is also abundant testimony that her father and one or two men who visited her home talked before her, if not to her, with as little reticence as Rochester talked to Jane Eyre. Her experience of Brussels schoolgirls must also be reckoned However, the main point to be noted is that the subject in itself was absolutely unconventional. In this, as in all her novels, she describes love not from the man's but from the woman's point of view She lifts the veil from the love-agonies of her heroines, and expresses the suffering which women are doomed to bear in silence. It has often been said that Charlotte Brontë's books are autobiographical, and this is true in a very real sense her characters from life, some of them, she ad mitted, were merely photographs But in another sense, equally important, her books do not render the outward part of her own experience. As we know her, Charlotte Bronté was a martyr to her sense of duty She lived for her family -her father, her sisters, her brother, her servants She would suffer nothing to shake the supremacy of her home duties, and almost denied herself the solace of friendship. But her heroines have no tie to home or family they are able to choose and shape their destinies, they enter the world free, and yet with qualities of culture and feeling that bring to them at last the full investiture of life through love. She writes much of love re quited, but her main theme is the suffering of love which is in doubt, the pain of unrequited Did she know it? For answer we quote her own words 'Details, situations which I do not understand and cannot personally inspect, I would not for the world meddle with Besides, not one feeling on any subject, public or private, will I ever affect that I do not really experience.' The grounds of the main objections that have been taken to Miss Brontë's novels are their occasional outspokenness and their unsparing revelations of the heart. The second edition of Jane Lire, with a dedication to Thickeray, appeared in January 1848 Thacleray had already expressed his admiration of the book, though he complained that the plot was familiar to him Miss Brontc said meekly that she had read few novels, and that she imagined the plot was original Her intense but strictly critical and qualified admiration of Thackeray seems to have been based entirely on Vanity Fair, the first number of which appeared in January 1847 and the last in July 1848

There was eager speculation on the authorship of Jane Lyre Many critics thought the book must bave been written by a man Others believed that a man and a woman had been at work togetber, and the names of Barry Cornwall and his wife were suggested But one, the able critic in the Christian Remembrancer, said 'We, for our part, cannot doubt that the work is written by a female, and, as certain provincialisms indicate, by one from the north of England.' It is impossible to trace the literary connections of Jane Eyre, but it has been suggested that in Charlotte Bronte's conception of love there are distinct traces of Harriet Martineau's forgotten novel, Deer brook There are also bints of the influence of Pamela, which, we know, was read by her father, and imitated by him in a little book. The attempts to suggest foreign origins are not plausible.

Miss Brontë, who had kept her secret even from her publishers, went up to London in July 1846 with her sister Anne and revealed herself. After a short visit, they returned to a sorely tried home. Branwell Bronte died, as we have said, in September 1848, Emily in December, and Anne Brontë in May 1849 During this painful time Miss Bronte was writing Shirles, which is the brightest of her She had partially escaped from sweet and stories Nearly every character in the bitter memories book was a Yorkshire friend. It was impossible any longer to hide the secret of the authorship Yorke family in particular were 'almost daguerreotypes' of the Taylors Shirley Keeldar, the heroine, represents traces of her sister Emily, Louis Moore, the tutor, is the inevitable M Héger, Mr Helstone is a Mr Roberson, a fighting Tory parson of the The love story of Robert and Caroline is even more beautiful than that of Louis and In both cases the man is dominant. Shirley Sharley expressed Charlotte Bronte in her happiest mood, and will always be the favourite novel of many readers, though Jane Eyre has been more esteemed by the public and Villette by the critics

Miss Bronte's genius had by this time brought her into a circle of friendly admirers, and among others she came to know Thackeray, G H Lewes, Mrs Gaskell, and Miss Martineau With none of these, however, was she on terms of real intimacy She was shy and shrinking, melancholy and selfconscious, and her feeble, nervous, suffering body was always sinking to its fall. There could be no greater contrast than that between her fiery soul and her extreme reserve and timidity. Outwardly her life was one of decorous, uneventful simplicity, but as a writer she plunged boldly into the whirl of passion, and never hesitated to lay bare the inner sanctuary of feeling. Yet her friendships and her fame gave her pleasure. 'How should I be with youth past, sisters lost, a resident in a moorland parish where there is not a single educated family? In that case I should have no world at all the raven, weary of surveying the deluge and without an ark to return to, would be my type. As it is, something like a hope and motive sustains me still.

Villette, her last completed story, and artistically the most perfect of all, is a reproduction of her life in Brussels, with touches from more recent experience It appeared in the beginning of 1853 Her publisher, Mr George Smith, and his mother are among the characters, and it contains a description of Rachel's acting which Miss Brontë had seen in London. The book was received with a burst of acclamation Harriet Martineau protested against the place it gave to love, and Anglican journals against its attacks on sacerdotalism But its picture of love, its romance, its poetry, its sarcasm, and occasional phyfulness captivated the world Villette is an autobiography in the fullest sense of the word. Charlotte herself is Lucy Snowe, and M. Héger is Paul Emanuel Her father urged that the story should end happily with the marriage of the professor and his pupil Miss Brontc, however, was inflexible. The lovers are left unwedded. Amidst all the praise the writer's heart was sinking. Her courage was failing, the oppressive quietness of her home life, and, above all, the haunting memories of Brussels, crushed her spirits Solitude fearfully aggravated She sat day by day in her chair, other evils with saddest memories for her only company, late into the night, conversing with the spirits of the A gleam of happiness came before the Her father's curate, Mr A B Nicholls, had long loved her Though Miss Bronte esteemed him, she thought him narrow and uncongenial in feelings and tastes Her father furiously opposed the match, he thought that his famous daughter would be throwing herself away on a curate with £100 a year Miss Bronti was touched at last by the steadfast devotion of Mr Nicholls, her father yielded, and she was married on 19th June 1854 After a visit with her husband to his Irish relations, she returned to Haworth Her married life was very happy, but her health became precarious, she sank steadily, and died on 31st March 1855 of an illness incidental to childbirth Her last words were 'Oh, I am not going to die, am I? He will not separate us, we have been so happy' So ended a deeply shadowed life. Her early friend, Mary Taylor, declared that Mrs Gaskell's biography was 'not so gloomy as the truth,' that Miss Bronte had lived all her days in a walking nightmare of poverty and self-suppression. For her three great books she received only £1500, practically all this sum was saved and bequeathed to her husband. It was her lot to be unfortunate in almost all things, but her fortitude remained unshaken She was rigidly faithful to her views of duty, and though often wounded she was never stained It has been well said that 'no apology need be offered for any single feature of Charlotte Bronte's life and character' The vitality of her works is undiminished, and to day they are as widely read as ever

Mme Rachel

The theatre was full crammed to its roof royal and noble were there palace and hotel had emptied their inmates into those tiers so thronged and so hushed

I wondered if she would justify her renown with strange curiosity, with feelings severe and austere, yet of riveted interest, I waited. She was a study of such nature as had not encountered my eyes yet a great and new planet she was but in what shape? I waited her rising

She rose at nine that December night above the horizon I saw her come She could shine yet with pale grandeur and steady might, but that star verged already on its judgment day Seen near, it was a chaos—hollow, half consumed, an orb perished or perishing—half lava, half glow

What I saw was the shadow of a royal Vashti a queen, fair as the day once, turned pale now lile twilight, and wasted like wax in fiame. I found upon her something neither of woman nor of man in each of her eyes sat a devil. These evil forces bore her through the tragedy, kept up her feeble strength—for she was but a fruit creature, and as the actions rose and the stir deepened, how wildly they shook her with their passions of the pit! They wrote Hell on her straight, haughty brow They tuned her voice to the note of torment They writhed her regal face to a demoniae mask. Hate and Murder and Madness incarnate she stood

It was a marvellous sight a mighty revelation

It was a spectacle low, horrible, immoral

Swordsmen thrust through, and dying in their blood on the arena sand, bulls goring, horses disembowelled, made a meeker vision for the public—a milder condiment for a people's palate—than Vashti torn by seven devils devils which eried sore and rent the tenement they haunted, but still refused to be exorcised.

Suffering had struck that stage empress, and she stood before her audience, neither yielding to, nor enduring, nor, in finite measure, resenting it—she stood locked in struggle, rigid in resistance. She stood, not dressed, but draped in pale antique folds, long and regular like scilpture—A background and entourage and flooring of deepest crimson threw her out, white like alabaster—like silver—rather, be it said like Death

Where was the artist of the Cleopatra? Let him come and sit down and study the different visions. Let him seek here the mighty brawn, the musele, the abounding blood, the full fed flesh he worshipped let all materialists draw nigh and look on

I have said that she does not resent her grief the weakness of that word would make it a lie. To her, what hurts becomes immediately embodied she lools on it as a thing that can be attacked, wormed down, Scarcely a substance herself, she torn in shreds grapples to conflict with abstractions. Before calamity she is a tigress, she rends her woes, shivers them in convulsed abhorrence Pain, for her, has no result in good tears water no harvest of wisdom on siekness, on death itself, she looks with the eye of a rebel Wicked, perhaps, she is, but also she is strong, and her strength his conquered Beauty, has overcome Grace, and bound both at her side, captives peerlessly fair and docile as Even in the uttermost frenzy of energy is each m-enad movement royally, imperially, incedingly up borne Her hair, flying loose in revel or war, is still an angel's hair, and glorious under a halo. Tallen, in surgent, hanished, she remembers the heaven where she Heaven's light, following her exile, pierces its rebelled confines and discloses their forlorn remoteness

(From Villette, Chap XXIII)

Rain.

But Jessie, I will write about you no more an autumn evening wet and wild There is only one cloud in the sky, but it curtains it from pole to pole The wind cannot rest it hurries sobbing over hills of sullen outline, colourless with twilight and mist has beat all day on that church tower it rises dark from the stony enclosure of its graveyard the nettles, the long grass, and the tombs all drip with wet evening reminds me too forcibly of another evening some years ago a howling, rainy autumn evening too-when certain who had that day performed a pilgrimage to a grave new made in a heretic cemetery, sat near a wood fire on the hearth of a foreign dwelling. They were merry and social, but they each knew that a gap never to be filled had been made in their circle. They knew they had lost something whose absence could never be quite atoned for so long as they lived, and they knew that heavy falling rain was soaking into the wet earth which covered their lost darling, and that the sad sighing gale was mourning above her buried head. The fire warmed them, Life and Friendship yet blessed them, but Jessie by cold, coffined, solitary—only the sod screening her from the storm

(From Shurley, Chap XXIII)

Hope Dead.

Jane Lyre-who had been an ardent, expectant woman-almost a bride-was a cold solitary girl again her life was pale, her prospects were desolate. A Christmas frost had come at midsummer, a white December storm had whirled over June, ice glazed the ripe apples, drifts crushed the blowing roses, on hay field and corn field lay a frozen shrond lanes which last night blushed full of flowers, to day were pathless with untrodden snow, and the woods which twelve hours since waved lenfy and fragrant as groves between the tropics, now spread, waste, wild, and white as pine forests in wintry Norway My hopes were all deadstruck with a subtle doom, such as, in one night, fell on all the first born in the land of Egypt I looked on my cherished wishes, yesterday so blooming and glow ing, they lay stark, chill, livid corpses that could never revive I looked at my love, that feeling which was my master's-which he had created, it shivered in my heart, like a suffering child in a cold eradle, sickness and anguish had scized it, it could not seek Mr Rochester's arms-it could not derive warmth from his breast never more could it turn to him, for faith was blightedconfidence destroyed 1 One idea only still throbbed life like within me—a remembrance of God it begot an unuttered prayer these words went wandering up and down in my rigless mind, as something that should be whispered, but no energy was found to express them-

'Be not far from me, for trouble is near there is none o help'

It was near, and as I had lifted no petition to Heaven to avert it—as I had neither joined my hands, nor bent my knees, nor moved my lips—it came in full heavy swing the torrent poured over me

(From Jane Eyre, Chap. XXVI)

Villette by Moonlight

Hush! The clock strikes. Gliostly deep as is the stillness of this house, it is only cleven. While my ear follows to silence the hum of the last stroke, I catch faintly from the built art capital a sound like bells, or like a band—a sound where sweetness, where victory, where mourning blend Oh to approach this music nearer, to listen to it alone by the rushy basin 1 Let me go-oh let me go l What hinders, what does not aid freedom? Quiet Rue Fossette! I find on this pavement that wanderer wooing summer night of which I mused, I see its moon over me, I feel its dew in the air Bnt here I cannot stay, I am still too near old haunts, so close under the dungeon, I can hear the prisoner s moan This solemn peace is not what I seek, it is not what I can bear to me the face of that sky bears the aspect of a world's death The park also will be calm-I know, a mortal screnity prevails everywhere Villette is one blaze, -yet let me seek the park. one broad illumination, the whole world seems abroad moonlight and heaven are banished the town, by her own flambeaux, beholds her own splendour-gry dresses, grand equipages, fine horses, and gallant riders throng the bright streets. I see even scores of masks. It is a strange scene, stranger than dreams That festal night would have been safe for a very child Half the peasantry had come in from the outlying environs of Villette, and the decent burghers were all abroad and around, dressed in their best. My straw hat passed amidst cap and jacket, short petticoat, and long calico mantle, without, perhaps, attracting a glance, I only took the precaution to bend down the broad leaf gipsy wise, with a supplementary ribbon—and then I felt safe as if masked

Safe I passed down the avenues—safe I mived with the crowd where it was deepest. To be still was not in my power, nor quietly to observe. I drank the elastic night air—the swell of sound, the dubious light, now flashing, now fiding. (From Villette, Chap XXVIII)

Prayer

Not always do those who dare such divine conflict prevail. Night after night the sweat of agony may burst dark on the forehead, the supplicant may cry for mercy with that soundless voice the soul utters when its appeal is to the Invisible, 'Spare my beloved,' it may im plore. 'Heal my life's life Rend not from me what long affection entwines with my whole nature heaven-bend-hear-be element!' And after this cry of strife, the sun may rise to see him worsted opening morn which used to salute him with the whisper of zephyrs, the carol of skylarks, may breathe as its first accents, from the dear lips which colour and lieat have quitted-'Oh, I have had a suffering night This morn ing I am worse I have tried to rise I cannot Dreams I am unused to have troubled me

Then the watcher approaches the patient's pillow and sees a new and strange moulding of the familiar features, feels at once that the insufferable moment draws nigh, knows it is God's will his idol shall be broken, and bends his head, and subdues his soul to the sentence he cannot avert, and scarce can bear

Happy Mrs Pryor! She was still praying, unconscious that the summer sun hung above the hills, when her child softly wolle in her arms. No piteous unconscious moaning—sound which so wastes our strength that, even if we have sworn to be firm, a rush of unconquerable fears sweeps away the oath—preceded her waking. No space of deaf apathy followed. The first words spoken were not those of one becoming estranged from this world, and already permitted to stray at times into realms foreign to the living. Caroline evidently remembered with clear ness what had happened.

(From Shirley, Chap. XXV.)

Love

'Love a enme! No, Shirley love is a divine virtue—ohtrusiveness is a enime, forwardness is a crime, and both disgust—but love!—no purest angel need blush to love. And when I see or licar either man or woman couple shame with love, I know their minds are coarse, their associations debased'

'You sacrifice three fourths of the world, Caroline.'

'They are cold—they are cowardly—they are stupid, on the subject, Shirley! They never loved—they never were loved!'

'Thou art right, Lina! And in their dense ignorance they blasphome living fire, seraphs—brought from a divine altar'

'They confound it with sparks mounting from Tophet!'
(From Shirler Chap XVII)

The Bronte literature is considerable, but practically all the facts are contained in Mrs Gaskell's biography, edited by Clement Shorter, and in Mr Shorter & Charlotte Bronte and her Circle (1896). The latter work contains many letters to Miss Nussey, W S Williams, and others. Charlotte Bronte, a Monograph, by T Wemyss Reid (1877) is based on Miss Nussey's letters. Some information may be obtained from Pictures of the Past, by F H Grundy (1879) and F A Leyland's The Bronte Family (1886), but neither book is quite trustworthy Dr Wright's work, The Brontes in Ireland (1893), is legendary A very convenient reprint of Miss Bronte's letters, in chronological order, was issued by Mr J Horsfall Turner for private circulation but very few copies are extant. Mr Augustine Birrell's little book in the Great Writers series is marked by its sense and humanity. Almost all the existing material is now in print the letters to M. Heger having probably been destroyed. A complete edition of her Works, with Introductions by Mrs Humphry Ward, was issued in 7 vols. in 1899-1900 a complete edition, with some new matter, and Introductions by the present writer, was published in 1903. Criticisms are very numerous the most impor tant is A Note on Charlotte Bronte, by Mr Swinburne (1877) A work full of judicious comment is The Brontes Fact and Fiction, by Angus M Mackay (1897) The Transactions of the Bronte Society include some valuable papers and nn excellent bibliography Of the numerous critical essays among the most important are two articles on Jane Eyre and Shirley in the Reone des Deux Mondes, by Eugene Forçade (1848 and 1849) these were considered by Charlotte Bronte the best interpretations of her novels. The Christian Remembrancer in 1848, 1853, and 1857 published acute enticisms to one of which Miss Bronte replied (see Christian Remembrancer, vol xxxv) We may note also the essays by W C. Roscoe in the National Review, reprinted in his Essays (1860) Sir Leslie Stephen Hours in a Library (3rd series, 1879), and his article in the Dictionary of National Biography, Sir John Skelton in Europs in History and Biography (1883).

W ROBERTSON NICOLL

Emily Jane Bronti was born at Thornton in 1818, and died at Haworth on 19th December 1848, leaving behind her one imperishable novel, Wuthering Heights, and some poems which cannot be forgotten She was an enigma in life, she remains an enigma in death. She went in infancy to the school at Cowan Bridge, and was for some time in 1836 a teacher in a school at Halifax, where she worked from six in the morning till eleven at night. Later on, she was with Charlotte during her first period at Brussels For the rest, she remained at Haworth, and is said to have been an excellent housekeeper. She had no intimacies except with her sister Anne, and their correspondence has been destroyed. Her two sisters, her father, her brother, her dog, and the old servant in the house were necessary to her, but she never studied their comfort nor returned their confidence. It was said of her that she never showed a regard for any human creature, that all her love was reserved for animals. This is an exaggeration, but her reserve was extreme. She could not live away from the moors, and whenever she was absent she suffered from vehement home sickness Miss Nussey tells us that on the top of a moor or in a deep glen she was a child in spirit for glee and enjoyment, that few people had the gift of looking and smiling as she could look and smile. The only man for whom she showed any friendship was a curate, Mr Weightman had an exceptional gift for music. Her poems showed remarkable force and vigour, as well as deep feeling. Her creed was never put into explicit form, but it is manifest that she was far from adopting the doctrines of the Church December 1847 her novel, Wuthering Heights, was published by T C Nev by, with her sister's story, Agnes Grey, the two making three volumes Newby was a commission publisher of no high The sisters paid him £50, and he character issued an edition of two hundred and fifty copies Charlotte Bronte went over it carefully after Emily's death, and it is now printed with Charlotte's corrections Emily Bronte did not live long enough to witness its recognition, she died on 19th December 1848, refusing medical advice, doggedly rejecting sympathy, and clinging passionately to life The earlier critics of Wuthering Heights dwelt on its inhuman characteristics, and it obtained its first recognition from Sydney Dobell in an article published in the Palladium Dobell refused to believe that Ellis Bell and Currer Bell were dis tinct, and urged Currer Bell to write as she wrote in Withering Heights Though he deprecated the employment of the author's wonderful pencil on a picture so destitute of moral beauty and human worth, he declared that Wuthering Heights was such an elaboration of a rare and fearful form of mental disease-so terribly strong, so exquisitely subtle-with such niceties in its transitions, such intimate symptomatic truth in its details, as to be at once a psychological and medical study book bore everywhere the stamp of high genius, though one looked back at the whole story as to a world of brilliant figures in an atmosphere of mist. Mr Dobell's judgment was confirmed by Matthew Arnold, who wrote of Emily as one

Whose soul Knew no fellow for might, Passion, vehemence, grief, Daring since Byron died

Mr Swinburne in a noble panegyric reckons her the greatest genius of the Bronte sisters

The attempts made by Dr Wright to find the origin of Wuthering Heights in Irish stories, and by Mrs Humphry Ward to connect the book with the German romantic movement, have failed Equally without foundation is the story that Branwell Bronte had a share in the book. Charlotte Brontc writes after his death 'My unhappy brother never knew what his sisters had done in literature-he was not aware that they bad ever published anything? She also points out that her sisters wrote from the impulse of nature, the dictates of intuition, and their stores of observation Emily Bronte remains the sphinx of literature

Distraction.

She found childish diversion in pulling the feathers from the rents she had just made, and ranging them on the sheet according to their different species her mind had strayed to other associations.

'That's a turkey's,' she murmured to herself, 'and this is a wild duck's, and this is a pigeon's Ah, they put pigeons' feathers in the pillows—no wonder I couldn't die! Let me take care to throw it on the floor when I he down And here is a moor cock's, and this —I should I now it among a thousand—it's a lapwing's Bonny bird, wheeling over our heads in the middle of the moor! It wanted to get to its nest, for the clouds had touched the swells, and it felt rain coming This feather was picked up from the heath, the bird was not shot we saw its nest in the winter, full of little skeletons. Heath cliff set a trap over it, and the old one, dared not come I made him promise he'd never shoot a lapwing after that, and he didn't Yes, here are more! Did he shoot my lapwings, Nelly? Are they red, any of them? Let me look?

'Give over that baby work,' I interrupted, drigging the pillow away and turning the holes towards the mattress, for she was removing its contents by handfuls. 'Lie down and shut your eyes you're wandering There's a mess' The down is flying about like snow'

I went here and there collecting it

"I see in you, Nelly," she continued dreamily, "an aged woman you have grey hair and bent shoulders. This bed is the fury cave under Penistone Crags, and you are gathering elf bolts to hurt our heifers, pretending, while I am near, that they are only locks of wool. That's what you'll come to fifty years hence. I I now you are not so now. I'm not wandering, you're mistaken, or else I should believe you really "cere that withered hag, and I should think I "vas under Penistone Crags, and I'm conscious it's night, and there are two candles on the table making the black press sline lile jet."

The Old Stoic

Riches I hold in light esteem,
And Love I laugh to scorn,
And lust of fame was but a dream,
That vanished with the morn

And if I pray, the only prayer
That moves my lips for me
Is, 'Leave the heart that now I bear,
And give me liberty'

Yes, as my swift days near their goal,
'Tis all that I implore,
In life and death, a chainless soul,
With courage to endure.

Anne Bronte would have been forgotten if it had not been for her sisters Born at Thornton in 1819, she died at Scarborough in May 1849 She had two unhappy experiences as a governess, but, with the exception of a visit to London, she only once left her native county She was in every way more normal than her sisters, gentle, pleasing in appearance, and intellectually commonplace. She was devoutly evangelical, but declined to believe in the doctrine of eternal punishment. Her two books, Agnes Grey and The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, have value as throwing light on the Brontc experience, in some of her religious poems she rises above mediocrity But it is perhaps to be regretted that her novels, especially The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, should continue to be reprinted This was Charlotte Bronte's opinion Anne had none of the power and fire of her sisters, but was almost as taciturn as they Prictically everything that is known of Emily Bronté is to be found in Chapter VI of Mr Shorter's Charlotte Bronte and her Circle The Preface by Charlotte Bronte for the reprint of Withering Heights in 1850 is singularly affecting. Mr Dobell's article appeared in the Palladium for September 1850, the Palla lium was an Edinburgh magazine written mainly by members of the spasmodic school. It is reprinted in his Biography (vol. 1 p. 163). Some of Emily's school exercises appear in The Woman at Home (vol. 1i. p. 445). The volume on Finily Bronté by A. M. F. Robinson is of little value, and is mainly concerned with Branwell Bronte. For Anne reference may be made to Currer Bell's biographical notice, and to the chapter in Mr Shorter's book.

W ROBLRTSON NICOIL

Mrs Gaskell (Elizabeth Cleghorn Steven-SON) was born in Lindsay Row, now part of Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, on 29th September 1810 She was the daughter, by his first marringe, of William Stevenson, an ex-Unitarian minister, who, after a chequered career, had settled as Keeper of the Records to the Treasury in London mother, who was a Miss Holland, daughter of Mr Holland of Sandlebridge in Clieshire, died within a month after the child's birth. The infant was transferred almost immediately to the care of lier mother's sister, Mrs Lumb, at Knutsford in Cheshire, quaint little country-town about fifteen miles from Manchester Knutsford is the place she afterwards described as Cranford in her book bearing that title, and as Hollingford in Wives and Daughters, there Mrs Gaskell spent most of her childhood and girlhood, growing up a beautiful and accomplished girl She was two years a pupil in a school at Stratford on Avon, and paid lengthened visits to London, Edinburgh, and Newcastle on Tyne On 30th August 1832 she was married to the Rev William Gaskell, minister of Cross Street Unitarian Chapel, Manchester Her first publication was a poem, written in conjunction with her husband and published in Blackwood, January 1837, under the title 'Sketches among the Poor' It was followed by a sketch of Clopton Hall near Stratford-on-Avon, contributed to William Howitt's book, Visits to Remarkable Places (1838) she finished her first novel, Mary Barton, the scene was laid in Manchester, and the book dealt with the period of distress which suggested Disraeli's Sybil Her aim was to represent the thoughts and feelings of the workman appeared anonymously in 1848, and was received with enthusiasm, winning the praise of Miss Edgeworth, Carlyle, and Landor Early in 1850 Dickens invited Mrs Gaskell's co-operation in his new venture, Household Words, and the first number contained the beginning of a short story, 'Lizzie Leigh? This was followed by many short stories and articles covering a long period Her second important novel, Ruth, though written with more finish than Mary Barton, dealt, perhaps unsuccessfully, with a difficult ethical problem, and was less popular Her most enduring work, Cranford, appeared irregularly in Household Words from 1851 to 1853 It sold slowly, but its place in English literature is assured It shows a specially clear and tender comprehension of a calm autumnal existence, as clear as Miss Austen's and much more tender, it had a marked effect on the early work of George Eliot More ambitious was her next novel, North and South, published in 1855, which returns to the problem of the working classes In 1857 Mrs Gaskell published her biography of Charlotte Bronte, based on personal knowledge and full and accurate investigation, and written with conspicuous skill and charm Recent investigations have only confirmed its substantial truth It must be admitted, however, that Mrs Gaskell showed herself singularly reck less in her treatment of living people, and she had to withdraw various passages under threat

From a Drawing by G Richmond R A in the possession of Miss Gaskell, Manchester

In 1859 she published a volume of short stories, under the title My Lady Ludlow Sylvia's Lovers (1863), which is perhaps the least satisfactory of her novels, depends for its story on the press gang at the close of the eighteenth century, its scene being laid in Whitby To 1863 also belongs the beautiful little idyl, Cousin Phillis Mrs Gaskell's last story, Wives and Daughters, is her fullest and ripest, but she did not live to finish it. On Sunday, 12th November 1865, without a moment's warning, she died from disease of the heart, in the company of her daughters, and at the country house at Holybourne, Hampshire, which she had purchased with the proceeds of her last book. Mrs Gaskell wrote many articles, which have never been collected, in All the Year Round, Fraser's Magazine, and the Pall Mall Gazette Her short stories have been collected in several volumes, and the complete edition of her novels and tales was issued in eight volumes in 1872-73 Though not a writer of the first rank, she succeeded more than most in measuring her powers and in achieving her ambitions. Her work moves between the manu facturing cities and the quiet country towns, and she is more successful in the latter than in the former, her effects are produced by a multitude of tender and delicate touches, rather than by dark shadows or brilliant lights. No one describes like her a society where the stage of life to which belonged vivid passion, forcible incident, and absorbing motives has passed by for the principal personages of her story, and has not yet arrived for the secondary characters

There is no authorised Life of Mrs Gasl ell, but see Mrs Gaskell by Miss Flora Masson (1903), the article in the Encyclopedia Britannica by the same writer, and that in the Dictionary of National Biography by Dr A. W Ward. The best criticism is by William Minto in the Fortinghtly Review (vol. xxx.) See also the obituary notice in the Saturday Review (1865) by Mr John Morley (!)

JEAN INGELOW

Jean Ingelow (1820-97) was the daughter of a banker at Boston in Lincolnshire, her mother being of Aberdeenshire stock, and lived in the fen country or at Ipswich till about 1863, when she settled permanently in London. Her first efforts in verse were published anony mously as A Rhyming Chronicle of Incidents and Teelings (1850). It was her second volume of Poems (1863), which ran through four impressions in a year, that revealed her gift and her accomplishment—seen especially perhaps in 'High Tide on the Coast of Lincolnshire in 1571'. Much of her poetry is of a religious, introspective cast, simplicity, grace, tenderness, pathos, and sympathy are conspicuous characteristics, perhaps the ballads best show her power to move She wrote many admirable stories for and about children, like Mopsa the Fairy (5th ed 1891) and Stories told to Children, and a series of successful novels, amongst them Off the Skelligs (1872), Fated to be Free (1875), Don John (1876), and Sarah de Beienger (1879) A one volume edition of her poems was issued in 1898, Some Recollections of Jean Ingelow, published anonymously, appeared in 1901

Eliza Cook (1818-89), daughter of a London brazier, contributed to magazines from an early age, and issued volumes of poetry in 1835 (Lay's of a Wild Harp), 1838, 1864, and 1865 For five years she conducted Eliza Cook's Journal (1849-1854), and reissued great part of her contributions to it in Joilings from my Journal (1860) Diamond Dust (1865) contained aphorisms and apophthegms, her last book of verse, New Echoes, had appeared in 1864 'The Englishman' ('There's a land that bears a well known name', and 'The Rover's Song' ('I'm afloat-I'm afloat on the fierce rolling tide') are among her most successful things 'The Old Arm-Chair,' 'God Speed the Plough,' and 'The Raising of the Maypole' also appealed to a wide audience, but many of her poems are very conventional and wooden sometimes affected a kind of imitation Scotch, apostrophised 'Charlie O'Ross, wi' the sloe black een,' as 'the laddie wha blithely comes wooin' o' me,' and celebrated Burns's memory in stanzas with the refrain 'Oh, bonnie sweet Robin is nae dead and gane'

Adelaide Ann Proeter (1825-64) inherited her poetic gift from her father, B W Procter ('Barry Cornwall,' see page 227), and at eighteen as contributor to a Book of Beauty was writing But most of her poems were published in Household Words (from 1853) and All the Year Round, though Dickens, her father's friend, did not for some time know who was the 'Miss Berwick' from whom her verses professedly came. poems were collected in two volumes, Legends and Lyrics, in 1858, a tenth edition appeared in 1866, and there were reprints in 1895, 1900, and 1901 Miss Procter, who became a Roman Catholic in 1851, took a lively interest in schemes for furthering the well-being of working women years of her life were clouded by sickness, and she died of consumption after a long illness the best known of her narrative poems are the legends of Provence and of Bregenz, 'The Angel's Story,' and 'The Story of a Faithful Soul' Most of her best poetry is of a serious cast. 'Cleansing Fires' and 'The Lost Chord,' familiar as household words, are more solemn and significant than many hymns, and 'The Message' is grave and tender Of her actual hymns two in common use are 'I do not ask, O Lord,' and 'My God, I thank Thee who hast made.'

George Eliot

is the name by which the great English novelist, MARY ANN or MARIAN EVANS, elected to be The youngest daughter of known as an author the second family of Robert Evans, a Warwickslure land agent, she was born at Arbury Farm, near Nuneaton, on the 22nd November 1819 Four months later her father removed to the farm of Griff, 'a charming, red-brick, my-covered house,' and this was her home for the first twenty one years of her life Evans was a man of strongly marked and strenuous character, many of the leading traits of which were transferred by his daughter to Adam Bede and Caleb Garth, and of the life at Griff, many of the features are given in the sketch of Maggie Tulliver's and Tom's childhood in The Mill on the Floss, especially her relation to her brother Isaac. Between five and nine she was at school at Attleboro, then at Nuneaton, and between thirteen and sixteen at Coventry She lost her mother, whom she loved devotedly, in 1836, and from the marriage of her elder sister Christiana (1837) took entire charge of her father's house Masters came over from Coventry to teach her German, Italian, and music, and of music she was passionately fond throughout life. She was also in immense reader Her worship for Scott dated, she tells us, from the age of seven, 'and afterwards when I was grown up and living alone with my father, I was able to make the evenings cheerful for him during the last five or six years of his life hy reading aloud to him Scott's novels' In 1841 her brother Isaac married and took Griff, and her father removed to Coventry, where she became icquainted with Charles Bray, a writer on the philosophy of necessity from the phrenological standpoint, and with his brother in-law, Charles Hennell, who had published in 1838 a rationalistic Inquiry concerning the Origin of Christianity Evangelicalism had a strong hold on her from fifteen to two and-twenty, and she seems at first to have hoped to convert her new friends, but by 1842 she had so greatly offended her father by refusing to go to church that he threatened to break up his household and go to live with his married daughter Subsequently she withdrew her objection to church-going, and the breach At the opening of 1844 the work was avoided of translating Strauss's Leben Jesu was transferred from Mrs Hennell to Marian Evans, and at this she worked laboriously and in very scholar like fashion until its publication in 1846. Her fither died in May 1849, and in June she went abroad with Mr and Mrs Bray, who left her at Geneva. In March 1850 she returned to England, and began to write for the Hastminster Review, and in September 1851 she became its assistant-editor and the centre of a literary circle, two of whose members were Herbert Spencer and George Henry Lewes (q v) then that she translated Teuerbach's Essence of Christianity, the only book that bore her real name.

Gradually her intimacy with Mr Lewes grew, and in 1854 she formed a connection with him which lasted until his death in 1878. In the July of that year they went abroad together, staying three months at Weimar, where Lewes was preparing for his Life of Goethe. After a longer stay at Berlin, they returned and took up their abode first at Dover, then at East Sheen, and finally at Richmond. At Berlin she had read to him a bit of description of life in a farmhouse, and to Lewes's influence the impulse to novel writing is almost certainly due, but if we judge from the defects of Lewes's own novels, we may doubt whether his influence on her work was altogether for good. In 1856 she attempted her first story, The Sad Fortunes of the Rev Amos Barlon, it came out in Blackwood's Magazine in 1857, and at once showed that a new author of great power had risen Mr Gilfil's Love Story and Janet's Repentance followed, the former based on an Arbury episode. All three were reprinted as Scenes from Chrical Life (1857), 'by George' Eliot, that pseudonym being adopted because George was Mr I ewes's Christian name, and Eliot was a good mouth filling, easily pronounced name." The brilliant story of Adam Bede (1859) had the most marvellous success, but, to George Eliot's amazement and annoyance, a Mr Liggins, who had lived in the same district of the Midlands as herself, lind the effrontery to claim the authorship, and Mr Blackwood land actually to intervene ere Liggins was discredited The Mill on the Floss (1860) is, as has been said, largely autobiographical in its earlier part, but its 'St Ogg's' is Gainsborough, which George Eliot visited in September

Stlas Marner (1861), Romola (1863), and Felia Holt, the Radical (1866), appeared next in succession Romola, a story of Florence in Savona rola's time, appeared originally in the Corulull, and brought her £7000 Her first poem, The Spanish Gypsy (1868), was followed next year by Agatha, The Legend of Jubal, and Armgart, and in 1871-1872 appeared Middlemarch, by some considered her greatest work After that Daniel Deronda (1876), a Jewish story, showed a marked falling off , so, too, did Impressions of Theophiastus Such (1879), a volume of somewhat miscellaneous essays Essays and Leaves from a Notebook (1884) con sisted of old articles from the IVestminster, Fraser's, and other scrials

After the death of Mr Lewes in 1878 George Eliot, who was always exceedingly dependent on some one person for affection and support, fell into a very melancholy state, from which she was roused by the solicitous kindness and attention of Mr John Cross, a friend of her own and of Mr Lewes's since 1869, and to him she was married on the 6th May 1880. Their married life lasted but a few months, she died in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, on the 22nd December of the same year, and is buried in Highgate Cemetery, in the grave next to that of Mr Lewes.

As a novelist, George Eliot will probably always stand among the greatest of the English school, above Richardson, whom she greatly admired, and with whose prinstraking and elaborate style of portraiture she had something in common, though in her preference for studies taken from simple rural life, from commonplace subjects so delineated as to bring out the humorous side of human shortcomings and the overmastering power of pitiable passions, she approached nearer to the still greater genius of Fielding But her mind had not the movement and vivacity of Fielding's If it had had that movement, that elasticity, that freedom of life in it, her genius would probably have shown itself much earlier than it did, and not waited till she was close upon forty before it betrayed even its existence. In early life she seems to have given her whole mind to the higher problems of life, and to have declared them virtually insoluble before she took refuge in portraying the disap pointments, the breakdowns, the narrow discontents, as well as the generous hopes and unsatisfied ideals of other human beings Having accepted with her usual too great docility the negative view of those who held that Christianity is a mere dream dreamt in the idealising mood of cager human aspiration, she passed on sadly to a pitying study of man in the frame of mind of one who is determined to make the best of a bad business And she extracted, perhaps, from our human lot all the good that it is possible for any one to extract from it who has once come deliberately to the conclusion that, though something may be done to elevate, and a good deal to alleviate it, and though not a little amusement may be extracted from it, yet that no power can really transfigure it, and that the more modest the aim, the less serious will be the inevitable disappoint-This subdued tone of regret that the highest human endeavour is destined to be baffled runs through all her tales, and it can hardly be doubted that their pervading melancholy is at least in some degree due to the false step which she herself, under the influence of a negative school of religious thought, had dehbcrately taken, when she sacrificed her own life to the ends of a connection out of which most of the joy, and almost all the sacredness, were taken by the unnatural and morally humiliating circumstances under which she entered upon it. It was greatly to her credit that in spite of these circumstances she steadily refused to lower the moral ideal at which she aimed, though she pursued it with scanty hope and without the assistance of the faintest trust in the help of any higher power

George Eliot's mind was one of extraordinary reflective power, but deficient in vivid personal She notices in Silas Mainer how slowly impressions grow up within its, and how little we are sometimes aware of the origin of even those impressions which are destined to produce the greatest effects upon our character and external 'Our consciousness,' she sais, registers the beginning of a growth within us any more than without us There have been many circulations of the sap before we detect the smallest sign of the bud' Her Life and Letters appear to show that the surve and long drawn melancholy and somewhat artificial condition of self-repression in which she lived grew upon her more and more as 'the sap circulated' and fed her ideal of the true relation of husband and wife In story after story she attempted to impress upon others the absolute sacredness of the rela tions to which her own action had apparently shown her to be indifferent. Her most impressive stories, Adam Bede, Silas Marner, Romola, Felix Holt, Middlemarch, and Daniel Deronda were all penetrated with the desire to show how selfish and desecrating what is called love may be without marriage, and how equally selfish and desecrating marriage may be without love, yet at every return to that subject there seems to be, in her treatment of the theme, less of hopefulness, less of awe, less of testimony to the sharp remorse which follows wrong doing, less of vivid instinct, more of the tone of tragic warning, more of a tendency to acquiescence in inevitable misery

Her studies of English farmers and tradesmen and of the lower middle class of the Midland counties are hardly surpassed in English literature, and give us at least as good a view of the life of the Midland counties, as masterly and full length portraits of the slow-moving, beef consuming, habit-ridden population of those counties in the earlier nineteenth century, as Sir Walter Scott has given us of the Borders and Highlands in older days, with their wilder and more adventurous people But there is a great difference in method between the two novelists, corresponding pretty closely to the difference between their favourite subjects Sir Walter loved to show his favourites embarked in perilous adventures George Eliot, on the other hand, is seldom so successful as when she patiently develops her characters in rather slow but humorous dialogue—such dialogue as Shakespeare loved to interpolate in his plays when he chose to show us how the 'Goodman Dull' of the Midlands talked away in his stupid but comfortable self satisfaction Perhaps now and then she a little overdoes this microscopic view of marticulate natures In that curious short story of hers, The Lifted Veil, she gives a picture of a man with a quite preternatural insight into the vagrant and frivolous background of the minds of those amongst whom he lives, who is made to complain of 'the obtrusion on my mind of the mental process going forward in first one person and then another, with whom I happened to be in contact, the vagrant, frivolous ideas and emotions of some uninteresting acquaintance force themselves on my consciousness like an importunate, ill played musical instrument, or the loud activity of an imprisoned insect.' Had not George Eliot herself some curious gift of the same kind? She seems sometimes to have had the buzz of dull but excited gossip almost revealed to her by a kind of disagreeable intuition, and to have written it down at too great length in order to rid herself of its leaden predominance over her imagination

At all events, she is greatly inferior to Scott in play and richness of pictorial imagination, in rapidity of movement, and in warmth of colour Romola, her one historical romance-though it is full of subtlety of conception, contains some very striking figures, and is painted with a surprising minuteness of realistic detail—is a doubtful suc-Sir Walter Scott never failed in miking the chief historical figure of his Instorical romances the most interesting figure in his group. George Chot did not thus succeed in painting Savonarola, it was in Tito and Tessa that she achieved her great successes. As regards the historical back ground of Romola, one can hardly say that it holds its place at all as compared with even the least successful historical romance of Sir Walter Scott George Eliot's imagination was not buoyant enough to travel back into these far regions of history, and create them anew for us, nor does her story move rapidly enough to make up for the difficulty of transporting our sympathies to so distant a region. We miss the vividness and we miss the action which are needful for the art of historical romance

In her poetry, too, George Eliot falls far short of Sir Walter Scott, she is sombre stately, even Miltonic after a fashion of her own, but Miltonic without Milton's felicity and charm. She is as grandiose as Milton without being as grand. Sometimes she attains true grandeur—though not Milton's sweet and winning grandeur—as in her delineation of the selfishness that remained at the heart even of the inspired musician Jubal.

This little pulse of self that living glowed
Through thrice three centuries, and divinely strowed
The light of music through the vague of sound, Ached smallness, still in good that had no bound

Usually she falls quite short of true grandeur in her poetry, and seems to be impressive without actually impressing the reader. The rhythm is laboured, the thought is laboured, the feeling is laboured, and the effect is more artificial than artistic.

Perhaps the most curious feature of George Chot's genius is that she wrote so very much better and with so much more ease when she was writing dramatically than she did when she was writing her own thoughts in her own name. There is hardly a good letter-considered as a letterin the whole three volumes, made up chiefly out of her letters, which Mr Cross gave to the world There is, on the contrary, hardly an ineffective speech put into the mouth of any of the characters whom she delineated in her novels Sir Walter Scott has given us a fir larger proportion of in effectively printed characters than George Eliot, though also a greater number of effectively painted There is hardly a country squire, or characters dairy maid, or poacher, or minkeeper, or country lad or lass to whom George Eliot does not give a thoroughly individual voice, but when she comes to speak for herself, her voice is measured, artificial, monotonous, and a little over sweet Her letters read as if they were turned out by machinery, though machinery invented by some gently intellectual and laborious mind letters are delightful reading, Miss Bronte's are full of interest, even Miss Austen's, though they disappointed everybody, give the impression of a lively and observant mind But George Eliot's have no freedom or personal stamp upon them, unless the absence of personal feeling be itself a personal stamp. It almost seems is if her mind had been intended more as an instrument for interpreting the minds of others, more as a phonograph through the agency of which the natures of all the various interlocutors with whom she met could be delicately registered and made to report themselves to the world, than as a distinct organ of her own taste and purpose George Eliot is in the highest degree original in her power of interpreting others, but she gives an effect of faded second liand survity when she comes to interpret herself. Nevertheless she will be named in the same categors with Sir Walter Scott, Thickeray, and Dickens, perhaps even above Miss Austen, if only for the richness and quantity of her admirable work

Patty will try to be your mamma when I am gone, my darling. You will be good and not vex her?

They leaned lowards her, and she strolled their fur heade, and ki sed their terr straned cheels. They cried because manina was ill and papa Jooked so unhappy, but they thought perhaps next week things would be as they used to be again

The little ones were lifted on the bed to kiss her Little Walter said, 'Mamma, mamma,' and stretched out his fat arms and smiled, and Chubby seemed grively wondering, but Dickey, who had been looking fixedly at her, with hip hanging down, ever since he came into the room, now seemed suddenly pierced with the idea that mamma was going away somewhere, his little heart swelled and he cried floud

Then Mrs Hackit and Nanny took them all away Patty at first begged to stay nt home and not go to Mrs Bond's again, but when Nnnny reminded her that she had better go to take care of the younger ones, she submitted at once, and they were all packed in the pony carriage once more.

Milly kept her eyes shut for some time after the children were gone. Amos had sunk on his knees, and was holding her hand while he watched her face. By and by she opened her eyes, and, drawing him close to her, whispered slowly—

'My dear-dear-husband-you have been-very-good to me. You-have-made me-very-happy'

She spoke no more for many hours. They watched her breathing becoming more and more difficult, until evening deepened into night, and until midnight was past. About half past twelve she seemed to be trying to speak, and they leaned to catch her words.

'Music-music-didn't you hear it?'

Amos knelt by the bed and held her hand in his He did not believe in his sorrow. It was a bad dream He did not know when she was gone. But Mr Brand, whom Mrs Hackit had sent for before twelve o'clock, thinking that Mr Barton might probably need his help, now came up to him, and said—

'Slie feels no more pun now Come, my dear sir, come with me.'

'She isn't dead?' shricked the poor desolate man, struggling to shake off Mr Brand, who had taken him by the arm But his weary, weakened frame was not equal to resistance, and he was dragged out of the room

Mr Tulliver and the Uncles and Aunts

'Why,' said Mr Tulliver, not looking at Mrs Glegg, but at the male part of his audience, 'you see, I've made up my mind not to bring Tom up to my own business I ve had my thoughts about it all along, and I made up my mind by what I saw with Garnett and his son I mean to put him to some business, as he can go into without capital, and I want to give him an eddication as he'll be even wi' the lawyers and folks, and put me up to a notion now nn' then'

Mrs Glegg emitted a long sort of guttural sound with closed lips, that smiled in mingled pity and scorn

'It 'ud be a fine deal better for some people,' she said after that introductory note, 'if they'd let the lawyers alone'

'Is he at the head of a grammar school, then, this elergymun—such as that at Market Bewley?' said Mr Deane.

'No—nothing o' that,' said Mr Tulliver 'He won't take more than two or three pupils—and so he'll have the more time to attend to 'em, you know'

'Ah, and get his eddication done the sooner they can't learn much at a time when there's so many of 'em,' said Uncle Pullet, feeling that he was getting quite in insight into this difficult matter

'But he'll want the more pay, I doubt,' said Mr Glegg
'Ay, ay, a cool hundred a year—that's all,' said Mr Tulliver, with some pride at his own spirited course
'But then, you know, it's an investment, Tom's eddica tion 'all be so much capital to him'

'Ay, there's something in that,' said Mr Glegg
'Well, well, neighbour Tulliver, you may be right, you may be right

"When land is gone and money's spent, Then learning is most excellent"

I remember seeing those two lines wrote on a window at Birston. But us that have got no learning had better keep our money, eh, neighbour Pullet?' Mr Glegg rubbed his knees and looked very pleasant.

'Mr Glegg, I wonder at you,' said his wife. 'It's very unbecoming in a man o' your age and belongings'

'What's unbecoming, Mrs G?' said Mr Glegg, winking pleasantly at the company 'My new bluc coat as I've got on?'

'I pity your weakness, Mr Glegg I say it's un becoming to be making a joke when you see your own kin going headlongs to ruin'

'If you mean me by that,' said Mr Tulliver, consider ably nettled, 'you needn't trouble yourself to fret about me I can manage my own affairs without troubling other folks'

'Bless me,' said Mr Deane, judiciously introducing a new idea, 'why, now I come to thinl of it, somebody said Wakem was going to send his son—the deformed lad—to a clergyman, didn't they, Susan?' (appealing to his wife)

'I can give no account of it, I'm sure,' said Mrs Deane, closing her lips very tightly again. Mrs Deane was not a woman to take part in a scene where missiles were flying.

'Well,' said Mr Tulliver, speaking all the more cheerfully, that Mrs Glegg might see he didn't mind her, 'if Wakem thinks o' sending his son to a clergyman, depend on it I shall make no mistake i' sending Tom to one Wakem's as big a scoundrel as Old Harry ever made, but he knows the length of every man's foot he's got to deal with Ay, ay, tell me who's Wakem's butcher, and I'll tell you where to get your meat'

'Bnt lawyer Wakem's son's got n hump back,' said Mrs Pullet, who felt as if the whole business had a funereal aspect, 'it's more nat'ral to send him to a elergyman'

'Yes,' said Mr Glegg, interpreting Mrs Pullet's observation with erroneous plansibility, 'you must consider that, neighbour Tulliver, Wnkem's son isn't likely to follow any business. Wakem 'ull make a gentleman of him, poor fellow'

'Mr Glegg,' said Mrs G, in a tone which implied that her indignation would fizz and ooze a little, though she was determined to keep it corked up, 'you'd far better hold your tongue. Mr Tulliver doesn't want to know your opinion nor mine neither. There's folks in the world as know better than every body else'

'Why, I should think that's you, if we're to trust your own tale,' said Mr Tulliver, beginning to boil up agun.

'O, I say nothing,' said Mrs Glegg sarcastically 'My ndvice has never been asked, and I don't give it'

'It'll be the first time, then,' said Mr Tulliver 'It's the only thing you're over ready at giving'

'I've been over ready at lending, then, if I haven't been over ready at giving,' said Mrs Glegg 'There s folk I've lent money to, as perhaps I shall repent o' lending money to kin'

'Come, come, come,' said Mr Glegg soothingly But Mr Tulliver was not to be hindered of his retort.

'You've got a bond for it, I reckon,' he said, 'and you've had your five per cent, kin or no kin'

'Sister,' said Mrs Talliver pleadingly, 'drink your wine, and let me give you some almonds and raisins'

'Bessy, I'm sorry for you,' said Mrs Glegg, very much with the feeling of a cur that seizes the opportunity of diverting his bark towards the man who carries no stick 'It's poor work, talking o' almonds and raisins'

'Lors, sister Glegg, don't be so quarrelsome,' said Mrs Pullet, beginning to cry a little 'You may be struck with a fit, getting so red in the face after dinner, and we are but just out o' mourning, all of us—and all wi' gowns craped alike and just put by—it's very bad among sisters'

'I should think it is bad,' said Mrs Glegg 'Things are come to a fine pass when one sister invites the other to her house o' purpose to quarrel with her and abuse her'

'Softly, softly, Jaac-be reasonable-be reasonable,' said Mr Glegg

But while he was speaking, Mr Tulliver, who had by no means said enough to satisfy his anger, burst out again

'Who wants to quarrel with you?' he said 'It s you as can't let people alone, but must be gnawing at 'em for ever I should never want to quarrel with any woman, if she kept her place.'

'My place, indeed '' said Mrs Glegg, getting rather more shrill 'There's your betters, Mr Tulliver, as are dead and in their grave, treated me with a different sort o' respect to what you do—though I ve got a husband as'll sit by had see me abused by them as had the chance if there hadn't been them in our family as married worse than they might ha' done'

'If you talk o' that,' said Mr Iulliver, 'iny family s as good as yours—and better, for it hasn't got a damned ill tempered woman in it

'Well' said Mrs Glegg, rising from her chair, 'I don't know whether you think it sa fine thing to sit by and liear me swore at, Mr Glegg, but I'm not going to stay a minute longer in this house. You can stay behind, and come home with the gig—and I'll walk home.'

'Dear heart, dear heart' said Mr Glegg in a melan choly tone, as he followed his wife out of the room

'Mr Tulliver, how could you talk so?' said Mrs Inlliver, with the tears in her eves

'Let her go,' said Mr Tulliver, too hot to be damped by any amount of tears 'Let her go, and the sooner the better she won't be trying to domineer over me again in a hurry'

A Conversation in the 'Rainbow'

The conversation, which vas at a high pitch of animation when Silas approached the door of the 'Rainbow,' had, as usual, been slow and intermittent when the company first assembled. The pipes began to be puffed in a silence which had an air of severity, the more important customers, who drank spirits and sat nearest the fire, staring at each other as if a bet were depending on the first man who winked, while the beer drinkers, chiefly men in fustian jackets and smock froels, kept their cyclids down and rubbed their hands across their mouths, as if their driughts of beer were a funcical duty attended with embarrassing sadness. At last Mr Snell, the landlord, a man of a neutral disposition, accustomed to stand aloof from human differences as those of beings who were all alike in need of liquor, broke silence, by saying in a doubtful tone to his cousin the butcher

'Some folks' ud say that was a fine beast you druv in vesterday, Bob?'

The butcher, a jolly, smiling, red haired man, was not disposed to answer rashly. He gave a few puffs before he spat and replied, 'And they wouldn't be fur wrong, John'

After this feeble delusive thaw, the silence set in as severely as before.

'Was it a red Durham?' said the farrier, taking up the thread of discourse after the lapse of a few minutes.

The farrier looked at the landlord, and the landlord lool ed at the butcher, as the person who must take the responsibility of answering

'Red it was,' said the butcher, in his good humoured husky treble-' and a Durham it was '

'Then you needn't tell me who you bought it of,' said the farrier, looking round with some triumph, 'I know who it is has got the red Darhams o' this country side. And she'd a white star on her brow, I'll bet a penny?' The farrier leaned forward with his hands on his knees as he put this question, and his eyes twinkled knowingly

'Well, yes—she might,' said the butcher slowly, considering that he was giving a decided affirmative 'I don't say contrairy'

'I knew that very well,' said the farrier, throwing himself backward again, and speaking defiantly, 'if I don't know Mr Lammeter's cows, I should like to know who does—that's all. And as for the cow you've bought, bargain or no bargain, I've been at the drenching of her—contradick me who will.'

The farrier lool ed fierce, and the mild butcher's conversational spirit was roused a little

'I'm not for contradicking no man,' he said, 'I'm for peace and quictness. Some are for cutting long ribs—I m for cutting 'em short myself, but I don't quarrel with 'em. All I say is, it's a lovely carkiss—and any body as was reasonable, it 'ud bring tears into their eyes to look at it'

'Well, it's the cow as I drenched, whatever it is,' pursued the farrier angrily, 'and it was Mr Lammeter's cow, else you told a lie when you said it was a' red Durham'

'I tell no lies,' said the butcher, with the same mild huskiness as before, 'and I contradick none—not if a man was to swear himself black he's no meat o' nine, nor none o' my bargains. All I say is, it's a lovely carkiss. And what I say I'll stick to, but I'll quarrel wi' no man'

'No,' said the farrier, with bitter sarcasm, looking at the company generally, 'and p'rhaps you aren't pig headed, and p'rhaps you didn't say the cow was a red Durham, and p'rhaps you didn't say she'd got a star on her brow—stick to that, now you're at it'

'Come, come,' said the landlord, 'let the cow alone The truth lies atween you you're both right and both wrong, as I allays say And as for the cow's being Mr Lammeter's, I say nothing to that, but this I say, as the "Rainbow" 's the "Rainbow" And for the matter o' that, if the talk is to be o' the Lammeters, jou know the most upo' that head, eli, Mr Macey? You remember when first Mr Lammeter's father come into these parts, and took the Warrens?

Mr Macey, tailor and parish clerk, the latter of which functions rheumatism had of late obliged him to share with a small featured young man who sat opposite him, held his white head on one side, and twirled his thumbs with an air of complacency, slightly seasoned with criticism. He smiled pityingly, in answer to the land lord's appeal, and said

'Ay, ay, I know, I know, but I let other folks talk I've laid by now, and gev up to the young uns. Ask them as have been to school at Tarley they've learnt pernouncing, that s come up since my day'

O may I Join the Choir Invisible

O may I join the choir invisible
Of those immortal dead who live again
In minds made better by their presence—live
In pulses stirred to generosity,
In deeds of daring rectitude, in scorn
For miserable aims that end with self,
In thoughts sublime that pierce the night like stars,
And with their mild persistence urge man's search
To vister issues.

So to live is heaven
To make undying music in the world,
Breathing as beauteous order that controls
With growing sway the growing life of man
This is life to come,
Which martyred men lieve made more glorious
For us who strive to follow. May I reach
That purest heaven, be to other souls
The cup of strength in some great agony, Enkindle generous ardour, feed pure love,
Beget the smiles that have no cruelty—
Pe the sweet presence of a good diffused,

So shall I join the choir invisible
Whose music is the gladness of the world

Scherer said George Eliot was infenor to no one of her sex except Madame de Stael (George Sand not being excepted) in depth brilliancy and flexibility of genius, and he endorsed Lord Acton's opinion that George Eliot was the most considerable literary personality that had till then appeared since the death of Goethe ]

Charlotte Mary Yonge (1823–1901), the only daughter of a Hampshire squire and magis trate, was born at Otterbourne near Winchester, and when Keble came to Hursley vicarige (to which the living of Otterbourne was anneved) he found her an intellectual, impressionable, and well educated girl of thirteen. When she began to write authorship was considered unladylike, and a family council consented to the publication of Abbey Chinch only on condition that she should not accept the pecuniary returns for any personal end—a condition she then and afterwards cheerfully complied with. She gained a large constituency of readers by her Heir of Redelysse (1853) and its successors, and her industry may be judged from the fact that within forty-four years (1848–92) she had published well over a hundred volumes (almost three annually), besides books translated and edited, and work done as editor of the Monthly Paclet Her novels are straightforward and natural, show not a little dramatic skill and literary grace, and inculcate a high and healthy morality, though they have not the charm of works of genius them are made the vehicle of High Church opinions, for though Miss Yonge was bred in an evangelical household, the teaching of the Tractarians and her close personal friendship with Keble were the most outstanding influences in the formation of her life and thought An unwonted element of chivalry was happily grafted on the realism of contemporary English domestic life Charles Kingsley said Heartsease was the most wholesome and delightful novel he had ever read, and, singular to relate (as it seems to us now), William Morris, Burne Jones, and their group at Oxford adopted as their model the hero of the Heir of Redclyffe, Sir Guy Morville, a Crusader in modern life profits from the Herr of Redely ffe were largely de voted to fitting out a missionary schooner for Bishop Selwyn, as were the returns from the Daisy Chain to building a missionary college in New Zeal ind Miss Yonge published several historical works (including eight volumes of Cameos from English History), books on military commanders, good women, and golden deeds, a work on Christian Names (1863), a Life of Bishop Patteson (1873), and a monograph on Hannah More (1888), with whom she had so much in common. An illustrated edition of her more popular novels was issued in 1888-89 in thirty five volumes. There is a Life of her by Miss Christabel Coleridge (1903)

Mrs Craik (1826-87) was better known by her maden name of Dinah Maria Mulock, and better still as 'the author of John Halifax, Gentleman' The daughter of a Nonconformist minister of Irish extraction, she was born at Stoke upon Frent, but, settling in London at twenty, she published in succession a series of stories for the young, of which Cola Monti was the best known, and then The Ogilvies (1849), Olive (1850), The Head of the Family (1851), and Agatha's Husband (1853) She never surpassed or even equalled her John Halifar, Gentleman (1857), a story of middle-class English life, her ideal, a generous, high minded man, carried about with him an old Greek Testament, in which, after an ancestor's name, was the epitheton 'gentleman'-to John a motto, a talis man, a charter, imposing on him truth, honour, fidelity, and purity The story was eminently popular at home, and was crelong translated into French, German, Italian, Greek, and Russian pension (1864) of £60 she set aside for authors less fortunate than herself, in 1864 she married Mr George Lillie Craik, a partner in the publish ing house of Macmillan, and spent the rest of her life in quiet happiness and literary industry at Corner House, Shortlands, Kent Much of Mrs Craik's verse is collected in Thirty Years' Poems (1881) Avillion, and other Tales, contained sonie of her most imaginative work. She produced in all nearly fifty works—more than a score of novels, including A Life for a Life, Mistress and Maid, and Christian's Mistake, and several volumes of prose essays, such as A Woman's Thoughts about Women (1858) and Concerning Men, and other Papers (1888)

Cliza Lynn Linton (1822-98) was born at Keswick, a daughter of the Rev James Lynn, vicar of Crosthwaite. She did not get on with her family, and at the age of twenty-three left home and settled in London as a woman of letters. publishing her first novel, Azeth the Egyptian, in In 1858 she married William James Linton (1812-98), an eminent wood-engraver and zealous Chartist, and also something of a poet and man of letters, who edited Republican papers and wrote (besides many pamphlets and occasional verses) The Plaint of Freedom (a remarkable poem, 1852), Claribel, and other Poenis (1865), an important work on The Masters of Wood-Engraving (1890), and Lives of Tom Paine and G Whittier He prepared the illustrations for the volume on The Lake Country which she wrote, and published in 1864, but in 1867 they separated, Linton going to America and settling at New Haven in Connecticut, while his wife remained in England and made literature lier She produced about a score of novels, of which the most notable are The True History of Joshua Davidson (1872), a daring and striking adaptation of the gospel story to modern conditions, Patricia Kemball (1874), Christopher Kirk land (1885), and The One Too Many (1894) wrote much for the magazines and reviews, and her 'Girl of the Period' articles in the Saturday were collected in 1883. In her latter years slie showed herself an equally caustic critic of the 'new woman' A rather masculine temper, a strong confidence of opinion, and a faculty of vigorous utterance were among her characteristics

See her autobiography, My Literary Life (1899), and George Somes Layard's Eliza Lynn Linton her Life, Letters, and Opinions (1901). Her husband wrote a volume of autobiographical Memories (1895).

Frances Power Cobbe was born at New bridge near Dublin on the 4th December 1822, the daughter of a county gentleman and magistrate, and went to school at Brighton. Her interest being early aroused in theological questions, she found spiritual guidance in Theodore Parker's works and lost her faith in the Trinity, but said nothing of her heresies to vex her invalid mother. When after her mother's death she revealed her change of view to her father, he banished her from home for a time, and never till, his death quite forgave her, even though she was allowed to keep house for him. Her first published work, in 1855, was an Essay on the Intuitive Theory of Morals, published anonymously, which created a good deal of controversy, but none of her crities suspected the author to be a woman After her father's death in 1857 she travelled in Italy and the East, wrote Cities of the Past (1864) and Italics (1864), and engaged in philanthropic and reformatory work with Miss Carpenter at Bristol. She began to write for the magazines, and ere long was a busy journalist, being from 1868 to 1875 leader-writer for the Echo A strong Theist, a supporter of women's rights, a strong social reformer in all directions, and a prominent antivivisectionist, she published more than thirty works, among them Friendless Girls (1861), Criminals, Idiots, Women, and Minors (1869), Darwinism in Morals (1872), The Hopes of the Human Race Hereafter and Here (1874), Re-echoes (1876), The Peak in Darien (1882), The Scientifu Spirit of the Age (1888), and an Autobiography (1894) In spite of her many controversies, she had a happy life, being at all times optimist in her views of life and buoyant in temperament. She knew most of the people best worth knowing in her time, was on kindly terms with people of the most various faiths and political views, and was only irreconcilably bitter against vivisectionists of all shades of opinion She bestowed more care on the substance of her arguments than on polishing her style, and thought more of the effect she could produce in abating social evils than in securing fame as an authoress But she had the pen of a ready, copious, earnest, and effective writer She died 5th April 1904

Mis Oliphant (1828-97), till her marriage in 1852 Margaret Oliphant Wilson, was born at Wallyford near Musselburgh in Midlothian Her father's business took him to Glasgow and ultimately to Liverpool, where he held a post in the Customs, and her education was in nowise specially adapted to a life of letters. But she early cherished literary ambitions and made literary experiments In 1849 she published her first work, Passages in the Life of Mis Margaret Vaitland, which instantly won attention and approval by the tender humour and insight of its presentation of Scottish life and character on both their higher and lower levels This work was followed by Caleb Field (1850), Merkland (1850), Adam Graeme (1852), Harry Muir (1853), Magdalen Hepburn (1854), Lilliesleaf, and Katte Stewart, which, like three others, appeared in succession in Blackavood's Magazine, with which the authoress had formed a life long connection These stories are of varying merit, but are all rich in the minute detril dear to the womanly mind, show nice and subtle appreliension of character, and have a flavour of quiet fun, they often display a charming delicacy in the treatment of the gentler emotions

Meanwhile she had for a while been in London looking after a brother, and in 1852 she married a cousin, Francis Wilson Oliphant, a designer of stained glass windows His health was feeble, in 1859 he was far gone in consumption, and he died at Rome before the end of that year, leaving her not merely unprovided for but deep in debt She addressed herself bravely to her life-work—thenceforward a continuous embarrassed struggle, complicated by her generosity to an unfortunate brother and his children, and her amazing and reckless determination to give her sons the best (and most expensive) education Eton and Oxford could provide. She also considered it her duty or her privilege to live in something like luxury and to dispense an almost lavish hospitality, and it was only on the posthumous publication of her autobiography that her friends and the public knew what anxious, monotonous toil was daily demanded from the gracious mistress of what seemed an affluent household. Her daughter died in 1864, her two sons, who lived on her labours, both predeceased her, but her last years still found her hard at work as ever, writing with almost undiminished vivacity and energy.

Her early novels had been well received, and had secured a market for all she wrote. But it was by the Chronicles of Carlingford (published in Blackwood's, 1861-65) that her reputation as a novelist was established, the most notable of the series, Salem Chapel, perhaps indicates a wider and more vigorous grasp than is to be found in any other of her works. Certain of the unloyelier features of English dissent, as exhibited in a small pro initial community, are here graphically sketched, and adapted vith admirable shill to the purposes of fiction. The 'Carlingford' scries comprised The Perpetual Curate and Miss Marjoribarks, Phabe Junior, in 1676, was a continuation. The long series of her novels included Madonna Mary (1866), The Primiose Path, He that Bill Not when he May, The Ladies Lindores, The Wizard's Son, Hester, and Kirsteen (1890), and, if we consider the circumstances under which they were produced, maintained a surprisingly high and equal level.

In some respects she touched a deeper note in A Beleaguered City (1880), based on a legend of a city besieged by the dead, and A Little Pilgrim in the Unseen (1882), both of which revealed a mystical element in an otherwise rather matter of-fact temper, little disturbed by philosophising or speculative profundity. Her lives of Edward Irving, of her cousin Laurence Oliphant, and of Principal Tulloch vere sympathetic studies though not great biographies, her sletch of Sheridan in the 'Men of Letters' series was unsympathetic and an obvious Other contributions to general literature, marred by want of thoroughness though often containing interesting suggestions, vere Historical Statches of the Reign of George II (1869), St Francis of Assist (1871), Vemoir of the Comte de Montalembert (1872), The Makers of Florence (1876), Dress (1878), The Liter in History of England, from 1790 to 1825 (1882), The Wakers of Venice(1888), Dante and Certantes in 'Foreign Classics for English Readers, and Chalmers in another series, Royal Lamburgh (1890), The Reign of Queen Anne (1894) The Walers of Molirn Rome (1895), Jianne d'Arc (1895), The Two Brontes (1897), besides a child's history of Scotland (1895), and a history of the publishing house of Blackwood (2 vols 1897—the third com pleting volume being by another hand)

She wrote too rapidly and she vrote too much Having a strong natural gift of story telling, she s rote easily, with a running pen, in a simple, plain, conversational style, not without a certain vigour of her own and frequent felicities of phrase. But she took no prins with her style, did not pruse to amend her clumsiest sentences, and evidently did not realise the beauty and pover of well ordered, compact, rhythmical chuses, sentences, and para Taking novels and other works together, she is computed to have produced upwards of a hundred and twenty separate publications in some two hundred and fifty volumes, and she has paid the inevitable penalty Salem Chapel and the Beliaguered City are still current literature, Magdalen Hepburn, The Perpetual Curate, and Miss Marjoribanks and one or two others of her stories, are not , et forgotten , on much of her work oblivion already scatters its poppy. She had little joy in her work, no love for her own inventions, and accordingly she tool up with equal willingness tasks in miscellaneous literature for which she was ill too slenderly equipped. She as readily undertook bools on Sheridan as on Dante, on Jerus ilem as on Florence. And the result shows that she had neither historical grasp nor critical insight, lacking original familiarity with the subjects, she could not atone for the defect by patient study, acuteness, and vivacity of presentation. But her mexhaustible fertility, her command of humour and pathos, her masters of multitudinous details are illustrated in all her novels, which, spite of defects, have often an indisputable interest and charm

The Convert's Wife

'Oh, Frail, I am so glad you are come!' said Louisa through her terr. 'I felt sure you would come when you go my letter. Your failer thinks I make a fuss about nothing, and Cuthbert and Guy do nothing but laugh at me, as if they could possibly know, but you always understand me, Frank. I have it vas just as good as sending for a brother of moom, indeed better,' said. Mrs. Wentworth, viping her eyes, 'for though Gerald is using me so badly, I would not expose him out of his own family, or have people making remarks—oh, not for the vorld.''

'Expo e lim'' so ' the Curate, with inuiterable astonishment. 'You don't man to say you have any complaint to male about Gerald''. The idea was so preposterous that Frank Wentworth laughed, but it is no a length pleasant to hear.

'Oh, Frant, if you but knew all,' said Louisa 'what I have had to put up the for months—all me best feelings outraged and so many things to endure that were dreadful to think of And I that was riways brought up so differently, but now,' cried the poor half your owner, that it can to be conscaled any longer. I think it will break my heart people will be sure to say I have been to blame, and how I am ever to hold up my head in society, and what is to be my name and wnether I am to be considered a vidow.'—

"A vidov" cried he Perpetual Curate, in utter consternation

'Or worse,' cobbed G_raid's poor little wife feels like being divorced-as if one had done something wrong, and I am sure I never did anothing to deserve it, but when your husband is a Romish priest,' cried the afflicted 1 oman, pre_sing her handkerchief to her eves, 'I would just ask anybody what are you? You can't be his wife, because he is not allowed to have any tife, and you can t go back to your maiden name, because of the children, and how can you have any place in society? Oh, Frank, I think I shall go distracted,' said poor Louisa, 'it vill feel as if one had done something wicked, and been put out of the pale. How can I be called Mrs Wentworth any more when my husband has left me? and even if he is a pact, and can't have any wife, still he will be alive, and I shall not have the satisfaction of being a widow even-I am sure I don't know what I say,' she concluded, with a fresh outburst, 'for to be a widor would be a poor satisfaction, and I don't know how I could ever, ever live without Gerald, but to feel as if you were an improper person, and all the children's prospects in life '-Oh, Frank '' cried the weeping Louisa, burying her face in her handkerchief, 'I think I shall go dis tracted, and my heart will break'

To all this strange and unexpected revelation the startled Curate listened like a man in a dream Possibly his sister in law's representation of this danger, as seen entirely from her own point of view, lind a more alarming effect upon him than any other statement of He could have gone into Gerild's difficulties with so much sympathy and fellow teeling that the shock would have been trifling in comparison, and between Rome and the highest level of Anglicanism there was no such difference as to frighten the accustomed mind of the Curite of St Roque's But, seen from Louisa's side, matters appeared very different here the founda tions of the earth were shaking, and life itself going to pieces, even the absurdity of her distress made the whole business more real, and the poor little woman, whose trouble was that she herself would neither be a wife nor a vidow, had enough of truth on her side to unfold a miserable picture to the eves of the anxious He did not know what answer to make to her, and perhaps it was a greater consolation to poor Lonisa to be permitted to run on-

'And you know it never needed to have come to this if Garild had been like other people 'she said drying lier tears, and with a tone of remonstrance 'Of course it is a family living, and it is not likely his own father would have made any disturbance, and there is no other family in the parish but the Skipwiths and they are great friends, and never would have said a word He might have preached in six surplices if he had lifed, cried poor Louisa-'who would have midded? And as for confession, and all that, I don't believe there is anybody in the world who had done any wrong that could have helped confessing to Gerald he is so good -oh, Frank, you know he is so good " said the exisperated little wife, overcome with fondness and admiration and impatience, 'and there is nobody in the parish that I ever heard of that does not worship him but when I tell him so, he never pris the least attention. And then I dward. Plumstead and he go on talking about subscription, and signing articles and nonsense, till they make my head swim. Nobody, I am sure, wants Gerald to subscribe or sign articles I am sure I would subscribe any amount,' cried the poor little woman, once more falling into tears-'a thousand pounds if I had it, Frank-only to make him hear reason, for why should he leave Wentworth, where he can do what he likes, and nobody will inter fere with him? The Bishop is an old friend of my father's, and I am sure he never would say anything and as for candle, and crosses and-anything he pleases, Frank '-

Here poor Louisa paused, and put her hand on his arm, and looked up wistfully into his face. She wanted to convince herself that she was right, and that the faltering dread she had behind all this, of something more mysterious than candles or crosses—something which she did not attempt to understand—was no real spectre after all 'Oh, Frank, I am sure I never would oppose him, nor your father, nor anybody, and why should he go and take some dreadful step, and upset everything?' said Mrs. Wentworth 'Oh, Frank! we will not even have enough to live upon, and as for me, if Gerald leaves me, how shall I ever hold up my head again, or how will anybody know how to behave to me? I can't call myself Miss Leighton again, after being married so long and if I am not his wife, what shall I be? Her crying became hysterical as she came back to this point, and Mr Wentworth sat by her trying to soothe her, as wretched as herself

Mrs Oliphant's Autobingraphy and Letters was published in 1899

Frederick Tennyson (1807-98) was eldest of the nest of singing birds in the Lincolnshire rectors of Somersby, and from Eton passed to Trinity College, Cambridge He travelled much on the Continent, spent nearly twenty years of his life at Florence, found a wife in the daughter of the chief magistrate at Siena, and from 1859 till within the years of his death lived in Jersey With his brothers Charles and Alfred he was one of the authors of the so called Poems by Tavo but he shrank from authorship and from criticism, and did not till 1854 publish anything in his own name Days and Hours, a collection of lyrics, was praised by Charles Kingsley for its luxuriant fancy, terseness, scholarliness, and grace, but some of the poems in it were somewhat freely criticised as diffuse too sensitive or irritable poet-overslandowed, like Charles, by Alfred's fame-now kept silence till 1890, when he published The Islas of Greece, an epic dealing with Sappho Daphne (1891) contrined 'tender and beautiful idyls,' and Poems of the Day and Night (1895) reproduced some pieces from the earlier Days and Hours Frederick has no little share of his greater brother's imagination and power, as many splendid passages in his Greek Lagends and in his shorter poems show But he licked that power to concentrate and construct which goes to the making of a consummate artist A temporary adhesion to Swedenborgianism and spiritualism is reflected in some of his poems

Charles Tennyson Turner (1808-79), second son of the Tennyson house, went to school at Louth, graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1832, and became vicar of Grasby in Lincolnshire He took the name of Turner under the will of a relation, and married a sister of the lady who was to be his brother Alfred's wife Besides his share in the Poems by Two Brothers (1827) he wrote upwards of three hundred and forty sonnets, published in volumes in 1830, 1864, 1868, and 1873, and collected, with a Life by the second Lord Tennyson and an essay by Spedding, in 1880 Though Charles's genius was not so robust as that of his brothers, Coleridge had greeted the first sonnet series with warm commendation, the sonneteer's more famous brother, Lord Tennyson, unhesitatingly pronounced some of his sonnets as amongst the finest in the language And Pro fessor Palgrave described them as idyllic, sincere, pathetic, and subtle, as sometimes verging on quaintness, and as 'covering in their pensive range a vast number of motives from English country ways.

Lord Tennyson.

Alfred Tennyson was born on the 6th of August 1809, at Somersby, Lincolnshire, in the rectory of his father, Dr Iennyson He was one of a numer ous house, being the fourth born of twelve sons and daughters, the eldest of whom died in infancy. His two elder brothers, brederick and Charles, were poets of a high order, though never widely recognised (see above), but the poetic work of each of the three brothers was not merely quite original, but was absolutely distinct, bearing not the faintest family likeness to that of the others in manner or method

Alfred Tennyson gives his own account of his be ginning to write 'According to the best of my recollection, when I was about eight years old I covered two sides of a slate with Thomsonian blank verse in praise of flowers for my brother Charles, who was a year older than I was—Thomson then being the only poet I knew Before I could read I was in the habit on a stormy day of spreading my arms to the wind, and crying out, "I hear a voice that's speaking in the wind," and the words "far, for away" had always a strange charm for me About ten or eleven Pope's Homer's Iliad became a favourite of mine, and I wrote hundreds and hundreds of lines in the regular Popeian metre -nay, even could improvise them, so could my two elder brothers, for my father was a poet, and could write regular metre very skilfully My father once said to me, "Don't write so rhythmically, break your lines occasionally for the sake of variety" "Artist first, then poet," some writer said of me I should answer, "Poeta nascitur, non fit," indeed, "Poeta nascitur et fit." I suppose I was nearer thirty than twenty before I was anything of an artist. At about twelve and onward I wrote an epic of six thousand lines a la Walter Scott-full of battles, dealing too with sea and mountain scencry—with Scott's regularity of octo syllables and his occasional varieties. I liough the performance vas very likely worth nothing, I never felt myself more truly inspired. I wrote as much as seventy lines it one time, and used to go shouting them about the fields in the dark. All these early efforts have been destroyed, only my brother in law, I dimund Lushington, begged for a page or two of the Scott poem. Somewhat later (at fourteen) I wrote a drain in blank verse,

I ORD TINNYSON

National Lottrut Callery

which I have still, and other things It seems to me I v rote them all in perfect metre." I hese poems made his father say, vith pardonable pride, ' If Alfred dies, one of our greatest poets will have gone, and suggest it another time, "I should not wonder if Alfred were to revive the great ness of his rela tice, William Pat' But it was not Thomson and Pope and Scott who were to be really permanent influences. Part of The bridgl, one of the most remark able of the boypoems, is quoted below

Alfred was edu cated by his fither, and at the Louth Grammar School In 1827 Charles and Alfred, with some help from Frederick, published anony mously Poems by Two Brothers, showing amid immuturities wide ringe of subject and command of varied metres. In 1827 Frederick had gone to Trinty College, Cambridge, and there next year Charles and Alfred joined him becoming associates of the brilliant group that included Trench, Monckton Milnes, Merivale, Alford, Lushington, and Arthur Hallam. Here Alfred wrote The Lover's Tale (first published in 1879) and (1829) the university prize poem Timbucton

The earliest volume of Alfred Tennyson's poems (Poems, chieffy Lyrical, 1830) did not take the world by storm. Critics were then too conventional and too conservative, they looked askance at a new departure, they disapproved of the young poet's style and his modes of expression. Some affectations of the time, some mannerisins and hyphened epithets, almost hid from them the extraordinary beauty of the verse, the vouthful blemishes they pounced on and held up to ridicule. Not one of them recognised that Alfred Tennyson had struck a keynote that would echo down the years, and to which almost all succeeding poets of the century would attune their lyres His son writes 'If I may venture to speak of his special influence over the world, my conviction is that its main and enduring fictors are his power of expression, the perfection of his workmanship, his strong common-sense, the high purport of his life and work, his humility, and his open hearted and helpful sympathy-loriezza ed un ilitadi, e largo core' Among the first to make the Poems of 1830 I nown by favourable criticism vere Sir John Bowring in the Westmuster Reme v, Leigh Hunt in the Latter, and Arthur Hallam in the Light seman's Magazine Christopher North in Black nova was hardly as hostile as might have been expected-comewhat too slittish and petulant? Fenns on hunself thought the notice amidst boisterous assiults was something of real appreciation practically shorn by copious extracts. The stupidity and brutality of the Quarterly on the Poems of 1833 were generally condemned and did not count with real lovers of poetry but the criticism tended to check the poet's productiveness for veirs. Honour to whom honour is due. While England had as yet given her new poet but a hesitating velcome America received his 1833 volume vith open arms The younger and more impulsive nation had been at once fiscinated, and Tennison's poetry was ilreidy in the hearts and on the hips of the best Americans while it was being drinned with frint praise by the great majority of his own country But his triumph was sure if slow volumes published in 1842 conquered his English world, and set him at once and for ever in his rightful place. Lock they Hall was perhaps the most popular of these poems. The pact himself always declared that one of his finest similes occurred here

Love took up the larp of I see, and smote on all the chords with might,

Since the chord of Self that, trembling, pass d in music out of sight

His humour, that after vards reached its highwater mark in the Northern Farmers, the Northern Cobbler, and the Church-varden and the Curate, began to show itself in a delightful form in Will Water proof and The Talling Oak The Lotos eaters is a wonderful example of exquisitely modu Inted verse and rich imagery But it is difficult to select among such masterpieces as Recollections of the Arabian Nights, The Poet, The Sca fairies, Love and Death, Oriana, The Lady of Shalott, Mariana, The Two Voices, The Sisters, The Palace of Art, The Dream of Fair Women, the poems on Freedom, the Monte d'Arthur, Ulysses, St Agnes Eve, Sir Galahad, The Lord of Burkigh, Dora, an English idyll of a type which Tennyson in vented, and, almost the most perfect of its kind, 'Break, break, break.'

Let it never be forgotten, as one of his chief glories, that Alfred Tennyson, even in the first flush and fervour of his young manhood, never wrote an unclean line, he treated the mysteries of love and passion with an exquisite reverence that was almost awe. And in the divinest thrill of that young love poem, The Gardener's Daughter, he sileneed himself almost suddenly

I ove with knit brows went by, And with a flying finger touch d my lips, And spake 'Be will not easily forgiven Are those who, setting wide the doors that bar The secret bridal chambers of the heart, Let in the day'

All his life Alfred Tennison maintained that noble reticence, that reserved emotion, passionate as his poetic nature was, anything like impurity of expression was impossible to him, 'because his heart was pure'

The Princess, 'the herald melody' of the higher education of women, appeared in 1847 character of Ida,' wrote Coventry Patmore in the Lamborgh Renew, 'who is "the very ldn of the intellect, seems to be intended to represent that of science, or the simple intellect, in the most exclusive and exilted form which it is capable of teaching by its own unaided efforts rebellion against an everbitant authority, it has fallen into the grievous mistake of refusing to recognise any authority at all. It is much in the right and much in the wrong, and has to undergo i disastrous course of error before it can be taught the I nowledge of the truth' Some of the blank verse in this poem is among the best Tennyson ever wrote—such passages as

Not peace she look d—the Head—but rising up Robed in the long night of her deep hair, so To the open window moved, remaining there Fixt like a beneon tower above the waves Of tempest, when the crimson rolling eye Glares ruin, and the wild birds on the light Dash themselves dead—She stretch'd her arms and call d Across the tumult and the tumult fell

And every one knows the beautiful lyrics, 'The Splendour fulls,' 'Ask me no more,' and 'Tears, idle tears'

The most important poems in Tennyson's life work were In Memoriam and the epic Idylls of the King, both of them works that helped to give back faith in God and Immortality to many of his generation in a time of doubt and scepticism In Memoriam, though not published till 1850, was begun directly after the death of his beloved friend Hallam, and continued, section by section, through succeeding years. We cannot doubt that the loss of this dearest 'first friend-ship' greatly contributed to the development of Alfred Tennyson's genius. It might never, perhaps, have attained to its ultimate splendour but for that bitter awakening from the happy poetic dreams of personal inexperience. He 'built up all his sorrow with his song,' and the poet was built up at the same time, coming to his full stature in the throes of that abiding pain. Professor Palgrave has spoken of In Memoriam as 'that elegiac treasury in which the poet has stored the grief and meditation of many years after his friend's death, a series of lyrics which in pathos, melody, range of thought, and depth of feeling may stand with the Cansoniere of Petrarch and the Sonnets of Shakespeare'

Maud (1855) give to the personal lyric its deepest and widest extension. The first four of the twelve Idylls of the King appeared in 1859 This most important—for some critics his greatest -work was completed in 1870, 1872, and 1885 The story of the old Celtic hero, Christianised ere Malory took it up, is here 'interfused with the vital atmosphere of the Victorian era," shadowing Sense at war with Soul' In Memoriam had greatly rused the poet's reputation, Mand, although a favourite with Tennyson himself, met with a good deal of uncomplimentary criticism, but the first Idylls (1859) won the heartiest recognition from critics of the most various schools, and secured for Tennyson the unique position and popularity he thencefor ward enjoyed throughout the English speaking world In 1850 his standing in the realm of poetry was marked by his appointment to be successor to Wordsworth, the greatest poet of the second half of the century succeeding the great creative poet of the first half

In June 1850 he married Emily Sellwood was a boy and girl attachment, but circumstances long deferred their union, an extraordinarily happy She was his true helpmate, his complement, the one thing needful to make his life a whole They settled at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, three years after their marriage, and Farringford became the ideal home of a poet. Here he lived with his wife and his boys, Hallam and Lionel, in ever-growing happiness, fame, and prosperity And here, in the library he added to his house, in the lovely lawns of his garden, or pacing his 'noble down,' with the lark's song far over his head and the breaking seas far below his feet for sole accompaniment, he composed some of his favourite poems, Maud, The Idylls of the King, Enoch Arden, Queen Mary, and many another idyll, lyric, and drama. And here as time went on his friends gathered round him—the surviving friends of his youth, the friends of his middle age, of his advancing years, the unknown friends from distant lands who crossed the seas to pay their homage to him in his simple sylvan court

The Arthurian romance, all but Balin and Balan, was completed in 1869, in Dean Alford's words, 'a great connected poem dealing with the very highest interests of man,' King Arthur being typical of the higher soul of man Tennyson was fondest of reading aloud Guinevere and The Passing of Arthur

In 1869 he built his new house, Aldworth, at Haslemere, where until the end of his life he always passed the summer, and here he wrote a considerable part of his later plays, Harold (1877), The Takon (1879), The Cup (1881), The Promise of May (1882), Becket (1884) Both Becket and The Cup, under Mr (afterwards Sir Henry) Irving's management, were very successful on the stage Of Beiket Sir Henry Irving wrote to the present 'We have passed the fiftieth per Loid Tennyson formance of Bicket, which is in the heyday of its I think that I may, without hereafter being credited with any inferior motive, give again the opinion which I previously expressed to your loved and honoured father To me Becket is a very noble play, with something of that lofty feel ing and that far-reaching influence which belong to a passion-play. There are in it moments of passion and pathos which are the aim and end of dramatic art, and which, when they exist, atone to an audience for the endurance of long Some of the scenes and passages, especially in the last act, are full of sublime feeling, and nie, with regard to both their dramatic effective ness and their poetic beauty, as fine as anything in our language. I know that such a play has an ennobling influence on both the audience who see it and the actors who play in it?

Other volumes were The Lover's Tale (1879), Ballads (1880), Tiresias (1885), Locksley Hall—Staty Years After (1886), Demeter (1889), The Death of Enone, Akbar, and other pieces (1892) The later volumes show a mature and perfect art, and a range wide enough to include history—mostly English, as in the splendid Ballad of the Revenge, tales in dialect—that chiefly of Lincolnshire, a few beautiful classical pieces, narratives, idyllic and lyrical, of the profoundest pathos, and poems treating great problems in religion and morality, philosophy and science

Tennyson's keen and abiding interest in religious and ethical problems is shown throughout his work, his fervid patriotism was conspicuous at all times, and he took his side unhesitatingly in the great political issues of the day. Long before colonial federation was a popular subject, he was amazed that England could not see that 'her true policy hes in a close union with our colonies'. In his personal friendships, as in his literary tastes, he was unusually catholic. Amongst his friends he ranked Carlyle as well as Gladstone, and Huvley as well as Ruskin. He loved to read aloud Shakespeare, Milton, and Chaucer, he reverenced Wordsworth, said that Keats, if he had lived, "would have been among the very greatest of us," thought Goethe among the wisest of mankind as well as a great artist, and in his friend Browning recognised a mighty intellect, 'though he seldom attempts the marriage of sense with sound' Shakespeare was his constant study till on his deathbed the power to read fuled him In a Cyclopædia of English Literature it is appropriate to record that the most perfect master of musical English verse thought the stateliest English prose was, after the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer, that of Hooker, Bacon, Milton, Jeremy Taylor, De Quincey, and Ruskin, with some of Sir Thomas Browne

He enjoyed travel, thus he made short journeys to the Pyrenees in 1831 and 1861, and, between 1853 and 1892, to the Western Highlands, Staffa, and Iona, Portugal, Cornwall, Derbyshire and Yorkshire, Weimar and Dresden, Dartmoor and Salcombe, North Wales, Suffolk, Ireland, Stonehenge, Venice, Verona, and the Italian lakes, Dovedale, and sea trips to Orkney, Norway, and Denmark, and the Channel Islands

In January 1884 Queen Victoria created Tennyson a peer of the United Kingdom, and the poetlaureate became Baron Tennyson of Freshwater It was in April 1886 that his and Aldworth younger son Lionel died as he was returning from India, a young man of high promise, his life too early quenched by untimely death-'a grief as deep as Life or Thought' After 1887 the poet peer suffered attack upon attack of illness, until the last illness which ended in his death at Aldworth on the 6th October 1892, in his cighty-fourth year At Aldworth, too, his widow presed away, in her eighty-fourth year, on the 10th August 1896 June Bracken and Heather, quoted below, was the last poem written to her. The nation buried its great poet in Westminster Abbey his wife lies in the God's acre of that island village where, as she had herself said, they spent their happiest On the tablet to his father's memory in Freshwater Church, the inscription ends with these fine lines by the present Lord Tennyson

Speak, living Voice! to thee death is not death, Thy life outlives the life of dust and breath

The Bridal—after reading the 'Bride of Lammermoor'

The lamps were bright and gay On the merry bridal day, When the merry bridegroom Bore the bride away! A merry, merry bridal, A merry bridal day! And the chapel's vaulted gloom Was misted with perfume. 'Now, tell me, mother, pray, Why the bride is white as clay, Although the merry bridegroom Bears the bride away, On a merry, merry bridal, A merry bridal day? And why her black eyes burn With a light so wild and stern?' In the hall, at close of day, Did the people dance and play, For now the merry bridegroom Hath borne the bride away

He from the dance hath gone, But the revel still goes on Then a scream of wild dismay Thro' the deep hall forced its way, Altho' the merry bridegroom Hath borne the bride away, And, staring as in trance, They were shaken from the dance --Then they found him where he lay Whom the wedded wife did slay, Tho' he a merry bridegroom Had borne the bride away, And they saw her standing by, With a laughing crazed eye, On the bitter, bitter bridal, The bitter bridal day

From 'The Talking Oak.'

(Written in boyhood)

To yonder oak within the field I spoke without restraint, And with a larger faith appeal'd Than Papist unto Saint

For oft I talk'd with him apart, And told him of my choice, Until he plagianised a heart, And answer'd with a voice.

Tho' what he whisper d, under Heaven
None else could understand,
I found him garrulously given,
A babbler in the land

But since I heard him make reply
Is many a weary hour,
'Twere well to question him, and try
If yet he keeps the power

Hail, hidden to the knees in fern, Broad Oak of Sumner chace, Whose topmost branches can discern The roofs of Sumner place <sup>1</sup>

Sny thou, whereon I carved her name,
If ever maid or spouse,
As fair as my Ohvin, eime
To rest beneath the boughs—

'O Walter, I have shelter'd here Whatever maiden grace The good old Summers, year by year, Made ripe in Sumner chace

'Old Summers, when the monk was fat, And, issuing shorn and sleck, Would twist his girdle tight, and pat The girls upon the cheek,

'Ere yet, in seom of Peter's pence, And number'd bead, and shrift, Bluff Harry broke into the spence, And turn'd the cowls adrift

'And I have seen some score of those Fresh faces, that would thrive When his man minded offset rose To chase the deer at five,

- 'And all that from the town would stroll,
  Till that wild wind made work
  In which the gloomy brewer's soul
  Went by me, like n stork
- 'The slight she slips of loyal blood, And others, passing priise, Strait laced, but all too full in bud For puritance stays
- 'And I have shadow'd many a group Of beauties, that were born In teacup times of hood and hoop, Or while the patch was worn,
- 'And, leg and arm with love knots gay, About me leap'd and laugh'd The modish Cupid of the day, And shrill'd his tinsel shaft
- 'I swear (and else may insects prick Each leaf into a gall) This girl, for whom your heart is sick, Is three times worth them all,
- 'Tor those and theirs by Nature's law,
  Have faded long ago,
  But in these latter springs I saw
  Your own Ohna blow,
- 'From when she gamboll'd on the greens,
  A baby germ, to when
  The maden blossoms of her teens
  Could number five from ten
- 'I swear, by leaf, and wind and run,
  (And hear me with thine ears,)
  That the' I circle in the grain
  Five hundred rings of years—
- 'Yet, since I first could east a shade, Did never creature pass So slightly, musically made, So light upon the grass
- 'I or as to fairies, that will flit
  To make the greensward fresh,
  I hold them exquisitely knit,
  But far too spare of flesh'
- Oh, hide thy knotted knees in fern, And overlook the chace, And from thy topmost brunch discern The roofs of Sumner place
- But thou, whereon I carved her name,
  That oft hast heard my vows, Duchre when hist Olivia came To sport beneath thy boughs
- 'And here she came, and round me play'd, And sang to me the whole Of those three stanzas that you made About my "grant bole,"
- 'Ard in a fit of froic mirth
  She strove to span my waist
  Alas, I was so broad of girth,
  I could not be embraced

- 'I wish d myself the fair young beech That here beside me stands, That round me, clasping each in each, She might have lock'd her hands.
- 'Yet seem'd the pressure thrice as sweet As woodbine's fragile hold, Or when I feel about my feet The berried briony fold'
- O muffle round thy knees with fern, And shadow Sumner chace! Long may thy topmost branch discern The roofs of Sumner place!
- But tell me, did she read the name
  I carved with many vows
  When last with throbbing heart I came To rest beneath thy boughs?
- 'O yes, she wander'd round and round These knotted knees of mine, And found, and kiss'd the name she found, And sweetly murmur'd thine
- 'A teardrop trembled from its source, And down my surface crupt My sense of touch is something coarse, But I believe she wept.
- 'Then flush'd her check with rosy light,
  She glanced across the plain,
  But not a creature was in sight
  She kiss'd me once again
- 'Her kisses were so close and kind,
  That, trust me on my word,
  Hard wood I am, and wrinkled rind,
  And yet my sap was stirr'd
- 'And even into my immost ring
  A pleasure I discern'd,
  Like those blind motions of the Spring,
  That show the year is turn'd'
- May never saw dismember thee, Nor wielded axe disjoint, That art the fairest spoken tree From here to Lizard point
- O rock upon thy towery top
  All throats that gurgle sweet'
  All starry culmination drop Balin dews to bathe thy feet I
- All grass of silky feather grow—
  And while he sinks or swells
  The full south breeze around thee blow
  The sound of minster bells.
- The fat earth feed thy branchy root,
  That under deeply strikes!
  The northern morning o'er thee shoot,
  Iligh up, in silver spikes!
- Nor ever lightning char thy grain,
  But, rolling as in sleep,
  Low thunders bring the mellow rain,
  That makes thee broad and deep!

And hear me swear a solemn oath, That only by thy side Will I to Olive plight my troth, And gain her for my bride.

From 'The Lotos-Eaters'

Dear is the memory of our wedded lives, And dear the last embraces of our wives And their warm tears but all bath suffer'd change . For surely now our household hearths are cold Our sons inherit us our looks are strange And we should come like gliosts to trouble joy Or else the island princes over bold Have eat our substance, and the minstrel sings Before them of the ten years' war in Iroy, And our great deeds, as half forgotten things Is there confusion in the little isle? l et what is broken so remain The Gods are hard to reconcile Lis hard to settle order once again There is confusion worse than death, Fromble on trouble, pain on pain, Long labour unto aged breath, Sore task to hearts worn out with many wars And eyes grown dim with gazing on the pilot stars

But, propt on beds of amaranth and moly,
How sweet (while warm airs hill us blowing lowly)
With half dropt evelids still,
Beneath a heaven dark and holy,
I o watch the long bright river drawing slowly
His waters from the purple hill—
To hear the dewy echoes calling From case to cave thro' the thick twined vine—
Io watch the emerald colour d water falling
I hiro' many a woy'n acanthus wreath divine!
Only to hear and see the far off sparkling brine,
Only to hear were sweet, stretch'd out beneath the pine.

The Lotos blooms below the barren peak.
The Lotos blows by every winding creek.
All day the wind breathes low with incllower tone.
Thro' every hollow cave and alley lone.
Round and round the spicy downs the vellow. Lotos dust as blown.

We have had enough of action, and of motion we, Roll'd to starboard, roll d to larboard, when the surge was seetling free,

Where the wallowing monster spouted his foam fountains in the sea

I et us swer an orth, and keep it with an equal mind. In the hollow I otos land to live and he reclined. On the hills like Gods together, careless of mankind I or they he beside their neetar, and the bolts are hirld I ar below them in the valleys, and the clouds are lightly cuil d

Kound their golden houses, girlled with the gleaming world

Where they smale in secret, looking over wasted lands. I light and famine, plague and carthquake, rosing deeps and fiery sands.

Clanging fights and flaming towns, and sinking slinps, and praying lian to

But they smile, they find a music centred in a coleful song

Steaming up a lamentation and an ancient tale of wrong I il e a tale of little meaning the the words are strong

Chanted from an ill used race of men that cleave the soil, Sow the seed, and reap the harvest vith enduring toil,
Storing yearly little dues of vibrat, and vine and oil, Till they penish and they suffer—soinc, its whisper do

Suffer on lless anguish, others in I lysian valleys dwell, Resting weary limbs at last on beds of asphotel Surely, surely, slumber is more so cet than toil, the shore Than labour in the deep mid-ocean, wind and wave and oar,

Oh rest ve, brother mariners, we will not wander more

On thy cold gray stones, O Sea!
And I would that my tongue could utter
The thoughts that arise in me

O well for the fisherman's boy,
That he shouts with his sister at play?
O well for the sailor lad,
That he sings in his boat on the bay!

And the stately ships go on

To their haven under the hill,

But O for the touch of a vanish d hand,

And the sound of a voice that is still!

At the foot of the erags, O Sea!
But the tender grace of a day that is dead
Will never come back to me

Ida's Chant of Victory

'Our enemies have fall n, have fall'n the seed, The little seed they laugh d at in the dark, Has risen and eleft the soil, and grown a bulk Of spanless girth, that lavs on every side A thousand arms and rushes to the Sun

'Our enemics have fall n, have fall n—they came, The leaves were wet with women's tears—they heard A noise of songs they would not under tand. They mark'd it with the red cross to the fall, And would have strown it, and are fall n themselves.

'Our enemies have fall'n, have fall no they came, The woodmen with their axes alo the tree' But we will make it faggots for the hearth And shape it plank and beam for roof and floor, And boats and bridges for the use of men

*Our enemies have fall in have fall in they strict With their own blows they huit them class, nor knew There dwelt an iron nature in the grain. The glittering axe was broken in their arms, Their arms were shattered to the shoulder blade.

*Our enemies have fall'n, but this shall grow A might of Summer from the heat, a breauth Of Autumn, dropping fruits of power, and roll d With music in the growing, breeze of Time. The tops shall strike from star to star the fings. Shall move the story bases of the world.

"And now, O maid behold our sanctuary Is violate, our laws broken fear we not ... To break them more in their behoof whese arms Champa n'il our couse and neu it with a clay Blanch'd in our annals, and perpetual feast, When dames and heroines of the golden year Shall strip a hundred hollows bare of Spring, To rain an April of ovation round Their statues, born aloft, the three—but come, We will be liberal, since our rights are won Let them not lie in the tents with coarse mankind, Ill nurses, but descend, and proffer these The brethren of our blood and cause, that there Lie bruised and maim'd, the tender ministries Of female hands and hospitality'

She spoke, and with the babe yet in her arms. Descending, burst the great bronze valves, and led A hundred maids in train across the Park Some cowl'd, and some bare headed, on they came, Their feet in flowers, her loveliest by them went The enamour'd air sighing, and on their earls From the high tree the blossom wavering fell, And over them the tremulous isles of light Slided, they moving under shade but Blanche At distance follow'd so they came anon Thro' open field into the lists they wound Timorously, and as the leader of the herd That holds a stately fretwork to the Sun, And follow'd up by a hundred airy does, Steps with a tender foot, light as on air, The lovely, lordly creature floated on To where her wounded brethren lay, there stay'd, Knelt on one knee, -the child on one, -and prest Their hands, and call'd them dear deliverers, And happy warriors, and immortal names, And said 'You shall not he in the tents but here, And nursed by those for whom you fought, and served With female hands and hospitality

Ask me no more

Ask me no more the moon may draw the sea,
I'he cloud may stoop from heaven and take the shape,
With fold to fold, of mountain or of cape
But O too fond, when have I answer'd thee?
Ask me no more.

Ask me no more what answer should I give?
I love not hollow cheek or faded eye
Yet, O my friend, I will not have thee die!
Ask me no more, lest I should bid thee live
Ask me no more

Ask me no more thy fate and mine are senl'd I strove against the stream and all in vain Let the great river take me to the main No more, dear love, for at a tonch I yield, Ask me no more

In Memoriam A. H H.

Strong Son of God, immortal I ove, Whom we, that have not seen thy face, By faith, and faith alone, embrace, Believing where we cannot prove,

Thine are these orbs of light and shade,
Thou madest Life in man and brute,
Thou madest Death, and lo, thy foot
Is on the skull which thou hast made

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust
Thou madest man, he knows not why,
He thinks he was not made to die,
And thou hast made him—thou art just

Then seemest human and divine,
The highest, holiest manhood, thou
Our wills are ours, we know not how,
Our wills are ours, to make them thine.

Our little systems have their day,
They have their day and cease to be I'hey are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they

We have but futh we cannot know,
For knowledge is of things we see,
And yet we trust it comes from thee,
A beam in darl ness let it grow

Let knowledge grow from more to more, But more of reverence in us dwell That mind and soul, according well, May make one music as before,

But vaster We are fools and slight,
We mock thee when we do not fear
But help thy foolish ones to bear,
Help thy vain worlds to bear thy light.

Forgive what seem'd my sin in me,
What seem'd my worth since I began,
For merit lives from man to man,
And not from man, O Lord, to thee

Forgive my grief for one removed,

Thy creature, whom I found so fur
I trust he lives in thee, and there
I find him worther to be loved

Forgive these wild and wandering eries, Confusions of a wasted youth,
Forgive them where they fail in truth,
And in thy wisdom make me wise

A Dedication

1849.

Dear, near and true—no truer Time himself
Can prove you, tho' he make you evermore
Dearer and nearer, as the rapid of life Shoots to the fall—take this and pray that he Who wrote it, honouring your sweet faith in him,
May trust himself, and after praise and scorn,
As one who feels the immeasurable world,
Attain the wise indifference of the wise,
And after Autumn past—if left to pass
His autumn into seeming leafless days—
Draw toward the long frost and longest night, Wearing his wisdom lightly, like the fruit
Which in our winter woodland looks a flower (To his wife)

To the Rev F D Maurice

Come, when no graver cares amploy, Godfather, come and see your boy, Your presence will be sun in winter, Making the little one leap for joy

For, being of that honest few, Who give the Fiend himself his dne, Should eighty thousand college councils Thunder 'Anathema,' friend, at you, Should all our churchmen foam in spite
At you, so careful of the right,
Yet one lay hearth would give you welcome (Take it and come) to the Isle of Wight,

Where, far from noise and smoke of town, I watch the twilight falling brown All round a careless order'd garden Close to the ridge of a noble down

You'll have no scandal while you dine, But honest talk and wholesome wine, And only hear the magpie gossip Garrulous under a roof of pine

For groves of pine on either hand, Fo break the blast of winter, stand And further on, the hoary Channel Tumbles a billow on chalk and sand,

Where, if below the milky steep Some ship of bittle slowly creep And on thro' zones of light and shadow Glimmer away to the lonely deep,

We might discuss the Northern sin Which made a selfish war begin, Dispute the claims, arrange the chances, Emperor, Ottoman, which shall win

Or whether war's avenging rod Shall lash all Europe into blood, Till you should turn to dearer matters, Dear to the man that is dear to God,

How best to help the slender store, How mend the dwellings, of the poor, How gain in life, as life advances, Valour and cliarity more and more

Come, Maurice, come the lawn as yet
Is hoar with rime, or spongy wet,
But when the wreath of March has blossom'd, Croeus, anemone, violet,

Or later, pay one visit here,
For those are few we hold as dear,
Nor pay but one, but come for many,
Many and many a happy year

From 'The Passing of Arthur'

And slowly answered Arthur from the barge 'The old order changeth, yielding place to new, And God fulfils himself in many ways, Lest one good custom should corrupt the world Comfort thyself what comfort is in mc? I have lived my life, and that which I have done May He within himself make pure but thou, If thou shouldst never see my face again, Pray for my soul More things are wrought by prayer Than this world dreams of Wherefore, let thy voice Rise like a fountain for me night and day For what are men better than sheep or goats That nourish a blind life within the brain, If, knowing God, they lift not linds of prayer Both for themselves and those who call them friend? For so the whole round earth is every way Bound by gold chains about the feet of God But now farewell I am going a long way

With these thou seest—if indeed I go (For all my mind is clouded with a doubt)—
To the island valley of Avibon,
Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
Nor ever wind blows loudly, but it lies Deep-meadow'd, happy, fair with orehard lawns
And bowery hollows crown'd with summer sea,
Where I will heal n c of my grievous wound'

So said he, and the barge with oar and sail Moved from the brink, like some full breasted swan That, fluting a wild carol ere her death, Ruffles her pure cold plume, and takes the flood With swarthy webs—Long stood Sir Bedivere-Revolving many memories, till the hull Look'd one black dot against the verge of dawn, And on the mere the wailing died away

But when that moan had past for evermore, The stillness of the dead world's winter dawn Amazed him, and he groan'd, 'The King is gone' And therewithal came on him the weird rhyme, 'From the great deep to the great deep he goes'

Whereat he slowly turn'd and slowly clomb
The last hard footstep of that iron crag, Thence mark'd the black hull moving yet, and cried,
'He passes to be king among the dead,
And after healing of his grievous wound
He comes again, but—if he come no more—
O me, be you dark Queens in you black boat,
Who shrick'd and wail'd, the three whereat we gazed
On that high day, when, clothed with living light,
They stood before his throne in silence, friends
Of Arthur, who should help him at his need?'

Then from the dawn it seem'd there came, but funt As from beyond the limit of the world,

I the the last echo born of a great ery Sounds, as if some fair city were one voice
Around a king returning from his wars

Thereat once more he moved about, and clomb I v'n to the highest he could climb, and saw, Straining his eyes beneath an arch of hand, Or thought he saw, the speek that bare the King, Down that long water opening on the deep Somewhere far off, pass on and on, and go I rom less to less and vanish into light And the new sun rose bringing the new year

June Bracken and Heather

There on the top of the down,
I'he wild heather round me and over me June's high blue,
When I look'd at the bracken so bright and the heather so brown,
I thought to myself I would offer this book to you,
This and my love tegriber.

Thus, and my love together,
To you that are seventy seven,
With a faith as clear as the heights of the June blue heaven,
And a fancy as summer new

As the green of the brack on amid the gloom of the heather

Crossing the Bar

Sunset and evening star
And one clear call for me!
And may there be no morning of the bar,
When I put out to sea,

But such a tide as moving seems asleep,
Too full for sound and foam,
When that which drew from out the boundless deep Turns again home

Twilight and evening bell,
And after that the dark '
And may there be no sadness of farewell,
When I embarl,

For the' from out our bourne of Time and Place
The flood may bear me far,
I hope to see my Pilot face to face
When I have crost the bar

Robert Browning

Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

In the opening years of the just ended century two children were growing up in English homes who were destined to make an indelible mark on the thought and literature of their country, and to leave to the world its most perfect love idvll in real life a bright, high-spirited little girl, with great violet eyes, and dark curls falling all about her face, flitting, a slight child-like figure among her many brothers and sisters, through the stately house and wooded park of her father's country seat among the Malvern Hills, and a noble, six-years younger boy, with blue eyes and golden hair, impetuous, passionate, loving-hearted, alone with his father and mother and little sister in a quiet home in Camberwell, then a country suburb of London-Elizabeth Barrett Moulton Barrett and Robert Browning

'Elizabeth Barrett, daughter of Edward Barrett Moulton Barrett, and Mary his wife, born at Cox hoe Hall, County of Durham, March the 6th, at seven o'clock in the evening in the year 1806' So runs the parish register recording the birth of the The original family name was Moulton, but, by the will of his grandfather, the father of the poetess took the name of Barrett on succeeding to his estates in Jamaica. While still a very young man he married Mary, daughter of J Graham Clarke, Esq, then residing at I enham Hall, New castle on-Tyne, bought Hope End among the Malvern Hills, and settled down to the life of a country gentleman. Elizabeth was the eldest surviving sister of a merry troop of eight sons and three daughters As future events showed, Mr Barrett was a man of despotic temper, with a supreme belief in 'the divine right of fathers'-and also of husbands, but he encouraged and was proud of his gifted daughter, who repaid him with a passionate affection 'I wrote verses very early,' she writes, 'at eight years old and earlier, but, what is less common, the early fancy turned into a will, and remained with me. The Greeks were my demigods, and hunted me out of Pope's Homer, till I dreamt more of Agamemnon than of "Moses" the black pony' Of a childish 'epic' in four books, called The Battle of Marathon, 'fifty copies were printed, because papa was bent upon spoiling ine' Next to Elizabeth in the family group came her brother Edward, her inseparable companion both in work and play, and to the lessons shared with him under his Scotch tutor, Mr M'Swiney (which the little girl greatly preferred to the instructions of Mrs Orme, her own governess), she probably owed her early acquaintance with the Greek and Latin classics To this beloved brother she also owed her pet name of 'Ba,' by which she was called to the end of her life by those she most loved Writing of these early years, she says 'We hved at Hope End in a retirement scarcely brol en to me except by books and my own thoughts I read books bid and good bird in a cage could have as good a story' The scenery and associations of her early home remained with her as a happy memory to the last During these quiet years of girlhood the wellknown blind Greek scholar, Hugh Stuart Boyd, came to live at Great Malvern, and between him and the eager, sympathetic young girl there soon sprang up a fast friendship. To the 'long mornings' spent with her blind friend over their beloved Greek she touchingly alludes in her poem 'Wine of Cyprus' In 1826 she published anonymously An Essay on Mind, and other Poen's 'A didactic poem long repented of,' she writes, 'yet the bird pecks through the shell in it' In 1828 her mother died, 'an angelic woman,' their cousin Mr Kenyon calls her, 'whose memory,' writes Elizabeth, in the bitterness of her first sorrow, 'is more precious to me than any earthly blessing left behind' During the few following years the abolition of slavery in the West Indies (which, however, he disinterestedly advocated), and the cost of a successful but expensive lawsuit, considerably diminished Mr Barrett's fortune, and in 1832 the old home at Hope End was broken up and the estate sold. For two years the family resided at Sidmouth, and while there Prometheus Bound, a Translation from the Greek of Æschylus, appeared in 1835. The next move was to 74 Gloucester Place, London, and here, through her relative Mr John Kenyon, Elizabeth was introduced to most of her early literary friend--notably to Miss Mitford-and access was gained for her poems to some of the chief literary journals Miss Mitford, with whom her acquaintance soon ripened into a warm friendship, thus describes her at this time 'A slight girlish figure, very delicate, with exquisite hands and feet, a round free with a most noble forehead, large dark eyes with such eyelashes, a dark complexion, literally as bright as the dark China rose, a profusion of silky dark curls, and a look of youth and modesty hardly to be expressed?

'Then came the failure in my health, which never had been strong,' writes Elizabeth, and the lung affection appears to have begun which was to condemn her henceforth to the restricted possibilities of an invalid, but she only devoted herself the more assiduously to the poetry which she had chosen as her life work 'The Romaunt of Margaret' and 'The Poet's Vow' appeared in the New Monthly Magazine, 'The Young Queen' and 'Victoria's Tears' in the Ithenaum, 'The Dream,' 'The Romaunt of the Page,' and 'The Romance of the Ganges' in Finden's Fableaux, then edited by Miss Mitford, while their author's own life often seemed to be hanging by a thread. In the spring of 1838 the family removed to 50 Wimpole Street, which was from henceforth her London home. and in the same year she published The Seraplam and other Poems, including 'Cowper's Grave' and others of her very finest lyrics. In the autumn of that year the state of her health became so critical that it was decided she should winter it forquity, to which she was accompanied by her beloved brother I'dward. For two winters she remained there, for months only lifted from her hed to the sofa, but the bright, keen spirit and indomitable will remained as vigorous is ever. In Lebruary 1840, 'The Crowned and Wedded Queen' appeared in the Athenaum, and shouly afterwards 'Napoleon's Return'. On the 11th July 1840 the sid event occurred which was to throw a shadow over her future hfi Her brother Edward, with two companions, all exnerienced yachts men, started for a few hours' pleasure sail in a small vacht on a fine summer's day after day Div presed in agonis ing suspense, but the bort did not return, still they honed igainst hope, till at last the sea gave up its dead The blow completely prostrated the strict on invilid, a morbid feeling took possession of her that she was respon sible for her dear one's death, who had remained at Torquay moved ly her tears at the prospect of parting with him Her poem Profundis, never published till after her own death, is a funt reflex of her feelings at this time, of which she could never afterwards speak, even to him she loved the most. In the September number of the Quarterly Recuer in important notice appeared of her Poems, while she herself was hovering between life and death not till lite in the summer of 1841 that she was able to be removed in in invalid carriage, by stages of twenty five miles a day, to the house in Wimpole Street, where she was to pass, in the seclusion of her darkened rooms, so many invalid Meanwhile her fame as a poet was grow-'The Cry of the Children,' suggested by Mr R H Horne's Report on Mines and Factories, appeared in Blackwood's Magazine and ittracted much attention. She also co-operated with Mr.

Home (with whom, though they had never met, she carried on a charming literary correspondence ince published) in his voil called the New Strict of the Ire, a ceries of critical papers on contemporary literature, and in this work she esme into connection, all unconrecounts, for the first time with the great influence of her future life. at Sergeaut Talfourd's some one pointed out to her cousin, Mr. Kenvon, a 'slim, dark, very hardsome' young min as Mr Robert Browning, the author of a notable poem called Paracelsus. The name recalled old memories and Mr Kenyon accosted the young author, and asked, "Was your fathers name Robert, and did he go to school at the Rev Mr Bell's at Cheshant?" Next morning the young man asled his father if he remembered a school fellow named John Kenvon 'Certainly,' he answered, 'this is his fice,' and he sketched a boy's head, in which his son at once recognised his acquaintance of the previous evening. The old comradeship was renewed, and Mr Kenton often spoke in his friend's house of his invalid poet cousin Miss Barrett, and when her poems appeared he sent a copy to the author of Paracelsus. When the volumes arrived the poet himself was abroad, but his sister read and was much struck with their beauty, and on his return drev her brother's attention to them, who was at once canmoured with them, and at Mr Kenyon's suggestion wrote to tell the invalid poetess how much he prized her work. This letter, dated toth January 1845, is the first of that unique series of letters between Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett, recently published, which embalis for the world its most idylic courtship

Robert Browning, whose greatness the Englishspeaking world is tardily coming to recognise, was born in an old house at Camberwell (since taken down) on the 7th of May 1812 His fither and grandfather both bore the same name, and both held positions of trust in the Bank of England His grandfather married Margaret Morris Tittle, who was born in the West Indies and owned The poet's father was their cldest property there son, and was sent out is a young man to his mother's sugar plantation in St Kitts, but the slave system was so repugnant to him that he sacrificed a fortune to his convictions, and returned home to take up a small post in the Bank of All who knew him intimately agree in Lugland considering him one of the most remarkable men they lind ever known A child like simplicity, unworldliness, and sweetness of nature was joined in him with extraordinary intellectual and artistic His detective figuity in criminal cases is said to have amounted to genius—as did also his artistic tilent (his own desire, thwarted by his father, was to have been an artist), and his power of versifying, his son declared to be far greater than his own. He was a scholar in the finest sense of the word, and had a passion for old In 1811 he married Sarih books and pictures Anna Wiedemann, daughter of a German ship master from Hamburg, who had settled in Dundee and married a Scottish wife whose name was Sarah From his maternal grandfather who is said to have been a skilled musician, Robert Browning probably inherited his love for music, is to his German and Scotch incestry combined he probably owed his metaphysics, and perhaps to the frafervidum ingenium Scotorum somewhat of his poetic fire. Mrs Browning was a woman in every way worths of such a husband and such 1102 F Crible speaks of her as the true type of a Scottish gentlewoman,' and Mr Kenyon declared that such as she had no need to go to heaven, because they made it wherever they were the first Robert Browning's love for his mother was a passion It is told of him that as a little bot he always said, "When I am a man I will marry my mamma!" All through his hie at home, however lite he might be out, he never went to bed vithout seeking her room for his good night kiss. 'She was a divine woman,' he used to say, with a tremor in his some to the sens list, and those who know best say that his mother's was, out of sight the strongest influence in his life. One little sister, eighteen months younger than her brother, named Sanianna after her mother, and well worthy of her place in that unique family group, completed the quiet Camberwell hou chold. Very early the poetic instinct showed itself in the little Robert, his sister remembered him wall inground the dining room table scanning his verses on the mahogany when his head hardly reached above it. A beautiful, impetuous, passionate and passionately loving child, full of restless energies, leenly susceptible to music and art, devoted to all living things-coming home with his pockets full of all sorts of insect and reptile pets, all-from the little speckled frog picked up by him in the strawberry-beds to the mutilated cut rescued from torturing boys-to be given into his mother's loving care, and the boy never forgot the skill and tenderness with which she sewed and dressed and bandaged poor pussy's wounds, till she nursed her back to health. Probably for the sake largely of a few hours' peace in the household the resile's little sprite was very early sent to a lady's school near, with the result of a mutiny among the mothers of the other pupils, who declared that their durings must be neglected as they were so speedily outstripped by Master Browning, to which the worths lady pertinently replied that if they could give their children 'Master Browning's intellect' she could easily satisfy them! By the time he was twelve he had written a utile column of poems which he called he rhet, but a publisher was sought in vain, and in disgest he threa the nextly statched little manuscrip into the fire summer of 1851 the projected visit to England was paid to Mrs Browning's grief, her futher remained inevorable in his resentment, and her letter plending that he would so fir relent as to Liss her child was un inswered. On this, and on each succeeding visit to England, Robert Browning went to the door of the church in which his marrive had been solemnised, and Lissed the paying stones-a mute testimony to the happiness there begun for lum. The following winter v is spirit in Paris. Carlyle was their fellow triveller, and during this visit they made the acquaintance of M. Joseph Milsind, ever ifterwards one of their most cherished friends Robert Browning's Lang on Sheller, which was prefixed to what aftery and proved to be a series of spurious letters of that a poet was written there. Mr. Browning's Cana Guide Wirdor's, an impressoned plea for the freedom of Italy, was also published during the year. Here Mr Browning occupied himself much in modelling, and there was a temporary suspension of his own work Partly this may have been due to the sense of the shadowing cloud that hung over the life so dear to him, partly, perhaps, also to the inevitable discouragement, even to a heart so brave and hopeful as his, of the long continued lack of any general appreciation of his vork by the English public Mrs Browning writes 'The treatment in England affects him, naturally, and for my part I set it down as an infant of that public-no other word

A election from his poems appeared in 1865, and in 1863 the three volume edition was published. In December 1864 he writes 'I feel such comfort and delight in doing the best I can with my own object in life, Poetry, that it shows me I have talen the root I did tale, well. I hope to do much more yet, and that the flavor of it will be put into her hand somehow! In this year he signed his will, before Alfred Lennyson and I I Palgrave His fither died on 14th June 1866 in Paris, three weeks before the completion of his eighty fifth year. His son writes of him

'He kept his own strange sweetness of soul to the So passed away this good, unworldly, kind hearted, religious man, whose powers, natural and acquired, would so easily have made him a notable man had he known what vanity, or ambition, or the love of money or social influence As it is, he was known to half a-dozen friends He was worthy of being Ba's father—out of the whole world, only he, so far as my experi-My sister will come and live with me ence goes You see what she loses All her life has been spent in caring for my mother, and seventeen years after that, my father' From this time to the end, the brother and sister were insepar able companions Not the least unique in this unique family circle, in all rarest qualities of head and heart, was Sarranna Browning, and in that beloved sister's perfect companionship the poet found his best earthly soluce for the great sorrow of his life True as steel, brilliant in intellect yet simple and natural as a child, she combined with an almost shrinking modesty and diffidence an unselfishness absolutely selfless, an understanding sympathy that never failed, and all her father's 'strange sweetness of soul' Her ministry of love, begun to her mother and continued to her father, came next as an unspeakable blessing to her poet brother, and, after his death, to his sontill, without one failing faculty, in her ninetieth year, at the dim dawn of a recent Italian April day, the quiet summons to the better country came, and she might not tarry

The younger generation now began to recognise that a great poet had been long in their midst though they knew him not, and in June 1867 Oxford conferred upon Mr Browning its MA degree, and in the following October he was made an honorary Fellow of Balliol The year after he declined to be nominated for the Lord Rectorship of St Andrews University In June 1868 Miss Arabel Barrett died, like her sister, in Robert Browning's This year the six-volume edition of his poems was published by Messrs Smith, Elder, & Co, and that winter the first two, and in spring the third and fourth volumes of The Ring and the Book, of which the Athenaum spoke as the 'opus magnum of the generation' Robert Browning was now recognised as a great poet London society sought engerly for his company, and he was drawn much into its whirl of engagements Maich 1871 Hervé Riel appeared in the Cornhill Magazine for the benefit of the French sufferers by the war, Mr Smith paying one hundred guineas for the poem Balaustion's Adventure and Prince Hohenstul-Schwangan were published in August and December 1871, of the latter, fourteen hundred copies were sold during the first five days 'I re member,' writes its author, 'that the year I made the little rough sketch in Rome (1860) my account for the last six months with Chapman was—nil, not one It (Hohenstiel-Schwangau) copy disposed of 1 is just what I imagine the man might, if he pleased, say for himself' in this year he was made one of the life governors of London University the Fan appeared in the spring of 1872 About this time an acquaintance, begun long before at Florence, with Miss Egorton Smith ripened into an intimacy They went much together to concerts in London, and, accompanied by Miss Browning, spent several summer holidays together, sharing the same house at Mers, at Villers, in the island of Arran, and lastly, in 1877, at La Susiaz. In 1875 Mr Browning declined nomination for the Lord Rectorship of Glasgow University sotto appeared in 1876. During their stay at La Saising in the summer of 1877 he was unusually depressed, and their visit there was brought to a sad and abrupt termination by the sudden death of Miss Egerton Smith, as they were preparing to start for a day's excursion on Salène. His poem La Saisias, recording the thoughts suggested by this sad event, on another life as an essential sequel to our present life, was published in 1878 along with The Two Posts of Croisic In this venr he returned to Italy with his sister, for the first time since his wife's death, travelling by the Splugen Pass, where in great excitement he wrote Ivan Ivanovitch, and thence by Como and Verona to Venice and Asolo 'From Asolo, at last, dear friend! So do dieams come false, he writes The little quaint hill-town had been his first love in Italy, and a dream had often haunted his sleep that he was struggling to reach 'The Rocca'-the ruined embattlement which crowns its hill-but always in vain. Almost every summer holiday after, he and his sister returned to the land lie loved for 'a dose of Italian air' The first series of Dramatic Idylls was published in 1879, the second in 1880, and in 1881 the London Browning Society was started by Dr Furnivall and Miss C H Hickey Jocoseria appeared in 1883, and Forishtali's Fancies in 1884. At the tercentenary of the Edinburgh University in that year, its degree of LLD was given to him, and the following year he was elected president of its associated societies In 1885 he entered into negotiations (which, however, eventually fell through) for the purchase of the old Manzoni Palace in Venice. In 1887 Par leyings appeared, and in June he removed from 19 Warwick Crescent to 29 De Vere Gardens, a larger house on the other side of the Park. In October his son, Mr Robert Barrett Browning, who had chosen the profession of an artist, and of whose early successes his father was far more proud than of any achievement of his own, married an American lady, Miss Fannie Coddington About this time Mr Browning's wonderfully perfect health began somewhat to decline, and he was troubled by severe colds in winter, but he held on to his usual routine of life. In the spring of 1888 he began to revise his poems for a uniform In August he went to Primiero, near He was in London again in his new house in De Vere Gardens, in the decorating and and the one into which my highest convictions upon life and art have entered' It is in reality a romance in blank verse. Many of the social problems with which it deals, though now familiar to us all, were looked upon forty years ago as startling novelties, and for a delicate and sensitive woman to treat them in the bold and outspoken way in which they are handled in Aurora Leigh was an act of true moral heroism But refined and sensitive as Elizabeth Barrett Browning was, her husband sings of her truly as the 'boldest heart that ever braved the sun' There were cruelties and injustices in the received relations of the sexes, and if words of hers could help to right them, the help should not be withheld Aurora Leigh has often been spoken of as an autobiography, but whatever points of resemblance there may be between the heroine and the author, nothing can be more dissimilar than the story of their lives Yet by their diverse roads they reach the same goal, and Aurora Leigh's final views of life and art may be accepted as essentially those of Elizabeth Barrett Browning

Robert Browning is as essentially a dramatic, as his wife is a lyrical, poet Comparatively few of his poems are strictly dramatic in form, but all his think ing falls naturally into a dramatic mould his philosophy and metaphysics, of which there is much in his poetry, take generally the form of the philosophy and speculations of some real or imaginary personality 'The incidents in the development of a soul little else is worth study l, at least, have always thought so, he says in the dedication of Sordello Not that Robert Browning's mind is objective, as Shakespeare's is, there is nothing of the calm, placid, mirroring quality in it which in our great Elizabethan dramatist reflects all things outward to itself, as from the surface of a rippleless lake. Browning's mind, on the contrary, is intensely and passionately subjective and individual One never loses sight of the creator's mind in the creatures of his genius, but the universality and depth of his sympathy enables him so to throw his own passionate soul into each varying plase of the human nature he depicts, that Robert Browning is, for the time being, each of his own creations Hence the man Robert Browning comes far closer to his readers than the man William Shakespeare It seems a hopeless task in the limited space available to give any adequate idea of the extraordinary richness and variety of Robert Browning's manysided genius (His intense sympathy and under standing of the point of view of everything living, from the lowest to the highest, from the basest to the best, is perhaps his most outstanding characteristic but hardly less remarkable are his philosophical insight, his marvellous powers of observation, the power and beauty of his descrip tions of nature, the combined manliness and sweetness of his views of life, and the cheery inspiriting ring of an optimism that ignores no shadow, vet ever pierces through the darkness to the light above the cloud, built upon no shifting sands of sentiment but on the eternal Rock

God's in His heaven, All's right with the world

The difficulties of his style, so often objected to, are very much the defects of his qualities much-abused obscurity is not a matter of mere style or expression, as can easily be proved by simply trying, after succeeding in mastering the poet's meaning in a difficult passage, to express the ideas it contains in clearer or simpler English, when it will be found that the words used are the very clearest words possible to convey its meaning The real difficulty lies in gaining the poet's standpoint, that done, all is simple, and this difficulty anses mainly from the subtlety and the ripidity of his thought.) There are many minds to whom Browning's poems must remain for ever a sealed book, (because of a certain subtle quality in his mind and a faculty for fine spun analogy) which eludes their grasp, and there are miny also who, though perhaps capable of understanding if once they attain to his standpoint, find the mental gymnastics necessary to follow the rapid transitions of his fancy too arduous a task. /The association of ideas in Browning's mind is so swift and so delicate that it requires a mind in some degree constituted like his own to be able To these essential difficulties of to follow him his poetry he sometimes adds (as in Sordello) 1 complex plot, begun in the middle, and relating to obscure episodes of unfamiliar history,) and then the bewilderment of the ordinary casual reader is indeed complete! Next to Sordello, perhaps, Fifine at the Fair is the most difficult, and certainly one of the most misunderstood of Browning's, poems, as it is also (when understood aright) one of his very noblest. The difficulty here is of v different kind from that of Sordello-it lies in the essential motif of the poem itself, which is 'from a given point, evolve the infinite'-from an imagi nary, commonplace, concrete example of a man apparently drawn away for a time from his nevertheless true allegiance to the high souled wife he loves by the passing attractions of a pretty dancinggirl at an itinerant village show, to illustrate man's whole relations to the Passing and the Permanent. Another objection often brought against Browning, and sometimes not wholly without cause, is the alleged roughness of his versification With him the sense always takes precedence of the sound His exact meaning must be expressed—if melodiously, so much the better-but in any case meaning must take the pas of melody, that he can be most melodious many of his lyrics incontestably prove) (Robert Browning is essentially the poet of poets

Robert Browning is essentially the poet of poets and of thinkers Perhaps more than any other his mind influences the whole trend of the thought of our generation, but it is largely by influencing the influences. Great as his direct influence un doubtedly is, his indirect and unacknowledged power is wider still, through the whole tone of the teaching of leading minds, themselves permeated by his thought.

The greatest of his many great poems is unquestionably The Ring and the Book It consists of twelve parts, originally in four volumes, in which the same tale of wrong and cruelty and murder is told from all imaginable different standpoints—of criminals, victims, counsel on either side, onlookers, and judge-with all Browning's own unapproachable insight into the character, motives, and point of view of each of his dramatis personæ Nothing in literature can be found finer than his delineation of the passionate purity of Pompilia 'My rose I gather for the breast of God,' as her judge, the wise old Pope, calls her, or of 'the warrior priest,' whose frivolous and unworthy past vanishes, shrivelled to nothingness at first touch of her pure flame, till he 'springs forth a hero,' loyal 'to the life's end,' or of the grand old Pope, facing his last judgment, 'The Pope for Christ,' and daring to > Send five souls more to just precede his own, Stand him in stend and witness—if need were, How he is wont to do God's work on earth

The exquisite dedication to his wife, beginning 'Oh Lyric Love, half angel and half bird,' concludes this masterpiece of poetry

Among his longer poems, after this extraordinary effort of genius, Paracelsus, Strafford, Pippa Passes, A Blot in the 'Scutcheon, Christmas Eve and Easter Day, Balaustion's Adventure, Fifine at the Fair, and La Saisiaz take perhaps the highest place, and amid the unbounded wealth of his shorter poems may be specially mentioned 'The Lost Leader,' 'How they Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix, 'Soliloquy in a Spanish Cloister,' 'Evelyn Hope,' 'Old Pictures in Florence,' 'Garden Fancies,' 'A Toccata of Galuppi's,' 'Home Thoughts from Abroad,' 'Saul,' 'By the Fireside, 'Any Wife to any Husband,' 'Two in the Campagna,' 'The Guardian Angel,' 'Mesmerism,' 'The Italian in England,' 'Waring,' 'The Last Ride Together,' 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' 'The Flight of the Duchess,' 'A Grammurian's Funeral,' 'How it Strikes a Contemporary,' 'An Epistle,' 'Fra Lippo Lippi,' 'Andrea del Sarto,' 'The Bishop orders his Tomb in Saint Praved's Church, 'Bishop Blougram's Apology,' 'Cleon,' 'One Word More,' 'The Worst of it,' 'Rabbi ben Erra,' 'A Death in the Desert,' 'Caliban upon Setebos,' 'Prospice,' 'Mr Sludge the Medium,' 'Epilogue to Diamatis Persona,' Ivan Ivanovitch,' 'Clive,' the 'Epilogue to Ferishtah's Fancies,' and the 'Epilogue to Asolando'

From Mrs Browning's Poems Cowper's Grave

It is a place where poets crowned may feel the heart's decaying,

It is a place where happy saints may weep amid their praying

Yet let the grief and humbleness as low as silence languish

Earth surely now may give her calm to whom she give her anguish

O poets, from a manne's tongue was poured the deathless singing '

O Christians, at your cross of hope a hopeless hand was clinging '

O men, this man in brotherhood your weary paths beguiling,

Groaned mly while he taught you peace, and died while ye were smiling 1

And now, what time ye all may read through dimming tears his story,

How discord on the music fell and darkness on the glory, And how when, one by one, sweet sounds and wandering lights departed,

He wore no less a loving face because so brol en hearted

He shall be strong to sanctify the poet's high vocation, And bow the meekest Christian down in meeker adoration.

Nor ever shall he be, in praise, of wise or good forsaken, Named softly as the household name of one whom God hith taken

With quiet sadness and no gloom I learn to think upon him,

With meekness that is gratefulness to God whose heaven hath won him,

Who suffered once the madness cloud to His own love to blind him,

But gently led the blind along where breath and bird could find him,

And wrought within his shittered brain such quick poetie senses

As lulls have language for, and stars, harmonious influences

The pulse of dew upon the grass kept his within its number,

And silent shidows from the trees refreshed him like a slumber

And timed hares were drawn from woods to share his home caresses, Uplooking to his human eyes with sylvan tendernesses, The very world, by God's constraint, from falsehood's ways removing,

Its women and its men became, beside him, true and loving

And though, in blindness, he remained unconscious of that guiding,

And things provided came without the sweet sense of providing,

He testified this solemn truth, while phrenzy desolated, Nor man nor nature satisfies whom only God created

Lile a sick child that I noweth not his mother while she blesses

And drops upon his birning brow the coolness of her kisses,—

That turns his fevered eyes around—'My mother' Where's my mother?'—

As if such tender words and deeds could come from any other !—

The fever gone, with leaps of heart he sees her bending o'er him,

Her free all pale from watchful love, the unweary love she bore him?

Thus woke the poet from the dream his life's long fever gave him,

Peneath those deep pathetic Eyes which closed in death to save him

Thus? Oh, not thus! No type of earth can image that Wherein he scarcely heard the chant of seraphs, round him breaking,

Or felt the new immortal thiob of soul from body parted, But felt those eyes alone, and knew—'My Saviour' not deserted!'

Deserted! God could separate from His own essence rither.

And Adam's sins have swept between the righteous Son and I other

Nea, once, Immanuel's orphaned cry His universe hath

It went up single, echoless, 'My God, I am forsaken ''

(Trom The Seraphim and other Poems 1838)

The Cry of the Children.

Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers,

Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are learning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears
The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
The young birds are chirping in the nest,
The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
The young flowers are blowing toward the west—
But the young, young children, O my brothers
They are weeping bitterly!
They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
In the country of the free

They look up with their pale and sunken faces,
And their looks are sad to see,
For the man's hoary anguish draws and presses
Down the checks of infancy,
'Your old earth' they say his year dream

'Your old earth,' they say, '1s very dreary, Our young feet,' they say, 'are very weak, I'ew paces have we taken, yet are weary—

Our grave rest is very far to seek Ask the aged why they weep, and not the children,
I or the outside earth is cold,

And we young ones stand without, in our bewildering,
And the graves are for the old '

'For oh,' say the children, 'we are weary,
And we cannot run or leap,
If we cared for any ineadows, it were merely To drop down in them and sleep

Our knees tremble sorely in the stooping, We fall upon our faces, trying to go,

And, underneath our heavy cyclids drooping,
The reddest flower would look as pale as snow
For, all day, we drag our burden tiring

Through the coal darl, underground, Or, all day we drive the wheels of iron In the factories, round and round.'

Now tell the poor young children, O my brothers, To look up to Him and pray, So the blessed One who blesseth all the others, Will bless them another day

They answer, 'Who is God that He should hear us, While the rushing of the non wheels is stirred? When we sob aloud, the human creatures near us

Pass by, hearing not, or answer not a word And we hear not (for the wheels in their resounding) Strangers speaking at the door

Is it likely God, with angels singing round Him, Hears our weeping any more?'

And well may the children weep before you!

They are weary ere they run,
They have never seen the sunshine, nor the glory
Which is brighter than the sun
They know the grief of man, without its wisdom,
They sink in man's despair without its calm,
Are slaves without the liberty in Christdom,
Are martyrs, by the pang without the palm
Are worn as if with age, yet unretrievingly
The harvest of its memories cannot reap,—
Are orphans of the carthly love and heavenly Let them weep! let them weep!

(From Poems, 1844)

From 'Catarina to Camoens'

[Dying in his absence abroad, and referring to the poem in which he recorded the sweetness of her eyes,]

Keep my ribind, take and keep it, (I have loosed it from my hair)
Feeling while you overweep it,
Not alone in your despair,
Since with saintly
Watch unfaintly
Out of heaven shall o'er you lean
'Sweetest eves were ever seen'

But—but now—yet unremoved
Up to heaven, they glisten fist,
You may cast away, Beloved,
In your future all my past Such old phrases
May be praises
For some fairer bosom queen—
'Sweetest eyes were ever seen!'

Eyes of mine what are ye doing?
Faithless, faithless,—praised amiss
If a tear be of your showing,
Dropt for any hope of His!
Death hath boldness
Besides coldness,
If unworthy tears demean
'Sweetest eyes were ever seen'

I will look out to his future,
I will bless it till it shine.
Should he ever be a suitor Unto sweeter eyes than mine,
Sunshine gild them,
Angels shield them,
Whatsoever eyes terrene
Be the sweetest His have seen!

(1844)

From 'The Cry of the Human.'

'There is no God' the foolish saith,
But none 'There is no sorrow,'
And nature oft the cry of faith
In bitter need will borrow Eyes, which the preacher could not school,
By wayside graves are raised,
And lips say 'God be pitiful,'
Who ne er said 'God be praised'
Be pitiful, O God!

(1844)

From 'The Rhyme of the Duohess May'
Oh, the little birds sang east, and the little birds sang west—

Toll slowly
And I said in underbreath,—All our life is mixed with death,

And who knoweth what is best?

Oh, the little birds sang east, and the little birds sang west—

Toll slowl;

And I smiled to think God's greatness flowed around our incompleteness—

Round our restlessness, His rest

Is it indeed so? If I lay here dead, Wonldst thou miss any life in losing mine?
And would the sun for thee more coldly shine
Because of grave damps falling round my head?
I marvelled, my Beloved, when I read
Thy thought so in the letter I am thine—
But so much to thee? Can I pour thy wine While my hands tremble? Then my soul, instead Of dreams of death, resumes life's lower range
Then, love me, Love! Look on me—breathe on me!
As brighter ladies do not count it strange,
For love, to give up acres and degree,
I yield the grave for thy sake, and exchange
My near sweet view of Heaven, for earth with thee!

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways I love thee to the depth and breadth and height My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight For the ends of Being and ideal Grace I love thee to the level of every day's Most quiet need, by sun and candlelight I love thee freely, as men strive for Right, I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise. I love thee with the passion put to use In my old griefs, and with my childhood's faith I love thee with a love I seemed to lose With my lost saints—I love thee with the breath, Smiles, tears, of all my life ' and, if God choose, I shall but love thee better after death

Make trade a Christian possibility, And individual right no general wrong

What then,
Unless the artist keep up open roads Betwixt the seen and unseen,—bursting through 140

The best of your conventions with his best?

We'll not barter, sir,

The beautiful for barley —And even so,
I hold you will not compass your poor ends
Of barley feeding and material ease,
Without a poet's individualism
To work your universal It takes a soul,
To move a body, it takes a high souled man,
To move the masses, even to a cleaner stye,
It takes the ideal, to blow a hair's breadth off
The dust of the actual —Ah, your Fouriers failed, Because not poet enough to understand That life develops from within'

Get leave to work
In this world—'tis the best you get at all!
For God in cursing, gives us better gifts Than men in benediction

If he had loved,

Ay, loved me, with that retributive face,—
I might have been a common woman now
And happier, less known and less left alone,
Perhaps a better woman after all,
With chubby children hanging on my neck
To keep me low and wise. Ah me, the vines
That bear such fruit, are proud to stoop with it
The palm stands upright in a realm of sand!

I was flushed with praise,
But, pausing just a moment to draw breath,
I could not choose but murmur to myself
"Is this all? all that's done? and all that's grined?"
If this then be success 'tis dismaller
Than any failure!

O my God, my God,
O Supreme Artist, who as sole return
For all the cosmic wonder of Thy work, Demandest of us just a word a name,
"My Father!" thou hast knowledge, only thou How dreary 'tis for women to sit still On winter nights by solitary fires
And hear the nations praising them far off,
Too far! ay, praising our quick sense of love,
Our very heart of passionate womanhood,
Which could not beat so in the verse without Being present also in the unkissed lips
And eyes undried because there's none to ask
The reason they grew moist

To have our books

Appraised by love, associated with love,

While we sit loveless! is it hard, you think?

At least 'tis mournful Fame, indeed, 'twas said,

Means simply love It was a man said that

And then, there's love and love the love of all

(To risk in turn a woman's paradox,)

Is but a small thing to the love of one

You bid a hungry child be satisfied

With a lieritage of many corn fields nay,

He says he's hungry,—he would rather have

That little barley cake you keep from him

While reckoning but his harvests

'The man most man, with tenderest human hands Works best for men—as God in Nazareth' He paused upon the word, and then resumed 'Fewer programmes, we who have no prescience, Fewer systems, we who are held and do not hold, Less massing out of masses to be saved By natious or by sexes.

The world waits

For help Beloved, let us love so well, Our work shall still be better for our love, And still our love be sweeter for our work, And both commended, for the sake of each, By all true workers and true lovers born'

A Musical Instrument

What was he doing, the great god Pan, Down in the reeds by the river?

Spreading ruin and scattering ban,

Splashing and paddling with hoofs of a goat,

And breaking the golden likes affoat

With the dragon fly on the river

He tore out a reed, the great god Pan,
From the deep cool bed of the river,
The limpid water turbidly ran,
And the broken lilies a dying lay,
And the dragon fly had fled away,
Ere he brought it out of the river

High on the shore sat the great god Pan,
While turbidly flowed the river,
And hacked and hewed as a great god cau,
With his hard bleak steel at the patient reed,
Till there was not a sign of the leaf indeed
To prove it fresh from the river

He cut it short, did the great god Pan, (How tall it stood in the river I) Then drew the pith, like the heart of a man,
Steadily from the outside ring,
And notched the poor dry empty thing
In holes, as he sat by the river

'This is the way,' laughed the great god Pan (Laughed while he sat by the river),
'The only way, since gods began
To make sweet music, they could succeed.'
Then, dropping his mouth to a hole in the reed,
He blew in power by the river

Sweet, sweet, sweet, O Pan!
Piercing sweet by the river!
Blinding sweet, O great god Pan!
The sun on the hill forgot to die,
And the lilies revived, and the dragon fly
Came back to dream on the river

Yet half a beast is the great god Pan,

To laugh as he sits by the river,

Making a poet out of a man

The true gods sigh for the cost and the pain,—

For the reed that grows nevermore again

As a reed with the reeds in the river

From Robert Browning's Poems
The Lost Leader

ľ

Just for a handful of silver he left us,
Just for a riband to stick in his coat—
Found the one gift of which fortune bereft us, Lost all the others she lets us devote,
They, with the gold to give, doled him ont silver,
So much was theirs who so little allowed
How all our copper had gone to his service!
Rags—were they purple, his heart had been proud 1

We that had loved him so, followed him, honoured him, Lived in his mild and magnificcut eye,
Learned his great language, caught his clear acceuts,
Made him our pattern to hive and to die!
Shakespeare was of us, Milton was for us, Burns, Shelley, were with us—they watch from their graves!

He alone breaks from the van and the freemen-He alone sinks to the rear and the slaves! We shall march prospering, -not thro' his presence, Songs shall inspirit us,-not from his lyre, Decds will be done, -while he boasts his quiescence, Still bidding erouch whom the rest bade aspire Blot out his name, then, record one lost soul more, One task more declined, one more footpath untrod, One more devils' triumph and sorrow for angels, One wrong more to man, one more insult to God! Life's night begins let him never come back to us! There would be doubt, hesitation and pain, Forced praise on our part—the glimmer of twilight, Never glad confident morning again 1 Best fight on well, for we taught him-strike gallantly, Mennee our heart ere we muster his own, Then let him receive the new knowledge and wait us, Pardoned in heaven, the first by the throne I (From Bells and Pomegranates, No 7, 1845-)

Evelyn Hope

Beautiful Evelyn Hope is dead!

Sit and watch by her side an hour

That is her book shelf, this her bed,

She plucked that piece of geranium flower,

Beginning to die too, in the glass,

Little has yet been changed, I think

The shutters are shut, no light may pass

Save two long rays thro' the hinge's chink

Sixteen years old when she died <sup>1</sup>
Perhaps she had scarcely heard my name,
It was not her time to love, beside,
Her life had many a hope and aim,
Duties enough and little cares,
And now was quiet, now astir,
Till God's hand beckoned unawares,
And the sweet white brow is all of her

Is it too late then, Evelyn Hope?
What, your soul was pure and true,
The good stars met in your horoscope,
Made you of spirit, fire and dew—
And just because I was twice as old
And our paths in the world diverged so wide, Tach was nought to each, must I be told?
We were fellow mortals, nought beside?

No, indeed ' for God above Is great to grant, as mighty to make,
And creates the love to reward the love
I clum you still for my own love's sake '
Delayed it may be for more lives yet,
Through worlds I shall traverse, not a few Much is to learn, much to forget
Let the time be come for taking you.
But the time will come—at last it will,

When, Evelyn Hope, what meant (I shall say)
In the lower earth, in the years long still,
That body and soul so pure and gry?

Why your hair was amber, I shall divine,
And your mouth of your own geranium's red—
And what you would do with me, in fine,
In the new life come in the old one's stead

I have lived (I shall say) so much since then,
Given up inyself so many times,
Gained me the gains of various men,
Ransacked the ages, spoiled the climes, let one thing, one in my soul's full scope, Lither I missed or itself missed me
And I want and find you, Livelyn Hope i
What is the issue? let us see!

I loved you, Evelyn, all the while My heart seemed full as it could hold?
There was place and to spare for the frink young smile,
And the red young mouth, and the hair's young gold So, hush—I will give you this leaf to keep See, I shut it inside the sweet cold hand!
There, that is our secret—go to sleep!
You will wake, and remember, and understand!

An Epistie-containing the Strange Medical Experience of Karshish, the Arab Physician

Karshish, the picker up of learning's crumbs, The not incurious in God's handiwork (This man's flesh he hath admirably made, Blown like a bubble, kneaded like a paste, To coop up and keep down on earth a space That puff of vapour from his mouth, man's soul) -To Abib, all sagacious in our art, Breeder in me of what poor skill I boast, Like me inquisitive how pricks and cracks Befull the flesh through too much stress and strain, Whereby the wily vapour fain would slip Back and rejoin its source before the term,-And aptest in contrivance (under God) To brifle it by deftly stopping such -The vagrant Scholar to his Sage at home Sends greeting (health and knowledge, fame with peace) Three samples of true snakestone-rarer still, One of the other sort, the melon shaped, (But fitter, pounded fine, for charms than drugs) And writeth now the twenty second time

My journeyings were brought to Jericho Thus I resume Who studious in our art Shall count a little labour unrepaid? I have shed sweat enough, left flesh and bone On many a flinty furlong of this land Also, the country side is all on fire With runours of a marching hitherward Some say Vespasian cometh, some, his son A black lynx snarled and pricked a tufted ear, Lust of my blood influmed his yellow balls I eried and threw my staff and he was gone. Twice have the robbers stripped and beaten me, And once a town declared me for a spy, But at the end, I reach Jerusalem, Since this poor covert where I pass the night, This Bethany lies scarce the distance thence A man with plague-sores at the third degree Runs till he drops down dead. Thou laughest here! Sooth at clates me, thus reposed and safe, To void the stuffing of my travel scrip And share with thee whatever Je vry yields

A viscid choler is observable In tertians, I was nearly hold to say, And falling sickness hath a happier cure Than our school wots of there s a spider here Weaves no web, watches on the ledge of tombs, Sprinkled with mottles on an ash grey back, Take five and drop them but who knows his mind, The Syran run a gate I trust this to? His service payeth me a sublimate Blown up his nose to help the ailing eye. Best wait I reach Jerusalem at morn, There set in order my experiences, Gather what most deserves, and give thee all-Or I might add, Judrea's gum tragacanth Scales off in purer flakes, slines clearer grained, Cracks 'twixt the pestle and the porphyry, In fine exceeds our produce Scalp disease Confounds me, crossing so with leprosy-Thou hadst admired one sort I gained at 7oar-But zeal outruns discretion Here I end

Yet stay my Syrian blinketh gratefully, Protesteth his devotion is my price-Suppose I write what harms not, though he steal? I half resolve to tell thee, yet I blush, What set me off a writing first of all An itch I had, a sting to write, a tang 1 For, be it this town's barrenness-or else The Man had something in the look of him-His case has struck me far more than 'tis worth. So, pardon if-(lest presently I lose In the great press of novelty at hand The care and pains this somehow stole from ine) I bid thee take the thing while fresh in mind, Almost in sight-for, wilt thou have the truth? The very man is gone from me but now, Whose ailment is the subject of discourse. Thus then and let thy better wit help all 1

'Tis but a case of manin-subinduced By epilepsy, at the turning point Of trance prolonged unduly some three days When, by the exhibition of some drug Or spell, exorcization, stroke of art Unknown to me and which 'twere well to I now, The evil thing out breaking all at once Left the man whole and sound in body indeed,— But flinging (so to speak) life s gates too wide, Making a clear house of it too suddenly, The first concert that entered might inscribe Whatever it was minded on the wall So plauly at that vantage, as it were, (I irst come, first served) that nothing subsequent Attaineth to erase those fancy scrawls The just returned and new established soul Hath gotten now so thoroughly by heart That henceforth she will read or these or none. And first—the man's own firm conviction rests That he was dead (in fact they buried him) -That he was dead and then restored to life By a Nazarene physician of his tribe -'Saveth, the same bade 'Rise,' and he did ri e. "Such cases are diurnal, thou wilt en Not so this figment '-not, that such a fume Instead of giving way to time and health, Should ext uself into the life of life As saffron tingeth fie. It blood, bones and all !

For sec, how he tall es up the after life The man-it is one Lazarus a Jew, Sanguine, proportioned, fifty years of age, The body's habit wholly laudable, As much, indeed, beyond the common health As he were made and put aside to show Thinl, could we penetrate by any drug And bathe the wearied soul and wormed flesh, And bring it clear and fair by three days sleep! Whence has the man the balm that brightens all? This grown man eyes the world now like a child Some elders of his tribe, I should premise, Led in their friend, obedient as a slicep. To bear my inquisition While they spoke Now sharply, now with sorrow,—told the ease,— He listened not except I spoke to him. But folded his two hands and let them talk, Watching the flies that buzzed and yet no fool And that's a sample how his years must go Look if a beggar, in fixed middle life. Should find a treasure—can he use the same With straitened liabits and with tastes starved small, And take at once to his impoverished brain The sudden element that changes things That sets the undreamed of rapture at his hand, And puts the cherp old joy in the scorned dust? Is he not such an one as moves to mirth-Warily parsimonious, when no need, Wasteful as drunkenness at undue times? All prudent counsel as to what befits The golden mean, is lost on such an one The man's funtustic will is the man's law So here-we call the treasure knowledge, say Increased beyond the fleshy faculty-Herven opened to a soul while yet on earth. Earth forced on a soul's use while seeing heaven The man is witless of the size, the suin, The value in proportion of all things, Or whether it be little or be much Discourse to him of prodigious armaments Assembled to besiege his city now, And of the passing of n mule with gourds-'Tis one! Then take it on the other side, Speal of some trifling fact, -he will gaze rapt With stupor at its very littleness, (Far as I see) as if in that indeed He caught prodigious import, whole results And so will turn to us the bystanders In ever the same stupor (note this point) That we too see not with his opened eyes Wonder and doubt come wrongly into play, Preposterously, nt cross purposes Should his child sicken unto death, -why look For scarce abatement of his cheerfulness, Or pretermission of the daily craft ! While a word, gesture, glance from that same child At play or in the school or laid asleep, Will startle him to an agony of fear, Exasperation, just as like. Demand The reason why-"'tis but a word," object-'A gesture '-he regards thee as our lord Who lived there in the pyramid alone, Looked at us (dost thou mind?) when, being young We both would unadvisedly recite Some charm's beginning, from that book of his, Able to bid the sun throb wide and burst

All into stars, as suns grown old are a ont Thou and the child have each a veil able Thrown our your heads, from under which we both Stretch your blind hands and trifle with a match Over a mine of Greek fire, did we know ! He holds on firmly to some thread of life-(It is the life to lead perforcedly) Which runs across some vast distracting orb-Of glors on either side that meagre throad, Which, conscious of, he must not enter yet-The spiritual life around the earthly life The law of that is known to him as this. His heart and brum move there, his feet stay here So is the man perplexed with impul-Sudden to start off cro swi e, not straight on Proclaiming what is right and wrong across, And not along this black thread through the blaze-It should be baulked by there it cannot be. And oft the man s soul springs into his face As if he saw again and heard again His sage that lade him 'Pive, and he did rise, Something a word, a tick of the blood within Admonishes then back he sinks at once To a lies who was very fine before. In sedulous recurrence to his trade Whereby he carnetly him the daily bread In I studiously the humbler for that pride Professedly the fultier that he knows God's secret, while he holds the thread of life Indeed the especial marking of the man Is prone submit ion to the heavenly will-Seeing it what it is and why it is "saveth, he will wait patient to the last I or that same death which must restore his being To equilibrium, body loosening soul Divorced even now by premature full growth He will live, may it pleaseth him to live So long as God please and just how God please He even seeketh not to please God more (Which meaneth, otherwise) than as God please Hence I perceive not be affects to preach The doctrine of his seet whate'er it he Make proselytes as madmen thirst to do How can be give his neighbour the real ground His own conviction? Ardent as he is-Call his great truth a lie, why, still the old "Be it as God please" reassureth him I probed the sore as thy disciple should "How, beast," said I, "this stolid carelessness Sufficeth thee when Rome is on her march To stamp out like n little spark thy town, The tribe the crue tale and thee at once?' He merely looked with his large eyes on me The man is apathetic, you deduce? Contrariwise, he loves both old and young, Able and weak, affects the very brutes and birds-how say I? flowers of the field-As a wise workman recognises tools In a master's workshop, loving what they make Thus is the man as harmless as a lamb Only impatient, let him do his best, At ignorance and carelessness and sin-An indignation which is promptly curbed As when in certain travel I have feigned To be an ignoramus in our art According to some preconceived design,

And happed to hear the land's practitioners Steeped in conceit sublimed by ignorance, Praitle fantastically on disease, Its cause and cure—and I must bold my peace 1

Thou wilt object-Why have I not ere this Sought out the sage himself, the Nazarene Who wrought this cure, inquiring at the source, Conferring with the frank ness that befits? Alas! it grieveth me, the learned leech Perished in a tumult many years ago, Accused, -onr learning's fate, -of wizardry, Rebelhon, to the setting up a rule And creed prodigious as described to me. His death, which happened when the earthquake fell (Prefiguring, as soon appeared, the loss To occult learning in our lord the sage Who lived there in the pyramid alone) Was wrought by the mad people-that's their wont ! On vain recourse, as I conjecture it, Io his tried virtue, for miraculous help-How could he stop the earthquake? That 's their way ! The other imputations must be hes But take one, though I loathe to give it thee, In mere respect for any good man's fame. (And after all, our patient Lazarus Is stark mad, should we count on what he says? Perhaps not though in writing to a leech 'Tis well to keep back nothing of a case.) This man so cured regards the curer, then, As-God forgive me! who but God himself, Creator and sustainer of the world, That came and dwelt in flesh on it awhile ! -Sayeth that such an one was born and lived, Taught, healed the sick, broke bread at his own house, Then died, with Lizarus by, for aught I know, And yet was what I said nor choose repeat, And must have so avouched himself in fact, In hearing of this very Lazarus Who saith—but why all this of what he saith? Why write of trivial matters, things of price Calling at every moment for remark? I noticed on the margin of a pool Blue flowering borage, the Aleppo sort, Aboundeth, very nitrous It is strange!

Thy pardon for this long and tedious case, Which, now that I review it, needs must seem Unduly dwelt on, prolixly set forth! Nor I myself discern in what is writ Good cause for the peculiar interest And awe indeed this man has touched me with Perhaps the journey's end, the weariness Had wronght upon me first. I met him thus I crossed a ridge of short sharp broken hills Like an old hon's cheek teeth Out there came A moon made like a face with certain spots Multiform, manifold and menacing Then a wind rose behind me. So we met In this old sleepy town at unaware, The man and I I send thee what is writ Regard it as a chance, a matter risked To this ambiguous Syrian-hc may lose, Or steal, or give it thee with equal good Icrusalem's repose shall make amends For time this letter wastes, thy time and mine, Till when, once more thy pardon and farewell !

The very God! think, Abib, dost thou think?
So, the All Great, were the All Loving too—
So, through the thunder comes a human voice Saying, 'O heart I made, a heart beats here!
Face, my hands fashioned, see it in myself!
Thou hast no power nor may'st conceive of mine,
But love I gave thee, with myself to love,
And thou must love me who have died for thee!'
The madman saith He said so it is strange

From 'The Ring and the Book.'

"On receipt of this command, Acquaint Count Guido and his fellows four They die to morrow could it be to night, The better For the main criminal I have no hope Lxcept in such a suddenness of fate I stood at Naples once, a night so dark I could have scarce conjectured there was earth Anywhere, sky or sea or world at all But the night's black was burst through by a blaze-Thunder struck blow on blow, earth groaned and bore, Through her whole length of mountain visible There by the city thick and plain with spires, And, like a ghost disshrouded, white the sea. So may the truth be flashed out by one blow, And Guido see, one instant and be saved Lnough, for I may die this very night And how should I dare die this man let live?

Carry this forthwith to the governor ! "

(1868-69.)

The Householder

Savage I was sitting in my house, late, lone Dreary, weary with the long day's work
Head of mc, heart of me, stupid as a stone Tongue tied now, now blaspheming like a Turk,
When, in a moment, just a knock, call, cry,

Half a pang and all a rapture, there again were we l'What, and is it really you again?' quoth I
'I again, what else did you expect?' quoth She.

'Never mind, hie away from this old house—
Every crumbling brick embrowned with sin and shame!
Quick, in its corners ere certain shapes arouse!

Let them—every devil of the night—lay claim,
Vake and mend, or rap and rend, for me! Good bye!

God be their guard from disturbance at their glee, Till, crash, comes down the carcass in a heap! quoth I
'Nay, but there's a decency required!' quoth She

'Ah, but if you knew how time has dragged, days, nights'

All the neighbour talk with man and maid—such men!
All the fuss and trouble of street sounds, window sights All the worry of flapping door and echoing roof, and then

All the fancies Who were they had leave, dared try Darker arts that almost struck despur in me? If you knew but how I dwelt down here!' quoth I 'And was I so better off up there?' quoth She.

'Help and get it over! Re united to his cafe (How draw up the paper lets the panish people know?)
Lies M, or N, departed from this life,
Day the this or that, month and year the so and so

What i' the way of final flourish? Prose, verse? Iry ' Affliction sore long time he bore, or what is it to be?
Till God did please to grant him ease Do end!'
quoth I
'I end with—Love is all and Death is nought!' quoth

She (From Fifine at the Fair, 1872)

Magical Nature

Flower—I never fancied, jewel—I profess you ' Bright I see and soft I feel the outside of a flower Save for glow inside and—jewel, I should guess you, Dim to sight and rough to touch the glory is the dower

You, forsooth, a flower? Nay, my love a jewel—Jewel at no mercy of a moment in your prime!

Time may fray the flower face kind be time or cruel, Jewel, from each facet, flash your laugh at time!

(From Pachiarotto, 1876.)

From 'La Saisiaz.'

Weakness never needs be falseness truth is truth in each degree

-Thunder pealed by God to Nature, whispered by my soul to me

Nay, the weakness turns to strength and trinmphs in a truth beyond

'Mine is but man's truest answer—how were it did God respond?'

Can I make my eye an engles, sharpen ear to recognize Sound o'er league and league of silence? Can I know, who but surmise?

I have lived, then, done and suffered, loved and hated, learnt and taught

This—there is no reconciling wisdom with a world distraught,

Goodness with triumphant evil, power with failure in the aim,

If (to my own sense, remember! though none other feel the same ')—

If you bar me from assuming earth to be a pupil's place, And life, time,—with all their chances, changes,—just probation space,

Mine, for mc

Only grant my soul may carry high through death her cup unspilled,

Brimming though it be with knowledge, life's loss drop hy drop distilled,

I shall hoast it mine—the balsam, bless each kindly wrench that wrung

From hie's tree its immost virtue, tapped the root whence pleasures sprung, Barked the bole, and broke the bough, and bruised the berry, left all grace

Ashes in death's stern alembic, loosed elivir in its place!

From 'The Two Poets of Croisic.'

(1878.)

Such a starved bank of moss Till, that May morn
Blue ran the firsh across Violets were born '

Sky—what a scowl of cloud Till, near and far, Ray on ray split the shroud Splendid, a star ! World—how it walled about Life with disgrace
Till God's own smile came out
That was thy face!

(1878)

Epilogue to 'Ferishtah's Fancles'

Oh, Love—no, Love! All the noise below, Love, Groanings all and moanings—none of Life I lose! All of Life's a cry just of weariness and woe, Love—"Hear at least, thou happy one!" How can I, Love, but choose?

Only, when I do hear, sudden circle round me —Much as when the moon's might frees a space from cloud—

Independent subandours, gloom, would also confound me

Iridescent splendours gloom—would else confound me— Barriered off and bruished far—bright edged the blackest shroud '

Thronging through the cloud rift, whose are they, the faces

Faint revealed yet sure divined, the famous ones of old?

'What'—they smile—'our names, our deeds so soon erases

Time upon his tablet where Life's glory hes enrolled?

'Was it for more fool's play, make believe and minming, So we battled it like men, not boylike sulked or whined?

Each of us heard clang God's 'Come!' and each was coming

Soldiers all, to forward face, not sneaks to lag behind

'How of the field's fortune? That concerned our Leader '

Led, we struck our stroke nor cared for doings left and right

Each as on his sole head, failer or succeeder,

Lay the blame or lit the pruise no care for cowards fight 1'

Then the cloud rift broadens, spanning earth that's inder, Wide our world displays its worth, man's strife and strife's success

All the good and beanty, wonder crowning wonder,
Till my heart and soul applied perfection, nothing less.

Only, at heart's utmost joy and triumph, terror Sudden turns the blood to ice a chill wind disen charms

All the late enchantment! What if all be error—
If the halo irised round my head were, Love, thine arms? (1884.)

Epilogue to 'Asolando'

[Published 121h December 1889 the day Robert Browning died at Venice ]

At the midnight in the silence of the sleep time, When you set your fancies free,

Will they pass to where—by death, fools think, imprisoned—

Low he lies who once so loved you, whom you loved so,
-Pity me?

Oh to love so, be so loved, yet so mistaken!

What had I on earth to do
With the slothful, with the mawkish, the unmanly?

Like the aimless, helpless, hopeless, did I drivel

-Being-who?

One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,

Never doubted clouds would break,

Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,

Held we fall to use, are baffled to fight better, Sleep to wake

No, at noonday in the bustle of man's work time Greet the unseen with a cheer ' Bid him forward, breast and back as either should be,
'Strive and thrive!' cry 'Speed,—fight on, fare ever There as here!'

A uniform edition of Robert Browning a works appeared in seven teen volumes in 1838-90 and Mr Furnivall published a Browning Bibliography in 1883 A Life of him was written by Mrs Suther land Orr (1891), who also prepared a Handbook to Browning (1885). JEANIE MORISON

John Westland Marston (1820-90), born the son of a Baptist minister at Boston, gave up law for literature, and in 1842 his Patrician's Daughter was brought out at Drury Lane by Macready It was the most successful of more than a dozen plays-Strathmore, Philip of France, A Hard Struggle (in prose), Donna Diana, Life for Life, and the rest, collected, with his poems, in 1876 - somewhat Sheridan - Knowlesian, and lacking in true dramatic life. He wrote a novel (1860), a good book on Our Recent Actors (1888), and a mass of poetic criticism, mostly in the columns of the Athenæum His plays are all all but forgotten, but he deserves to be remem bered as a true representative of poetical drama

His son, Philip Bourke Mirraton (1850–87), the blind poet, was born, lived, and died in London His life was a series of losses—of eyesight at three, and afterwards of his sister, his promised bride, and his two dear friends, Oliver Madox Brown and Rossetti His memory will survive through his friendships with Rossetti, with Mr Watts-Dunton, and with Mr Swinburne rather than through his sonnets and lyrics—delicate and melodious most of them, exquisite some of them, but all too sad for a world that sees Song-tide, All in All, and Wind Voices were the three volumes of poetry he published between 1870 and

1883, to a posthumous collection of his stories (1887), mostly published in America, is prefixed a Memoir by Mr William Sharp. He was Dr Gordon Hake's 'Blind Boy,' Mr Swinburne dedicated a sonnet to his memory. Mrs Chandler Moulton collected his poems in 1892

Sir Henry James Sumner Maine (1822-88) was in his own time probably the most conspicuous, popular, and influential writer on social science, on the usages and proprietary ideas of primitive society as forming the basis of laws still in From Christ's Hospital he passed to Cambridge, where, having greatly distinguished himself he was in his twenty-fifth year elected Regius Pro fessor of Civil Law He was called to the Bar in 1850, and in 1862 went to India as Legal Member of On his return he was in 1870 the Government appointed Professor of Comparative Jurisprudence at Oxford, a post he resigned on being elected to the Mastership of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1878 In 1871 he had become a Member of the Council of the Secretary of State for India and KCSI, and in 1887 he was appointed Whewell Professor of International Law at Cambridge. As was admitted by those most hostile to his fundamental views, his Roman Law and Legal Education (1856), followed in 1861 by Ancient Law, its Connection with the Early History of Society and its Relation to Modern Ideas, for more than twenty years profoundly influenced the teaching of jurisprudence in England In Village Communities in the Last and West (1871), delivered as a series of lectures at Oxford, the author traced the similarity that exists between the primitive communal societies of India and those of the ancient Germanic races In 1875 appeared Lectures on the Early History of Institutions, principally an investigation of the ancient laws of Ireland, called the Brehon Laws, interesting not merely as one of the best preserved systems of primitive law, but because of its complete independence of Roman law Law and Custom (1883) further illustrated his favourite theses, and International Law (1888) was based on his professorial work. In Popular Government (1885) he illustrated, not for the first time, his strong anti democratic bias His fundamental idea, urged against M'Lennan and all supporters of the view that matriarchy was a germinal stage of primitive civilisation, was that the germ of society was the patriarchal power, the family centring round the father (not the mother), while from the family came the gens, from the gens the tribe, and from the tribe the nation. The opponents of Maine's view multiplied amongst anthropologists and sociologists, and produced detailed evidence from savage life and ancient records, and his contentions were criticised as showing a tendency to make a 'portable village community which we might take about with us from one quarter of the globe to another?

There is a Memoir of Maine by Sir M E Grant Duff (1892).

John Ruskin.

one of the great teachers of art and life to the modern world, was the only son of John James Ruskin, a London wine-merchant, by his marriage with his first cousin, Margaret Cov The family The father had been born was of Scottish origin and educated in Edinburgh, and from both parents Ruskin inherited the simple piety, the strenuous morality, and the inflexible rectitude which are characteristic of their race and religion Born on the 8th February 1819, he was brought up in the austere but bracing atmosphere of a Puritan home, without the common toys or amusements of childhood and with but scanty childish companionship. The picture of his early life has been drawn over and over again by his own hand, most fully, with complete fidelity and unsurpassable charm, in the chapters of autobiography which were the last work of his advanced age. When he was four years old, his parents removed from London to what was then the rural suburb of Herne Hill, which remained their home, and his, for nearly fifty years. His education was received chiefly at home. first from his mother and then from private tutors, except for a short time when he went to a day-school in Peckham, he hardly ever passed outside the narrow home circle until he went to But this narrow life was enlarged and varied by his accompanying his father on the summer travels through all parts of England which he regularly undertook in the course of business. and occasionally in more prolonged excursions on the Continent of a less professional nature. In connection with these latter travels he made the acquaintance, between the age of thirteen and fifteen, with three books which are keynotes to the whole of his mental development-Rogers's Italy, with the Turner engravings, in 1832, Prout's Sketches in Flanders and Germany, in 1833, and Saussure's Voyages dans les Alpes, in 1834 kindled in him the love of art, the reverence for antiquity, and the minute study of nature.

In 1837 he matriculated at Christ Church, Oxford, as a gentleman-commoner. He was already then contributing articles to the Architectural Magazine and other journals. In 1839, after two unsuccessful attempts, he won the New digate prize for an English poem, neither better nor worse than other prize poems, on Salsette and Elephanta. His juvenile poems have in recent years been collected and published by the mis placed industry of his friends and biographers

The Anglo Catholic movement, which was so profoundly to alter the whole outward aspect and inner life of England, was then in the full tide of its early struggles and successes Oxford was its centre, but it passed Ruskin by without producing the least effect on him. For his teacher he took, now and throughout life, not Newman but Carlyle (q v). The two lifelong friendships he formed at Oxford were with men who had a turn for art but none for theology-one an accomplished scholar. and the other eminent in the promotion and endowment of science-Liddell (afterwards Dean of Christ Church) and Henry Acland In the spring of 1840 Ruskin had a serious illness which practically brought his Oxford life to an end The following winter and spring were spent in Italy with his On his return he took a pass degree, and then set to work on a defence and vindication of the painter Turner, whose acquaintance he had recently made, and whose pictures he had even before then begun to buy and to treasure. work gradually grew far beyond its first scope. The five bulky volumes into which it expanded. and which appeared successively during the next twenty years, range in their progress more and more widely over the whole field of art in its relation to life and nature The title at first projected, Turner and the Aneients, was replaced by another at once clumsy and contentious-Modern Painters their Superiority in the Art of Landscape Painting to all the Ancient Masters proved by Examples of the True, the Beautiful, and the Intellectual, from the Works of Modern Artists, especially from those of I M W Turner, Esq, RA The first volume was published under this title in April 1843. It was the year of Mill's Logie, of Carlyle's Past and Present, of Gioberti's Primato Civile e Morali degli Italiani period was that of the great triumphs of Liberalism, in its widest sense, throughout Europe, and all four works are epoch-making in the history of the development of the modern or liberal spirit In Great Britain, popular attention was it the moment largely engrossed with the ecclesiastical controversies which were raging furiously in both kingdoms, but Ruskin's first volume nevertheless made an impression which was both immediate A new voice had made itself heard. the critics only spread its influence more widely by their protests and condemnations. The next few years were for Ruskin a period of growing fame and widening influence.

A second volume of Modern Painters was pub lished in 1846. In the interval between the two he had discovered (for it was no less than a dis covery) the great Christian art of medieval Itals He had also discovered his own powers in prose, and used them with immense effect both in attack and defence, in the exposition of theories and the inculcation of principles This second volume of Modern Painters is indeed a treatise of philosophy, far transcending the scope of a comparative criticism of art The language moulded to the purposes of philosophic inquiry by Locke reappears in it, draped in the more voluminous rhetoric of an earlier age, yet so freshly handled as to be a new style—the style which, in the history of English literature, will be known as that of Ruskin, and of which no one else has fully mastered the secret.

His next work of importance followed two years later This was The Seven Lamps of Architecture, written in London during the winter of 1848-49, in the early months of a brief and disastrous marriage which need only be mentioned in passing, for it did not, in the six years for which it lasted, deeply affect his life as a thinker and artist. The Seven Lamps, the most popular among all Ruskin's earlier works, is really an interlude in the vast and complex inquiry which he was pursuing in Modes in Painters, it is a study of the principles he had begun to discover and lay down for art, in their application to the mistress-art of all the arts which men exercise. What gave occasion and urgency to the interlude was the opening of Rus kin's eyes to the tragic fate doomed, and in part already executed, on all the monuments of the past by the calculated and merciless rayages of restoration '

The Gothic Re vival, a general name that may be given to that great reversion of feeling towards the Middle Ages which played so profound a part in the history of the earlier nineteenth century, had touched Ruskin, as it touched the whole of the English speaking world, through Walter Scott. On its theological and mystical side it never touched him at all, he remained through life as he had been brought up in childhood, essentially a Protestant, though his Protestantism became less and less orthodox. The Bible, which he had read through over and over again with his mother as a child at home, and which was one of the strongest formative influences on his own literary style, was to him the voice of God speaking directly to the individual Church and the Sacraments bore as little part in his religion as they bear in the Gospels, but just on this account, the Gothic revival in the sphere of the arts affected him with an intenser force. These discourses on architecture as the crowning embodi ment of life itself and of the virtues that make life excellent—ranged by him here under the six heads or 'lamps' of sacrifice, truth, power, beauty, memory, and obedience—are at the same time the inculcation of a scheme of human life in all respects the antithesis of that which Ruskin saw in the modern world around him—a life which walked simply and austerely in the conscious sight of God and guided by God's immediate hand—That such a life had existed in the so called Ages of Faith was to his mind demonstrable from the memorials which those ages had left—He still hoped or fancied that the world might be led back through the study of these silent witnesses to the spirit of the men who had reared them, and he felt it a primary duty to call men back to the old path by exciting their enthusiasm and renewing their reverence for a period when life was in the full sense sacred and art kindled by a living fire from heaven

It was in this spirit that he wrote, during the years immediately following, the greatest of his works, The Stones of I cnice The first volume appeared in 1851, the other two ın 1853 It is his greatest work both because his style had now reached maturity, and because in this one instance he completed fully an œuvie de longue haleine, a work the mere mass and structure of which give it a weight denied to briefer or more fragmentary writings That concentration which he had in full measure as regards each immediate object of his interest, he lacked as regards the continuous attention required to elaborate great masterpieces his mind suffered from its very alertness and impetuous responsiveness. Again and again it happened that one train of suggestion or study led him on to another until he became distracted in the multiplicity of his thoughts, and so it is that so much of his writing is fragmentary and fugitive, and that his mind at last gave way, not merely under the pressure of the evil tongues and evil days on which he fell, but under the burden of a message that became inarticulate through over-haste and over copious ness of utterance.

As the Stones of Venuce is Ruskin's greatest work, so one chapter in it, the sixth of the second volume, entitled 'On the Nature of Gothic,' is the central point of his whole teaching. With the twentieth chapter of Carlyle's Sartor Resartus, it is a confession of faith and a call to the higher life which may be called the most momentous utterance of their half century of continuous authorship. In both cases the appeal is not to despur, but to labour and liope, in both cases the voice of God speaking through the man was greater than the man himself, and the works of later years took on them the sombre splendours of a great tragedy, when the prophets outlived faith in their own prophecies

A sort of appendix to the Stones of Venice is a work which followed immediately on its completion, the small but exquisite volume of Lectures on Architecture and Painting given at Edinburgh at the end of 1853. In 1851 had appeared another minor work of great interest, his pamphlet in defence of the Pre-Raphaelite School. With that school Ruskin was indeed neither then nor afterwards in full sympathy. The rough justice of the popular belief which identified his teaching with their practice lies merely in this, that both placed before them 'truth to nature' as the object of art, their definition of truth and their conception of nature were, in fact, widely different.

After the Stones of Venuce was completed, Ruskin returned to what he still regarded as his main work, the completion of Modern Painters Two more volumes, the third and fourth, appeared in 1856 The ten years that had passed between the second and third volumes were a period of immense moment in European history, and on Ruskin's own mind they had wrought the beginnings of a great change. The chapters on Idealism and Sentiment in the third volume gave what may be called a wholly new grammar of the psychology of art But the meaning of art itself was being insensibly changed in his mind His work at Venice had led him away from the study of science to that of history, he was coming to see more clearly what history forced on him, that art is not a representation of nature but a function of life fluctuation between these two views of art is what gives uncertainty and some degree of inconsistency to his practical teaching thereafter Some of his least satisfactory work is the result of an attempt to reduce prematurely under a single idea the ethical laws of human life with the laws which govern irrational or inanimate nature, with the life of the Roman poet's bruta tellus et vaga flumma, the growth not merely of birds or plants, but of Yet here he was on the clouds and crystals edge of an ultimate truth to which both Platonism and Christianity bear witness, and which the most recent scientific thought is beginning imperfectly to realise But short of such a final reconciliation, the art which is a mere record of 'objective truth' is not art at all, and no real art is possible which is not the unforced imaginative outcome of a civic or national life lived in accordance with the laws of God

address given by Ruskin at the Manchester Art-Treasures Exhibition of 1857, shows this shifting of his axis of thought. It is still more evident in The Two Paths of 1859, a collection of lectures and addresses given in the two or three preceding years In that volume the intricacy of the problems dealt with leads to a confusion of argument that would be almost ludicrous if it were not full at once of pathos and of promise His old principles-the instinctive happy principles of youth—are giving way everywhere under him, like the instinctive or traditional dogma on which they had their moral basis cry makes itself heard of the man who has drifted from his moorings He was destined never to recover them, never to be able again to rest in a complete belief

It was little wonder, then, that the fifth and last volume of Modern Painters, published in 1860, showed some inconsistency and even incoherence of thought, or that it failed to awake the same enthusiasm as its predecessors Ruskin had had his period of growing popularity and widening acceptance He lind now, with whatever reluctance, to lay down the singing-robe of the artist and take on himself the sackcloth of the prophet What the public desired was to be amused, they were ready to make an idol of him while he tall ed smooth things to them, but now the task before him was to break down his own popularity, to be regarded by the world with a mixture of pity and contempt, to see even his friends fail him and fall away from him The strain brought out all the petulance and irritability inherent in his highly strung temper, he finally gave way under it. years following the great change in his moral axis are those in which his work, though not his greatest, has the highest value and significance. lecture 'On the Work of Iron,' given at Tunbridge Wells in 1858 and published in The Two Paths, shows the change in its full extent and gravity His teaching-though he himself would not have admitted it-has there become express Socialism His delight in rhetoric and sentiment still clung to He still was able, as in the celebrated com parison of modern Rochdale with medieval Pisa in the Bradford lecture of 1859 (published in the same volume), to let himself loose in a torrent of gorgeous language with no more distinctly ethical content than one of those later landscapes of Turner's with which Ruskin's carlier writing has so much in common, and in the arrangement of which at the National Gallery, from 1856 onwards, he found an occupation and an anodyne. But sentiment and rhetoric could no longer satisfy him, nor could he find relief from the actual world in the pathos and splendour of the past. To instruct, to startle, to save if it might be-though of that the hope grew ever fainter-a world lying in wickedness, became to him a primary and absorbing duty When the Cornhill Magazine was founded in one of the foremost among English men of letters, His contribution was invited to contribute to it was the four papers afterwards issued as the volume entitled Unto This Last The story is well known of the tempest of outraged protest they evoked, and of Thackeray's capitulation to the popular feeling which brought the series to an abrupt close. their author might feel that he had at last struck home. In the preface to the collected volume he wrote, gravely and sincerely, 'I rest satisfied with the work, though with nothing else that I have done' It is difficult to appreciate now, when time has turned half of what then seemed preposterous paradoxes into accepted doctrines, how far ahead of his generation Ruskin then was, what foresight and insight was given him by his absolute fearless ness and complete sincerity. It may be said with little exaggeration that the legislation of the last thirty-five years has followed baltingly behind the principles asserted by Ruskin in 1860 it may be said with great confidence that these same principles are now the main motive forces of the civic movement of the twentieth century volume marks likewise the perfection, for practical purposes, of his style It has slied the flamboyance and prolivity of his youth, it has not lapsed into the involved garrulity-often delightful indeed, but at best lacking the gravity of really great art which alternately charms and irritates in the later essays and addresses. Here it is in his hands like the sword of an expert swordsman rapid, and lustrous, flashing with swift easy turns through impassioned pleading, succinct exposition, searching irony, and fanciful humour

Some ten years of crowded literary production followed, in which it is only possible here to name and fix the chief landmarks These are Munera Pulveris, an unfinished series of essays in Political Economy continuing the work begun in Unto This Last The essays first appeared in Fraser's Magasine in 1862-63, they had the same fate as their predecessors in the Corulull After the fourth number, publisher and public both revolted, and the remainder of the series was suppressed The orthodox Political Economy was still foolish enough to persecute heresy, and still strong enough to persecute it successfully (2) The addresses on Truffic (1864) and Work (1865), re printed in The Crown of Wild Olive the former in the main a trenchant attack on the fundamental irreligion and immorality of modern society, the latter developing more distinctly, and with less of compromise, the implied Socialism of Unto This Last \ (3) The two addresses named 'Sesame' and 'Lilies,' published together under the joint title (1 third address was afterwards incorporated in the volume), which are said to have had a vastly greater circulation than any other of Ruskin's writings (1865) With a certain reversion to the 'purple and soft raiment' of his earlier diction and sentiment, they have to many thousands of persons set up new ideals—in the one case of the sacredness of thought and language, in the other of the duties and privileges of womanhood (4) The series of letters to a Sunderland working-man, Time and Tide by Weare and Tyne, an attempt, at the season of great hopes roused by the democratisation of the franchise in 1867, to continue the author's work in social ethics by drawing the outlines of a constructive policy towards the ennobling of labour and the humanisation of riches

For the nany other lectures, addresses, and de tached papers of these years, reference must be made to fuller biographies. The great fault of Ruskin's work is manifest in them—the impetuous ness and restlessness of mind to which reference has already been made. Stimulating and fasci, nating beyond all writers of his generation in detached utterances, he was less like a builder than a sower, scattering seed to right and left with careless hand. Some of his seed fell on the way side, some among thorns, much in shallow soil. What fell on good ground has profoundly influenced the movement of the world for the last half-century.

In 1869, at the age of fifty, Ruskin received what may be called his first public and official recognition, in his appointment to the newly-founded Professorship of Fine Art at Oxford The responsibilities of such a position, had he entered on it earlier, must have had a great effect towards marshalling and concentrating his activity was, his tenure of the office for three consecutive triennial terms, from 1870 to 1878, produced results inadequate to his own desire or his friends' ex-The academic atmosphere of Oxford was adverse alike to the sincere practice of art and to the intense moral enthusiasm of his social doctrine He founded, and endowed with lavish generosity, a school of drawing there, which has never flourished beyond the range of his immediate personal influence. He drew round him a small circle of young men, a few of whom in later life helped to carry the torch he had kindled and laid in their hands. Several of his courses of lectures in the University, notably those entitled Aratra Pentelici (1870), The Eagle's Nest (1872), Ariadne Florentina (1872), Love's Meime (1873), represent substantial additions to his writings on art Oxford did not let him go unhonoured he was elected an honorary Student of Christ Church and an honorary Fellow of Corpus, and though his professorial work was but a small part of his activity, he became universally known as Professor Ruskin.

His tenure of the Slinde Professorship coincided with the life of the celebrated Fors Clavigera—a series of notes and essays, in the form of letters, dealing with almost every conceivable subject, which was issued by Ruskin in monthly parts from the beginning of 1871 until his illness in 1878, further numbers appeared at irregular intervals between 1878 and 1884. It was not put on the market through the ordinary channels of trade, but was sold directly by Ruskin himself to purchasers, and this was the beginning of a system on which all his works came to be produced and issued Gradually, as time went on, the agent whom he employed for printing and distributing them be came a publisher in the ordinary meaning of the This was one of Ruskin's practical attempts (all in turn unsuccessful as regards their original object) to get rid of the tyranny of commercialism His other experiments in the same direction—the Guild of St George, the tea-shop in Marvlebone, the reclamation, in concert with Miss Octavia Hill, of a patch of slum property in London, the road making carried on by himself and his pupils near Oxford—do not belong to the story of his life as a man of letters. But it should be noted that it was the profit from the sale of his writings, in definice of all accepted trade principles, which supported his later years in ease, and even in affluence, when his boundless public and private generosity had almost exhausted the fortune he inherited from his father

His father had died in 1864, his mother in 1871 The most childlike, dutiful, and affectionate of sons, he never had until the latter date any separate home of his own He then bought the little estate of Brantwood on Coniston Water in North Lanca shire, which became his home for the rest of his life, and which was made all that a home could be for him by the presence and care of his cousin, Miss Agnew, afterwards Mrs Arthur Severn Brantwood, early in 1878, he was seized with a long and dangerous illness which left his brain seriously affected, and from which lie never fully In 1883 his health was so far restored that he was able to accept re election to the Slade Professorship, but the strain and excitement were almost from the first too great. It was a relief both to him and to his friends when he resigned at the end of 1884, as a protest against the estab lishment of a physiological laboratory in Oxford and the endowment of vivisection by the University Between 1885 and 1889 there appeared in monthly parts the informal autobiography entitled Præterita Twenty-four of these parts appeared in regular succession, a long break due to illness followed, four more numbers appeared in 1888-89, and brought down the story of his life to about 1864 The gradual failure of vital force ended peacefully at Brantwood on 20th January 1900 He was buried at Coniston, and a monument was afterwards erected to him in Westminster Abbey In him passed away the last of the great figures of the earlier Victorian age.

The final estimate to be formed of Ruskin as an author will only be determined by time. A great deal of his published writing was occasional and necessarily fugitive. On principle, he allowed the utmost publicity to be given to all his correspondence, and his collected works include numberless letters, seldom without interest but often of trifling value, and not ranking as literature in the full sense of the term. Between such letters and his slighter and more informal published writingsmagazine articles, lectures, prefaces and intro ductions, &c -no distinct line can be drawn Two well known and widely-read volumes, Arrows of the Chave (1880) and On the Old Road (1885), are collections of these fugitive contributions to newspapers and magazines Modern Painters, by far his longest and most elaborate work, was written with a special purpose Both because that purpose was in fact largely attained, and because it kept changing and shifting through the seventeen or eighteen years while the work was in progress, great parts of the five volumes are practically obsolete Competent critics have held that the style, with all its merits, is too diffuse for permanence in its general structure, and ingrace fully gorgeous in the more highly elaborated passages Of his work before 1860 the conjecture may be hazarded that the Seven Lamps and the Stones of Venuce will survive Among the multi farious mass of his later writings it is certain that Unto This Last and The Two Paths, with some of the papers collected in The Crown of H'ild Olive and many detached numbers of Fors Clasugera, have a permanent place in literature as among the writings which have most profoundly influenced modern thought and life Praterita, his last un finished masterpiece, has in its sweet and garrulous charm, its childlike simplicity and cloudless serenity, as high and as secure a place as any of these

As a master of style Ruskin's eminence is also great and peculiar In science he had no adequate equipment of training or system, in art he was a brilliant amateur But in language he was almost from the first a trained artist, he used language with a freedom and flexibility that had been strange to England for the best part of two centuries before he rediscovered the secret his earlier writings the style suffers from verbosity, more especially during a few years when he consciously imitated the style of the great Elizabethan theologian Richard Hooker this fault he was always subject to relapse But on occasion he could, without losing any flexibility or freedom, write with a terse force and swift pre cision which cannot be surpassed and have seldom been equalled The purple patches which gained him his first faine, and by which he is perhaps even now most widely known, were a conscious artifice. His own sounder judgment disapproved them, and he often had occasion to lament that he was read for his fine writing and not for the sake of the truths which the writing was meant to convey and to make impressive. It has been already noted how he remained, so to speak, a child in his parents' house so long as his parents lived, and in the work even of his mature age there is a childlike quality that now fascinates by its limpid simplicity and now annoys by its waywardness or extravagance There are traces of the same quality in Plato, one of Ruskin's chief masters both in substance and in style, and one whose whole spirit and temper have a remarkable affinity with his Apart from the beauty and charm of his own writing, he is a figure of the first importance in English literature as an amplificator imperii, one who gave a new range and a new sensitiveness to English prose.

Restoration and Destruction.

Neither by the public, nor by those who have the care of public monuments, is the true meaning of the word restoration understood. It means the most total destruction which a building can suffer a destruction oat of which no remnants can be gathered a destruc tion accompanied with false description of the thing destroyed. Do not let us deceive ourselves in this important matter it is impossible, as impossible as to raise the dead, to restore anything that has ever been great or beautiful in architecture. That which I have above insisted upon as the life of the whole, that spirit which is given only by the hand and eye of the work man, never can be recalled Another spirit may be given by another time, and it is then a new building, bat the spirit of the dead workman cannot be summoned up, and commanded to direct other hands, and other thoughts And as for direct and simple copying, it is palpably impossible. What copying can there be of surfaces that have been worn half an inch down? The whole finish of the work was in the half inch that is gone, if you attempt to restore that finish, you do it conjecturally, if you copy what is left, granting fidelity to be possible (and what care, or watchfulness, or cost can secure it), how is the new work better than the old? There was yet in the old some life, some mysterious suggestion of what it had been, and of what it had lost, some sweetness in the gentle lines which rain and sun had wroaght. There can be none in the brute hard Look at the animals which ness of the new carving I have given in Plate 14, as an instance of living work, and suppose the markings of the scales and hair once worn away, or the wrinkles of the brows, and who shall ever restore them? The first step to restoration (I have seen it, and that again and again-seen it on the Baptistery of Pisa, seen it on the Casa d' Oro at Venice, seen it on the Cathedral of Lisieux) is to dash the old work to pieces, the second is usually to put up the cheapest and basest imitation which can escape detection, but in all cases, however carefal, and however laboured, an imitation still, a cold model of such parts as can be modelled, with conjectural supplements, and my experience has as yet farmished me with only one instance, that of the Palais de Justice at Rouen, in which even this, the utmost degree of fidelity which is possible, has been attained, or even attempted

Do not let us talk then of restoration The thing is a Lie from beginning to end You may make a model of a building as you may of a corpse, and your model may have the shell of the old walls within it as your cast might have the skeleton, with what advantage I neither see nor care but the old building is destroyed, and that more totally and mercilessly than if it had sunk into a heap of dist, or melted into a mass of clav more has been gleaned out of desolated Nincveh than ever will be out of re built Milan But, it is said, there may come a necessity for restoration! Granted Look the neces sity full in the face, and understand it on its own terms. It is a necessity for destruction Accept it as such, pull the building down, throw its stones into neglected corners, make ballast of them, or mortar, if you will, but do it honestly, and do not set up a Lie in their place And look that necessity in the face before it comes, and yon may prevent it. The principle of modern times (a principle which, I believe, at least in France, to be systematically acted on by the masons, in order to find themselves work, as the abbey of St Ouen was pulled down by the magistrates of the town by way of giving work to some vagrants) is to neglect buildings first, and restore them afterwards Take proper care of your monuments, and you will not need to restore them A few sheets of lead put in time upon a roof, a few dead leaves and sticks swept in time out of a water course, will save both roof and walls from ruin Watch an old building with an anxious care, guard it as best you may, and at any cost, from every influence of dilapidation Count its stones as you would jewels of a crown, set watches about it as if at the gates of a besieged city, bind it together with iron where it loosens, stay it with timber where it declines, do not care about the unsightliness of the aid better a crutch than a lost limb, and do this tenderly, and reverently, and continually, and many a generation will still be born and pass away beneath its shadow Its evil day must come at last, but let it come declaredly and openly, and let no dishonouring and false substitute deprive it of the funeral offices of memory

Perfection in Art.

I shoald be led far from the matter in hand, if I were to pursue this interesting subject. Enough, I trust, has been said to show the reader that the rudeness or imper fection which at first rendered the term 'Gothic' one of reproach is indeed, when rightly understood one of the most noble characters of Christian architecture, and not only a noble but an essential one. It seems a fantastic paradox, but it is nevertheless a most important truth, that no architecture can be truly noble which is not im And this is easily demonstrable. For since the architect, whom we will suppose capable of doing all in perfection, cannot execute the whole with his own hands, he must either make slaves of his workmen in the old Greek, and present English fashion, and level his work to a slave's capacities, which is to degrade it, or else he must take his workmen as he finds them, and let them show their weaknesses together with their strength, which will involve the Gothic imperfection, but render the whole work as noble as the intellect of the age can make it

But the principle may be stated more broadly still I have confined the illustration of it to architecture, but I must not leave it as if true of architecture only Hitherto I have used the words imperfect and perfect merely to distinguish between work grossly unskilful, and work executed with average precision and science, and I have been pleading that any degree of unskilfulness should be admitted, so only that the labourer's mind had room for expression. But, accurately speaking, no good work whatever can be perfect, and the demand for perfection is always a sign of a misunderstanding of the ends of art.

This for two reasons, both based on everlasting laws. The first, that no great man ever stops working till he has reached his point of failure—that is to say, his mind is nlways far in advance of his powers of execution, and the latter will now and then give way in trying to follow it, besides that he will always give to the inferior portions of his work only such inferior attention as they require, and according to his greatness he becomes so accustomed to the feeling of dissatisfaction with the best he can do, that in moments of lassitude or anger vith himself he will not care though the beholder be dissatisfied also I believe there has only been one man who would not acknowledge this necessity, and strove always to reach perfection, Leonardo, the end of his vain effort being merely that he would take ten years to a picture, and leave it unfinished. And therefore, if we are to have great men working nt all, or less men doing their best, the nork will be imperfect, however beautiful Of hnman work none but what is had can be perfect, in its own bad way

The second reason is, that imperfection is in some sort essential to all that we know of life. It is the sign of life in a mortal body, that is to say, of a state of progress and change. Nothing that lives is, or can be, rigidly perfect, part of it is decaying, part nascent The foxglove blo som, - a third part bud, a third part past, a third part in full bloom, -is n type of the life of this world And in all things that live there are certain irregularities and deficiencies which are not only signs of life, but sources of beauty. No human face is exactly the same in its lines on each side, no leaf perfect in its lobes, no branch in its symmetry. All admit irregularity as they imply change and to banish imperfection is to destroy expression, to cheel exertion, to paralyze vitality All things are literally better, lovelier, and more beloved for the imperfections which have been divinely appointed, that the law of human life may be Effort, and the law of human judgment, Mercy

Accept this then for a universal law, that neither architecture nor any other noble work of man can be good unless it be imperfect, and let us be prepared for the otherwise strange fact, which we shall discern clearly as we approach the period of the Renaissance, that the first cause of the fall of the arts of Europe was a relentless requirement of perfection, incapable alike either of being silenced by veneration for greatness, or softened into for giveness of simplicity

Thus far then of the Radeness or Savageness, which is the first mental element of Gothic prehitecture. It is an element in many other healthy architectures also, as in Byzantine and Romanesque, but true Gothic cannot exist without it.

Rochdale and Pisa.

Beautiful art can only be produced by people who have beautiful things about them, and leisure to look at them, and unless you provide some elements of beauty for your workmen to be surrounded by, you will find that no elements of beauty can be invented by them

I was struck forcibly by the bearing of this great fact upon our modern efforts at ornamentation in an after noon walk, last week, in the suburbs of one of our large manufacturing towns. I was thinking of the difference in the effect upon the designer's mind, between the scene which I then came upon, and the scene which would have presented itself to the eyes of any designer of the middle nges, when he left his workshop. Just outside the town I came apon an old English cottage, or mansion, I hardly know which to call it, set close under the hill, and beside the river, perhaps built somewhere in the

Charles's times, with mullioned windows and a low arched porch, round which, in the little triangular garden, one can imagine the family as they used to sit In old summer times, the ripple of the river heard faintly through the syeethman hedge, and the sheep on the far off wolds slining in the evening sunlight There, unin liabited for many and many n year, it had been left in unregarded havoe of ruin, the garden gate still s rung loose to its latch, the garden, blighted utterly into a field of aslies, not even a weed taling roo there the roof torn into shapeless rents, the shutters hanging about the undows in raps of rotten wood, before its gate, the stream which had gladdened it now soaking slowly by, black as ebony, and thick with cardling scum, the bank above it trodden into unctuous, sooty slime far in front of it, between it and the old hills, the furnaces of the city forming forth perpetual plague of sulphurous dark ness, the volumes of their storm clouds coiling low over a waste of grassless fields, feneed from each other, not by hedges, but by slabs of square stone, like gravestones, riveted together with iron

That was your scene for the designer's contemplation in his afternoon walk at Rochdale. Now fancy "hat yes the scene which presented itself, in his afternoon walk, to a designer of the Gothic school of Pisa—Nino Pisano, or any of his inen.

On each side of a bright river he saw rise a line of brighter palaces, arched and pilland, and inlaid with deep red porphyry, and vith scrpentine, along the quays before their gites were riding troops of I nights, noble in face and form, dazzling in crest and shield, lim-e and nian one labyrinth of quaint colour and gleaming I ghtthe parple, and silver, and scarlet fringes flowing over the strong limbs and clashing mail, like sea waves over roels at sunset Opening on each side from the river were gardens, courts, and eloisters, long successions of white pillars among wreaths of vine, leaping of fountains through buds of pomegranate and orange and still along the garden paths, and under and through the crimson of the pomegranate shadows, moving slowly, groups of the fairest women that Italy ever saw-fairest, because purest and thoughtfullest, trained in all high knowledge, as in all courteous art-in dance, in song, in sweet wit, in lofty learning, in loftier courage, in loftiest love-able alike to elect, to enchant, or save, the souls of men-Above all this seeners of perfect human life, to a dome and bell tower, burning with white alabister and gold beyond doine and ball tower the slopes of mighty hills, hoars with olive, far in the north, above a purple sea of peaks of solemn Apennine, the clear, sharp cloven Carrara mountains sent up their stendfast flames of murble summit into amber sky, the great sea itself, scorching with expanse of light, stretching from their feet to the Gorgonian isles, and over all these, ever present, near or far-seen through the leaves of vine, or imaged with all its march of clouds in the Arno's stream, or set with its depth of blue close against the golden hair and burning eheck of lady and knight-that antroubled and sacred sky, which was to all men, in those days of innocent faith, indeed the unquestioned abode of spirits, as the earth was of men, and which opened straight through its gates of cloud and veils of dew into the awfulness of the eternal world, -a heaven in which every cloud that passed was literally the chariot of an angel, and every ray of its Evening and Morning streamed from the throne of God.

What think you of that for a school of design?

I do not bring this contrast before you as a ground of hopelessness in our task, neither do I lool for any possible renovation of the Republic of Pisa, at Bradford, in the nineteenth century, but I put it before you in order that you may be aware precisely of the kind of difficulty you have to meet, and may then consider with yourselves how far you can meet it To men surrounded by the depressing and monotonous circumstances of English manufacturing life, depend upon it, design is simply impossible. This is the most distinct of all the experiences I have had in dealing with the modern workman He is intelligent and ingenious in the highest degree-subtle in touch and keen in sight but he is, generally speaking, wholly destitute of designing power And if you want to give him the power, you must give him the materials, and put him in the circumstances for Design is not the offspring of idle fancy it is the studied result of accumulative observation and delightful Without observation and experience, no design -without peace and pleasurableness in occupation, no design-and all the lecturings, and teachings, and prizes, and principles of art, in the world, are of no use, so long as you don't surround your men with happy influences and beautiful things. It is impossible for them to have right ideas about colour, unless they see the lovely colours of nature unspoiled, impossible for them to supply beautiful incident and action in their ornament, unless they see beautiful incident and action in the world about them. Inform their minds, refine their habits, and you form and refine their designs, but keep them illiterate, uncomfortable, and in the midst of unbeautiful tlings, and whatever they do will still be spurious, vulgar, and valueless (From The Two Paths)

The So-called Christian.

But in order to put this question into any terms, one had first of all to face a difficulty—to me for the present insuperable,—the difficulty of knowing whether to address one's audience as believing, or not believing, in any other world than this. For if you address any average modern English company as believing in an Eternal life, and then endeavour to draw any conclusions from this as sumed behief, as to their present business, they will forth with tell you that 'what you say is very beautiful, but it is not practical.' If, on the contrary, you frankly address them as unbelievers in Eternal life, and try to draw any consequences from that unbelief,—they immediately hold you for an accursed person, and shake off the dust from their feet at you

And the more I thought over what I had got to say, the less I found I could say it, without some reference to this inthingible or intractable question. It made all the difference, in asserting any principle of war, whether one assumed that a discharge of artillery would merely knead down a certain quantity of once living clay into a level line, as in a brickfield, or whether, out of every sepa rately Christian named portion of the ruinous heap there went out, into the smoke and dead fallen air of battle some astonished condition of soul, unwillingly released It made all the difference, in speaking of the possible range of commerce, whether one assumed that all bar gains related only to visible property-or whether pro perty, for the present invisible, but nevertheless real, was elsewhere purchaseable on other terms all the difference, in addressing a body of men subject to considerable hardship, and having to find some way out of it—whether one could confidently say to them, 'My friends,—you have only to die, and all will be right,' or whether one had any secret misgiving that such advice was more blessed to him that give than to him that took it

And therefore the deliberate reader will find, through out these lectures, a hesitation in driving points home, and a pausing short of conclusions which he will feel I would fain have come to,-hesitation which arises wholly from this uncertainty of my hearers' temper For I do not speak, nor have I ever spoken, since the time of first forward youth, in any proselytizing temper, as desiring to persuade any one to believe anything, but, whomsoever I venture to address, I take, for the time, his creed as I find it, and endeavour to push it into such vital fruit as it seems capable of I hus, it is a creed with a great part of the existing, English people, that they are in possession of a book which tells them, straight from the lips of God, all they ought to do, and need to know I have read that book, with as much care as most of them, for some forty years, and am thankful that, on those who trust it, I can press its My endeavour has been uniformly to make them trust it more deeply than they do, trust it, not in their own favourite verses only, but in the sum of all, trust it, not as a fetish or talisman, which they are to be saved by daily repetitions of, but as a Captain's order, to be heard and obeyed at their peril. I was always encouraged by supposing my hearers to hold such belief To these, if to any, I once had hope of addressing, with acceptance, words which insisted on the guilt of pride, and the futility of avarice, from these, if from any, I once expected ratification of a political economy, which asserted that the life was more than the meat, and the body than raiment, and these, it once seemed to me, I might ask, without being accused of fanaticism, not merely in doctrine of the lips, but in the bestowal of their heart's treasure, to separate themselves from the crowd of whom it is written, 'After all these things do the Gentiles seek '

It cannot, however, be assumed, with any semblance of reason, that a general audience is now wholly, or even in majority, composed of these religious persons. A large portion must always consist of men who admit no such creed, or who, at least, are maccessible to appeals And as, with the so called Christian, founded on it I desired to plead for honest declaration and fulfilment of his belief in life,-with the so called Infidel, I desired to plead for an honest declaration and fulfilment of his belief in death The dilemma is inevitable. must either hereafter live, or hereafter die, fate may be bravely met, and conduct wisely ordered, on either expectation, but never in hesitation between ungrasped hope, and unconfronted fear. We usually believe in immortality, so fir is to avoid preparation for death, and in mortality, so far as to avoid preparation for any thing after death. Whereas, a wise man will at least hold lumself ready for one or other of two events, of which one or other is inevitable, and will have all tlungs ended in order, for his sleep, or left in order, for his awakening

Nor have we any right to call it an ignoble indegment if he determine to end them in order, as for sleep. A brave belief in life is indeed an enviable state of mind, but, as far as I can discern, an unusual one. I know few Christians so convinced of the splendour of the rooms in their Father's house, as to be imppier when their friends are called to those mansions, than they would have been if the Queen had sent for them to live at nor has the Church's most ardent 'desire to depart, and be with Christ,' ever cured it of the singular habit of putting on mourning for every person summoned to such departure. On the contrary, a brave belief in death has been assuredly held by many not ignoble persons, and it is a sign of the last depravity in the Church itself, when it assumes that such a belief is in consistent with either purity of character or energy of The shortness of life is not, to nny rational person, a conclusive reason for wasting the space of it which may be granted him, nor does the anticipation of death, to morrow, suggest, to anyone but a drunkard, the expediency of drunkenness to day. To teach that there is no device in the grave, may indeed make the deviceless person more contented in his dulness, but it will make the deviser only more earnest in devising nor is human conduct likely, in every case, to be purer, under the conviction that all its evil may in a moment be pardoned, and all its wrong doing in a moment redeemed, and that the sign of repentance, which purges the guilt of the past, will want the soul into a felicity which forgets its pain,—that it may be under the sterner, and to many not unwise minds, more probable, appreliension, that 'what a man soweth that shall he also reap'-or others resp,-when he, the living seed of pestilence, walketh no more in darkness, but lies down therein.

The First Sight of the Alps

Entered once into this mountain Paradise, we wound on through its balmy glens, past cottage after cottage on their laybs, still glistering in the dew

The road got into more barren heights by the midday, the hills arduous, once or twice we had to wait for horses, and we were still twenty miles from Schaffhausen at sunset, it was past midnight when we reached her closed gates. The disturbed porter hid the grace to open them—not quite wide enough, we carried away one of our lamps in collision with the slanting bar as we drove through the arch. How much happier the privilege of dreamily entering a medieval city, though with the loss of a lamp, than the free ingress of being jammed between a dray and a tramear at a railroad station!

It is strange that I but dimly recollect the following morning, I fancy we must have gone to some sort of church or other, and certainly, part of the day went in admiring the bow windows projecting into the clean streets. None of us seem to have thought the Alps would be visible without profane exertion in elimbing hills. We dined at four, as usual, and the evening being entirely fine, went out to walk, all of us—my father and mother and Mary and I

We must have still spent some time in town seeing, for it was drawing towards sunset when we got up to some sort of garden promenade—west of the town, I believe, and high above the Rhine, so as to command the open country across it to the south and west. At which open country of low undulation, fire into blue,—gazing as nt one of our own distances from Malvern of Worcestershire, or Dorking of Kent,—suddenly—behold—beyond,

There was no thought in any of us for a moment of their being clouds They were clear as crystal, sharp on the pure horizon sky, and already tinged with rose by the sinking sun Infinitely beyond all that we had ever thought or dreamed,—the seen walls of lost Eden could not have been more beautiful to us, not more awful, round heaven, the walls of sacred Death

It is not possible to imagine, in any time of the world, a more blessed entrance into life, for a child of such a temperament as mine True, the temperament belonged to the nge a very few years, -within the hundred, before that, no child could have been born to care for mountains, or for the men that lived among them, in Till Rousseau's time, there had been no that way 'sentimental' love of nature, and till Scott's, no such apprehensive love of 'all sorts and conditions of men,' not in the soul merely, but in the flesh St Bernard of La Fontaine, looking out to Mont Blinc with his child's eyes, sees above Mont Blnnc the Madonna, St Bernard of Talloires, not the Lake of Annecy, but the dead between Martigny and Aosta. But for me, the Alps and their people were alike beautiful in their snow, and their humanity, and I wanted, neither for them nor myself, sight of any thrones in lieaven but the rocks, or of any spirits in heaven but the clouds

Thus, in perfect health of life and fire of heart, not wanting to be anything but the boy I was, not wanting to have anything more than I had, knowing of sorrow only just so much as to make life serious to me, not enough to slacken in the least its sinews, and with so much of science mixed with feeling as to make the sight of the Alps not only life revelation of the beauty of the earth, but the opening of the first page of its volume,—I went down that evening from the garden terrace of Schaffhausen with my destiny fixed in all of it that was to be sacred and useful. To that terrace, and the shore of the Lake of Geneva, my heart and faith return to this day, in every impulse that is yet nobly alive in them, and every thought that has in it help or peace

For Ruskin's life, as has been indicated above his own writings are the best and the fullest authority. A complete list of them is given in the Bibliography of the Writings of John Ruskin, by T. J. Wise (2 vols. 1889-93). The Life and Work of Ruskin by his pupil and secretary, W. G. Collingwood (2 vols. 1893), may be called his official biography up to that date. Among the many works dealing with his ideas or altempting to analyse his teaching and influence may be named Studies in Ruskin by E. T. Cook (1890). Ruskin by Mrs. Meynell (1900), Ruskin, Social Referenter, by J. A. Hobson (1898). John Ruskin, by Frederic Harrison (1902), and for a foreign view, Le Monrement Idéaliste et Social dans la Littérature Anglaise au Ibme Siècle. John Ruskin, by Jacques Bardoux (1900). nnd Ruskin et la Réligion de la Beanté by R. de la Sizeranne (1897, English translation, 1900). A collected edition of the whole of Ruskin's works including much material hitberto unpublished, began to be issued in 1903 under the supervision of his literary executors.

William Johnson Cory (1823-92), the son of a Devonshire squire, was born at Torrington, and till 1878, when he inherited an estate and assumed the name of Cory, was beloved and revered by his Eton pupils (including Sir Frederick Pollock and Lord Rosebery) as William Johnson Schooled at Eton, he was a brilliant student at Cambridge and became a Fellow of King's, and for over quarter of a century (from 1845) was the most eminent of Eton masters. After his retirement (1878) he lived at Madeira and at Hamp

At Cambridge he had won the Chancellor's medal for an English poem on Plato, his sapplies and alcaics were pronounced by Munro 'the best and most Horatian since Horace's own time. But, it was his Ionica (1858; enlarged 1891) that revealed-at first only to a very limited circle-his unique gift as an English lyrist, 'Anteros' and 'Mimnermus in Church' having an especial charm He wrote handbooks of Latin and Greek verse composition, defended Eton against the attacks of 'Jacob Omnium,' and published a suggestive and original (but debatable) Guide to English History from 1815 to 1835 A volume of extracts from his Letters and Journals, illustrating his attractive character and at times paradoxical opinions, was published in 1897

James Robinson Planché (1796-1880), whose name suggests his Huguenot descent, was born in London, and curiously combined the professions of antiquary and official herald (Rouge Cross from 1854, Somerset Herald from 1866) with that of writer of burlesques and other pieces for the theatre. His first extravaganza, Amoroso, was produced at Drury Lane in 1818 In 1824 he wrote English words for Weber's Der Freischutz, in 1826 for Oberou, from this time on he produced over ninety adaptations or translations and more than seventy original pieces (some with collabo-To the other side of his life work belong two histories of British costume and a Cyclopadia of Costume, Regal Records (1838), The Pursusvant of Arms (1852, 3rd ed 1874), and The Conqueror and his Companions (1874), besides his autobiographical Recollections (1872) The Extravaganzas (1879) fill five volumes

Richard William Church (1815-90) was born at Lisbon, a nephew of Sir Richard Church (famous in the Neapolitan service and as generalissimo of the insurgent Greeks in 1827). He spent much of his boyhood in Italy, was a friend of Newman at Oxford, took a first-class from Wadham College, was elected a Fellow of Oriel, in 1853 became rector of Whatley near Frome, and as Dean of St Paul's from 1871 was a distinguished and revered representative of the High Church on its best side. Among his score of works, besides several volumes of sermons, were Essays and Reviews (1854), The Beginning of the Middle Ages (1877), and The Oxford Movement (1891), and books on Anselm and Dante, on Spenser and Bacon (in the 'Men of Letters' series) He was one of the founders of the Guardian There is a Life of him by his daughter (1894)

Thomas Hughes (1823-96), born at Uffington, Berks, the son of a country squire, was educated at Rugby under Dr Arnold, studied at Oriel College, Oxford, 1841-45, was called to the Bar in 1848, and became a member of the Chancery Bar His first literary venture, published anonymously, was Tom Brown's Schooldays (1856), a story of boy-life at Rugby under Arnold's reign, based mainly on Passing contribuéd copionisty to the britist Ser in Magician and the Dull 1 (1 cersits diegre 14, he in 1841 published his Rom via of Her, the first of a long series of romances and historical illustrative mainly of the ichievements of Scottish arms abroad. The novels abound in incident, gloofy dauntless daring, and line a brist and vigorous stale without much literary charm. The histories are at times 100 picturesque and not historical enough. Of up wards of fifty novels the best known are Tee Ad intract of an zeric de Can f. Frank Hiller, or the Queen's Own, Bothwell, The Yellow I rigate and Harry Ogil ic, but his latest stones were meant to illustrate the British occupation of Burm's and the reconquest of the Soudan. Of his other works, Old and New Eduluren had the largest sale. But he wrote Memoirs of Kirlaldy of Gringe, of Montrose and other Scottish heroes, and books of battles on land and sea. Cardinal Manning received Grant into the Roman communion twelve years before his death

The Songs and Ballads of Ireland.

In Ireland they who make the people's ballads do not exactly make the people's laws. But the ballad-writers have "always been accurate and sympathetic exponents of popular sentiment. And in the ninefeenth century the patriotic ballad has constituted a very considerable part of the total poctic production of Irish writers' What may be termed the political poetry of Ireland is purely English in form It does not date much farther back than the era of the Volunteers, and the great period which followed that movement, the period of the Grattan Parliament, added singularly little to the ballad literature of Ireland It was, indeed, only at the close of that era, in the convulsions of the rebellion, that the emotions of the masses began to be expressed in verses, often simple, sometimes rude, but always charged with patriotic The stirring events of those times gave opportunities for the production of that poetry of action and passion for which, as Sir Charles Gavan Duffy has noted in the preface to his Ballad Poetry of Ireland, the Celtic race have always had an intense relish. Of the earliest of these songs of the people many of the most successful have been the work of writers otherwise unknown, and some have been anonymous. Among the latter must be included the most characteristic example of the class to which it belongs 'The Wearm' o' the Green,' a ballad which has been called the National Anthem of Ireland, though it comes nearer perhaps to a dirge or a requiem than to an anthem the Union to the days of Catholic Emancipation the lyrical voice of Ireland was practically inarticulate, save for the exception-an immense exception of course-of Moore's Melodies But the Melodies belong to a poetical category more formal and more self-conscious than the ballad. With the Repeal movement, however, the ballad impulse again made itself felt. In the hands of Thomas Davis, Gavan Duffy, and their colleagues of the Nation newspaper, a school of patriotic poetry, popular in form and feeling, was founded, which expressed with much power and concentration the n itional aspirations of the mass of Irishmen poetry of this period was at its best during the Young Ireland movement, and its most striking examples will be found in the collections compiled in the forties Of these The Ballad Poetry of Ireland, edited by Sir Charles Gavan Duffy, The Book of Irish Ballads, edited by Denis Florence MacCarthy, The Songs of Ireland, edited by M J Barry, and The Spirit of the Nation are the best known, and the best. In nil of these the dominant note is the note of patriotism, sometimes triumphant, sometimes chastened, now a prean, more often a dirge. But the verses are invariably occupied with the same theme in its almost countless variations Under the influence of Davis, and later of l'erguson, this national poetry became largely infused with an historical spirit, the writers seeking sometimes in the legend, more often in the actual chronicles of the country, fresh sources of inspiration, and the political ballad thus began to assume a more artificial tone, or at any rate a more elaborated style Many examples of this kind of writing have already been given in this volume in the specimens of the poetry of Davis, Ferguson, Mangan, the Banims, and others (see pages 353-But the earlier poetry is for the most part simpler in form, and it is chiefly this which is illustrated here. After the middle of the nine teenth century the intense lyrical impulse which the Young Ireland movement had stimulated was greatly weakened Certainly the movements of Irish latter-day politics have been less abundantly illustrated by Tyrtæn music, and the Fenian movement produced no poet and scarcely a song But bards have not been wholly wanting In such writers as Timothy D Sullivan the traditions of 'Young Ireland' have been carried on, if not exactly maintained, and 'The Spirit of the Nation' may still be felt in them

The Wearin' o' the Green.

Oh Paddy, dear, an' did ye hear the news that's goin' round?

The shamrock is by law forbid to grow on Irish ground No more St Patrick's Day we'll keep, his colour can't be seen,

For there's a cruel law agin the wearin' o' the green!

I met wid Napper Tandy, and he took me by the hand,
And he said, 'How's poor ould Ireland, and how does she stand?'

She's the most disthressful country that iver yet was seen,

For they 're hangin' men and women there for wearint o' the green

An' if the colour we must wear is England's cruel red, Let it remind us of the blood that Ireland has shed Then pull the shamrock from your hat, and throw it on the sod—

And never fear, 'twill take root there tho' under foot 'tis trod

When law can stop the blades of grass from growin' as they grow,

And when the leaves in summer time their colour dare not show,

Then I will change the colour too I wear in my caubeen,

But till that day, plaze God, I'll stick to wearin' o' the green ANON

The Shan Van Vocht

['The Little Old Woman - name for Ireland].

Oh ' the French are on the sea,
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
The French are on the sea,
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
Oh! the French are in the Bay,
They'll be here without delay,
And the Orange will decay,
Says the Shan Van Vocht

And where will they have their camp?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
Where will they have their camp?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
On the Curragh of Kildare,
The boys they will be there,
With their pikes in good repair,
Says the Shan Van Vocht

Then what will the yeomen do?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
What will the yeomen do?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
What should the yeomen do
But throw off the red and blue,
And swear that they'll be true
To the Shan Van Vocht?

And what colour will they wear?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
What colour will they wear?
Says the Shan Van Vocht,
What colour should be seen Where our fathers' homes have been But their own immortal green?
Says the Shan Van Vocht

And will Ireland then be free?
Says the Shan Van Voeht,
Will Ireland then be free?
Says the Shan Van Voeht,
Yes! Ireland shall be free
From the centre to the sea,
Then hurrah for Liberty,
Says the Shan Van Voeht.

The Memory of the Dead.

Who fears to speak of Niuety Light?
Who blushes at the name?
When cowards mock the patriot's fate
Who hangs his head for shame?
He's all a knave, or half a slave,
Who slights his country thus
But a true man, like you, man,
Will fill your glass with us

We drink the memory of the brave,
The faithful and the few—
Some lie far off beyond the wave,
Some sleep in Ireland, too,
All, all are gone, but still lives on
The fame of those who died,
And true men, like you, men,
Remember them with pride.

Some on the shores of distant lands
Their weary hearts have laid,
And by the strangers' heedless hands
Their lonely graves were made,
But though their clay be far away
Beyond the Atlantic foam,
In true men, like you, men,
Their spirit's still at home

The dust of some in Irish earth,
Among their own they rest,
And the same land that gave them birth
Has caught them to her breast

And we will pray that from their clay
Full many a race may start
Of true men, like you, men,
Fo act as brave a part.

They rose in dark and evil days
To right their native land,
They kindled here a living blaze
That nothing shall withstand Alas I that might can conquer right,
They fell, and passed away,
But true men, like you, men,
Are plenty here to day

Then here's their memory—may it be
For its a guiding light,
To cheer our strife for liberty,
And teach us to unite'
Through good and ill, be Ireland's still Though sad as theirs your fate,
And true men, be you, men,
Lile those of Ninety Eight.

Fair is my Native Isle

Fair is my native isle,
Proud is she too,
Sweet is her kindly smile,
Loving and true.
Exiled ones sigh for her,
Brave men would die for her,
Sneh love have I for her,
So would I do.

Dark has her story been Down through long years,
Oft her sweet face was seen
Wet with sad tears,
Now all looks bright for her,
Now comes delight for her,
Freedom and right for her,
Placed 'midst her peers

Far in the olden time High was her fame,
Nations in every clime
Blest her dear name.
Peace comes once more to her,
Tame as of yore to her,
Each breeze wafts o'er to her Praise and acclaim

TIMOTHY D SULLIVAN

Aubrey de Vere (1814-1902) belonged to a family remarkable for the development of the poetic faculty in many of its members. He was the third son of Sir Aubrey de Vere, the well known author of Julian the Apostate, Mary Tudor, and other dramatic and poetic works, and was born in County Limerick De Vere was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he came much under the influence of the eminent niathematician and thinker, Sir William Rowan Hamilton Brought up in a charming part of rural Ireland, and of a contemplative turn, De Vere was early attracted by the poetry of Wordsworth subsequently made the acquaintance of the poet, whom he visited at Rydal in 1841 was much interested in theological questions, be came the friend of Newman and Manning, and in 1851 joined the Cliurch of Rome In 1842 appeared De Vere's first work, The Waldenses, or the Fall of Rora, a lyrical drama, which was followed in 1843 by The Search after Proserpine, and other poems. His father's death in 1846, the great famine of 1847, and the religious preoccupations of the succeeding years apparently diverted De Vere's thoughts for a time from poetry, but Poems Miscellaneous and Sacred (1853) bear obvious marks of his religious experiences This volume vas followed in 1857 by It was not until 1861 that De May Carols Vere entered on that series of poems inspired by Irish subjects by which, despite the essentially Wordsworthian character of his temper and intellect, he is best known and for which he will be longest remembered These poems present a curious combination of bardic and ecclesiastical mediævalism This vein the poet worked in Inisfail, a Lyrical Chronicle of Ireland (1861), a poem intended to illustrate Irish history from the Norman Conquest to the era of the Penal Laws, and to 'embody the essence of a nation's history' It was followed by The Infant Bridal (1864) Irish Odes (1869) and The Legends of St Patrick (1872) De Vere again sought his materials in the same quarry, but Alexander the Great (1874) and St Thomas of Canterbury (1876) are semi philosophical dramas In Legends of the Saxon Saints De Vere sought with less success to apply to English themes the methods he had used in his Irish poems De Vere's voluminous works were collected in six volumes in 1884, but he subsequently published Legends, and Records of the Church and Empire (1887) and Mediæval Records and Sonnets (1893) See a volume of Selections (1890), and the Memoir by Wilfrid Ward (1904)

De Vere was all his life keenly interested in Irish affairs, and published several prose volumes on public questions, among which may be inentioned English Misrule and Irish Misdeeds (1848) and Ireland's Church Property and the Right Use of It (1867) His more strictly literary prose writings were collected in Essays, chiefly on Poetry (1887), and Essays, chiefly Literary and Ethical (1889) The long list of his publications closed with a volume of Recollections (1897), which contains many interesting memories of Wordsworth, Hartley Coleridge, Newman, Manning, and others of the poet's most eminent contemporaries Vere's poetry moves on a high plane of ethical contemplation, and is brightened by a rich imagination, but lie lacked the lyrical gift, and his best work is to be praised chiefly as possessing a grave austerity of thought and a stately dignity in its diction

The True King, a Bard Song

(A D- 1399)

He came in the night on a false pretence,
As a friend he came, as a lord remains
His coming we noted not, when, nor whence,
We slept, we woke in chains
Tree negative they had chased us to dens and caves,
Our streets and our churches lay drowned in blood,
The race that had sold us their sons as slaves
In our Land as conquerors stood!

Who were they, those princes that gave away
What was theirs to keep, not theirs to give?
A king holds sway for a passing day,
The kingdoms for ever live!
The Tanist succeeds when the king is dust
The king rules all, yet the king hath nought
They were traitors, not kings, who sold their trust,
They were traitors, not kings, who bought!

Brave Art MacMurrough '—Arise, 'tis morn l
For a true king the nation waited long
He is strong as the horn of the unicorn,
This true king who rights our wrong!
He rules in the fight by an inward right,
From the heart of the nation her king is grown,
He rules by right, he is bone of her might,
Her flesh, and bone of her bone!

The March to Kinsale

(December AD 1601)

O'er many a river bridged with ice,
Through many a vale with snowdrifts dumb,
Past quaking fen and precipice
The Princes of the North are come!

Lo! these are they that year by year
Rolled back the tide of England's war, Rejoice, Kinsale! thy help is near!
That wondrous winter march is o'er,
And thus they sang, 'To morrow morn
Our eyes shall rest upon the foe
Pass on, swift night, in silence borne,
And blow, thou breeze of sunrise, blow!'

Bhthe as a boy on marched the host,
With droning pipe and clear voiced harp,
At last above that southern coast
Rang out their war steeds' whinny sharp
And up the sea salt slopes they wound,
And airs once more of ocean quaffed,
Those frosty woods, the blue waves bound
As though May touched them, waved and hughed
And thus they sang, 'To morrow morn
Our eyes shall rest upon our foe
Pass on, swift night, in silence borne,
And blow, thou breeze of sunrise, blow'

Beside their watch fires couched all night
Some slept, some danced, at cards some played,
While chanting on a central height
Of moonlit erag, the priesihood prayed
And some to sweetheart, some to vife, Sent message lind, while others told Triumpliant tales of recent fight,
Or legends of their sires of old
And thus they sang, 'To morrow morn
Our eyes shall rest upon the foc
Roll on, swift night, in silence borne,
And blow, thou breeze of sunn e, blow ''

Dirge of Owen Roe O'Neill.

(A.D 1649)

So 'tis over Lift the dead '
Bear him to his place of rest,
Broken heart and blighted head,
Lay the Cross upon his breast

There is one that died too soon
'I was not Fortune—it was Fate
After him that cast her shoon

Toll the church bells slowly toll 'God this day is wroth with Lire Seal the book and fold the scroll, Crush the harp and burst the wire

Lords and priests, ye talked and talked In Kilkenny's council hall, But this man whose game ye baulked Was the one man 'mong you all'

'Twas not on the field he fell!

Sing his requiem, dark stoled choir!

Let a nation sound his knell,

God this day is wroth with Dire

The Graves of Tirconnel and Tyrone on San Pietro in Montorio

Within St Peter's fane, that kindly hearth Where exiles crowned their earthly loads cast down, The Scottish kings repose, their wanderings past, In death more royal thrice than in their birth Near them, within a church of narrower girth, But, like it with dilated memories vast, Sad Ulster's Princes find their rest at last. The home the holiest spot save one on earth. This is that mount which saw St. Peter die? Where stands you dome stood once that Cross reversed. On this dread hill, a western Calvary, The Empire and the Synagogue accurat, Clashed to ensanguined hands—like Cain—in one. Sleep where the Apostle slept, Tirconnel and Tyrone!

The Little Black Rose

The Little Black Rose shall be red at last,
What made it black but the March wind dry,
And the tears of the vido that fell on it fast?
It shall redden the hills when June is nigh.

The Silk of the kine shall reel at last,
What drove her forth but the dragon fly?
In the golden vale she shall feed full fast,
With her mild gold horn and her slov darl eye.

The wounded wood dove is dead at last!

The pine long bleeding, it shall not die!

This song is secret. Mine car it found

In a wind o'er the plains at Athenry

John Mitchel (1815-75) is best known is a politician. But he has been admirably characterised by Mr Lecly as 'a man of great, but exclusively literary, ability, and it is as a writer rather than as a politician that he will be longest Mitchel was the son of a Presby remembered terian minister, and was born in Dungiven, County Londonderry His early life was spent in Newry, where his father had a congregation for many years, and where he imbibed the strongly Nationalist views which, in the Ulster of his boy hood, were still the inheritance of the descendants of the men of '98 In 1830 he entered Trinity College, Dublin, but he did not take a degree He became a solicitor, and practised first at Newry and later at Banbridge. He married, after a romantic elopement, a young lady of great beauty and good social position, Miss Jane Verner In 1842 the current of Mitchel's life of professional routine was entirely changed by his becoming acquainted with the young pitriot Thomas Davis (page 364) He became closely associated with the Young Ireland movement, and as a contributor to the Nation at once began to attract attention by the vigour of his writings On the death of Davis (1845), Mitchel accepted a position on the staff of the Nation, and removed to Dublin is not the place in which to trace the stirring events of Mitchel's political career, which culminated in his conviction on a charge of treason felony and a sentence of fourteen years' trans portation. It is to his experiences as a political prisoner in Bermuda and at the Cape that we owe one of Mitchel's principal literary achievements, his Jail Journal—a work remarkable for the in tense individuality it reveals, as well as for the great vigour of its style. This was followed by the most vigorous and successful of his writings, The Last Conquest of Ireland (perhaps), published in 1860 in New York, where he resided from his release from prison until shortly before his death. A more ambitious work, The History of Ireland from the Treaty of Limerick to the Present Time, has little literary and no historical ment. At the election of 1874 Mitchel was returned for Tipperary, but declared incapable of being elected. At a second election he was again chosen, but died at Newry before the petition presented against his return could be heard

Mitchel was a vigorous and picturesque personality. Of the leaders of 'Young Ireland' he lind, with the exception of Davis, the largest share of literary talent, and his writings, which in their style bear strong marks of Carlyle's influence, will always be valuable as illustrating the character of the movement with which he was so closely identified.

Denis Florence MacCarthy (1817-82), a graceful and cultivated writer of poetry, was born in Dublin Intended for the Roman Catholic priesthood, he was educated at Maynooth early commenced to contribute verse to Dublin periodicals, and was one of the celebrated band of writers for the Nation whose influence on the Irish politics of their day was so remarkable. Among the fruits of his interest in the Young Ireland movement was a collection of Irish ballads, which he edited with much judgment and taste 1850 appeared his first volume of original verse, Ballads, Poems, and Lyrics This was followed by the The Bell-Founder (1857) and Under-Glimpses Perhaps the work by which MacCarthy is best remembered is his ode on Thomas Moore, com posed for the centenary of that writer an accomplished Spanish scholar His translations of Calderon have been highly praised, and he was awarded the medal of the Royal Academy of Spain in recognition of his work in this field. MacCarthy held for a short time the post of lecturer on English literature at the Catholic university in Dublin. In 1872 he published Shelley's Early Lafe, dwelling chiefly on the poet's visit to Ireland His later years were spent in London His health failed after 1864, and in 1871 he received a Civil List pension A collected edition of poems, edited by his son, was published ın 1884.

Sil Charles Gavan Duffy (1816–1903), poet, patriot, and publicist, was born in Monighin He was early attracted to journalism and to public affairs, and before he was of age was already the editor of a journal of some consequence in Belfast. In 1842, in conjunction with Thomas Davis and John Dillon, he founded the Nation, and thence forward was the most active of the organisers of the Young Ireland movement. The story of Duffy's connection with Irish politics may be read in his admirable Young Ircland, a Fragment of Irish History, in The League of North and South, and in his Life of Thomas Davis (1890), in which he paid a warm and generous homage to the memory of his early associate In 1852 he became member for New Ross, but, hopeless of effecting anything in Ireland, emigrated to Australia Entering the Victorian legislature, Duffy exhibited remarkable parliamentary talents, and by 1871 had risen to be Premier of the colony In 1873 he was knighted, and subsequently became Speaker of the Legislative Assembly His career in Australia is fully described in a volume of reminiscences, My Life in Two Hemispheres (1894) Retiring in advanced years from colonial politics, Duffy returned to Europe. He spent his latter days mainly at Nice, but paid frequent visits to London, where he became the founder and first president of the Irish Literary Duffy was perliaps more remarkable for his power of inspiring others to work than for the merit of his own performances He was from the first I eenly alive to the value of literature as an instrument for promoting the political purposes to which he was attached While at work on the Nation he was, with Davis, active in stimulating the publication of books on Irish history and literature, and was the originator of 'The Library of Ireland,' a popular series of books for the people on Irish history and literature. His collection of the Ballad Poetry of Ireland has enjoyed an immense popularity in Ireland and America, and he contributed some vigorous original verse to the columns of the Nation In his old age Duffy endeavoured to revive the same class of literature, devising and for some time editing the 'New Irish Library' But this series was much less successful than its predecessor. Shortly before his death he presented to the Royal Irish Academy a valuable collection of manuscripts connected with modern Irish history

Though not a great writer, Duffy was a great journalist. His best work is buried in the files of the Nation. Few men everted a wider influence in the Ireland of his day. In the verses he contributed to the Spirit of the Nation he expressed with considerable power and imaginative insight the ideas that lay at the root of the movement of which he was a principal author.

Cecil Frances Alexander (1818-95), well known as a writer of hymns, was the daughter of Major Humphreys, an officer in the Royal Marines, and was born in County Wicklow She was carly attracted by the Oxford movement, and in conjunction with a lady friend published a series of tracts in which her first efforts in devotional poetry In 1846 Miss Humphreys published rppeared her Verses for Holy Seasons This was followed in 1848 by Hymns for Little Children For the latter work Keble wrote a preface. In 1850 she was married to the Rev William Alexander, then a rector in the north of Ireland, and subsequently

Bishop of Derry and Archbishop of Armagli (see below) Besides the works already mentioned, Mrs Alexander published several other volumes ell that is best worth remembrance in her work has been collected in a single volume, Poems by Cecil Trances Alexander, edited by her husband after her death in 1895. She was the editor of a well known collection in the 'Golden Treasury' series, It is the Sunday Bool of Poetry for the Young for her hymns that Mrs Alexander best deserves remembrance Many of these have become popu hir far and wide, and such admirable examples of her genuine poetical talent as 'The roscate hues of early dawn,' 'There is a green hill far away,' and 'Jesus calls us o'er the tumult' will always retain their place in collections of English 'The Burial of Moses,' first published in the Dublin University Magazine (1856), is the best known of Mrs Alexander's pieces other than her hymns Perhaps Mrs Alexander's chief gift was the power of blending vivid and picturesque imagery with devotional sentiment.

William Alexander, Archbishop of Armagli and Primate of All Ireland, was born in 1824 Though his entire life has been passed in the service of the Church of Ireland, the Most Rev Dr Alexander has, all through his career, evinced strong leanings towards literature. In 1867, not long before his elevation to the Irish episcopate, this bent was even strong enough to lead to his being a candidate for the chair of Poetry in the University of Oxford Born in Londonderry, Dr Alexander was educated at Tunbridge School, and later at Exeter and Brasenosc Colleges, Oxford, where he graduated in 1845 Though he had published no formal volumes of verse, he had, in his own phrise, been 'suspected all his life of poetry,' and was thus selected in 1853 to deliver the Inaugural Ode on the installation of the Earl of Derby as Chancellor of the University of This poem is an unusually happy specimen of stately verse. Other commemorative poems in the same kind show a felicitous facility for commemorative verse, and Dr Alexander may be said to have the laureate faculty for ornate ceremonal poetry in a degree which all laureates have not attained to In 1858 appeared The Death of Jacob, followed by Specimens, Poetical and Critical (1867), Lyrics of Life and Light (1878), and The Finding of the Book In 1886 was published the author's most considerable volume of poetry, St Augustine's Holiday, and other Poems, and it is in this that the poet's best work will be found A new edition, which appeared in 1900 under the title of The Finding of the Book, and other Poems, contains many poems not to be found in the earlier volume. Dr Alexander's prose, as those who know his eloquence are aware, is often poctry, but his poetry is certainly not prose To a natural splendour of diction he unites a real imaginative vision and a sensibility which is from the heart And if, to use the phraseology he has himself employed in his preface to St Augustine's Holiday, he had not been called to be 'n governor of the suncturry and of the house of God,' the Irish Primate would certainly have become 'one of the brethren who prophesy with harps, and are instructed in the songs of the Lord' As it is, a poet's temperament and a scholar's taste make themselves felt in all his verse. Besides the works mentioned, Dr Alexander has been the author in recent years of a number of poems published in the magizines and clsewhere, but not hitherto collected.

Appointed Bishop of Derry by the Crown in 1867, prior to the disestablishment of the Irish Church, Dr Alexander was nearly thirty , ears later called by the votes of his brethren on the Episcopal bench to the Archbishopric of Armagh and Primacy of All Ireland

William Gorman Wills (1828-91), one of the most successful drainatists of the later half of the nineteenth century, was the son of the Rev James Wills (see page 350), and was born Through his mother he was con nected with the gifted families of Bushe and He early exhibited a strong artistic Plunket bent, and, like his countryman Lover, his energies were first spent on painting, to pursue which art he scents to have abandoned his college career without taking a degree. His first effort in literature was a novel, Old Times, published in an Irish periodical, which showed promise of distinc-In 1862 Wills settled in London, where he took to writing for the magazines, and produced several stories, but without making any striking Int. Nor for some time was he more successful as a dramatist, in which capacity he made his first attempt in 1865 with A Man and his Snaaow The stimulus which was needed to make Wills do his best was supplied by his fither's death, which threw on him the charge of his mother's support. He succeeded in 1871 in obtaining the appoint ment of dramatist to the Lyceum, and produced for that thertre in 1872 and 1873 Medea in Cornth, Charles I, and Eugene Aran. The two last named plays, with Sir Henry Irving in the leading rôles, achieved a wide popularity, and thenceforward Wills's fame was assured A succession of plays followed, among which may be mentioned Jane Shore, Buckingham, Nell Graynne, and the remarkably popular Olivia, in which Ellen Terry scored one of her greatest triumphs. Wills continued for nearly twenty years the profession of playwright, and maintained his popularity as a dramatist to the end of his life, in spite of an extraordinary carelessness in matters of business and an apparent indifference to fame. The number of his acted plays is as many as thirty-three. Besides his plays and his early stories Wills wrote a blank verse poem, Melchioi, of some merit, and he had a distinct facility as a song-writer. In this last form of composition the familiar 'I'll sing thee songs of Araby' is his best-known effort

Wills was a man of varied talent and singular personal charm, who, despite his remarkable success as a playwright, never did full justice to his powers It will be long before the best of his plays cease to hold the stage Few of them have been printed, and criticism is therefore difficult, but it is doubt ful if many of them would bear reading written little that will be remembered as literature, in spite of a turn for epigram and a remarkable facility of expression. This last quality was admirably illustrated in his definition of indecency, given on the spur of the moment, in cross-evamination in a court of justice, which is perhaps the most familiar phrase Wills ever coined, 'That which would bring the blush of shame to the cheek of modesty, or excite strong passions in a man'

Dion Boucicault (1820?-90), actor and dramatist, was born in Dublin, but receiving his education in London at the hands of an uncle, his early years were passed mainly in England Early evincing an aptitude for the stage, Boucicault joined his countryman Macready, and made his first appearance on the boards at Bristol in Jack Sheppard His talents as an actor were of a high order, and he was considered by competent judges the best 'stage Irishman' of his generation Acting plays quickly led by an easy transition to writing them In 1841 London Assurance, a five act comedy produced at Covent Garden by Charles Mathews, met with immediate success It was followed by a rapid succession of pieces in which, without exhibiting many of the higher qualities of a dramatist, Boucicault gave proofs of remarkable adroitness as an adapter, and his pieces were always 'actable.' In 1860 he entered, in The Colleen Bawn, a play founded on Gerald Griffin's novel The Collegians, on the field of Irish melo drama, with which his name is chiefly associated The Colleen Bawn was followed by a number of dramas with Irish titles, of which the best-known and most successful were Arrah na-Pogue and The Shaughraun Alike as actor and dramatist, Boucicault pursued for above forty years a brilliant, though not commercially prosperous, career though few play wrights of the nineteenth century have been more prolific, few authors of equal volume have written with so little distinction will be longest remembered by his Irish plays, which, though conventional in form, strike, in some scenes at least, a fairly high note of pathos

Horace (1850) From 1850 onwards he published over a score of novels, four or five of them historical, but the best devoted to fox-hunting, steeplechasing, and country-house life generally, subjects he knew so intimately as to be always beyond reproach on the score of accuracy—he was even a supreme arbiter on sporting matters. But his stories have a charm for those who rarely read sporting novels—the morale of his heroes, men and women, was higher than in many works of the kind, as stories they are lively and entertaining, the humour being better than the pathos, and some of his songs (such as 'Drink, puppy, drink') appeal to an equally

John Francis Campbell (1822-85), of Islay, educated at Eton and Edinburgh University, held for a time an office at court, and was afterwards secretary to the lighthouse and coal commissions. An enthusiastic Highlander and profound Gaelic scholar, he is chiefly remembered by his Popular Tales of the IVest Highlands (4 vols 1860-62), a most important contribution to the study of folk tales which greatly vivified Celtic studies in Britain, and made a subsequent 'Gaelic revival' possible

The dominating idea of modern thought is With that idea the name of Herbert Spencer is indissolubly connected Herbert Spencer was born at Derby on 27th April 1820 He owed much to his father A teacher by profession, the elder Spencer was remarkably free from the pedagogic spirit. A believer in the spontaneity of nature, he did not make the mistake of James Mill in setting himself to make his son an intellectual The boy was seven years old before he In due course he was sent to school, could read but his progress was not marked, he was restless, inattentive, and by no means pliable. Even at that early age it was noted that his reasoning capacities were ahead of his powers of mental Learning by rote was distasteful, and only when nature's methods were allowed to assert themselves did he make progress even as a boy, had for him a special charm Young Spencer's domestic environment was par ticularly fitted to develop in him the element of individuality for which he was so markedly distinguished, all the topics of the day were discussed with freedom in the family circle, and reason rather than authority was the supreme court of appeal In religion, young Spencer breathed the vigorous atmosphere of Dissent His father, though at first a Methodist, joined the Quakers, while his mother retained her love for the Wesley in persuasion. On Sunday morning the boy attended the Quakers' meeting with his father, and the Methodist Chapel with his mother in the evening. Strange to say, religion never took vital hold of Spencer The present writer once asked him if he lind ever undergone those religious convulsions which are associated with so many thinkers who have sprung from middle class Dissenting families His reply was that religion never appealed to him, his mind seemed to lie outside of the range of the current creed.

When he was thirteen years of age, Spencer's education was undertaken by his uncle, the Rev Thomas Spencer, perpetual curate at Hinton near Bath—a man of individuality, as may be gathered from the fact that he was a Radical in politics, an Anti-Corn-Law agitator, and a temperance advocate, rather a striking combination of qualities in a Church of England clergyman The uncle hoped to fit his pupil for a university career, but his mind was not cast in that mould Reluctantly the idea of a university career was abandoned, it was resolved to let the lad's tendencies follow their natural course. Spencer returned home rather uncertain as to his future. His father secured for him an assistantship in a school His pedagogic career was cut short in 1837 by an offer from the resident engineer of the London division of the London and Birmingham Railway, then in progress of construction As a civil engineer he was employed till the crisis which followed upon the great railway mania, railway construction came to a standstill, and the profession of civil engineer entered upon darl days. At the age of twenty six Spencer found himself stranded, he returned to his home at Derby, and occupied his leisure in intellectual pursuit. In 1842, in The Nonconformist, appeared the first-fruits of his in tellectual activity in the shape of a series of articles on 'The Proper Sphere of Government' -articles, it may be remarked, which contain the germs of his political philosophy Possibly in fluenced by his success in his new sphere, he cast his eyes towards journalism, and in 1848 he was invited to the position of sub editor of the Economist nevispaper

Mr Spencer found time in the midst of his journalistic work to study the deep problems of philosophy, science, and politics, which were dis turbing the minds of nineteenth century thinkers In 1850 appeared Social Statics, in which he made an attempt to base the science of government on first principles. The fundamental thought of Social Statics is that society is an organism whose evolution is determined by laws. In societies lie recognised a certain order of progress, from the simple to the complex, and as he pursued his studies he discovered the same order of development in other classes of phenomena, particularly The nucleus of the Spencerian philosophy is to be found in Social Statics, where, in the chapter entitled 'General Considerations,' it is stated as a biological truth that low types of animals are composed of many parts not mutually dependent, while higher animals are composed of unlike but mutually dependent parts. The same truth was observable in society, and thus Ilr Spencer was led to the conclusion that the indi vidual and the social organism follow the same line of development, the primary characteristic of which is integration and increase of definiteness -a characteristic which he also noted in mental evolution in his Principles of Psychology, published Suddenly there arose in Mr Spencer's mind the conception that the law of development, which he had observed in separate classes of phenomena, was a universal law applicable to the entire Cosmos In his essay on 'Progress, its Law and Cause' (1857), the subject is still further elucidated, though not till the publication of First Principles, in 1862, did Mr Spencer formulate in its full-orbed entirety the theory of Evolution His life is mainly a record of the development of his ideas, or rather of the stages in the dis covery of the fundamental idea in Evolution, and of his application of it as interpretative of the The twelve years from entire phenomenal world 1850, when he published Social Statics, to 1862, when he came before the public with his theory of Evolution, were years of rapid intellectual development. He became a contributor to the Westminster Review, and came into contact with some of the leading writers of the day

Eliot early recognised the genius of the rising philosopher, and steadily his reputation increased

The great aim of science and philosophy has been to discover the laws of the Cosmos, and, if possible, to reduce them to one comprehensive all embracing law. Mr Spencer's aim was to bring about by strictly scientific methods the unification of phenomena, to comprehend the Universe from a single point of view By way of preliminary in his First Principles, he defines his position by refusing to attack the problem from the meta physical side. Taking his stand upon Sir William Hamilton's exposition of the relativity of I nowledge. he shows that, from the constitution of the human mind, knowledge of Absolute existence is impossible. Speculation in this direction he relegated to the Unknowable According to Mr Spencer, the task which lies before philosophy is the unification of knowledge, the reduction of phenomena to one When he came to the problem, fundamental law phenomena had been embraced within three great generalisations—the Nebular theory, the law of Gravitation, and Conservation or Persistence of The Nebular theory deals with the primi tive constitution of the Universe, Gravitation with the law which governs all existences, and the Conservation of Force with the dynamic conditions of the Cosmos. What Mr Spencer did was to take these three separate generalisations and fuse them into one by his theory of Evolution Accord ing to him the Universe is one fact, the result of one great cosmical process-namely, the Redistri button of Matter and Motion The problem before Mr Spencer was this Given a Universe composed of a fixed quantity of Matter and Motion, con ceived in harmony with the law of Gravitation as manifesting co existent forces of attraction and repulsion, to trace the process by which the Cosmos vas evolved from its nebulous to its present The process is summed up in the following uncouth but pregnant formula Evolution is an integration of Matter and concomitant dissipation of Motion, during which the Matter passes from an indefinite incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity, and during which the retrained Motion undergoes a parallel transformation This law holds good of all existences whatsoever For convenience, phenomena are divided into sections-astronomy, geology, biology, psychology, and sociology, but the process is one, and the law of the process is one. Evolution is one in principle and in fact.

Mr Spencer's course was clear Having formulated the law of the Cosmos in its totality, he had now to use the law to interpret and classify the various sections of phenomena in the order of their evolution. In a word, Mr Spencer set himself in his various works not only to unify but to interpret phenomena. In First Principles the inorganic evolution is outlined, and in the Principles of Biology Mr Spencer applies his evolution formula to the great problem of life, plant and animal. The key to this branch of the subject is found in his definition of life as the continuous adjustment of inner to outer relations Given an environment gradually increasing in complexity, it follows that organisms, in order to survive, must in the process of adaptation also increase in complexity of the organisms restrict themselves to certain processes, and thus by a kind of division of labour structural and functional complexities result another process, that associated with the name of Darwin, unfit organisms perish in the struggle for existence, only those survive which adopt themselves to their environment. In the sphere of biology Mr Spencer shows that organic life conforms to the universal law of evolution-inasmuch as development from the humblest protoplasmic forms to the highest types, with all their structural and functional complexities, is from the homoge neous to the heterogeneous by means of successive integrations and differentiations The Principles of Biology, published in 1867, in which the evolution view of organic life was elaborated in great detail, quite revolutionised the scientific attitude towards Nature.

In Principles of Psychology, though written before First Principles, evolution is shown to hold sway also in the world of mind The starting-point of Psychology is Consciousness-not its ultimate nature, which is inscrutable, but its development Mr Spencer finds Consciousness to take its rise in the recognition of likeness and unlikeness between primary states of feeling, he traces the reciprocal relations between mind and its environment, and notes the various stages in its evolution from the simplicity of primitive ideas to the complex intelligence of the civilised mind. In Psychology as in Biology, the one law of evolution holds good-from the simple to the complex through successive integrations and differentiations instinct, memory, reason being all evolved in the mind by its efforts to adjust itself to its environment. A striking feature of Mr Spencer's Psychology is the attempt to close by his evolution theory the long dispute between the Experientialists and the Intuitionalists Beliefs which had hitherto been accepted as necessary truths, and which the school of Mill had never been able to resolve into individual experiences, according to Spencer are beliefs which, though a priors to the individual, are a posteriors to the race. By some thinkers, however, the Spencerian theory is not accepted as a solution of the problem. They hold that the evolution of rationality presupposes the existence of reason, at least in the germ in the mind of primitive man The neo Hegelians in particular dissent from Mr Spencer's theory of the origin of necessary truths

Another problem which the Spencerian psychology professes to have attacked successfully is that relating to External Perception. Taking his stand upon the doctrine of the relativity of Knowledge, Mr Spencer—unlike Mill, who landed in Idealism—reached an entirely original theory which lie calls

Fransfigured Realism By means of this theory Mr Spencer endeavours to combine the fragments of truth which are to be found in the crude Realism of the average man and the subtle Idealism of Mill Transfigured Realism has not received extensive recognition by contemporary thinkers. In life manner ethical evolution is handled. Moral codes, howe or complex, are traced back to primitive facts of consciousness, to elementary pleasures and pains. Here, as in the region of ideas, Mr Spencer endeavours to mediate between the Utilitarians and the Intuitionalists. The difficulty of the Utilitarians in dealing with moral feelings was to explain their origin in individual experiences of utility. According to the evolution view experiences of utility organised and consolidated through all past generations of the human race have, by means of hereditary transmission, taken the form of moral intuitions-emotional responses to right and wrong conduct, which have no apparent basis in individual experiences of utility In Data of Ethics, published in 1879, are laid down the principles which are applied in later volumes to the detailed interpreta tion of ethical phenomena. The conclusion reached is that ethical development is from the simple to the complex, and is conditioned by social develop ment. From the tribal to the national stage a gradual process can be traced, caused by the ever broadening sympathies of human nature in response to the increasing complexity of civilisation-a process which justifies the philosopher of evolution in forecasting a time when the entire human race will be bound by the tie of brotherhood.

In Principles of Sociology, the first volume of which appeared in 1877, the avolution formula is applied to the social or mism. Society, like an organism, begins in a state of relative simplicity, and by a series of structural and functional changes reaches a state of relative complexity From the primitive tribe to the highest form of civilisation the le of evolution holds good. Viewed in detail society seems a mass of confused strivings among individuals, but when the economic, political, and ethical elements are dul, focussed, the great evolutionary law is detected. Civilisation is seen to be a colossal process of adjustment a hereby man's physical intellectual, and moral nature develops in all its maryellous complexity in response to an environment also increasing in complexity

In Political Institutions, published in 1882, 3ir Spencer details the growth of governments on the lines of his theor and in his Man vers is the State 11884: lie applies to modern conditions his theor that State interference is an evil and should be reduced to a minimum in the interests of in dividual and ocial progress. In both Sociology and Political Irea upons Mr. Spencer lays stress upon he great change which tool place when civilisation entered upon the industrial stage Under the military regime the active virtues receive prominence. When success in 1 at 1136 the highest glory goodness was identified with bravery and strength and the feelings of hatred and revenge engendered by sinfe deadered the sympathies and prevented the higher forms of cthical life from de eloping With the rise of Industrialism human development entered upon a new phase. Or contrasting the characters of the men of to-da with those of their arcestors, we see that with pacific industry has come a ground independence, a decrease of personal loyalty, and less faith in governments. Along with that has come increased assertion of individuality and greater development of sympathy arising out of the decay of the warlile spirit.

Religion, too, with its varied beliefs and institutions, is exhibited as subject to the law of development, rising from ancestor-worship, through the elaborate cults of paganism to the highly complex organisations of modern times And just as morality increases in purity with the increase of civilisation more particularly with the increasing sway of Industrialism, so religion rises to higher and nobler conceptions of beginning in ancestor-worship . the Universe culminates in Christianity, and sliades off in the hands of philosophic thinkers into Pantheism According to Mr Spencer there is a sphere for religion—the sphere of the Uni novable. This view of religion takes its rise in the Spencerian theory of Knowledge, positive Knowledge, it is Man is not contended, cannot satisfy the mind content with tracing the Universe back to the Persistence of Force, for Science that is enough, but the philosopher and the religionist demard an analysis of Force Force is seen to be but a symbol of the Absolute, which, by virtue of the relativity of thought, man can never hope to apprehend In this region the last word of the Spencerian philosophy is Agnosticism The religious sentiment, according to Mr Spencer, will not be killed by science. The sense of mystery is deepened rather than weakened by increasing knowledge, scientific explanations leave man at last in presence of the inexplicable. 'One truth must grow ever clearer-the truth that there is an Inscrutable Existence everywhere manifested, to which the man of science can neither find nor conceive either beginning or end. Amid the mysteries which become the more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the one absolute certainty that he is ever in presence of an Infinite and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed?

After forty years of toil, which resulted in several nervous collapses through overwork, Mr Spencer brought his system of philosophy to a conclusion For twenty-four years he carried on his work at a Fame came at last, and at Brighton, whither he went to escape the distractions of London life, he found time to complete his system of philosophy, and round off his life work by writing his Autobiography and revising his earlier volumes, especially his Principles of Biology and Principles of Psychology He died 8th December 1903 Nearly all his works have been translated into French, German, and Russian, while several have found their way into the Polish, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, Greek, Japanese, and Chinese languages Spencer's influence is thus world wide, and the historian of the nineteenth century will recognise in the philosophy of evolution the dominating factor in the higher reaches of scientific and speculative thought

Evolution and Dissolution

Here presents itself a final question which has probably been taking a more or less distinct shape in the 'If Evolution of every kind is an in minds of many crease in complexity and function that is incidental to the universal process of equilibration, and if equilibra tion must end in complete rest, what is the fate towards which all things tend? If the Solar System is slowly dissipating its forces-if the Sun is losing his heat at a rate which will tell in millions of years-if with diminution of the Sun's radiations there must go on a diminution in the activity of geologic and meteoro logic processes as well as in the quantity of vegetal and animal existence—if Man and Society are similarly dependent on the supply of force that is gradually coming to an end, are we not manifestly progressing towards omnipresent death?' That such a state must be the outcome of the processes everywhere going on seems beyond doubt This dissolution of the Earth, and, at intervals, of every other planet, is not, however, a dissolution of the Solar System in their ensemble, all the changes exhibited throughout the Solar System are incidents accompanying the in tegration of the entire matter composing it the local integration of which each planet is the scene, completing itself long before the general integration is complete. But each secondary mass having gone through its evolution and reached a state of equilibrium among its parts, thereafter continues in hits extinct state, until by the still progressing general integration it is brought into the general mass. And though each such union of a secondary mass with the central mass, implying transformation of molar motion into molecular motion, causes partial diffusion of the total mass formed, and adds to the quantity of motion that has to be dispersed in the shape of light and heat, yet it does not postpone the period at which the total mass must become completely integrated, and its excess of contained motion radiated into space

Here we come to the question rused at the close of the last chapter—does Evolution as a whole, lil e Evolution in detail, advance towards complete quies cence? Is that motionless state called death, which ends Evolution in organic bodies, typical of the Universal Death in which Evolution at large must end? And have we thus to contemplate as the outcome of things a boundless space holding here and there extinct suns fated to remain for ever without further change?

To so speculative an inquiry, none but a speculative answer is to be expected. Such answer as may be ventured must be taken less as a positive answer than as a demurrer to the conclusion that the proximate result must be the ultimate result. If, pushing to its extreme the argument that Evolution must come to a close in complete equilibrium or rest, the reader suggests that, for aught that appears to the contrary, the Universal Death thus implied will continue indefinitely, it is legitimate to point out how, on carrying the argument still further, we are led to infer a subsequent Universal Life (From First Principles)

Science and Religion

Under one of its aspects, scientific progress is a gradual transfiguration of nature. Where ordinary per ception saw perfect simplicity it reveals great complexity, where there seemed absolute mertness it discloses intense activity, and in what appears mere vacancy it finds a marvellous play of forces Lach generation of physicists discovers in so called 'brute matter' powers which but a few years before the most instructed physicists would have thought incredible, as instance the ability of a mere iron plate to take up the complicated aerial vibra tions produced by articulate speech, which, translated into multitudinous and varied electric pulses, are retranslated a thousand miles off by another iron plate and ngain heard as articulate speech when the explorer of nature sees that, quiescent as they appear, surrounding bodies are thus sensitive to forces which are infinitesimal in their amounts-when the spectroscope proves to him that molecules on the earth pulsate in harmony with molecules in the stars - when there is forced on him the inference that every point in space thrills with an infinity of vibrations passing through it in all directions, the conception to which he tends is much less that of a Universe of dead matter than that of a Universe every where alive, alive if not in the restricted sense, still in a general sense

Science under its concrete forms enlarges the sphere for religious sentiment. From the very beginning the progress of I nowledge has been accompanied by an

Among savages, the increasing capacity for wonder lowest are the least surprised when shown remarkable products of civilised art astonishing the traveller by their indifference. And so little of the marrellous do they perceive in the grandest phenomena of nature that any inquiries concerning them they regard as childish trifling. It is not the rustic, nor the artisan, nor the trader who sees something more than a mere matter of course in the hatching of a chick, but it is the biolo gist, who, pushing to the uttermost his analysis of vital phenomena, reaches his greatest perplexity when a speek of protoplasm under the inicroscope shows him life in its simplest form, and makes him feel that, however he formulates its processes, the actual play of forces remains unimaginable. Neither in the ordinary tourist nor in the deer stalker climbing the mountains above him does a Highland glen rouse ideas beyond those of sport and of the picturesque, but it may, and often clocs, in the geologist. He, observing that the glacier bound roel he sits on his lost by weathering but half an inch of its surface since a time far more remote than the beginnings of human civilisation, and then trying to conceive the vloy denudation which has cut out the whole valley, has thoughts of time and of power to which they are strangers. Nor is it in the primitive peoples who supposed that the heavens rested on mountain tops, and more than in the modern inheritors of their cosmogons who repeat that 'the heavens declare the glory of God,' that we find the largest conceptions of the Universe, or the greatest amount of wonder excited by contemplation of it. Rather, it is in the astronomer, who sees in the Sun a mass so vast that even into one of his spots our Earth might be plunged without touching its edges, and y ho by every finer telescope is shown an increased multitude of such suns, many of them far larger Hereafter as heretofore, higher faculty and deeper insight will raise rather than lower this sentiment present the most powerful and most instructed mind has neither the knowledge nor the capacity required for symbolising in thought the totality of thing. Occupied with one or other division of Nature, the man of science usually does not know enough of the other division, even rudely, to conceive the extent and complexity of their phenomena, and supposing him to have adequate I now ledge of each, yet he is unable to think of them as a whole. Wider and stronger intellect may hereafter help him to form a vague consciousness of them in their By future more evolved intelligence the course of things now apprehensible only in parts may be apprehensible altogether, with an accompanying feel ing as much beyond that of the present cultured man as his feeling is beyond that of the savage feeling is not likely to be decreased but to be increased by that analysis of Knowledge which, while forcing him to agnosticism, vet continually prompts him to imagine some solution of the great enigma which he knows cannot Especially must this be so when he remem bers that the very notions, origin, cause, and purpose are relative notions belonging to human thought, which are probably irrelevant to the Ultimate Reality transcend ing human thought, and when, though suspecting that explanation is a word without ineaning when applied to this Ultimate Reality, he yet feels compelled to think there must be an explanation.

But one truth must grow ever clearer—the truth that there is an Inscrutable Existence everywhere manifested, to which he can neither find nor conceive either beginning or end. Amid the mysteries which become the more mysterious the more they are thought about, there will remain the one absolute certainty that he is ever in presence of an Infinite and I ternal Energy from which all things proceed.

Matthew Arnold,

whose distinction as a poet was equalled by his distinction as a critic, was the eldest son of Dr Thomas Arnold, headmaster (1827-42) of Rugby He was born on 24th December 1822 School at Laleham on the Thames From his fifteenth to his nineteenth year he was under his father's care at Rugby, where in June 1840 was recited his schoolboy poem 'Alaric in Rome,' a composition somewhat Byronic in manner, which gave no certain promise of his future powers In that year he obtained a scholarship at Balliol College, and in 1841 was in residence at Oxford A year later his father died, but the memory and the influence of Dr Arnold remained always with his son to prompt and cheer him in the path of duty, to deepen and control his character, possibly also to expose him to certain trials which attend intellectual vericity in a time of intellectual transitions He was unaffected by the Oxford High Church movement, but felt the personal charm of J H Newman, and the charm of the old collegiate city and the surrounding country refined and nourished his Among his friends were Clough and imagination Stanley, J D Coleridge and J C Sharp Newdigate verses on 'Cromwell' are of no higher merit than that which a creditable prize poem com-In 1844 he took a second class monly exhibits at his final examination in classics, and in the following year was elected to an Oriel fellow-For a short time Matthew Arnold taught at Rugby under Tait, afterwards Archbisliop of Canterbury In 1847 he became private secretary to Lord Lansdowne, President of the Council, and in 1851 entered on that career of inspector of schools to which a great part of his life was intelligently and conscientiously devoted He believed, perhaps rightly, that the school inspector did much to wear down and wear out the poet that was within him In the year of his appointment to these new duties he married the daughter of Mr Justice Wightman It was an eminently happy marriage

Two years previously had appeared The Strayed Reveller, and other Poems, by 'A.', it attracted little attention, and was speedily withdrawn by the author from circulation Yet the volume contained much that is beautiful and characteristic of Arnold at his best. The poem which gives its name to the slender collection is a dialogue between a youth who has drunk of Circe's cup, the enchantress, and that 'spare, dark featured, quick eyed stranger,' Ulysses, it is touched with melancholy in the contrast be tween the happy vision of all things which the gods possess and the vision of men, into which pain and trouble enter. The verse is unrhymed and irregular, a form much affected—perhaps under the influence of Goethe-by Arnold, and produced with an uncertainty of ear which, surprising the reader with metrical beauty succeeded by strange failures, often leaves the impression of something hazardous and experimental The sonnets of this volume, seldom regular in form, are distinguished by originality of idea and a fine poise of feeling But the most admirable poems are 'Mycerinus,' which tells of the just Egyptian king, doomed to death, who would fain seek a refuge from reflection in revelry, and yet below his revelry consults with his own soul and is wise, that pathetic idyl of the sea-sands and the sea, a kind of domestic tragedy under the waves, 'The Forsaken Merman,' a poem now familiar to all readers of modern literature, and 'Resignation,' a piece of meditation, characterised by that 'sad lucidity of soul' of which it speaks, and lacking only that higher lucidity which is joyous

Empedocles on Etna, and other Poems, by 'A', followed in 1852, and, before fifty copies had been sold, this also was withdrawn from circulation. It seemed to the author, as a critic of his own work, that the painful emotion of his Empedocles, un relieved by action, was no suitable material for a Happily the rigour of his theory yielded in 1867 to the expressed desire of Robert Browning, and the poem was then republished The versified philosophy of Empedocles, as he moves upward to fling himself into the crater of Etna, includes noble stanzas, but a critical Polonius might justly assert that 'This is too long' The songs of the young harp-player, Callicles, have magical beauty and sometimes the finest music, yet even here the music of Arnold's verse is uncertain The volume contained 'Tristram and Iseult,' a poem in three parts, which fails where there is a demand for ardour of passion, but becomes gracious and delicate in the third part where Iseult of Brittany, resigned rather than happy, sits by the seaside and beguiles her children with the tale of Merlin and Vivian. Some lyrics of elaborated beauty-and Matthew Arnold often attained simplicity through elaboration—accompanied the longer poems, among which appeared 'A Summer Night' and certain love poems of foiled affection, real or imaginary, with Switzerland for their scene. The admirable 'Memorial Verses' and 'Stanzas in Memory of the Author of "Obermann" do honour to some of the chief literary masters of Arnold's mind-Goethe, Wordsworth, Sénancour-and raise criticism to veritable poetry

A year later—1853—appeared a volume of Poems, partly republished, partly new, and the public was now for the first time attentive and duly impressed A Preface in prose took the withdrawal from circulation of Empedocles on Etna as the occasion for setting forth some central principles of the poetic art, and for insisting on the supreme importance of unity in a work of art as contrasted with scattered brilliancies and beauties. The most remarkable new poems were the epic episode 'Sohrab and Rustum,' derived from Ferdusi's 'Shah Nameh,' and the beautiful 'Scholar-Gipsy,' suggested by Glanvill's story of an Oxford student who quitted his studies to join himself to the crew of outlandish wanderers. The landscape of Oxfordshire and of the Thames valley is rendered in the latter of these poems with exquisite feeling 'Sohrab and Rustum,' the story of a great chieftain who slays his son in single combat, each unknown to the other until the fatal wound has been given, is written in blank verse of sustained dignity, and is inspired by a passion ite pathos, rare in this passionate quality among the poems of Arnold. In a second series of Poems, published in 1855, was included an epic treatment of a fragment of Norse mythology, 'Balder Dead' Balder, beloved of the gods, has been undesignedly slain by the blind Hoder, the adventurous efforts to recover Balder from the realm of the dead make up the main part of the narrative. It was impossible to give the subject, which strains the power of imaginative belief without always supporting it, an interest equal to that of 'Sohrab and Rustum'

After his thirty-third year Arnold's stream of poetry, from the first pure rather than affluent, dwindled, but in Merope (1858) he made a sustained and deliberate effort, which in its design was admirable His purpose, as he tells his reader in an interesting preface, was to try how much of the effectiveness of the poetical forms of Greek tragedy he could retain in an English poem con structed under the conditions of those forms story of Merope was not ill chosen, it had been handled in drama by Maffei and by Alfieri in Italy, by Voltaire in France. Æpytus, the son of Merope, avenges, after many years have passed, the murder of his royal father upon the tyrant Polyphontes, the situations are impressive, the characters, in the hands of a true dramatic poet, might be of deep and tragic interest. But Matthew Arnold's poem is constructed, not inspired, it lacks life, it is a death-mask, not without a certain dignity, taken from the face of Greek trigedy. The rhyme less choruses are often equally devoid of spirit and of tone

In 1867 appeared New Poems, Arnold's last considerable gift to the admirers of his poetry And the contents of the volume were not all 'new,' for it reprinted the early 'Empedocles on Etna' and other pieces from among those of 1852. Yet of the new poems some were unsurpassed by any earlier work of their author 'Thyrsis,' a monody to commemorate Arthur Hugh Clough, is perfect in its classical grace and its association of personal feeling with the loveliness of English landscape. If we receive no impression of Clough's character from it, neither do we learn much respecting Edward King from Milton's Lycidas 'A Southern Night' laments the loss of the writer's brother, who died on his way home from India 'Rugby Chanel' is a noble characterisation of the poet's fither, and of his special services to the world 'Heine's Grave' is the poetry of criticism, but the image of England as the 'Weiry Litan' riscs to something higher than this. The deep-thoughted and pathetic 'Stanzas from the Grande Chartreuse' had appeared in Frasir's Magazine as early as With this volume Matthew Arnold's period of poetical creation may be said to have closed, but at rare intervals in later years some piece of verse appeared which proved that he still possessed the inspiration and the accomplishment of song In 1882 his 'Westminster Abbey,' to write which he was inoved by the burnl of Dean Stanley in the Abber, showed that his power as a poet, at least in moments of deep feeling, was not abated

As a poet, Matthew Arnold's chief masters were the Greek epic, dramatic, and elegiac writers-Goethe, Wordsworth But Goethe lind a higher spirit of wisdom and Wordsworth had a higher Arnold luinself described spirit of joy than he poetry as a criticism of life, assuredly from his own poetry a body of such criticism can be derived, and it is sometimes criticisin which may be questioned or gainsaid. Through many of his more intimate personal poems runs the contrast between the life whose springs are inward, of the soul, and the life of division and distraction, of fever and unrest, which is drawn hither and thither by the influences of the world, its pleasures and passions, its business, greeds, ambitions, casual attractions, conflicting opinions, and trivial cares and strifes -drawn hither and thither by these, and not by these alone, but also by all the various objects that claim our purer sympathies from day to day, and the various intellectual lights and cross lights that lead us or mislead us away from the true objects of the soul Especially in these latter days of ours, when no dominant faith or doctrine of life imposes itself on the minds of men, when there is around us a chaos of creeds, and when men lie open through their finer intellectual sensitiveness to so many diverse influences, it is difficult to find one's true way

To lose one's soul means for Matthew Arnold to live a life without unity, a life of cares, hopes, fears, desires, opinions, business, passions which arise and wane with the accidents of each successive day and hour To live too fast, to be perpetually harassed, to be dulled by toil, to be made wild with passion, to adapt ourselves to every view of trutli in turn and never to see truth with lucidity and as a whole, to yield to the chance allurements of the time and place and never to possess our souls before we die-this is the condition of many of us, especially in these days of crowded and hurrying action, these days of moral trouble and spiritual doubt, and it is no better than a death On the other hand, to be self poised and in life harmonious, to 'see life steadily and see it whole,' to escape from the torment of conflicting desires, to gain a high serenity, a wide and luminous view -this is the rare attainment of chosen spirits and the very life of life. How may the evil be avoided? -how may the good be reached and held fast? Not by any external aids, replies Matthew Arnold, not by any outward machinery of life, not by creeds that fail and philosophies that fade and pass away, not thus, but by insight and by moral vigour, by rullying the good in the depths of ourselves-

The aids to noble life are all within

Such is Arnold's stoical moral teaching, and the experience of mankind in all ages declares that through action, through passion, are we educated, and that the aids to noble life are not all, are not chiefly, within But the 'eriticism of life' in his poems served his generation by presenting with a sad fidelity certain of its moral and spiritual troubles, and by suggesting some palliatives of its pain His touch cannot heal, but in some degree it fortifies and it consoles Arnold's melancholy and his resistance to that melancholy appear only in his verse. As a prose writer, while he is at heart serious, his temper is buoyant, his spirit is high, his intellectual confidence is entire, he has charming airs of authority or condescension, and can employ with a grave purpose mockery, banter, irony But setting aside the remarkable prefaces to two volumes of poetry, as a prose writer he was unknown until 1859, when his pamplilet, England and the Italian Question, appeared In 1857 he was elected to the professorship of Poetry, Oxford, and was re elected for a term of five years in 1862 Towards the close of his first term of office was published a slender volume, three lectures On Translating Homer, to which a fourth lecture, On Translating Homer Làst Words (1862), formed a kind of appendix. This is an admirable piece of criticism, for Matthew Arnold knew Homer well, felt the special qualities of Homer's genius, and had an adequate acquaintance with the English translations with which he deals The test of a good translation will be found in the answer to the question, 'Is it acceptable to scholars?' And scholars will before all else require that a translation should be penetrated by certain Homeric qualities-Homer is eminently rapid, he is eminently plain and direct, both in the substance of his thought and its expression, he is eminently noble. Homer's style is indeed 'the grand style,' which arises in poetry 'when a noble nature, poetically gifted, treats with simplicity or with severity a serious subject.' application of these principles to the translations of Chapman, Pope, Cowper, and more recent writers is full of detailed instruction, but Arnold arrives in the close at the strange conclusion that the happiest medium for Homeric translation is the English liexameter, a conclusion which is by no means reinforced by ineffective examples from his own hand

The lectures On the Study of Celtic Literature, delivered in 1866, and, after publication in the Cornhill Magazine, collected into a volume in 1867, form a work which is full of interesting views and stimulating thought, but it is not, and could not be, a work of authority Here Arnold wrote: as an ingenious amateur, but without more than a superficial acquaintance with his subject. The book illustrates in a striking way the weaker sidel of its author's criticism of literature He censured the English criticism of the early part of the nine teenth century because it did not know enough, but this was precisely his own defect. His own ideas are always interesting and are often valuable, and he plays with these, hovering above his subject, but he does not always possess his subject It is not merely that his scholarship is insufficient, he lacks that patient receptivity which is the condition of adequate criticism. He wrote on Celtie literature, and knew too little to write He attempted Biblical criticism, as a master and his scholarship was painfully inadequate wrote essays on French literature which are full of charm, but he does not seem to have known a French literature sufficiently, or to have had a feeling for what is best and most characteristic in it, and his good fortune was that he relied much upon so prinstaking a guide as Sainte Beuve But all that he possessed he animated with his own delightful intellectual vitality In each province of criticism he contributed illuminating ideas he had not adequate knowledge, he had fine instincts, and a virida vis which in itself is of high worth And this volume on Celtic literature is not only written in the happiest temper, but lights up his subject with inspiring thoughts which do not always accompany a more thorough scholarship than his It pleads for a sympathetic spirit and a spirit of sanity in the study of things Celtic, endeavours to determine the character of the Celtic genius-'sentiment, with love of beauty, charm, and spirituality for its excellence, ineffectualness and self-will for its defect,' and makes interesting conjectures as to the elements contributed by the Celtic genius to the literature of England.

(The Essays in Criticism published in 1865, and somewhat enlarged in subsequent editions, is perhaps the most fruitful in ideas and the happiest in its choice of subjects of all his prose writings. It urged the need of literary criticism, disinterested in spirit and well informed, as a real and important need of the time. It uttered a warning in the cssay on 'Academies' against provinciality in thought and in style, and pleaded for a culture which should be of the centre \ The study of Maurice de Guerin assigned that minor writer too high a rank, but it was an occasion for expounding Arnold's own thoughts on the interpretative power of poetry by virtue of 'natural magic' or 'moral profundity' That of Heine presented him less as a poet or a wit than as a gallant soldier in the war of intel The contrast between pagan lectual liberation and medieval religious sentiment, as seen in Theocritus and in St Francis, showed the breadth of Arnold's sympathics To Joubert, viewed as a French Coleridge, an importance was given which was out of proportion to his actual claims the essay on Spinoza, though it dealt slightly with that great thinker, dealt rightly as far as it went, hand that on Marcus Aurelius was written as if 'Arnold-which was rare-had fully possessed his Some caprices of opinion showed that the writer was not himself always at the centre, some vivacities of utterance, here and elsewhere, showed that his good taste was not infallible, but the spirit of partisanship was notably absent, and the style was delightfully animated without the aid of rhetorical heightening Seldom had a volume of critical studies appeared in which the play of idens was so stimulating or so graceful

During these years Arnold contributed largely as a specialist—but a specialist who was also a humanist possessed by liberal views-to the litera ture of education In 1859 he acted as an Assistant Commissioner on Education in investigating the systems of instruction on the Continent, and again he went abroad with a like purpose in 1865 works as his Popular Education in France (1861), A French Lion (1864), Schools and Universities on the Continent (1868), and the Reports on Elementary Schools, collected after his death and edited by Sir F Sandford, can hardly be said to enter into general literature, yet they were important aids to English culture The remarkable Introduction to the first of these volumes, afterwards reprinted in Mixed Essays with the title 'Democracy,' pleaded on behalf of a high ideal in matters of education to be maintained by the action of the State.

That Introduction involved some criticism-on English society, to the defects of which Arnold To point out those defects and was keenly alive suggest possible remedies seemed to him to be the truest form of patriotism Such criticism widened its scope, and touched on politics as well as manners and morals, in the volume entitled in 1869 from the Cornhill Magazine Arnold honed little from institutions and external machinery as serving the cause of social development, though \( \ell \) one institution, the Church of England, he valued. highly as an organisation for the promotion of 'goodness' He desired in this volume to reach something deeper than institutions. It was a plea for 'culture' as the great help out of our present difficulties, 'culture being a pursuit of our total perfection by means of getting to know, on all matters which most concern us, the best that has been thought and said in the world, and through this knowledge, turning a stream of fresh and free thought upon our stock notions and liabits, which we now follow strunchly but mechanically? culture is an inward operation, and its resultsexpressed in words borrowed from Dean Swiftare, above all else, 'sweetness and light.' Our aristocracy, whom Arnold names 'the Barbarians,' are materialised, our middle class, the 'Philistines,' are vulgarised, our populace is brut dised, and with each class the pursuit of our total perfection is unthought of and almost unknown Civilisation, as the later essay on 'Equality' explains, advances along several lines, it proceeds by the power of intellect and science by the power of beauty, by the power of social life and manners, by the power of conduct. The Hebraism of the English char acter has taken conduct, which is three fourths of life, into its charge, but were it not well if this Hebraism entered into an alliance with that more liberal conception of human perfection at which Hellenism aims? In all this there was, indeed, nothing new, the same doctrine land been set forth for Germany by Goethe, but Arnold's preaching was timely, and though his panacea of 'culture' provoked not a few sceptical smiles, he served the cause of true progress by turning, to repeat his own words, a stream of free thought upon our stock notions and habits Friendshift's Garland (1871), a little volume the greater part of which had appeared as letters in the Pall Mall Gazette (1866-70), may be regarded as a sequel, gay but serious, to the graver attack on Philistinism, and especially on Philistinism in alliance with Arnold's friends the political Liberals, of Culture and Anarchy Here he is a slinger of stones at Goliath, and some of the missiles are skilfully aimed An ininginary Arminius von Thunder-ten-Tronckli is the critic of English society The book is wittily in earnest, but the persifinge is sometimes excessive or a little too obvious, and while the volume deserved to be republished as an exposition of Arnold's thought and an example of his raillery, judicious readers will hardly censure the writer for declining to permit its republication during his lifetime.

With St Paul and Protestantism (1870) opened a series of writings in which Matthew Arnold aspired to play the part of a critic of religion and of the Bible. Its object was to deliver the spiritual teaching of St Paul, as Arnold conceived Culture and Anarchy, made up of articles collected | this, from the accretions of dogma, and especially

Puritan, Calvinistic, and 'Evangelical' dogma, with which it had been encrusted 'The three essential terms of Pauline theology,' he writes, 'are not as popular theology makes them calling, justification, sanctification, but are rather these dying with Christ, resurrection from the dead, growing unto Christ'-which words he would interpret in a way differing widely from the interpretation of the Churches Religion he understood as morality touched with enthusiasm, God he understood as the stream of tendency in thoughts and things which makes for righteousness. The Hebrusm that was in him made him feel the supreme importance of preserving religion, his Hellenism compelled him to turn a fresh stream of thought—as he believed—on the current notions of religion In Literature and Dogma (1873) and God and the Bible (1875) he continued to pour new wine into old bottles, and old wine into new bottles, and to some readers, although Matthew Arnold was never more serious, it looked too like n juggler's trick. To deliver religion from false accretions—this was a noble aim, to urge that the Bible should be read as literature rather than as a storehouse of texts for the elaboration of dogma -this too was legitimate and was desirable. But Matthew Arnold was not qualified by knowledge for trustworthy criticism of the Bible, and the singular thing was that by applying literary tact to the interpretation of the Bible, he arrived at results which no disinterested critic, regarding the Bible merely as literature, could accept as approximating to the actual meanings of the writers. He found in the sacred writings what he desired to find, precisely as did the popular and dogmatic interpreters whom he condemned The series of writings on religion was closed by editions of the authorised version of Is unh, the work of one who, as a Hebraist, was not well equipped for his task, and by Last Essays on Church and Religion (1877), which included an elaborate but far from trustworthy criticism of Bishop Butler The value of these writings lies in Arnold's deep feeling for the ethical side of religion, his deep sense of what is beautiful in character and admirable in conduct

In Mixed Essays (1879) Arnold returned to literature, but politics divides the volume with The essay on Lucius Cary, Lord Falk land, and that on George Sand have the fine critical discernment of the writer's earlier studies, ind more warmth of feeling than is always present in what he wrote, two essays of much inferior interest reported the opinions of Scherer on Milton and on Goethe, with comments of Arnold's own The politics of Arnold consisted largely in the presentation of high ideals to British Liberalism, and the rebuke of the actual Liberal party which the presentation of such ideals involved pleaded especially for the spirit of amiability as well as the spirit of justice in the treatment of Here his master was Edinund Burke. from whose writings he compiled a volume of selections But as to the actual forces in contemporary Ireland, Arnold did not take the pains to inform himself aright Irish Issays, and Others (1882), attempt to indicate how England and English civilisation may be made attractive to Ireland. The critic did not sufficiently grasp the fact that common interests, and, among these, interests of a material kind, are the suiest bonds between peoples under a common government. But all that he has written is generously conceived and of a high intention.

In 1883-84 Matthew Arnold visited Americans a lecturer, and as a lecturer, partly owing to the ineffectiveness of his delivery, he was not successful. The Discourses in America (1885) are three—an appreciation of Emerson, a plea for the humanities in culture and education, and a discourse entitled 'Numbers,' which declares that the salvation of society in every country depends upon the mirrority, the little 'remnant' of those who are good—that in countries of small population this remnant is impotent, but that the numbers of America justify a hope that there the remnant may be efficient against the evil majority

In 1886 Arnold resigned his position as an inspector of schools. Through the influence of Gladstone, whom he had not regarded as a friend, he received a pension 'as a public recognition of service to the poetry and literature of England' But the end was now at hand. On 15th April 1888, while in Liverpool, he died of heart disease, and almost in a moment. The place of burnal was Lalcham, his place of birth

A second series of Essays in Criticism (1888) was brought together after Arnold's death included studies of Wordsworth and of Byron pre viously prefixed to volumes of Selections which he had made, an essay on the Study of Poetry, short articles on Gray and Keats contributed to Mr Ward's Lughsh Poets, a review suggested by the Life of Shulley, and other contributions to periodicals Several of these are rich in wise thought, but Arnold's ethical feeling for literature preponderates unduly over his feeling for beauty volumes of his Letters, published in 1895, exhibit his character in a most amiable light in all his domestic relations, he is not, however, among the great letter writers of England, his judgments of public persons are often unjust, and his anticipations of the course of public events are often strangely erroneous Yet the Letters bring us into a happy intimacy with Arnold His gifts in prose and verse to our literature are enlianced in value by our knowledge of a noble character and a life devoted to high ideals.

The Death of Sohrab

He spoke, and Sohrab smiled on him, and took The spear, and drew it from his side, and eased His wound's imperious anguish, but the blood Came welling from the open gash, and life Flow'd with the stream, -all down his cold white side The crimson torrent ran, dim now and soil'd, Like the soil'd tissue of white violets Left, freshly gather'd, on their native bank, By children whom their nurses call with haste Indoors from the sun's eye, his head droop d low, His limbs grew slack, motionless, white he lay-White, with eyes closed only when heavy gasps, Deep heavy gasps quivering through all his frame, Convulsed him back to life, he open d them, And fix d them feebly on his father s face, Till now all strength was ebb'd, and from his limbs Unwillingly the spirit fled away, Regretting the warm mansion which it left, And youth, and bloom, and this delightful world So, on the bloody sand, Sohrab lay dead And the great Rustum drew his horseman's cloak Down o'er his face, and sate by his dead son As those black granite pillars, once high rear'd By Jemshid in Persepolis, to bear His house, now 'mid their broken flights of steps Lie prone, enormous, down the mountain side -So in the sand lay Rustum by his son. And night came down over the solemn waste,

And night came down over the solemn waste,
And the two gazing hosts, and that sole pair,
And darken'd all, and a cold fog, with night,
Crept from the Oxus. Soon a hum arose,
As of a great assembly loosed, and fires
Began to twinkle through the fog, for now
Both armies moved to camp, and took their ineal,
The Persians took it on the open sands
Southward, the Tariars by the river marge,
And Rustum and his son were left alone.

But the majestic river floated on,
Ont of the mist and hum of that low land,
Into the frosty starlight, and there moved,
Rejoicing, through the hush'd Chorasmian waste,
Under the solitary moon,—he flow d
Right for the polar star, past Orgunic, Brimming, and bright, and large, then sands begin
To hem his watery march, and dam his streams,
And split his currents, that for many a league
The shoth, and parcell'd Oxus strains along Through beds of sand and matted rushy isles—Oxus, forgetting the bright speed he had
In his high mountain cradle in Pamere,
A foil d circuitous wanderer—till at last

The long'd for dash of waves is heard, and wide

His luminous home of waters opens, bright And tranquil, from whose floor the new bathed stars Emerge, and shine upon the Aral Sea.

Dover Beach.

The sea is calm to night

The tide is full, the moon lies fair

Upon the straits,—on the French coast the light Gleams and is gone, the chiffs of England stand, Glimmering and vast, out in the tranquil bay work
Come to the window, sweet is the night air toology, from the long line of spray

Where the sea meets the moon blanch'd land,
Listen to you hear the grating roar

Of pebbles which the waves draw back, and fling,
At their return, up the high strand,
Begin, and cease, and then again begin,
With tremulous cadence slow, and bring The eternal note of sadness in.

Sophocles iong ago
Heard it on the Ægæan, and it brought Into his mind the turbld ebb and flow
Of human misery, we Find also in the sound a thought,
Hearing it by this distant northern sea.
The sea of faith
Was once, too, at the full, and round earth's shore Lay like the folds of a bright girdle furl'd.
But now I only hear
Its melancholy, long, withdrawing roar,
Retreating to the breath
Of the night wind down the vast edges drear

And naked shingles of the world.

Ah, love, let us be true

To one another! for the world, which seems To lle before us like a land of dreams,
So various, so beantiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light.
Nor certitude, nor peace, nor help for pain
And we are here as on a darkling plain Swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight.
Where ignorant armies clash by night.

The Song of Callicles.

Far, far from here, The Adriatic breaks in n warm bay Among the green Illy rian hills, and there The sunshine in the happy glens is fair, And by the sea, and in the brakes. The grass is cool, the seaside nir Buoyant and fresh, the mountain flowers More virginal and sweet than ours. And there, they say, two bright and aged snakes, Who once were Cadmus and Harmonm, 12 Bask in the glens or on the warm sea shore, In breathless quiet, after all their ills , \ - 5 Nor do they see their country, nor the place Where the Sphinx lived among the from ning hills, Nor the unhappy palace of their race, & Nor Thebes, nor the Ismenus, any more.

There those two live, far in the Illyrian brakes!
They had stay'd long enough to see,
In Thebes, the billow of calamit!
Over their own dear children roll'd,

Curse upon curse, pang upon pung, For years, they sitting helpless in their home, A grey old mun and woman, yet of old The Gods had to their marriage come, And at the banquet all the Muses sung

Therefore they did not end their days
In sight of blood, but were rapt, far away,
To where the west wind plays,
And murmurs of the Adriatic come
To those untrodden mountain lawns, and there Placed safely in changed forms, the pair
Wholly forget their first sad life, and home,
And all that Thelain woe, and stray
For ever through the glens, placid and dumb

From 'Thyrsis'

It ink'd him to be here, he could not rest.

He loved each simple joy the country yields,
He loved his mates, but yet he could not keep,
For that a shadow lower'd on the fields,
Here with the shepherds and the silly sheep
Some life of men unblest
He knew, which made him droop, and fill'd his head
He went, his piping took a troubled sound
Of storms that rage ontside our happy ground,
He could not wait their passing, he is dead

So, some tempestious morn in early June,
When the year's primal burst of bloom is o'er,
Before the roses and the longest day—
When garden walks and all the grassy floor
With blossoms red and white of fullen May
And chestinit flowers are strewn—
So have I heard the cuckoo's parting ery,
I rom the wet field, through the vext garden trees,
Come with the volleying rain and tossing breeze
The bloom is gone, and with the bloom go I!

Too quick despairer, wherefore wilt thou go?
Soon will the high Midsummer points come on,
Soon will the musk carnations break and swell,
Soon shall we have gold dusted snapdragon,
Sweet-william with his homely cottage smell,
And stocks in fragrant blow,
Roses that down the alleys shine afar,
And open, jasmine muffled lattices,
And groups under the dreaming garden trees,
And the full moon, and the white evening star

He hearkens not! light comer, he is flown!
What matters it? next year he will return,
And we shall have him in the sweet spring days
With whitening hedges, and uncrumpling fern,
And blue bells trembling by the forest ways,
And seent of hay new mown
But Thyrsis never more we swains shall see,
See him come hade, and get a smoother read

See him come back, and cut a smoother reed, And blow a strain the world at last shall heed— For Time, not Corydon, hath conquer'd thee!

Alack, for Corydon no rival now!—
But when Sicilian shepherds lost a mate,
Some good survivor with his flute would go,
Piping a ditty sad for Bion's fate,
And cross the inpermitted ferry's flow,
And relax Pluto's brow,

And make leap up with joy the beauteous head Of Proscrpine, among whose crowned hair Are flowers first open'd on Sicilian ur, And flute his friend, like Orpheus, from the dead

Paganism.

I have said a great deal of harm of paganism, and, taking paganism to mean a state of things which it is commonly taken to mean, and which did really exist, no more harm than it well deserved Yet I must not end without reminding the reader that before this state of things appeared there was an epoch in Greek life-in pagan life-of the highest possible beauty and value. That epoch by itself goes far towards making Greece the Greece we mean when we speak of Greece—a country hardly less important to mankind than Judea. poetry of later paganism lived by the senses and under standing, the poetry of medieval Christianity lived by the heart and imagination But the main element of the modern spirit's life is neither the senses and understand ing, nor the heart and imagination, it is the imaginative reason. And there is a century in Greek life-the century preceding the Peloponnesian war, from about the year 530 to the year 430 B C - in which poetry made, it seems to me, the noblest, the most successful effort she has ever made as the priestess of the imaginative reason, of the element by which the modern spirit, if it would live right, has chiefly to live. Of this effort, of which the four great names are Simonides, Pindar, Æschylus, Sophoeles, I must rot now attempt more than the hare mention, but it is right, it is necessary, after all I have said, to indicate it. No doubt that effort was imperfect Perhaps everything, take it at what point in its exist ence you will, carries within itself the fatal law of its own ulterior development Perhaps, even of the life of Pindar's time, Pompen was the inevitable bourne. Perhaps the life of their beautiful Greece could not afford to its poets all that fullness of varied experience, all that power of emotion, which

> 'the heavy and the weary weight Of all this unintelligible world' affords the poet of after times Perhaps in Sophoeles the thinking power a little overbalances the religious sen e, as in Dante the religious sense overbalances the thinking The present has to make its own poetry, and not even Sophoeles and his compeers, any more than Dante and Shakspeare, are enough for it That I will not dispute, nor will I set up the Greel poets, from Pindar to Soplioeles, as objects of blind worship no other poets so well show to the poetry of the present the way it must take, no other poets have lived so much by the imaginative reason, no other poets have made their work so well balanced, no other poets, who have so well satisfied the thinking power, have so well satisfied the religious sense

'Oh! that my lot may lead me in the path of holy innocence of word and deed, the path which august laws ordain, laws that in the highest empyrein had their birth, of which Heaven is the father alone, neither did the race of mortal men beget them, nor shall oblivion ever put them to sleep. The power of God is mighty in them, and groweth not old '

Let St Francis—nay, or Luther either—beat that!

The English Mind

What are the essential characteristics of the spirit of our nation? Not, certainly, an open and clear mind, not a quick and flexible intelligence. Our greatest admirers would not claim for us that we have these in a pre eminent degree, they might say that we had more of them than our detractors gave us credit for, but they would not assert They would them to be our essential characteristics rather allege, as our chief spiritual characteristics, energy and honesty, and, if we are judged favourably and positively, not invidiously and negatively, our chief clirrac teristics are, no doubt, these energy and honesty, not an open and clear mind, not a quick and flexible intelligence Openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence were very signal characteristics of the Athenian people in ancient times, everybody will feel that Openness of mind and flexibility of intelligence are remarkable characteristics of the French people in modern times, at any rate, they strikingly characterise them as compared with us, I think everybody, or almost everybody, will feel that I will not now ask what more the Athenian or the French spirit has than this, nor what shortcomings either of them may have as a set off against this all I want now to point out is that they have this, and that we have it in a much lesser degree

Let me remarl, however, that not only in the moral sphere, but also in the intellectual and spiritual sphere, energy and honesty are most important and fruitful qualities, that, for instance, of what we call genius energy So by assigning to a nation is the most essential part energy and honesty as its chief spiritual characteristicsby refusing to it as at all eminent characteristics, open ness of mind and flexibility of intelligence-we do not by any means, as some people might at first suppose, relegate its importance and its power of manifesting itself with effect from the intellectual to the moral sphere. We only indicate its probable special line of successful activity in the intellectual sphere, and, it is true, certain imperfections and failings to which, in this sphere it will always be subject. Genius is mainly an affair of energy, and poetry is mainly an affair of genius, therefore, a nation whose spirit is characterised by energy may well be eminent in poetry,—and we have Shakspeare the highest reach of science is, one may say, an inventive power, a faculty of divination, akin to the highest power exercised in poetry, therefore, a nation whose spirit is characterised by energy may well be eminent in science, Shakspeare and Newton in -and we have Newton the intellectual sphere there can be no higher names. And what that energy, which is the life of genius, above everything demands and insists upon is freedom, entire independence of all authority, prescription, and routinethe fullest room to expand as it will. Therefore, a nation whose chief spiritual characteristic is energy will not be very apt to set up, in intellectual matters, a fixed standard an authority, like an academy By this it certainly escapes certain real inconveniences and dangers, and it can, at the same time, as we have seen, reach undeniably splendid heights in poetry and science On the other hand, some of the requisites of intellectual work are specially the affur of quickness of mind and flexibility of intelligence The form, the method of evolution, the precision, the proportions, the relations of the parts to the whole, in an intellectual work, depend mainly upon them And these are the elements of an intellectual work which are really most communicable from it, which can most be learned and adopted from it, which have, therefore, the greatest effect upon the intellectual performance of others in poetry these requisites are very important, and the poetry of a nation, not eminent for the gifts on which they depend, will, more or less, suffer by this short coming In poetry, however, they are, after all, secon dary, and energy is the first thing, but in prose they are of first rate importance. In its prose literature, there fore, and in the routine of intellectual work generally, a nation with no particular gifts for these will not be so These are what, as I have said, can to a successful certain degree be learned and appropriated, while the free activity of genius cannot Academies consecrate and maintain them, and, therefore, a nation with an eminent turn for them naturally establishes academies So far as routine and authority tend to embarrass energy and inventive genius, academies may be said to be obstructive to energy and inventive genius, and, to this extent, to the human spirit's general advance But then this evil is so much compensated by the propagation on a large scale, of the mental aptitudes and demands which an open mind and a flexible intelligence naturally engender, genius itself, in the long run, so greatly finds its account in this propagation, and bodies like the French Academy have such power for promoting it, that the general advance of the human spirit is perhaps, on the whole, rather furthered than impeded by their existence (From 'The Literary Influence of Academies in

The Celtic Genius

Sentimental—always reads to react against the despetism of fact, that is the description which a great friend of the Celt gives of him. And it is not a bad description of the sentimental temperament, it lets us into the secret of its dangers and of its liabitual want of success. Balance, measure, and patience these are the eternal conditions, even supposing the happiest temperamen to start with, of high success, and bilance, measure, and patience are just what the Celt has never had Even in the world of spiritual creation he has never, in spite of his admirable gifts of quick perception and warm emotion, succeeded perfectly, because he never has had steadiness, patience, sanity enough to comply with the conditions under which alone can expression be perfectly given to the finest perceptions and emotions. The Greek has the same perceptive, emotional tempera ment as the Celt, but he adds to this temperament the sense of measure, hence his admirable success in the plastic arts, in which the Celtic genius, with its chafing against the despotism of fact, its perpetual straining after mere emotion, has accomplished nothing. In the eomparatively petty art of ornamentation, in rings, brooches, crossers, relic cases, and so on, he has done just enough to show his delicacy of taste, his happy temperament, but the grand difficulties of painting and sculpture, the prolonged dealings of spirit with matter, he has never had patience for Take the more spiritual arts of music and poetry All which emotion alone can do in music the Celt has done, the very soul of emotion breathes in the Scotch and Irish airs, but with all this power of musical feeling, what has the Celt, so eager for emotion that he has not patience for science, effected in music, to be compared with what the less emotional German, stendily developing his musical feeling with the science of a Sebistian Bach or a Beethoven, has effected? In poetry, again-poetry which the Celt has so passionately, so nobly loved, poetry where emotion counts for so much, but where reason, too, reason, measure, sanity, also count for so much-the Celt has shown genius, indeed, splendid genius, but even here his faults have clung to him, and have hindered him from producing great works such as other nations with a genius for poetry—the Greeks, say, or the Italians -have produced The Celt has not produced great poetical works, he has only produced poetry with an air of greatness investing it all, and sometimes giving, moreover, to short pieces, or to passages, lines, and snatches of long pieces, singular beauty and power And yet he loved poetry so much that he grudged no pains to it, but the true art, the architectonice which shapes great works, such as the Agamemnon or the Divine Comedy comes only after a steady, deep searching survey, a firm conception of the facts of human life, which the Celt has not patience for So he runs off into technie, where he employs the utmost elaboration, and attains astonishing skill, but in the contents of his poetry you have only so much inter pretation of the world as the first dash of a quick, strong perception, and then sentiment, infinite sentiment, can bring you Here, too, his want of samty and steadfastness has kept the Celt back from the highest success

If his rebellion against fact has thus lamed the Celt even in spiritual work, how much more must it have lamed him in the world of business and politics. The skilful and resolute appliance of means to ends which is needed both to make progress in material civilisation, and also to form powerful states, is just what the Celt has least turn for He is sensual, or at least sensuous, loves bright colours, company, and pleasure, and here he is like the Greel and Latin races But compare the talent the Greek and Latin (or Latinised) races have shown for gratifying their senses, for procuring an out ward life rich, luxurious, splendid, with the Celt's failure to reach any material civilisation sound and satisfying, and not out at elbows, poor, slovenly, and half bar The sensuousness of the Greek made Sybaris and Corinth, the sensuousness of the Latin made Rome and Bare, the sensuousness of the Latinised Frenchman makes Pans, the sensuousness of the Celt proper has Even in his ideal herole times, his gay made Ireland and sensuous nature cannot carry him, in the appliances of his favourite life of sociability and pleasure, beyond the gross and creeping Saxon whom he despises, the regent Breas, we are told in the Battle of Mostura of the Fomorians, became unpopular because 'the knives of his people were not greased at his table, nor did their breath smell of ale at the banquet ' In its grossness and barbarousness is not that Saxon, as Saxon as it can be? -- just what the Latinised Norman, sensuous and sociable like the Celt, but with the talent to make this bent of his serve to a practical embellishment of his mode of living, found so disgusting in the Saxon

And as in material civilisation he has been ineffectual, so has the Celt been ineffectual in politics. This colossal, impetuous, adventurous wanderer, the Titan of the early world, who in primitive times fills so large a place on earth's scene, dwindles and dwindles as history goes on, and at last is shrunk to what we now see him. For ages and ages the world has been constantly slipping, ever more and more, out of the Celt's grasp. 'They went forth to the war,' Ossian says most truly, 'but they always fell'

Philistines and Barbarians

The same desire for clearness, which has led me thus to extend a little my first analysis of the three great classes of English society, prompts me also to make my nomen elature for them a little fuller, with a view to making it thereby more clear and manageable. It is awkward and tiresome to be always saying the aristocratic class, the middle class, the working class. For the middle class. for that great body which, as we know, 'has done all the great things that have been done in all departments,' and which is to be conceived as chiefly moving between its two cardinal points of Mr Bazley and the Rev W Cattle, but inclining, in the mass, rather towards the latter than the former-for this class we have a designation which now has become pretty well known, and which we inty as well still keep for them, the designation of Philistines What this term means I have so often explained that I need not repeat it here. For the anstocratic class, conceived mainly as a body moving between the two cardinal points of Lord Eleho and Sir Thomas Bateson, but as a whole nearer to the latter than the former, we have as yet got no special designation my attention has naturally been concentrated on my own class, the middle class, with which I am in closest sympathy, and which has been, besides, the great power of our day, and has had its praises sung by all speakers and newspapers Still, the aristocratic class is so im portant in itself, and the weighty functions which Mr Carlyle proposes at the present critical time to commit to it must add so much to its importance, that it seems neglectful, and a strong instance of that want of coherent philosophic method for which Mr Frederic Harrison blames me, to leave the aristocratic class so much without notice and denomination. It may be thought that the characteristic which I have occasionally mentioned as proper to anstocracies—their natural inaecessibility, as children of the established fact, to ideas-points to our extending to this class also the designation of Philistines, the Philistine being, as is well known, the enemy of the children of light, or servants of the idea Nevertheless. there seems to be an inconvenience in thus giving one and the same designation to two very different classes, and besides, if we look into the thing closely, we shall find that the term Philistine conveys a sense which makes it more peculiarly appropriate to our middle class than to our aristocratic. For Philistine gives the notion of some thing particularly stiff necked and perverse in the resist ance to light and its children, and therein it specially suits our middle class, who not only do not pursue sweetness and light, but who prefer to them that sort of machinery of business, chapels, ten meetings, and addresses from Mr Murphy and the Rev W Cattle, which makes up the dismal and illiberal life on which I have so often But the aristoeratic class has actually, as we have seen, in its well known politeness, a kind of image or shadow of sweetness, and as for light, if it does not pursue light, it is not that it perversely cherishes some dismal and illiberal existence in preference to light, but it is seduced from following light by those mighty and eternal seducers of our race which weave for this class their most irresistible charms-by worldly splendour, security, power and pleasure. These seducers are exterior goods, but they are goods, and he who is hindered by them from caring for light and ideas is not so much doing what is perverse as what is natural

Keeping this in view, I have in my own mind often indulged myself with the fancy of putting side by side with the idea of our aristocratic class, the idea of the Barbarians The Barbarians, to whom we all owe so much, and who reinvigorated and renewed our worn out Europe, had, as is well known, emment merits, and in this country, where we are for the most part sprung from the Barbarians, we have never had the prejudice against them which prevails among the races of Latin origin The Barbarians brought with them that staunch indi vidualism, as the modern phrase is, and that passion for doing as one likes, for the assertion of personal liberty, which appears to Mr Bright the central idea of English life, and of which we have, at my rate, a very rich The stronghold and natural seat of this passion was in the nobles of whom our aristocratic class are the inheritors, and this class, accordingly, have signally manifested it, and have done much by their example to recommend it to the body of the nation, who already, indeed, had it in their blood. The Barbarians, again, had the passion for field sports, and they have handed it on to our aristocratic class, who of this passion too, as of the passion for asserting one's personal liberty, are the great natural stronghold. The care of the Bar barians for the body, and for all manly excreises, the vigour, good looks, and fine complexion which they acquired and perpetuated in their families by these means-all this may be observed still in our aristo The chivalry of the Barbarians, with cratic class. its characteristics of high spirit, choice manners, and distinguished bearing-what is this but the beautiful commencement of the politeness of our aristocratic class? In some Barbarian noble, no doubt, one would have admired, if one could have been then alive to see it, the rudiments of Lord Ilcho Only, all this eulture (to call it by that name) of the Barbarians was it consisted principally an exterior culture mainly in outward gifts and graces, in looks, manners, accomphshments, prowess, the chief inward gifts which had purt in it were the most exterior, so to speak, of inward gifts, those which come nearest to outward ones they were courage, a high spirit, self confidence. within, and unawakened, lay a whole range of powers of thought and feeling, to which these interesting produc tions of nature had, from the eircumstances of their life, no access Making allowances for the difference of the times, surely we can observe precisely the same tling now in our aristocratic class. In general its culture is exterior chiefly, all the exterior graces and accomplish ments, and the more external of the inward virtues, seem to be principally its portion It now, of course, cannot but be often in contact with those studies by which, from the world of thought and feeling, true culture teaches us to fetch sweetness and light, but its hold upon these very studies appears remarkably external, and unable to exert any deep power upon its spirit Therefore the one insufficiency which we noted in the perfect mean of this elass, Lord Eleho, was an insufficiency of light owing to the same causes, does not a subtle enticism lead us to make, even on the good looks and politeness of our aristocratic class, the one qualifying remark, that in these charming gifts there should perhaps be, for ideal perfec tion, a shade more soul?

I often, therefore, when I want to distinguish clearly the anstocratic class from the Philistines proper, or middle class, name the former, in my own mind, the Barbarrans, and when I go through the country, and see this and that beautiful and imposing seat of theirs crowning the landscape, 'There,' I say to myself, '15 a great fortified post of the Barbarrans'

EDWARD DOWDEN

Frederick Locker-Lampson (1821-95) was born at Greenwich Hospital, of which his father was secretary and civil commissioner Educated at several private schools, he proved no very apt scholar, and in 1837 was placed in a Mineing Lane office, in 1841 he got a clerkship at Somerset House, and in 1842 a still more congenial post at the Admiralty About this time he developed a faculty for maling verses, somewhat after the manner of Praed, but it was not till, after his first marriage, he had quitted official life that he made his name widely known as a writer of unusually bright and clever vers de sociélé by his London Lyrics (1857), collected from the various papers in which they had appeared. This volume had before the end of the century been reprinted in British and America nearly a score of times, some of the editions living illustrations by Richard Doyle, George Cruikshank, and others It was supple mented by more London Lyrics in 1881 and by London Rhymes in 1882, both series privately printed The Rowfant Club in Cleveland, Ohio, US, published a volume of his later verses, called Rowfant Rhymes, in 1895, with a Preface by Mr Austin Dobson Mr Locker-Lampson published also two anthologies—Lina Elegantiarum (1867), described as 'a collection of some of the best social and occasional verse of deceased English authors,' and Patchwork (1879), a book of extracts In 1850 he married a daughter of the seventh Earl of Elgin, who died in 1872, and in 1874 the drughter of Sir Curtis Lampson, an American who settled in England as a director of the Atlantic Telegraph Company After his second marriage he lived mainly at his father-in-law's house of Rowfant, near East Grinstead in Susses, where he collected a famous library of Elizabethan and other rare books, and in 1885 he added the name of Lampson to his own My Confidences (1896) is autobiographical

To my Grandmother—Suggested by a Picture by Mr Romney

> Under the elm a rustic seat Was merriest Susai s pet retreat To merry-mike

This Relative of mine,
Was she seventy and nine
When she died?

By the canvas may be seen How she look'd at seventeen, As a Bride.

Beneath a summer tree
Her maiden revene
Has a charm,
Her ringlets are in taste,
What an arm! and what a waist
For an arm!

With her bridal wreath, bouquet, Lace furthingale, and gay Falbala—

If Romney's touch be true, What a lucky dog were you, Grandpapa!

Her hips are sweet as love,
They are parting 1 Do they move?
Are they dumb?
Her eyes are blue, and beam Beseechingly, and seem To say, 'Come'

What funny fancy slips
From atween these cherry lips?
Whisper me,
Fair Sorceress in print,
What canon says I mryn't Marry thee?

That good for nothing Time
Has a confidence sublime'
When I first Saw this Lady, in my youth,

Saw this Lady, in my youth, Her winters had, forsooth, Done their worst

Her locks, as white as snow,
Once shamed the swarthy crow,
By and by

That fowl's avenging sprite Set his cruel foot for spite Near her eye.

Her rounded form was lean, And her silk was bombazine, Well I wot

With her needles would she sit, And for hours would she knit— Would she not?

Ah perishable clay!
Her charms had dropt away
One by one
But if she heaved a sigh
With a burthen, it was, 'Thy Will he done.'

In travail, as in tears,
With the firdel of her years
Overprest,
In merey she was borne
Where the weary and the worn
Are at rest

O if you now are there,
And sveet as once you were,
Grandmamma,
This nether world agrees
You'll all the better please Grandpapa.

At her Window

Ah, minstrel, how strange is
The carol you sing!
Let Psyche who ranges
Ike garden of spring,
Remember the changes
December will bring

Beating Heart ' we come again Where my Love reposes This is Mabel's window pane, These are Mabel's roses.

Is she nested? Does she kneel
In the twilight stilly,
Lily clad from throat to heel,
She, my virgin Lily?

Soon the wan, the wistful stars, Fading, will forsake her, Elves of light, on beamy bars, Whisper then, and wal e her

Let this friendly pubble plead At her flowery grating, If she hear me will she heed? Mabel, I am waiting

Mabel will be deck'd anon,

Zoned in bride's apparel,

Happy zone! Oh hark to yon

Passion slinken caro!!

Sing thy song thou tranced thrush,
Pipe thy best, thy clearest,— Hush, her lattice moves, O hush—
Dearest Mabel!—dearest

Coventry Kersey Dighton Patmore (1823-96) was born at Woodford in Essex, the son of Peter George Patmore, who edited the Court Journal, 'read' for a publisher, contributed largely to the magazines, and wrote, besides other books, My Friends and Acquaintances (1854), three volumes of literary reminiscences boy, educated privately, had thoughts of taking orders, but naturally drifted into literary work, and in his twenty first year published a volume of narrative poems (1844) which were not too kindly Though bought up and destroyed ere a hundred and fifty copies had been sold, this publication secured for him the acquaintance of Rossetti, Woolner, and the pre Raphaelites 1846, through the friendly offices of Monckton Milnes (Lord Houghton), he obtained an appointment as an assistant librarian in the British Museum, and when he retired from the Museum in 1865, was within measurable distance of the headship in his department. He wrote for the Edinburgh Review, the North British, and other serials, contributed in 1850 two poems and a prose essay to the pre Raphaelite Germ, and in 1853 ventured once more to publish a volume of poems, Tamerton Church Tower, which contained revised versions of some of those that hall first appeared in 1844, and shows traces of the mysticism which bulked so largely in his later work. The acceptance this volume met with encouraged him to publish, but anonymously, in 1854 and 1856 (as The Bethrothal and The Esponsals), the first two sections of what is, under the name of The Angel in the House, by far his best known poem, to which were added in 1860 and 1863 Faithful for Ever and The Victories of Love In virtue of its sincere, tender, and exquisite presentation of holy domestic love, the Angel in the House was greeted with enthusiasm by the poet's friends, Tennyson, Ruskin, Browning, and

It was largely inspired by Patmore's beautiful and accomplished first wife, daughter of a Congregational minister, whom he Two years married in 1847, and who died in 1862 later Patmore entered the Roman Catholic com munion, and was followed by his three sons and three daughters, in 1865 he married a second time, and erelong bought an estate near Uckfield in Sussex, which he so improved as to be able to sell it for £27,000 Then he settled at Hastings, where, after the death of his second wife in 1880, he built a splendid Roman Catholic church The liome of his last years was at Lymington married a third time in 1881 i

The Unknown Eros, and other Odes (1877), was a collection of upwards of forty odes combining Catholic mysticism and fervent devotion, which in their elaborate rhythms sharply contrasted with the

His interests were many, but his sympathies, literary and other, far from

'Twas when the spousal time of May Hangs all the hedge with bridal wreaths, And air's so sweet the bosom gay Gives thanks for every breath it breathes, When like to like is gladly moved, And each thing joins in Spring's refrain, 'Let those love now who never loved, Let those who have loved love again,' That I, in whom the sweet time wrought, Lay stretch'd within a lonely glade, Abandon'd to delicious thought Beneath the softly twinkling shade The leaves, all stirring, munick'd well A neighbouring rush of rivers cold, And, as the sun or shadow fell, So these were green and those were gold, In dim recesses hyacinths droop'd, And breadths of primrose lit the air, Which, wandering through the woodland, stoop'd And gather'd perfumes here and there, Upon the spray the squirrel swung, And careless songsters, six or seven, Sing lofty songs the leaves among

Fit for their only listener, Heaven

The wedded light and heat, Winnowing the witless space,
Without a let,
What are they till they beat
Against the sleepy sod, and there beget Perchance the violet!
Is the One found,
Amongst a wilderness of as happy grace,

To make Heaven's bound, So that in Her All which it hath of sensitively good Is sought and understood After the narrow mode the mighty Heavens prefer? She, as a little breeze Following still Night, Ripples the spirit's cold, deep seas Into delight, But, in a while, The unmeasurable smile Is broke by fresher airs to flashes blent With darkling discontent, And all the subtle zephyr hurries gay, And all the heaving ocean heaves one way, T'ward the void sky line and an unguess'd weal, Until the vanward billows fee The agitating shallows, and divine the goal, And to foam roll, And spread and stray And traverse wildly, like delighted hands, The fair and fleckless sands, And so the whole Unfathomable and immense Triumphing tide comes at the last to reach And burst in wind kiss'd splendours on the deaf'ning Where forms of children in first innocence Laugh and fling pebbles on the rainbow'd erest Of its untired unrest.

The Year

(From The Unknown Eros)

The crocus, while the days are dark, Unfolds its suffron sheen, At April's touch, the crudest bark Discovers gems of green.

Then sleep the seasons, full of night,
While slowly swells the pod
And rounds the peach, and in the night
The mushroom bursts the sod

The Winter falls, the frozen rut
Is bound with silver bars,
The snow drift heaps against the hut,
And night is piere'd with stars.

In 1862 Patmore edited, with his first wife's help the anthology called The Children's Garland in 1877 he edited and largely supplemented his friend B W Procter's Antohography (page 227), and in 1884 edited the poems of his own son, Henry John Patmore (1865-83). Florilegium Anantis (1888) was a selection from his poems by Dr R. Garnett Poems of Pathos and Delight was another (1895) by Mrs Meynell In 1900 Mr Basil Champneys, who designed the memorial church at Brighton published a Life of Patmore in two volumes.

born at Crinford in Kent, whence his father, a wine merchant, removed that same year to London, and in 1835 to Cheltenham, with Gloucestershire and with his father's business Sydney's whole after-life was connected Under the influence of a sect of 'Freethinking Christians' founded by Samuel Thompson, his maternal grandfather, he developed a hothouse precocity, and at fifteen became engaged to the girl whom he married at twenty. He never quite recovered from a severe illness (1847), and the chief events of his life were visits to Switzerland, Scotland, Cannes, Spain, and Italy, in quest of health for himself or his wife. He died at Barton End House, among the Cotswold Hills His principal works are The Roman, a dramatic poem by 'Sydney Yendys' (1850), Balder, Part the First (1854), Sonnets on the War, written in conjunction with Alexander Smith (1855), and England in Time of War (1856) The first and the last had a success to wonder at For though some of his lyrics are pretty, though his fancy is sparkling and exuberant, his poems are often superfine, grandiose, transcendental, and save to unusually sympathetic readers, it seems that 'spasmodic' or some equivalent epithet does hit them off better than com parison either with Shelley or with Donne

The hoar unconscious walls, bisson and bare, Lake an old man deaf, blind, and gray in whom The years of old stand in the sun, and murmur Of childhood and the dead From parapets Where the sky rests, from broken niches-each More than Olympus—for gods dwelt in them— Below from senatorial haunts and seats Imperal, where the ever passing fates Wore out the stone, strange hermit birds eroaked forth Sorrowful sounds, like watchers on the height Crying the hours of ruin When the clouds Dressed every myrtle on the walls in mourning, With calm prerogative the eternal pile Impassive shone with the unearthly light When conquering suns Of immortality I riumphed in jubilant earth, it stood out dark With thoughts of ages like some mighty captive Upon his death bed in a Christian land, And lying, through the chant of psalm and creed, Unshriven and stern, with peace upon his brow, And on his lips strange gods

Rank weeds and grasses, Careless and nodding, grew, and asked no leave, Where Romans trembled Where the wreck was saddest, Sweet pensive herbs, that had been gay elsewhere, With conscious mien of place rose tall and still, And bent with duty Like some village children Who found a dead king on a battlefield, And with decorous care and reverent pity Composed the lordly ruin, and sat down Grave without tears At length the giant lay, And everywhere he was begirt with years, And everywhere the torn and mouldering Past For Time, smit with honour Hung with the ivy Of what he slew, cast his own mantle on him, That none should mock the dead. A dropt rose lying in my way,
A hutterfly that flutters gay
Athwart the noisy street,
I know the happy Snmmer smiles

Around the happy Summer smiles.

'Twere neither prean now, nor dirge,

The flash and thunder of the surge On flat sands wide and bare,

No haunting joy or anguish dwells. In the green light of sunny dells,

Or in the starry air
Alike to me the desert flower,
The runbow laughing o'er the shower

While o'er thy walls the darkness suls, I lean against the churchyard rails

Up in the midnight towers
The belfried spire, the street is dead,
I hear in silence overhead

The clang of iron hours
It moves me not—I know her tomb
Is yonder in the shapeless gloom

All raptures of this mortal breath, Solemnities of life and death,
Dwell in thy noise alone
Of me thou hast become a part—
Some kindred with my human heart
Lives in thy streets of stone,
For we have been familiar more Than galley slave and weary our

Besides Early Years of Alexander Smith (1869), by the Rev T Brisbane, there is a Memoir by Patricl Proctor Alexander prefixed to his Last Leaves (1869).

William Allingham (1824-89) was of English family, but was a native of Bally shannon in Donegal, where his fither managed a bank. There he was educated, and there at an early age he began to contribute to periodical literature. He became supervisor of Customs in his native place—

The kindly spot, the friendly town, where every one is known,

And not a face in all the place but partly seems my own, but removed in the same service to England, and settled in London, where in 1874 he succeeded Froude as editor of Fraser's Magazine His works included Poems (1850), Day and Night Songs (1854), Laurence Bloomfield in Ireland (1864), Fifty Modern Poems (1865), Songs, Poems, and Ballads (1877), Evil May Day and Ashby Manor (1883), Blackberries (1884), and Irish Songs and Poems (1887) His verse is free from obscurity, my sticism, or the 'spasmodic' temper, is fresh and graceful, shows a delicate fancy and, especially in the lyrics, a sweet and varied melody his best work is descriptive. Laurence Bloomfield, the story of a young Irish landlord who, amidst manifold discouragement, seeks to improve the condition of the people on his property, was by Allingham regarded as his best work, yet by the general reader it was but coldly received. He wrote two plays which were never produced, and a delightful prose record of his walks in various corners of England, The Rambles of Patricius Walker (reprinted from Fraser) In 1874 he had married Helen Paterson, who, born near Burtonon-Trent, entered the schools of the Academy in 1867, and made herself a name as a book illustrator and painter in water colours

An Irishman to the Nightingales.

You sweet fastidious nightingales!
The myrtle blooms in Irish vales,
By Avondhu and rich Lough Lene,
Through many a grove and bowerlet green,
Fur mirrored round the loitering skiff
The purple peak, the tinted cliff,
The glen where mountain torrents rave,
And foliage blinds their leaping wave,
Broad emerald meadows filled with flowers,
Embosomed ocean bays are ours
With all their isles, and mystic towers Lonely and gray, deserted long
Less sad if they might hear that perfect song!

What scared ye? (ours, I think, of old)
The sombre Fowl batched in the cold?
King Henry's Normans, mailed and stern,
Smiters of galloglas and kern?
Or, most and worse, fraternal fend,
Which sad Ierne long liath rued?
I orsook ye, when the Geraldine,
Great chieftain of a glorious line,
Was hunted on his hills and slain,
And, one to France and one to Spain,
The remnant of the race withdrew?
Was it from anarchy ve flew,
And fierce oppression's bigot crew,
Wild complaint, and menace hourse,
Misled, misleading voices, loud and coarse?

Come back, O birds, or come at last ! For Ireland's furious days are past, And, purged of comity and wrong, Her eye, her step, grow calm and strong Why should we miss that pure delight? Brief is the journey, swift the flight, And Hesper finds no furer maids In Spanish bowers or English glades. No loves more true on any shore, No lovers loving music more. Melodious Erin, warm of heart, Entreats you, stay not then apart. But bid the merles and throstles know (And ere another May time go) Their place is in the second row Come to the west, dear nightingales ! The rose and myrtle bloom in Irish vales

A Dream

I heard the dogs howl in the moonlight night, I went to the window to see the sight, All the Dead that ever I knew. Going one by one and two by two

On they pass'd, and on they pass'd, Townsfellows all, from first to last, Born in the moonlight of the lane, Quench'd in the heavy shadow again

Schoolmates, marching as when we play'd At soldiers once—but now more staid, Those were the strangest sight to me Who were drown'd, I knew, in the awful sea

Straight and handsome folk, bent and weak, too, Some that I loved, and gasp'd to speak to, Some but a day in their churchyard bed, Some that I had not known were dead

A long, long crowd—where each seem d lonely, I et of them all there was one, one only, Raised a head or look'd my way. She linger'd a moment—she might not stay

How long since I saw that fair pale face. All! Mother dear! might I only place
My head on thy breast, a moment to rest,
While thy hand on inv tearful check were prest!

On, on, a moving bridge they made Across the moon stream, from shade to shade, I oung and old, women and men, Many long forgot, but remember d then

And first there came a bitter laughter, A sound of tears the moment after, And then a music so lofty and gay, That every morning, day by day, I strive to recall it if I may

His complete works, prose and verse were published in six volumes in 1888-93 and a one-volume selection in 1892, and D G Rossetti's Letters to Allingham were edited by Dr Birkbeck Hill (1893). A Life by his wife was promised

George Macdonald, born at Hunth in Aberdeenshire, of the Glencoe stock, in 1824, was educated at Aberdeen University and the Independent College at Highbury He became pastor at Arundel and at Manchester, but ill-health drove him to Algiers and to literature. His first, book Within and Without (1856), a dramatic poem, was followed by another volume of Poems (1857) and by Phantastes, a Faerie Romance (1858) A long series of novels succeeded, including David Elgin brod, his first really popular success (1862), The Portent (1864), Alec Forbes (1865), Annals of a Quict Neighbourhood (1866), Guild Court (1867), The Seaboard Parish (1868), Robert Falconer (1868), Malcolui (1874), St George and St Michael (1875), The Marquis of Lossic (1877), Sir Gibbie (1879), Mary Marston (1881), Lilith (1895), and Salted with Fire (1897) From time to time he continued to preach most impressive sermons, and as a lecturer on Wordsworth, Shakespeare, and other literary topics he attracted large audiences at home and in the United States His poetry is simple but spiritual, instinct with a fresh and delicate fancy, and a tender and loving insight into nature. In his novels, to the essential story telling and dramatic gift he adds a genial humour, a tolerant and kindly sympathy with most sides of life, especially that (so much exploited since his day) of Scottish country-folk. In the earnestness of his recoil from what he conceived to be the narrowness of Calvinism, he at times waves too polemical and 'hortatory, even then the didactic manner is relieved by the romancer's power of dramatic dialogue, as well as by the revelation of exceptionally keen spiritual instincts, tolerance, and native fervour of faith, hope, and It is perhaps characteristic of his Scottish temper that his eminently moral and Puritan criticism of life is softened and brightened by frequent gleams of tenderness. He is an original writer of delicate imagination and profound suggestiveness. His earlier books are indisputably his best, in them especially the characters do quite visibly develop. And in his handling of the dialect of his native district, in its vigour, vivacity, and truth to philology and nature, he has been equalled by no recent kail yarder health was for many years very broken, and his home was mainly on the Riviera. His Alma Mater had given him her honorary degree of LLD in 1868, and in 1877 a Civil List pension was conferred on him

Other novels are Adela Catheart (1864), It is lifted Cumbermede (1871), Thomas Wingfield Curate (1876), I aul Faber, Surgeon (1878) What s Mine s Mine, Home Again, Our Elect Lady, and Heather and Snow between 1886 and 1893. Admirable books for the young were Dealings with the Fairies Ranald Bannerman's Boyhood, At the Back of the North Wind ood The Princess and the Goblin all between 1867 and 1871. Three series of Unspoken Sermons were issued in 1866–1885, and 1889, and there was a work on The Miracles of Our Lord (1870). Dr. Mardonald edited Figlind's Antiphon studies on English poets. Exotics translated from Novalis and elsewhere and Rampolli also a translation. The Diet of Orts was a miscellary and Hamlet a Shakespearian study of originality and power. He collected and arranged his Poetical Works in two volumes in 1893, and issued in 1884 Works of Fancy and Imagination teo volumes of poetry and prove ldyls. He also assisted his wife with her Chamber Dramas for Children

Walter Chalmers Smith, born in Aberdeen in 1824, studied at Aberdeen and Edinburgh, and preached to a Presbyterian church in London ere as a Free Church minister he settled in his first country cure in Kinross shire. Thence he passed to a charge in Glasgow, and from 1876 till his resignation in 1894 he was a minister in Edin-During these years he published a series of volumes of verse, including The Bishop's Walk, by 'Orwell' (1861), Olrig Grange, by 'Hermann Kunst' (1872), Hilda among the Broken Gods (1878), Raban, or Life Splinters (1880), North-Country Folk (1883), Kildrostan, a Dramatic Poem (1884), and A Heretic (1890) These various books were collected in a one volume edition in 1902, with the addition of some thirty Ballads from Scottish History, on subjects as various as Wishart and Montrose, the Scots abroad and the outlawed Macgregors, the persecuted Jesuits and the kidnapped Lady Grange. Dr Smith's poems (he was made D D and LL D ) illustrate in simple, vigorous, homely, and often rather rough, shambling verse 'the varying shades of thought and feeling during the latter part of the nineteenth century,' his singularly catholic temper enabling him to represent with almost equal furness the true blue Presbyterian orthodoxy of the olden time, the hard but conscientious unfaith of the modern materialist, and the tolerant and only slightly unorthodox modern Christianity with which he was himself identified In his works kindly satire, autobiographical reminiscence, exhortation, and encouragement towards a higher life are happily combined with the more directly poetic elements

Thomas Woolner (1826-92), poet sculptor, was born at Hadleigh, and studied at the Royal Academy from 1842 Already in 1843 his 'Eleanor sucking the Poison from Prince Edward's Wound' attracted much attention, it was followed by a long series of works in sculpture, including statues and portrut-busts of most of his famous contemporaries He produced in all about a hundred and twenty works, and was successively A R A and R A a conspicuous member of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (see the article on Rossetti) he contributed poems to The Germ, which with others were expanded into a volume as My Beautiful Lady (1863, 5th ed 1892) Other poems were Pygmalion, Silenus, Tiresias, and Nelly Dali his sculptures were greatly praised as imaginative and poetic, it may with equal truth be said that his poems have some of the charms of sculpture—they were picturesque, sincere, and impressive

Walter Moratio Pater (1839-94) was the son of an American of Dutch extraction who had settled as a medical practitioner in Shadwell (not then incorporated with London), but was brought up at Enfield Neither at school in Canterbury nor at Queen's College, Oxford, did he manifest any exceptional literary gift or impulse, though he attracted Jowett and was stimulated by T H He became a Fellow of Brisenose, rend with pupils, gave up thoughts of taking Anglican orders, and through Unitarianism passed to a non Christian scheme of philosophical eclecticism His home alternated between Oxford in termtime and London Throughout life he was, in thought as in style, the disciple of no one master Already in a magazine article on Coleridge in 1866 his singularly polished style is as charac teristic as it is in most of his later work. Other remarkable articles on Winckelmann, Leonardo da Vinci, Botticelli, Michelangelo, and others followed, and when collected and added to inv Studies in the History of the Renaissance (1873) attracted even more notice. But Marius the Epicurean (1885) is his principal legacy to the world, though his four Imaginary Portraits (dealing with Watteau amongst the rest), and his Appreciations of Lamb, Wordsworth, Rossetti,

Sir Thomas Browne, and Blake, recompanied by a very significant dissertation on style, would have made any writer famous. Gaster de la Teur, in unfinished romance of media vil life, came out in Afaemillar's, Emerald Uthreart was partly autobiographical, Plato and Platonism was an eminently suggestive disquisition, and there was a volume of Itiscellaneous Studies (1895).

Marins the Epicurean is the life of a noble Roman, the friend of Galen and of Marcus Aurchus, who is profoundly moved by the spiritual problems of that trying period, is attracted by what he sees of Christianity and Christians, and dies a kind of marter by mistake without any joyous confidence in his own philosophy as a ley to the riddle of exist ence. His epicureanism is not that 'of the sty,' nor the book philosophy of the Greek texts, nor the syncretistic scheme of the imperial Romans, nor the revived and negative epicureanism of Gassendi and the Renassance, but that of the nineteenth century Englishman who had drunk from the wells of Oxford, had studied Goethe and Ruskin, and had essayed in even higher synthesis of culture and beauty and the spiritual life

Paters style is unique in English literature—exquisitely polished, perfected as an instrument for expressing every subtlest numee of thought or feeling, brilliant and yet dignified in phrasing, but complex, over-claborate, and wanting in directness and buoyancy. Yet the too obvious labor time hardly detracts from his right to take rank at the head of the stylists of the later nineteenth century, and Marius was a spiritual maleutic to many of his younger contemporaries.

A brief Life by Ferris Greenslet appeared in 1904 in Mr Gosse's Critical Kit Kats (1896) there is an interesting article on him.

Joseph Skipses, the miner poet, was born in 1832 near North Shielder, and had voiled from childhood on the Percy Main Collieres there when in 1859 he printed a few son is 1 from 1863 he held posts such as him itam or eare taker. In some of his poems friendly critics have noted an affinity to Blalle. He child a number of volumes of the "Canterbury Series"—Blalle, Burns, Coleridge, Poe, Shelley. He died in 1993.

David Wingate (1828-92), the collier poet was born at Cowglen near Glasgow, and losing his fither by a fire damp explosion while still a child, descended the pit at the age of nine. He had a strong taste for country rambles and wild flowers, contributed early verses to the Han Hor Ad ertises, and was brought to notice in his twenty third venr by an article written by another Glasgow poet Hugh Macdonald His first volume, Pears erd Sorga, published in 1862, was made the subject of in article by Lord Neaves in Black coods Mag's zm, and his next, Amic Weir, in 1866, brought him not only further reputation, but the means of attending the Glasgon School of Mines thus enabled, on the passing of the Coal-Mines Regulation Act in 1872, to assume the position of collicry manager. He had now leisure to contribute poetry and prose tales to a number of magazines and papers, and he published further volumes—Laly Neil, and other Poems (1879), Poems and Songs (1883), and Selected Poems (1890) Nine years before his death, which took place at Toll-cross, Glasgow, he received a Civil List pension of £50. By his first wife he had a large family, his second wife was a descendant of Robert Burns. Wingate's character retained to the end a sturdy independence, and much of his poetry almost justified the early criticism by Lord Neaves. 'There are few verses in the language more pure, tender, and musical, nor any love utterance we can remember more refined and delicate in its simplicity.'

My Little Wife

My little wafe has two merry black eyes—
Sweet little, dear little, daisy faced Jane I
And fifty young lads always deemed her a prize,
And blamed the kind creature for eausing them pun
They all knew her pretty,
And some thought her witty,
But sware of sound sense she was faultless and free,
Because the fair seoffer

Refused every offer, And secretly cherished affection for me

My little wise often round the church luil—
Sweet little, dear little, neat footed Jane—Walked slowly and thoughtful and lonely until The afternoon bell claimed its call o'er the plain.

And nothing seemed sweeter To me than to meet her,

And tell her what weather 'twas likely to be,
My heart the while glowing,
The selfish wish growing,

That all her affections were centred in me

My little wife once—'tis strange but 'tis true—
Sweet little, dear little, love troubled Jine—
So deeply absorbed in her day-dreaming grew,
The bell claimed and ceased, yet she heard not its strain
And I, walking near her (May love ever cheer her Who thinks all such wand'ring of sin void and free),

Strove hard to persuade her That He who had made her Had destated her heart love for no one but me

My little wife—well, perhaps this was wrong— Sweet little, dear little, warm hearted Jane— Sat on the hillside till her shadow grew long Nor tired of the preacher who thus could detain I argued so neatly,

And proved so completely
That none but poor Andrew her husband could be.
She smiled when I blessed her,
And blushed when I kissed her,

And owned that she loved and could wed none but me

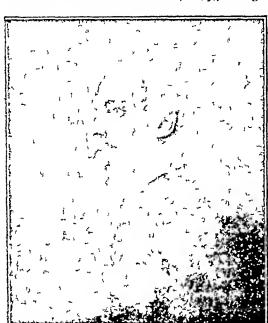

Francis Turner Palgrave (1824-97), son of Sii Francis Palgrave (page 265), became scholar of Balliol College at Oxford and Fellow of Exeter, was successively vice principal of a training college, private secretary to Earl Granville, an official in the Education Department, and Professor of Poetry at Oxford (1886-95). As early is 1854 he had published a volume of songs and poems, in 1866 one of essays on art. In 1871 came another collection of Lyrical Poems, and in 1881 his most ambitious poem, Visions of England Amenophis, a poem, appeared in 1892 He edited Shakespeare's sonnets and songs, and selections from Shakespeare, Keats, and Tennyson is best known as the editor (with Tennyson's help) of the famous and unique anthology, The Golden Treasury of English Lyrics (1861, re edited in 1896), supplemented in 1896 by a second series, selected with less perfect critical insight was also an admirable Children's Treasury of Songs, and a Treasury of Sacred Song In the year of his death he issued a volume of his Oxford lectures as Landscape in Ail He had an extraordinary faculty of appreciating what was best in literature, and exceptional sensitiveness and subtlety as a critic, but though in his own poetry he showed both imagination and the gift of artistic form, he was lacking in creative power

William Gifford Palgrave (1826-88), another of Sir Francis's sons, graduated at Oxford and joined the Bombay Native Infantry, but, becoming a Jesuit, studied at Rome, and was sent as a missionary to Syria For Napoleon III he went disguised as a physician on a daring expedition through Arabia (1862-63), described in his Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Lastern Arabia (1865) Quitting the Society of Jesus in 1864, he was sent by the British Government in 1865 to treat for the release of the captives in Abyssinia. He became consul at Trebizond, St Thomas, and Manila, was consul general in Bulgaria and in Siam, and as British minister to Uruguay was reconciled to the Church works were on the Eastern question and on Dutch Guiana, a volume of travel sketches, and an Eastern tale, Hermann Agha (1872)

Sir Richard Francis Burton (1821-90) was born, the son of a colonel, at Barham House, Hertfordshire, and educated-somewhat desultorily -in France and Italy as well as in England spent nearly a year at Oxford, not very studiously, and got an appointment in the Indian arms 1842 he served in Sind under Sir Charles Napier, and having mastered Hindustani, Persian, and Arabic, made (disguised as an Afglian pilgrim) the daring journey described in his famous Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecea (1855) After a visit to Somaliland and service in the Crimea, he in 1856 set out with Speke on the journey which led to the discovery (1858) of Lake Tring myrl r, and afterwards travelled in North America In 1861 he was consul at Pernando Po, and went on a mission He was subsequently consul at to Daliomey Santos in Brazil, at Damascus, and (1872) at Tricste In 1876-78 he visited Midian, and in 1882 Guinea, and he was knighted in 1886 Too original and too masterful to be a model official, he was frequently at feud with his superiors, was summarily recalled from his Damascus post, and, as he and his wife thought, badly used by home Govern-

Sir Samuel White Baker (1821-93) spent nine years hunting and planting in Cevlon, and in 1859 laid a railway across the Dobrudya. In 1860 he married a Hungarian lady, and with her he undertook the exploration of the Nile sources Setting out from Cairo in 1861, at Gondokoro they heard from Speke and Grant about the Victoria Numera, which they had discovered, as also of another great lake reported by natives and named Luta Nzige. Baker and his wife resolved to reach this lake, and after many adventures beliefd the great inland sea to which Baker gave the name of the Albert Nyanza. In 1869-73 he commanded an expedition, organised by the pasha of Egypt, for the suppression of slavery and the annexation of the equatorial regions of the Nile Basin explored Cyprus in 1879, visited Syria, India, Japan, and America, and was knighted in 1866. Baker wrote easily and well, and besides some tales and many contributions to reviews, published The Rifle and the Hound in Ceylon (1854), Eight Years Wanderings in Ceylon (1855), The Albert Nyanza (1866), The Nile Tributaries of Abyssinia (1867), Ismailia (1874), Cyprus as I saw it (1879), and Wild Beasts and their Ilays Several of these have been frequently reprinted There is a Life of Baker by Murriy and White (1895)

Captains Speke and Grant were associated in the famous 1860-63 expedition to explore the sources of the Nile John Stanning Speke (1827-64) was born at Jordans, Ilminster, and in the Indian In 1854 he army saw service in the Punjab joined Burton in a hazardous expedition to Somali land, in 1857 the Royal Geographical Society sent out the two to search for the equatornal lakes of Africa. Speke, whilst travelling alone, discovered the Victoria Avanza, and convinced himselfrightly, as it afterwards appeared—that he saw in it the head-waters of the Nile. In 1860 he returned with Captain Grant, explored the lake, and tracked the Nile flowing out of it his death in a partridge shooting accident he had published his Journal of the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (1863) and Il hat led to the Discovery of the Source of the Nile (1864) Argustus Crant (1827-92), born at Nairn, was bred at Marischal College for the Indian army, and in Gujerat, during the Mutiny, and in the Abvissiman expedition gained distinction. Colonel, C B., and FRS, he had a full share with Speke in the exploration of the Victoria Nyanzi, and wrote A Wall across Africa, The Botam of the Spike and Grant Expedition, and Khartoum as I sa

Henry Thomas Buckle, who holds a permanent place in literature by his History of Civilisation in England, was born at Lee in Kent, 24th November 1821 A delicate child, he was brought up mainly under home influences Up till the age of eight he hardly knew his letters, and when his parents sent him to school it was on the distinct understanding that he should learn nothing unless he chose, and on no account was he To a boy of delicate brain school to be whipped life was highly distasteful, and at his own request he was taken home. When he left in his four teenth year his knowledge was scanty. He had no fondness for boyish games, and in order to keep him occupied with something not directly mental, his mother taught him knitting. He was sent to a private tutor, but his health giving way, the boy was again taken home. At the age of seventeen he was placed in the office of his father, who was a partner in a firm of shipowners trading with the East Indies Young Buckle did not take kindly to his new occupation, the work was utterly un congenial At his father's death, which occurred when he was nineteen years old, Buckle was left in independent circumstances, and at once relin quished office work With his mother and sister Buckle left England in 1840, and spent a year in foreign travel About this time the idea of writing the history of civilisation took hold of him, and in order to qualify himself he studied eagerly the languages and literature of the countries through which he passed His principal amusement was chess, in which he attained quite a European For art he cared little, and for music reputation he had no ear One tune to him was like another Once he thought he recognised 'God Save the Queen,' but it turned out to be 'Rule Britannia'

The Continental tour made a great change in Buckle's mental outlook. From being a Tory and a narrow Churchman, he became a Radical and a Freethinker He began to educate himself in earnest. He had no high opinion of universities, and his education was entirely self-directed Buckle's life was that of a student His reading power was enormous, and as he had no social distractions, he was able to collect those stores of knowledge which, under his marvellous capacity for generalising, were so effectively used in his great work. He lived with his books, of which he collected some 22,000 Till the year 1850 he lived in obscurity, gradually preparing for his life work, The History of Civilisation in England Evidence of the thoroughness of his training is seen in the fact that he had made himself conversant with nineteen languages

By the publication of his History of Civilisation in England in two volumes (1857-61) Buckle became famous, it was generally recognised that a new star had risen on the intellectual horizon. On the Continent the work had prompt recognition, and Sir D. MacKenzie Wallace relates that when trivelling in Russia he found it among the peasants. The book was but a fragment of his original design, but enough was published to indicate the nature of the theory of civilisation with which Buckle's name will always be associated. Just as the first volume was published Buckle suffered a severe domestic blow. His mother, who had been long ill and very feeble, lived only to have the volume placed in her, hands and to read the dedication to herself. With her death a distinct change came over Buckle. His devotion to his mother amounted to a passion, and the shock of her death appears to have entirely unmanned him. A bachelor, whose love affairs were of the faintest, Buckle lived only for his mother, and with her death he felt himself a solitary wanderer. In June 1857 signs of physical weakness manifested themselves, and as a restorative he in 1861 planned a Journey to the East, taking with him two boxs, one of whom afterwards became his biographer On the journey he caught fever, and died at Damascus on the 29th of May 1862, in his fortyfirst year In many ways Buckle was an attractive personality A student, he was as far as possible from being a bookworm. His heart was tender, and though immersed in dry studies he found time for reading poetry, especially Shakespeare, in order, as he said, to keep his affections alive. His most striking characteristic, perliaps, was a passion for liberty and justice, as was seen in his remarkable conflict with Sir John Coleridge over a lialf witted labourer, Thomas Pooley, who had been sentenced to a term of imprisonment for scrawling on a gate some contemptuous words about Christ and Christianity From prison the poor fellow was released only to go to the madhouse. Buckle, whose knowledge of the case was derived from a reference to it in

Mill's essay on Liberty, was stung vith indignation He made an attack on the judge with such passion that even his friends condemned him for violence The incident shows that Buckle's theories about liberty and tolerance were no mere literary ornaments, but were genuine convictions rooted in a deeply sensitive nature.

When the History of Civilisation appeared it became plain that the author had got hold of a new conception of history He wanted history to rise above the almanac ideal, he wanted to dis-History, in the opinion of Buckle, cover causes should enable man not only to know but to understand the past. Buckle takes it for granted that social progress—in other words civilisation—conforms to laws, and he sets himself to discover what His conception of law is antagonistic to the doctrine of the freedom of the will, of which he disposes in a not very satisfactory manner The subtleties of metaphysical thinking were not quite in Buckle's line. Civilisation, he finds, is influenced by four great physical agencies climate. food, soil, and the general aspect of nature Outside of Europe nature is too strong for man, con sequently civilisation proper can best be studied in European countries viere man has triumphed The study of man thus becomes over nature necessary as a preliminary to the study of civilisa-In Buckle's opinion progress owes nothing to the moral side of humanity moral maxims are few and stationary The progressive element in civilisation is due to the intellect, by which man discovers new truths, thereby increasing man's rule over nature. Having cleared the ground, Buckle proceeds to show that the one thing needful in order that intellectualism shall have full play is liberty. Some of the most eloquent passages in his book are in defence of liberty and in denunciation of the protective spirit, whether it takes the form of theological or political authority Apart from its theories, the History of Civilisation was at once accepted as a work of the first rank It vas recognised as a striking attempt to bring scientific method into a region of activity which had hitherto been given over to anarchy England various efforts, mostly fragmentary, had been made in the direction of sociology, but till Buckle wrote nothing had been done on a comprehensive scale. Adam Smith in his Wealth of Nations showed the way, and on the same line proceeded Hume and Ferguson in Scotland Mixed with political theorising a thread of sociological speculation may be detected in Burke. Coming nearer our own time, the Economists were keenly alive to the need of a science of society, as may be seen from J S Mill's essay on Civilisation It was reserved for Buckle to tackle the subject in scientific fashion. If his work is defective, if it fails to embody the fruitful idea of evolution in the interpretation of social phenomena, still to Buckle femains the credit of opening up by a new method in almost unexplored field for scientific treatment. From the standpoint of present knowledge it is easy to find flaws in the History of Civilisation, but the true critic vill rather dwell upon the greatness of Buckle's conceptions than upon faults which are due to well-understood limitations.

The Ideal Historian.

In the moral world, as in the physical world, nothing is anomalous, nothing is unnatural, nothing is strange All is order, symmetry, and lav There are opposites, but there are no contradictions. In the character of a nation inconsistency is impossible. Such, however, is still the backy and condition of the human mind, and with so evil and janndiced an eye do we approach the greatest problems that not only common writers, but also men from whom better things might be hoped, are on this point involved in constant confusion, perpleying themselves and their readers by speaking of inconsistency, as if it were a quality belonging to the subject they investigate, instead of being, as it really is, a measure of their ov n ignorance. It is the business of the historian to remove this ignorance by showing that the movements of nations are perfectly regular, and that, life all other movements, they are solely determined by their ante eedents. If he cannot do this he is no historian. He may be an annalist or a biographer or a chronicler, but higher than that he cannot rise, unless he is imbued with that spirit of science which teaches as an article of faith the doctrine of uniform sequence, in other words, the doctrine that certain events having already happened, certain other events corresponding to them will also To seize this idea with firmness and to apply it on all occasions without listening to any exceptions is extremely difficult, but it must be done by whoever wishes to elevate the study of history from its present crude and informal state, and do what he may towards placing it in its proper rank, as the head and chief of all the sciences Even then he cannot perform his task unless his materials are ample, and derived from sources of unquestioned eredibility But if his facts are sufficiently numerous, if they are very diversified, if they have been collected from such various quarters that they can check and confront each other, so as to do away with all suspicion of their testimony being garbled, and if he who uses them possesses that faculty of generalisation with out which nothing great can be achieved, he will hardly fail in bringing some part of his labours to a prosperous issue, provided he devotes all his strength to that one enterprise, postponing to it every other object of ambition, and sacrificing to it many interests which men hold Some of the most pleasurable incentives to action he must disregard. Not for him are those rewards which, in other pursuits, the same energy would have carned, not for him the sweets of popular applause, not for him the luxury of power, not for him a share in the councils of his country, not for him a conspicuous and honourable place before the public eye. the great problem of affairs, to detect those hidden cir cumstances which determine the march and destiny of nations, and to find in the events of the past a key to the proceedings of the future, is nothing less than to unite into a single science all the laws of the moral and physical world. Whoever does this will build up aftesh the fabric of our knowledge, rearruige its various parts, and harmonise its apparent discrepancies

Philip Gilbert Hamerton (1834-94), art critic and resthetic philosopher, was born at Lane side near Oldliam, the son of a solicitor He lost his mother soon after his birth, and his memories of his fither, who died ten years later, were un happy, he was privately educated with a view to Oxford and Anglican orders, but gave up this prospect for art and literature. An early volume of poems was a failure, for a time he practised as a painter, camping in the Highlands with his wife, a French lady, but he soon settled in France as a writer by profession, his home for most of his remaining years being in the Morvan near Autun He had written on art for the periodicals, his first important book, A Painter's Camp in the Highlands (1862), was followed by Etching and Etchers and Contemporary French Pairlers (1868), and Painting on France after the Decline of Classicism (1869), and these books gave him a recognised place in literature. From 1869 he edited the Portfolio, founded by himself The Intellectual Life (1873) is a really valuable series of letters of advice addressed to literary aspirants and others, Human Intercourse (1884) is a volume of essays on social subjects, The Graphic Arts (1882), finely illustrated, is a treatise on drawing, painting, and engraving, Landscape (1885), a superbly illustrated volume, sets forth the influence of natural land scape on man Among his other works are two Lives of Furner (1878 and 1889), Portfelio Papers (1889), French and Linglish (planned to interpret sympathetically each people to the other, 1889), Man in Art (1893), The Mount (1897), and two novels His Autobiography (to 1858) was supple mented by a Meinoir of his later life by his wife (1896) His sympathy, catholicity in matters artis tic, and the combined luminousness and grace of his literary style gave him an important share in the work both of expounding art to artists and of educating the British philistine Fame's Hinton (1822-75), son of a Baptist minister, was born at Reading, was at first a clerk, but in 1847 qualified as a surgeon, voyaged to China, and practised in Jamaica for a time. He ultimately grined a high position in London as a specialist m nurd surgery But, devoting himself more and more to studying the squalid life of slums and alleys, he conceived a scheme, revolutionary and far reach ing, to improve the condition of outcast women—a scheme he afterwards feared might add to the evil he so enrnestly strove to remove. All his life Hinton was a tireless thinker and student, a little over hasty to draw conclusions, yet never dogmatic his writing takes the form of interrogation, indicat ing accurately enough the open minded and eager seeker after truth As a consequence his books are unusually rich in suggestive thought. John Ferguson McLennan (1827-81', born at Inverness and educated at the Universities of Aberdeen and Cambridge, joined the Scottish Bar in 1857, and for three years (1872-75) was draughts man of parliamentary Bills for Scotland - but his life work, which made its mark on sociological studies throughout the world, was the series of books and papers in which he propounded and defended, by wide research and masses of evidence gathered from all corners, his theory (partially anticipated by one Swiss author, Bachofen) that historical customs connected with marriage point bick to a primitive marriage by capture, that exclu sive exogramy was an universal stage in the social development, polyandry preceding monandry, and that matriarchy was prior to the patriarchal sistem everywhere. To these speculations he was led by his studies in connection with the article 'Law' which he contributed in 1857 to the eighth edition of the Encyclopadia Britannica But it v is his exposition of the theory in Primitive Mairiage (1865) that first challenged the attention of the world In The Patriarchal Theory (finished by his brother Donald in 1884) he maintained his views against Sir Henry Maine His entirely original conceptions as to Potemism, also epoch making, first appeared in the supplement to the first edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia in 1868, and he wrote on kinship, polyandry, the family, the worship of numals, and other sociological problems various writings he gave a great impulse to sociological studies, all subsequent research took account of his views, though some of them have been superseded as knowledge of savage it ages has become wider and more precise Primitir e Harriage reappeared in 1886 in the volume ealled Studies in Incient History, of which studies a second series was published in 1895. the Scottish Church He was in several Liberal Governments as Lord Privy Seal (twice), Postmaster-General, and Secretary of State for India, but he resigned his last public office through his disapproval of Mr Gladstone's Irish Land Bill, and he vigorously opposed Home Rule His works include, besides papers on zoology, geology, and sociology, and a volume of poems (The Burden of Belief), The Reign of Law (1866), Primeval Man (1869), Antiquities of Iona (1870), The Eastern Question (1879), Scotland as it Was and as it Is (1887), The Unseen Foundations of Society (1893), The Philosophy of Belief (1896), and Organic Evolution Cross-examined (1898) As a statesman and thinker he was fearless and independent, dogmatic and self-confident. He was an cloquent speaker, a keen and irrepressible dialectician constantly at war with Darwin, Huxley, Tyndall, or Herbert Spencer, as subverters of what he conceived to be the eternal and immutable foundations of moral, religious, and scientific truth

Alfred Russel Wallace, naturalist-traveller, evolutionist, and writer on many, especially social, subjects, was born on the 8th of January 1823, at Usk in Monmouthshire, of Scotch ancestry on his father's side. He was educated at Hereford Grammar School, and in his fourteenth year became an apprentice in the office of an elder brother, a land surveyor and architect. In 1844 he became a master in the Collegiate School at I eicester, where he got to know Henry Walter Both were keenly interested in natural Bates history, both were eager to explore some virgin land, and it was eventually arranged that they should go off together on a scientific expedition to the Amazons (1848) It is interesting to note that it was Wallace who chose the country to explore, that he had been greatly impressed with Darwin's Journal and Humboldt's Personal Narrative, and that he had definitely in view the possibility of 'solving the problem of the origin of species' The explorers made their livelihood by sending collections home.

Wallace left South America in 1852, and in the following year he published his interesting Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro But he had neither solved his problem nor satisfied his exploring bent, and in 1854 he went off again, this time to the Malayan Archipelago, where he spent eight years in studying the fauna from Sumatra to New Guinea. His story was subsequently told in admirable fashion in The Malay Archipelago, the Land of the Orang-utan and the Bird of Paradise (1869), to which his Island Life (1880) is a not less successful sequel In his wanderings Wallace made large collections, wrote numerous technical papers, and accumulated great stores of knowledge in regard to the habits, adaptations, and geographical distribution of animals He became a foremost authority on questions relating to distribution, and his large work, The Geographical Distribution of |

Animals (1876), is a monument to his patience and thoroughness. One of his discoveries, the importance of which has been exaggerated, was the establishment of a frunal boundary, usually called 'Wallace's Line'. More notable, however, is the fact that during his explorations, and during an illness at Fernate, he thought out the idea of natural selection (though not using the term), which Darwin was simultaneously developing at home. The pioneer papers of Darwin and Wallace were read together before the Linnæan Society on the 1st of July 1858, and a lifelong friendship, most honourable on both sides, was cemented between the two discoverers

Wallace has done many services to the evolutionist cause, notably in his Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection (1871), which some authorities have placed next to the Origin of Species in actual influence, and in his Darwinism (1889), in which he discussed some of the post Darwinian steps of progress in Evolution-Theory In some respects he may be described as more 'Darwinian' than Daiwin, for he has rejected as unproved that phase of sexual selection which depends on female choice, and he has supported the view that 'acquired characters' are not trans 'My whole work tends to illustrate the overwhelming importance of Natural Selection over all other agencies in the production of new species? It was very appropriate that the first Darwin medal of the Royal Society should have been awarded to him (1890)

But the exceptional feature in Wallace's scien tific philosophy is his argument that some of the great steps in evolution, such as the origin of the higher characteristics of man, are due to a special evolution liardly distinguishable from He finds their only interpretation in the hy pothesis of 'a spiritual essence or nature, capable of progressive development under favourable con ditions' 'There are at least three stages in the development of the organic world when some new cause or power must necessarily have come into action'—the beginning of life, the introduction of consciousness, and the origin of inan's higher intellectual and moral faculties. At these several stages of progress a change in essential nature took place, 'due, probably, to causes of a higher order than those of the material universe' This seems another way of saying that an adequate scientific interpretation of the great steps in question has not been as yet worked out, but there is also iniplied Wallace's conviction that an inter pretation in terms of generally accepted scientific formulæ is impossible

Always interested, like Spencer and Huxley, in actual human problems, Wallace has written much on social questions, as in his Land Nationalisation (1882), Bad Times (1885), The Wonderful Century (1898), Studies Scientific and Social (1900) and Man's Place in the Universe (1903) Always fearless, he has written strongly against vaccination and in favour of phrenology, and he has expounded his position as an experimentally convinced spiritualist in Miracles and Modern His mind is one which Spiritualism (1874) reaches a conclusion quickly and holds to it with tenacity, stronger in insight than in logical criticism, but always bold and independent His style, though not remarkable, is clear and vivid, and always suggestive of enthusiasm and earnestness In 1881 Wallace received a Civil List pension, in 1882 he was made LLD of Dublin, in 1889 DCL He still works quietly in his country of Oxford home near Dorset, a veteran-the Nestor-among biologists, a naturalist in the old and truest sense, rich in a world-wide experience of animal life, at once a specialist and a generaliser, a humanist thinker and a social striver, a man of science who realises the spiritual aspect of the world

Thomas Henry Huxley was born at Ealing, then a village near London, on the 4th of May 1825, the seventh and youngest child of an assistant-master in a semi-public school inherited from his mother a notable gift of 'rupidity of thought' and many of his physical characteristics as 'a black Celt,' from his father but little except an innate talent for drawing, 'a hot temper, and that amount of tenacity of purpose which unfriendly observers sometimes call obstinacy' His early education seems to have been scanty and poor of its sort. He 'lind two years of a Pandemonium of a school (between eight and ten), and after that neither help nor sympathy in any intellectual direction till he reached manhood' Very early, however, he became an omnivorous reader, ranging from Hutton's Geology and Hamilton's Philosophy of the Unconditioned (read at the age of twelve) to Sartor Resartus and modern fiction His most conspicuous early characteristics were lucidity, a striving after systematisation (witness a boyish scheme for a 'classification of all knowledge'), a habit of 'visualising,' and a bent towards mechanical engineering. Even in after life this early interest in mechanical problems remained When between twelve and thirteen he became a medical apprentice, and during this period he stored his mind with literature and science, learned French and German, and laid the foundations of dy spepsia, from which he suffered severely throughout his life In 1842 he entered as a free scholar at Charing Cross Hospital, where he was particularly influenced by Mr Wharton Jones, who gave him a love for anatomy and a high standard of precise work, and suggested the publication of his first scientific paper Having completed his medical course, he was induced by a fellow student, afterwards well known as Sir Joseph Fayrer, to apply for an appointment as surgeon on a ship. He satisfied the Director-General, passed the member ship examination of the Royal College of Surgeons.

and was entered on the books of Nelson's old ship, the Victory, for duty at Haslar Hospital. After seven months at Haslar, he was recommended by the chief of the hospital, Sir John Richardson—Arctic explorer and naturalist—as surgeon to H M S Rattlesnake, then about to start for surveying work in the Torres Strait, under command of Captain Owen Staples

Thus Huxley, like Darwin, Wallace, Hooker, and many other famous naturalists, secured his Wandergaline, and he made the most of them During the voyage of the Rattlesnake he sent communication after communication on the structure of marine animals to the Linnæan Society, and a paper on the anatomy and affinities of the Medusæ found its way (through the Bishop of Norwich, Captain Stanley's father) to the Royal Society, where it eventually won for the young author the Royal Medal

Huxley returned to England in the end of 1850, equipped, as Virchow said, 'as a perfect zoologist and keen sighted ethnologist'. He was granted leave ashore to work out the zoological results of the voyage, and his researches were so obviously important that he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society in 1851, and received the Gold Medal in 1852. In 1853 further leave ashore was refused, and, as Huxley could not see his way to relinquish science, he had to be struck off the Navy List. Steadily, if not rapidly, however, the problem of Brodwissenschaft was solved, in 1854 he succeeded Edward Forbes as Professor of Natural History at the School of Mines, with a salary of £200, which was soon doubled on his becoming naturalist to the Geological Survey. In 1855 he was in a position to marry the lady whom he had met and loved seven years before in Sydney.

For ten years after his voyage, until the publication of the Origin of Species (1859), Huxley's active life was in the main concerned with He made science his career, he estab lished his reputation, he worked most at Invertebrates, he began to get thoroughly interested in palaontology, on the whole, he was a pure zoologist. For ten years after the publication of Darwin's magnum opus Huxley was most promi nent as an advocate of Evolution Theory, he worked most at Vertebrates and extinct forms, he became more of a teacher and a controversialist, his lecturing and literary work increased greatly 'The third period, from 1870 to 1880, was con siderably different in character. He had become the most prominent man in biological science in England, at a time when biological science was attracting a quite unusual amount of scientific and public attention Public honours and public duties, some of them scientific, others general, began to crowd upon him, and the time at his disposal for the quiet labours of investigation became rapidly more limited', Chalmers Mitchell! Between 1880 and 1890 Huxley was at the zenith of his reputation for some years he was President of the Royal Society of London, the bluest ribbon of scientific distinction in Britain, the Waterloo victory of Evolutionism was already a pleasant memory, by experts and by the public alike he was regarded as a scientific commander in chief, and every utterance commanded respect

From youth upwards Huyley was a martyr to periodic dyspepsia, and the nemesis of his all too energetic life gradually closed in upon a constitution which was never robust. From 1885 onwards the disease, which he quantly labelled a D. (Anno Domini), became more and more real—pleurisy, cardiac troubles, influenza, and the like—until on 29th June 1895 he died, mentally vigorous to the Huxley dealt with so many subjects in a masterly way that it is unusually difficult to sum up the services which he rendered to human progress Pre eminent as a biologist, he must be given a high place on the general fame roll of Science He had, in comparison with his other endowments. relatively little of that inborn sympathetic interest in living creatures which marks the naturalist as such, no small part of his very best work dealt with extinct forms, and it is significant that when a zoologist asked him how he proposed to treat birds in one of his courses of lectures, he replied, 'I intend to treat them as extinct animals' On the other hand, this did not mean that he was uninterested in their other aspects. Our point is rather that he brought to a discussion of a piece of chalk, or of glaciers, or of a river basin, all the force of his perferved enthusiasm and all the strength of his intelligence, just as much as if the subject had been a jellvfish, or a crayfish, or a developing chick—like force of mind was such that he could make anything real, 'a window into the Infinite'

If we dare try to analyse the particular excel lences of Huxley's scientific mood, it appears that he had four pre eminent qualities Tirst and foremost we should place his quality of lucidity. his clearness of vision, his hatred of verbalism. his penetrating insight into essentials, secondly, his passion for facts, his continual insistence on getting below opinion and inference to the original documents-the facts of nature, thirdly, his crutiousness, so well illustrated by his general agnostic position, by his reserve of judgment in regard to the relative value of the various factors in evolutionary processes, and by almost all his work in detail, fourthly, that characteristic of the scientific mood which may be described as a sense of the interrelations of things, which was especially manifested in Huxley's morphological worl, in his detection of affinities

As a zoologist, Huyley added much to the sum of I nowledge by his investigations on new or very inadequately understood types of animal life He greatly advanced the natural classification of both backboned and backboneless animals, and he established a number of big simplifying generali 'Three of his researches may fairly be called classical that on the Hydrozon, in which he propounded the wide reaching generalisation that the ectoderm and entoderm of polypes and sea anemones correspond with the two primary germ layers in the embryos of the higher animals, that on the fossil Ganoids, and that on the morphologiof the vertebrate skull, in which he demolished the fanciful "vertebral theory,' which, however fruitful in its first conception, had become a positive hindrance to the progress of philosophical anatoms Of less magnitude are his papers on the classification of birds on the crayfishes, on the anatomy of the Australian mud fish and on the Canide, while the rest of his strictly original contributions to zoology are, for a man of his intellectual calibre, hardly more than opuscula. But what opuscula t There is not one of them but contains some brilliant generalisation, some new and fruitful way of looking at the facts of the science' (Jeffery Parker)

As a biologist, he gave us a clear working conception of 'protoplasm,' which he called 'the physical basis of life,' he vivified and improved the cell-doctrine of Schwann and Schleiden, Virchow and Goodsir, he made a wonderfully sagacious, now well-verified, prophecy when he compared the organism to a web, of which the warp is derived from the female and the woof from the male, and these are only representative samples of his services. As an evolutionist, he supplied in the most convincing way factual corroborations of the theory of descent, in his American Addresses, for instance, he did, in reference to the ancestry of the horse and the like, a service exactly comparable to that rendered in a very different field (Crustaceans) by Fritz Muller in his Facts for Darwin. As an advocate, acute and incisive, but never guilty of special pleading or polemical rhetoric, he did in a controversial period knightly service on behalf of a light-bringing conception of Nature. He was, in fact, forcinost on the fighting edge of the Evolutionist phalanx. On the other hand, by his cautious ness and keen criticism he did much to prevent a premature dogmatism in regard to the factors in the Evolution process

It seems no exaggeration to say that Huxley has given us an immortal standard by which to judge what 'scientific' really means, but he was more than 'scientific' He was one of the most outstanding examples of a man of science at the same time a citizen of the world, keenly interested in all serious human problems whether of conduct or of belief Whether the subject was biology or philosophy, education or politics, fisheries or slavery, he brought to each and all a keen penetrating insight, a wide human outlook, and fearless honesty Indeed, one of the greatest marvels of Hurdey's life was the diversity of its interests and energies On the London School Board, Huxley was an advocate on behalf of physical training, domestic economy, drawing, elementary scienceeven of the Bible in schools In regard to technical education he emphasised the fact that, for the purposes of mental discipline in preparation for the practical tasks of life, no useful distinction could be drawn between technical science and science as such 'The workshop is the only real school for a handicraft The education which precedes that of the workshop should be entirely devoted to the strengthening of the body, the elevation of the moral faculties, and the cultivation of the intelligence, and especially to the imbuing of the mind with a broad, clear view of the laws of that natural world with the components of which the handicraftsman will have to deal'

Huxley served on many Royal Commissions on Fisheries, Vivisection, Medical Acts, Universities of Scotland (1876–78), and so on, he was an active secretary of the Royal Society of London for about ten years (1871–80), and had much to do with the equipment of the Challenger expedition and with the due utilisation of its magnificent results. The general verdict must be that Huxley 'saw life steadily, and saw it whole.'

Of Huxley's philosophy or attitude towards philosophy a little must now be said. Although his mental constitution was very different from that of the contemplative or speculative metaphysician, he was greatly interested in the criticism of cate gories, and gave much time and thought to a study of the philosophical classics. His impulse was in the main a practical one—he sought 'to learn what is true in order to do what is right,' which, he tells us, 'is the summing up of the whole duty of man, for all who are not able to satisfy their mental hunger with the east wind of authority' What conclusions did he reach? In the first place, that 'there is but one kind of knowledge and but one method of acquiring it'scientific knowledge, which he called 'organised common sense,' reached by the rigorous use of scientific methods In the second place, that in the scientific restatement or interpretative description of the processes of Nature-that is, of our experience-all insinuation of transcendental formulæ or supernatural agencies must be resolutely repelled, science must not try to eke out the application of its own categories by borrowing from metaphysics or theology In the third place, that as a philosophical explanation of the universe, materialism is inadequate and illogical honest and rigorous following up of the argument which leads us to materialism inevitably carries us beyond it' Thus Huxley remained a philosophical agnostic 'If I were obliged to choose between absolute materialism and absolute idealism, I should feel compelled to accept the latter alternative.' In all estimates of his position two often repeated sentences must be remembered 'Evolution is not an explanation of the cosmos, but merely a generalised statement of the method and results of that process' 'There is a wider teleology which is not touched by the doctrine of evolution, but is actually based on the fundamental proposition of evolution?

In many minds the name of Huxley has for its most prominent association controversialism, and though his constructive work was far more important, there is no denying that he spent no small part of his time and energy in fighting, and that he thoroughly enjoyed it. He was the champion of the scientific point of view, as contrasted with the metaphysical or the theological, he looked forward to the time when the scientific interpretation 'will organise itself into a coherent system, embracing human life and the world as one harmonious whole? But we misunderstand his controversialism if we forget the motive that prompted it-'the faniticism of veracity' Whether we consider his famous duel with Bishop Wilberforce at the British Association meeting in 1860, or his criticism of Owen, or his battles with the bishops and Mr Gladstone, or any other of the many controversies, we cannot but feel that they express no merely polemical spirit, but that of an earnest truth seeker who hit hard out of conviction, who never sought to destroy without also replacing

Huxley's style is especially distinguished by lucidity, accuracy, and force, and no small part of the wide extension of scientific interest has been due to its charm. He deliberately laboured to achieve a mastery of clear expression both in his lectures and in his essays, and he succeeded For lucidity and clear-cut accuracy he was almost fastidious 'It constantly becomes more and more difficult for me to fintsh things satisfactorily' 'Science and literature,' he said, 'are not two things, but two sides of one thing,' and the greater part of his non technical scientific writings may also be ranked as literature.

According to Mr Chalmers Mitchell 'For him, speaking on any subject was merely a branch of scientific exposition, when emotion was to be roused or enthusiasm to be kindled the inspiration was to come from the facts and not from the The arts he allowed himself were common to all forms of exposition he would explain a novel set of ideas by comparison with simpler ideas obvious to all his listeners, and he sought to arrest attention or to drive home a conclusion by some brilliant phrase that bit into the memory These two arts, the art of the phrase maker and the art of explaining by vivacious and simple comparison, he brought to a high perfection Careful reflection and examination will make it plain that the pleasure to be got from Huxley's style is not due in any large measure to his choice and handling of words For indeed the truth of the matter is that Huxley's style was a style of ideas and not of words and sentences The ideas and their ordering are the root and the branches, the beginning and the end of his He is one of our great English writers, but he is not a great writer of English'

Huvley was a wide and omnivorous reader, and familiar with the English classics, from which he often drew in phrase and allusion 'If a man,' he wrote, 'cannot get literary culture out of his Bible, and Chaucer, and Shakespeare, and Milton, and Hobbes, and Bishop Berkeley, to mention only a few of our illustrious writers-I say, if he cannot get it out of these writers, he cannot get it out of anything' He had an unusual knowledge of Latin, classical, patristic, and medieval, he had a fair knowledge of the Greek language (acquired when fifty-three) and a wide acquaintance with Greek literature in translation, he was at home in French and German, and so forth Thus we can understand how, with his quick brain (his mother's rapidity of thought 'passed on in full strength') and tenacious memory, he wrote a style often vivid with picturesque allusion and telling phrase.

It should be added that this man—an indefatigable and often preoccupied specialist, a born intellectual combatant and as good a hater as ever lived, an uncompromising Luther in the scientific reformation, a fearless propagandist of Evolution Theory, an anti-clerical, anti-dogmatist, agnostic, called by more bad names than any of his contemporaries, and confessedly one of hasty temper—was beloved by many 'They were chiefly moved by something over and above his wide knowledge in so many fields—by his passionate sincerity, his interest not only in pure knowledge but in liuman life, by his belief that the interpretation of the book of nature was not to be kept apart from the ultimate problems of existence, by the love of truth, in short, both theoretical and practical, which gave the key to the character of the man himself'

Aims in Life

To promote the increase of natural knowledge and to forward the application of scientific methods of investigation to all the problems of life to the best of my ability, in the conviction which lies grown with my growth and strengthened with my strength, that there is no alleviation for the sufferings of mankind except veracity of thought and of action, and the resolute facing of the world as it is when the garment of make believe by which pious hands have hidden its uglier features is stripped off

It is with this intent that I have subordinated any reasonable or unreasonable ambition for scientific fame which I may have permitted myself to entertain to other ends, to the popularisation of science, to the development and organisation of scientific education, to the endless series of battles and skirmishes over evolution, and to the untiring opposition to that ecclesiastical spirit, that clericalism, which in England, as everywhere else, and to whatever denomination it may belong, is the deadly enemy of science. In striving for the attainment of these objects, I have been but one among many, and I shall be well content to be remembered, or even not remembered, as such (From Autobiographical Sketch)

A Liberal Education

That man, I think, has had a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure all the work that as a mechanism it is capable of, whose intellect is a clear cold logic engine, with all its parts of equal strength and in smooth working order, ready, like a steam engine, to be turned to any kind of work, and spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind, whose mind is stored with a knowledge of the great and fundamental truths of nature and of the laws of her operations, one who, no stunted ascetie, is full of life and fire, but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a vigorous will, the servant of a teader con science, who has learned to love all beauty, whether of nature or of art, to hate all vileness, and to respect others as himself

Such an one and no other, I conceive, has had a liberal education, for he is, as completely as a man can be, in harmony with nature. He will make the best of her, and she of him. They will get on together rarely she as his ever beneficent mother, he as her mouth piece, her conscious self, her minister and interpreter (From 'A Liberal Education and Where to Find It')

Nature of Life

What justification is there, then, for the assumption of the existence in the living matter of a something which has no representative or correlative in the not living matter which gave rise to it? What better philo sophical status has 'vitality than 'aquosity'? If the phenomena exhibited by water are its properties, so are those presented by protoplasm, living or dead, its properties. If the properties of water may be properly said to result from the nature and disposition of its component molecules, I can find no intelligible ground for refusing to say that the properties of protoplasm result from the nature and disposition of its molecules

It may seem a small thing to admit that the dull vital actions of a fungus or a foraminifer are the properties of their protoplasm, and are the direct results of the nature of the matter of which they are composed But if their protoplasm is essentially identical with, and most readily converted into, that of any animal, I can discover no logical halting place between the admission that such is the case and the further concession that all vital action may, with equal propriety, be said to be the result of the molecular forces of the protoplasm which displays it. And if so, it must be true, in the same sense and to the same extent, that the thoughts to which I am now giving utterance, and your thoughts regarding them, are the expression of molecular changes in that matter of life which is the source of our other vital phenomena-

Origin of Life

Looking back through the prodigious vista of the past, I find no record of the commencement of life, and there fore I am devoid of any means of forming a definite conclusion as to the conditions of its appearance. Belief, in the scientific sense of the word, is a serious matter, and needs strong foundations.

To say that, in the admitted absence of evidence, I have any belief as to the mode in which the existing forms of life have originated would be using words in a wrong sense. But expectation is possible where belief is not, and if it were given me to look beyond the abyss of geologically recorded time to the still more remote period when the earth was passing through physical and chemical conditions which it can no more see again than a man can recall his infancy, I should expect to be a witness of the evolution of living protoplasm from not living matter

I should expect to see it appear under forms of great simplicity, endowed, like existing fungi, with the power of determining the formation of new protoplasm from such matters as aimmonium carbonates, oxilates, and tartrates, alkaline and earthy phosphites, and water without the aid of light. That is the expectation to which analogical reasoning leads me, but I beg you once more to recollect that I have no right to call my opinion anything but an act of philosophical faith

Man's Place in Nature

Identical in the physical processes by which he originates—identical in the early stages of his formation—identical in the mode of his nutrition, before and after birth, with the animals which he immediately below him in the scale—Man, if his adult and perfect structure be compared with theirs, exhibits, as might be expected, a marvellous likeness of organisation. He resembles them as they resemble one another—he differs from them as they differ from one another. And though these differences and resemblances cannot be weighed and measured, their value may be readily estimated, the scale or standard of judgment, touching that value, being afforded and expressed by the system of classification of animals now current among zoologists.

Is it, indeed, true that the Poct, or the Philosopher, or the Artist, whose genius is the glory of his age, is degraded from his high estate by the undoubted historical probability, not to say certainty, that he is the direct de scendant of some naked and bestial savage, whose intelligence was just sufficient to make him a little more cunning than the Fox, and by so much more dangerous than the Inger? Or is he bound to how and grovel on all fours because of the wholly unquestionable fact that he was once an Egg, which no ordinary power of discrimination could distinguish from that of a Dog? Or is the philan thropist or the saint to give up his endcavour to lead a noble life because the simplest study of man's nature reveals at its foundations all the selfish passions and fierce appetites of the merest quadruped? Is mother love vile because a hen shows it, or fidelity base/because dogs possess it?

The common sense of the mass of mankind will answer these questions without a moment's hesitation. Healthy humanity, finding itself hard pressed to escape from real sin and degradation, will leave the brooding over specialitive pollution to the cymics and the 'righteous over much,' who, disagreeing in everything else, unite in blind insensibility to the nobleness of this visible world, and in inability to appreciate the grandeur of the place Man occupies therein

Nay more, thoughtful men, escaped from the blinding influences of traditional prejudice, will find in the lowly stock whence man has spring, the best evidence of the splendour of his capacities, and will discern in his long progress through the Past a reasonable ground of faith in his attainment of a nobler Future

On the Publication of the 'Origin of Species'

I imagine that most of those of my contemporaries who thought seriously about the matter were very much in my own state of mind-inclined to say to both Mosaists and Evolutionists, 'A plague on both your houses 1' and disposed to turn aside from an intermin able and apparently fruitless discussion, to labour in the fertile fields of ascertainable fact. And I may therefore suppose that the publication of the Darwin and Wallace paper in 1858, and still more that of the Origin in 1859, had the effect upon them of the flash of light which, to a man who has lost himself on a dark night, suddenly reveals a road which, whether it takes him straight home or not, certainly goes his way which we were looking for, and could not find, was a hypothesis respecting the origin of known organic forms which assumed the operation of no causes but such as could be proved to be actually at work We wanted, not to pin our faith to that or any other speculation, but to get hold of clear and definite conceptions which could be brought face to face with facts and have their validity tested The Origin provided us with the work ing hypothesis we sought

'The Strongest Arguments in Favour of Evolution'

I may add that, beyond all these different classes of persons who may profit by the study of biology, there is yet one other. I remember, a number of years ago, that a gentleman who was a vehement opponent of Mr Darwin's views, and had written some terrible articles against them, applied to me to know what was the best way in which he could acquaint himself with the strongest arguments in favour of evolution. I wrote back, in all good faith and simplicity, recommending him to go through a course of comparative anatomy and physiology, and then to study development. I am sorry to say that he was very much displeased, as people often are with good advice. Notwithstanding this discouraging result, I venture, as a parting word, to repeat the suggestion, and to say to all the more or less acute lay and clerical 'paper philosophers' who venture into the regions of biological controversy—Get a little sound, thorough, practical, elementary instruction in Biology.

J ARTHUR THOUSON

William Wilkie Collins (1824-89) was the elder son of the distinguished painter William Collins, RA, and was born in London, his name testifies to his father's friendship with David Wilkie. He was educated partly at a private school in Highbury, but during 1836-39 was with his parents After his return he spent four years in a tea business, and then entered Lincoln's Inn. but he gradually, though mentably, took to literature, the Life of his father (1848) being his earliest publication To it succeeded Antonina, or the Tall of Rome (1850), Basil (1852), Hide and Seek (1854), The Dead Secret (1857), The Woman in White (1860), No Name (1862), Armadale (1866), The Moonstone (1868), The New Magdalen (1873), The Law and the Lady (1875)—in all, more than five-and twenty novels and collections of novelettes Wilkie Collins became a close friend of Charles Dickens, After Dark and the Dead Secret came out in Household Words, the Woman in White in All the Year Round Count Fosco in the IVoman in White is a veritable creation, a permanent character in English literary allusion, and in this his most successful work, his characteristic method was quite unhackneyed-that of unfolding an intricate plot by the successive verbatim narratives of the chief dramatis The Moonstone, one of the strongest detective stories in literature, is the next most popular work of the author, who was a master of complex plot, fascinating mystery, sensational episode, thrilling situation, and stritling dénouement. No Name, in Mr Swinburne's judgment, 'is an only less excellent example of as curious and as original a talent,' dealing with the imputa tion of illegitimacy, and with the struggle and final triumph over its disadvantages later didactic novels are only occasionally re lieved by brilliant exposition of character and evolution of incident, some are like bad parodies of the author's better work. On the whole, Mr Swinburne admits that 'the crowning merit, the most distinctive quality of his best work is to be sought and found in the construction of an interesting and perplexing story, well conceived, well contrived, and well moulded into life like and attractive shape.' Making due allowance for melodramatic lapses, for mannerisms and faults of style, for occasional violence and crudity, and for a curious dependence on the help of some pliysical or moral depravity in his characters, Wilkie Collins 'was in his way a genuine artist.' Deafness, dumbness, blindness, or hereditary weakness are too essential to some of his earlier novels, and his disapproval of the Scotch marriage law and the Scotch verdict of 'Not proven,' of athleti cism and worse social cankers, are too obviously the keynote of some of his later ones. Some of the short stories are admirable, each of those in After Dark is, in Mr Swinburne's words, 'a little model, a little masterpiece in its kind? Dickens influenced Collins, but perhaps not much more than Collins influenced Dickens Thackeray found the Woman in H lite thrilling, and Edward Litz-Gerald was an enthusiastic admirer of the same Wilkie Collins dramatised Armadale, No Name, the Woman in White, and the New Magdalen, The Irozen Deep was written as a Mr Swinburne's essay on the novelist will be found in his Studies in Prose and Poetry (1894)

The Doom of Sir Percival.

I mounted the hill rapidly. The dark mass of the church tower was the first object I discerned dimly against the night sky. As I turned aside to get round to the vestry, I heard heavy footsteps close to me. The servant had ascended to the church after us. 'I don't inean any harm,' he said when I turned round on him, 'I'm only looking for my master'. The tones in which he spoke betraved unmistakable fear. I took no notice of him, and went on

The instant I turned the corner, and came in view of the vestry, I saw the lantern skylight on the roof brilliantly lit up from within. It shone out with dazzling brightness against the murky, starless sky

I hurned through the churchyard to the door

As I got near, there was a strange smell stealing out on the damp night air. I heard a snapping noise inside—I saw the light above grow brighter and brighter—a pane of the glass cracked—I ran to the door, and put my hand on it. The vestry was on fire!

Before I could move, before I could draw my breath after that discovery, I was horror struck by a heavy thump against the door, from the inside I heard the key worked violently in the lock—I heard a man's voice, behind the door, raised to a dreadful shrillness, screaming for help.

The servant, who had followed me, staggered back shuddering, and dropped to his knees. 'Oh, my God l' he said, 'it's Sir Percival !'

As the words passed his hips the elerk joined us—and at the same moment there was another, and in last, grating turn of the key in the lock

'The Lord have merey on his soul!' said the old man 'He is doomed and dead He has hampered the lock'

I rushed to the door The one absorbing purpose that had filled all my thoughts, that had controlled all my actions, for weeks and weeks past, vanished in an instant from my mind. All remembrance of the heartless injury the man's crimes had inflicted, of the love, the innocence, the happiness he had pittlessly laid waste, of the oath I had sworn in my own heart to summon him to the terrible reckoning that he deserved, passed from my memory like a dream. I remembered nothing but the horror of his situation. I felt nothing but the natural human impulse to save him from a frightful death.

'Try the other door 'I shouted. 'Try the door into the church The lock's hampered You're a dead man if you waste another moment on it!'

There had been no renewed ery for help when the key was turned for the last time. There was no sound now, of any kind, to give token that he was still alive. I heard nothing but the quickening crackle of the flames, and the sharp snap of the glass in the skylight above.

I looked round at my two companions. The servant had risen to his feet, he had taken the lantern, and was holding it up vacantly at the door. Terror seemed to have struck him with downright idiocy—he waited at my heels, he followed me about when I moved, like a dog. The clerk sat crouched up on one of the tombstones, shivering, and moaning to himself. The one moment in which I looked at them was enough to show me that they were both helpless.

Hardly knowing what I did, acting desperately on the first impulse that occurred to me, I seized the servant and pushed him against the vestry wall 'Stoop' I said, 'and hold by the stones. I am going to climb over you to the roof—I am going to break the skylight, and give him some air I'

The man trembled from head to foot, but he held firm I got on his back, with my cudgel in my mouth, seized the parapet with both hands, and was instantly on the roof In the frantic hurry and agitation of the moment, it never struck me that I might let out the flame instead of letting in the air I struck at the skylight, and bat tered in the cracked, loosened glass at a blow fire leaped ont like a wild beast from its lair. If the wind had not chanced, in the position I occupied, to set it away from me, my exertions might have ended then I crouched on the roof as the smoke poured out above me, with the flame The gleums and flashes of the light showed me the servant's face staring up vacantly under the wall, the clerk risen to his feet on the tombstone, wringing his hands in despair, and the scanty population of the village, haggard men and ter rified women, clustered heyond in the churchyard-all appearing and disappearing, in the red of the dread ful glare, in the black of the choking smoke And the man beneath my fect '-the man, suffocating, burning, dying so near us all, so atterly beyond our reach !

The thought half maddened me. I lowered myself from the roof, by my hands, and dropped to the ground

'The key of the church!' I shouted to the elerk. 'We must try in that way—we may save him yet if we can burst open the inner door'

'No, no, no'' cried the old man 'No hope' the church key and the vestry key are on the same ring—both inside there! Oh, sir, he's past saving—he's dust and ashes by this time!'

'They 'Il see the fire from the town,' said a voice from among the men behind me. 'There's a ingine in the town. They'll save the church'

I called to that man—he had his wits about him—I called to him to come and speak to me—It would be a quarter of an hour at least before the town engine could reach us—The horror of remaining mactive all that time was more than I could face—In defiance of my own reason I persuaded myself that the doomed and lost wretch in the vestry might still be lying scassless on the floor, might not be dead yet. If we broke open the door, might we save him? I knew the strength of the heavy lock—I knew the thickness of the nailed oak—I knew the hopelessness of assailing the one and the other by ordinary means. But surely there were beams still left in the dismantled cottages near the church? What if we got one, and used it as a battering ram against the door?

The thought leaped through me, like the fire leaping out of the shattered skylight. I appealed to the min who had spoken first of the fire engine in the town 'Have you got your pickaxes handy?' Yes, then had 'And a hatchet, and a saw, and a bit of rope?' Yes! yes! yes! I ran down among the villagers, with the lantern in mi hand 'Tive shillings apiece to every man who helps me!' They started into life at the words. That ravenous second lininger of poverty—the hunger for money—roused them into tumult and activity in a moment. 'Two of you for more lanterns if you have them! Two of you for the pickaxes and the tools! The rest after me to find the beam ' They cheered—with shrill starveling voices they cheered The women and the children fled back on either side. We rushed in a body down the churchyard path to the first empty cottage. Not a man was left behind but the clerk-the noor old clerk standing on the flat tombstone sobbing and wailing over the church The servant was still at my heels his white, helpless, panie stricken face was close over my shoulder as we pushed into the cottage. There were rafters from the torn down floor above, lying loose on the ground-but they were too light. A beam ran across over our heads, but not out of reach of our arms and our pickaxes—a beam fast at each end in the ruined wall, with ceiling and flooring all ripped away, and a great gap in the roof above, open to the sky We attacked the beam at both ends at once God! how it held-how the brick and mortar of the wall resisted us ! We struck, and tugged, and tore The beam gave at one end-it came down with a lump of brickwork after it There was a scream from the women all huddled in the doorway to look at us-a shout from the men-two of thein down, but not hurt Another tug all together-and We raised it, and gave the beam was loose at both ends the word to clear the doorway Now for the work 1 now for the rush at the door! There is the fire streaming into the sky, streaming brighter than ever to light us' Steady, along the churchyard path--steady with the beam, for a rush at the door One, two, three-and off Out rings the cheering again, irrepressibly We have shalen it already, the hinges must give, if the lock won't Another run with the beam! One, two, threeand off It's loose! the stealthy fire darts at us through the crevice all round it Another, and a last rush! The door falls in with a crash A great hush of awe, a still ness of breathless expectation, possesses every living soul The scorching heat on We look for the body our faces drives us back we see nothing-above, below, all through the room, we see nothing but a sheet of living fire. (From The Woman in Il hite) Richard Doddridge Blackmore (1825-1900) was born at Longworth in Berkshire, and educated at Blundell's School in Tiverton and at

Exeter College, Oxford He graduated in 1847, afterwards studied law, was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple in 1852, and practised for a dozen years as a conveyancer By degrees he saw that his vocation was not that of conveyancer. ultimately he united the pursuit of literature with the management of a market-garden and orchard at Teddington on Thames, and there it was he died His first publications were Poems by Melanter (1854), Epullia (1855), The Bugle of the Black Sea (1855), followed by The Tate of Franklin (1860) and a translation of the first and second books of Virgil's Georgics (1862) Other volumes of verse followed these, as well as a complete translation of the Georgics in 1871. His earliest novels were Clara Vaughan (1864) and Cradock Nowell (1866), but his first distinct success was Lorna Doone, a Romance of Exmoor (1869), which from the first was by the discerning recognised as almost certainly a great and classic novel, attained vast popularity in a vear or two, and before its author's death had passed through some forty Blackmore's plots were often defective in construction, but here the plot (though not free from faults) was good and well managed, the style has a pleasing flavour of its age, the time of James II, the joy in open-air life and adventure is infectious, and the figures have much more life and movement than in any other of his novels-John Ridd and some at least of his allies and enemies are imperishable memories to all Englishmen For his rare insight into and sympathy with manimate life, Blackmore stands almost alone among English But he has also described for us with absolute truth the Devonshire farmer as he lives and speaks, and many of his women, if somewhat shadowy in outline, are yet figures of rare tenderness and grace More than most copious authors -and somewhat to his own annovance—he is fated to be remembered as the author of one book, and that one Lorna Doone Blackmore cherished the local criticism that 'it was as good as Devonshire cream,' but was wont to grumble good-naturedly at the pre-eminence assigned to it over all his other works, at its having almost become a guide book to the west country. His other novels are The Maid of Sker, perhaps his second best story (1872), Alice Lorraine, Kentish in setting (1875), Cripps the Carrier (1876), Erema (1877), Mary Anerley, a Yorkshire story (1880), Christowell, a Dastmoor Tale (1882), Tommy Upmore, one of his least happy creations (1884), Springhaven (1887), Perlycross (1894), Fringilla, tales in verse (1895), Tales from the Telling-House (1896), and Dariel (1897) He wrote verses from time to time, and never realised how obvious it was, even to his more enthusiastic admirers, that verse was not his medium From time to time, too, he expounded his views on fruit and orchards, and he contributed a series of articles on gardening and fruit-growing to Chambers's Encyclopædia, but he had sorrowfully to confess that in his forty years' experience of fruit-growing at Teddington, he could only in two several years report a fair margin of profit.

Esther's Winter Walk.

The weather had been for some few weeks in a good constitutional English state, that is to say, it had no settled tendency towards anything. Or at any rate, so it seemed to people who took little heed of it. There had been a little rain, and then a little snow, and a touch of frost, and then a sample of fog, and so on trying all varieties, to suit the British public. True Britons, however, had grumbled duly at each successive overing, so that the winter was now resolving henceforth only to please itself. And this determined will was in the wind, the air, and the earth itself just when night began to fall on this dark day of December.

As Esther turned the corner from the Beckley lane into the road, the broad coach road to Oxford, she met a wind that knew its mind coming over the crest of Shotover, a stern east wind that whistled sadly over the brown and burren fields, and butterly piped in the road way. To the chill of this blast the sere oak leaves shivered in the dusk and rattled, the gray ash saplings bent their naked length to get away from it, and the surly stubs of the hedge went to and fro to one another The shiny dips of the path began to rib themselves, like the fronds of fern, and to shrink into wrinkles and sniewy knobs, while the broader puddles, though skirred by the breeze, found the network of ice veiling over them. This, as it crusted, began to be capable of a consistent quivering, with a frail infinitude of spikelets, crossing and yet carrying into one another. And the cold work (marred every now and then by the hurry of the wind that urged it) in the main was going on so fast that the face of the water ceased to glisten, and instead of ruffling lifted, and instead of waving wavered So that, as the surface trembled, any level eye might see little splinters (held as are the ribs and harl of feathers) spreading, and rising life steins of lace, and then with a smooth, crisp jostle sinking, as the wind flew over them, into the quavering consistence of a coverlet of ice

Esther Cripps took little heed of these things, or of any other in the matter of weather, except to say to herself now and then how latter cold the wind was, and that she feared it would turn to snow, and how she longed to be sitting with a cup of ' Aunt Lxie's ' crudle in the snug room next to the bakehouse, or how glad she would be to get only as far as the first house of St Clement's, to see the lamps and the lights in the shops, and be quit of this dreary loneliness. For now it must be three market days since fearful rumours began to stir in several neighbouring villages, which made even strong men discontent with solitude towards nightfall, and as for the women-just now poor Lether would rather not think of what they declared. It was all very well to pretend to doubt it while linging the clothes out or turning the inaugle, but as for laughing out here in the dark, and a mile away from the nearest house-Good Lord 1 How that white owl frightened her!

Being a sensible and brave girl, she forced her mind as well as she could into another channel, and lifted the cover of the basket in which she had some alce things for 'Aunt Txie,' and then she set off for a bold little run, until she was out of breath, and trembling at the sound of her own light feet. For though all the Crippses were known to be of a firm and resolute fibre, who could expect a young maid like this to tramp on like a Roman sentinel?

And a lucky thing for her it was that she tried nothing of the sort, but glided along with her heart in her mouth, and her short skirt tucked up round her. I ucky also for her that the ground (which she so little heeded, and so wanted to get over) was in that early stage of freezing, or of drying to forestall frost, in which it deadens sound as much as the later stage enlivens it, otherwise it is doubtful whether she would have seen the Christians dressing of the shops in Oxford

l or, a little farther on, she came, without so much as a cow in the road or a sheep in a field for company, to a dark narrow place, where the way hung over the verge of a stony hollow an ancient pit which had once been worled as part of the quarries of Headington. This had long been of had repute as a hannted and ill omened place, and even the Carner himself, strong and re olute as he was felt no shame in whispering when he passed by in the moonlight. And the name of the place was the 'Gipsy's Grave'. Therefore, as I'sther Cripps approached it, she was half inclined to wint and hide herself in a bush or gap until a cart or vaggon should come down the hill belind her, or an honest dairyman whisting softly to reassure his shadow, or even a woman no braver than herself

But neither any eart came near, nor any other kind of company, only the violence of the wind and the been increase of the frost bite. So that the girl inade up her mind to put the best foot foremost, and run through her terrors at such a pace that none of their could by hold of her

Through yards of darkness she skimmed the ground, in haste only to be rid of it, without looking forward, or over her shoulders, or anywhere, when she could help it. And now she was ready to laugh it herself and her stipid fears, as she eaught through the trees a glimpic of the lights of Oxford, down in the low land, scarcely more than a mile and a half nway from her. In the joy of rehef she was ready to jump and pant without fear of the echoes, when suddenly something eaught her car-

This was not n thing nt first to be at all afruid of, but only just enough to roule a little curiosity. It seemed to be nothing more nor less than the steady stroke of a pickase. The sound came from the farther corner of the deserted quarry, where a crest of soft and shingly rock overlaing a briary thicket. Any person working there would be quite out of sight from the road, by reason of the bend of the hollow.

The blow of the tool came dull and heavy on the dark and frosty wind, and I sther almost made up her mind to run on, and take no heed of it. And so she would have dane no doubt, if she had not been a Cripps girl. But in this family firm and settled opinions had been handed down concerning the rights of property—the rights that overcome all wrongs, and outlive death. The brother Levineus of Stow Wood had sown a piece of waste at the corner of the clevice with winter carrots for his herd of swine. The land being none of his thins far, his right so to treat it was not established, and there fore likely to be attacked by any rapacious encoucher. I sther felt all such things keenly, and resolved to find out what was going on (From Criffs the Larrer)

Robert Michael Ballantyne (1825-94), writer of tales for boys, was born at Edinburgh in April 1825, a nephew of Scott's printers first of his eighty volumes, issued in 1848, was a record of personal experiences during a six vears' residence (1841-47) in the territories of the Hudson By Company, in 1848-55 he was in the publish ing office of the Messrs Constable in Edinburgh, in 1856 he took to literature as a profession-more specifically to the business of writing bools for In this his life work he combined in the happiest was tales of strenuous endrasour and exciting adventure, a sound moral, and an amount of viried instruction wholly alien to the plan of predecessors like Majne Reid. At first he drew largely on his own experiences in Ti - I cung Fur Traders (1856) and U gar 1 (1857). But he made special studies for such works as The lafe loat Tre Lighthouse Inditing the Flames, and Deep Down (in Cornish mines) and he trivelled in Norway and Mines express! for the purpose of amassing materials for others of his stories

Among the most popular were The Coral Island, Martin Rattler, The World of Ice, The Pirate City, The Dog Crusoe, Erling the Bold, The Settler and the Savage, and Black Ivory Personally he exemplified the high character of his heroes, and he was a keen volunteer and an accomplished artist in water-colours. In 1893 he published Personal Reminiscences of Bookmaking. Harrow was his home, but he died at Rome. See his Personal Recollections (1893)

Andrew Kennedy Hutchison Boyd (1825-1899) was familiarly known to a generation of magazine readers as A K.H B, and is remembered not as a divine but as a copious, desultory, entertaining writer on things in general He was born in Auchinleck manse, Ayrshire, spent his boyhood in the manse of the adjoining parish of Ochiltreé (whither his father was transferred soon after), and was educated at Ayr Academy, King's College, London, and Glasgow University He studied for the English Bar, but in 1851 received Presbyterian ordination, and had been minister of Newtonon Ayr, Kirkpatrick Irongias, and St Bernard's, Edinburgh, before his settlement in 1865 at St Andrews He became known to a wide public by his essays in Traser's Magazine signed A.K H B, and reprinted as Recreat ons of a Country Parson (three series, 1859-61) The Graver Thoughts of a Country Parson followed, and, including sermons and books of gossiping reminiscences, he produced over thirty volumes. His essays had a character of their own, essential commonplaceness of thought being disguised by a certain airy vivacity and chattiness, good-humoured in the main (especially towards himself), but at times his deliberate irrelevance became prolix and even dull, though he had a genius for gossip and anecdotes, at its best in the earlier volumes of the reminiscences comments on contemporaries were often more pointed than complimentary, and in playful or caustic anecdotes he in return was not too gently dealt with He was DD and LLD His foibles were vanity, a profound admiration for deans and dignitaries of the Anglican Church, and a corresponding dislike for Dissenters of all species was failing in health when, mistaking his medicine, he accidentally poisoned himself at Bournemouth See his Twenty five Years of St Andrews (2 vols 1892), St Andrews and Elsewhere (1895), and Last Lears of St Andrews (1896)

Samuel Butler (1825–1902), born at Langar in Notts, was educated at Shrewsbury and St John's, Cambridge, spent the years 1860–64 in Canterbury, New Zealand, and devoted the rest of his life to literary work in London. In Erewhon (1872—the name being of course an anagram of 'nowhere') he revealed his gift of humour and irony, his prejudices and his anti-conventional audacity, Erewhon Revisited (1901) was a continuation of this modern Utopia. He wrote on evolution against Darwin, insisted in a book that the author of the Odyssey was a woman, and had his own theory as to the sonnets of Sliake-speare. He translated the whole of the Iliad and of the Odyssey into English prose, and he wrote (2 vols 1896) the Life of his namesake and grand father, headmaster of Shrewsbury and Bishop of Lichfield (1744–1839). Other works were The Fair Haven, Life and Habit, Luck or Cunning, La Voto, and, posthumously published, The Way of the Flesh (1903). He wrote sonnets also, and practised painting and musical composition.

Rev. Edward Bradley (1827-89), better known by his pen-name of 'Cuthbert Bede,' was born at Kidderminster, educated for the Church'at Durham University, and appointed rector succes sively of Denton in Huntingdonshire, Stretton near Oakham, and Lenton in the neighbourhood of The list of his six-and-twenty pub Grantham lished works includes the Book of Beauty (1856), Tairy Tables (1858), Glencraggan (1861), Tales of College Life (1862), and Fotheringhay (1885) But the most popular of his books, as it was the earliest, was doubtless The Adventures of M1 Verdant Green, an Oxford Treshman (1853-57), a facetious and even farcical description of the humours of English university life, which displays an imperfect imitation of the manner and method of Dickens The hero, whose character is more plainly than artistically indicated by his name, enters 'Brazenface College' as the most innocent of home bred youngsters, and is initiated into all the amusements and venial dissipations of an undergraduate career by two more knowing liands, Mr Bouncer and Mr Larkyns, with the result that he goes through a series of ridiculous scrapes Though almost negli gible as literature, this burlesque had a wide, an immediate, and by no means an ephemeral popularity, which at first no doubt was heightened by the knowledge that some of the figures in it were caricatures of well-known Oxford dons

George Alfred Lawrence (1827-76) was born at Braxted rectory, Essex, and from Rugby passed in 1848 to Balliol College, Oxford He was called four years later to the Bar, was a militin officer, and got into a United States prison on his way to join the Confederate army Of his nine or ten novels by far the best known is Guy Livingstone (1857), the next perhaps, though far less popular, Sword and Gown (1859)

George Augustus Henry Sala (1828-95), born in London of Italian ancestry, studied art and did book-illustrations, but after 1851 became a contributor to Household IVords, Temple Bar (which he founded and edited 1860-66), the Illustrated London News, and Cornhill As special correspondent of the Daily Telegraph he was in the United States during the Civil War, in Itali with Garibaldi, in France in 1870-71, and later in Russia and Australia. Twice Round the Clock (1859) is his best-known work, while his novels include

The Baddington Peerage, Captain Dangerous, and Quite Alone Among his books of trivel are A Journey due North, books on Holland, Barbury, Rome, and Venice, Paris Herself Again (1879), America Revisited (1882), and Right Round the World (1888) His autobiography is pretty fully covered by Things I have Seen (1894) and his Life and Adventures (1895)

William Caldwell Roscoe (1823-59), grandson of the historian of Lorenzo de' Medici (see Vol II p 639), was born in Liverpool, and educated finally at University College, London Though called to the Bar, he soon settled in Wales in business, but found time for much literary work for the reviews, for the two tragedies Eliduc and Violenzia, and for many lyrics and other poems His essays were collected in 1860, with a Memoir, by his brother in law, R. H. Hutton, his dramas and poems were reprinted in 1891

John Caird (1820-98), a great Scottish preacher, born at Greenock, studied at Glasgow, and had held four important cures when in 1862 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Glasgow. He was principal of the university from 1873 till the year of his death. His Religion of Common Life, preached before Queen Victoria at Crathie in 1855, quickly carried his fame throughout the Protestant world, Dean Stanley said it was the greatest single sermon of the century. He published a volume of Sermons (1858), An Introduction to the Philo sophy of Religion (1880), which revealed a strong neo Hegelian leaning, and a small but pregnant book on Spinoza (1888)

Edward Caild, brother of the preacher principal, was born in 1835. From Glasgow he passed as a Snell exhibitioner to Balliol College, Oxford, and became in 1864. Fellow and tutor at Merton. In 1866 he was appointed Professor of Moral Philosophy at Glasgow University, in 1893 he was elected Master of Balliol. A profound and sympathetic student of Hegel, he made himself one of the most conspicuous and influential philosophical thinkers of his time by a series of works on Kant (1877), Hegel (1883), and Comte (1885), The Evolution of Religion (Gifford Lectures, 1893), and The Evolution of Theology in the Greek Philosophy (1904)

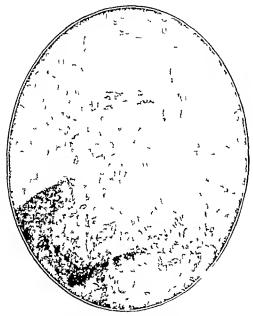

Joseph Barber Lightfoot (1828–89), Bishop of Durham, was born at Liverpool, and from King Edward's School, Birmingham, passed in 1847 to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1851 as thirteenth wrangler, senior classic, and Chancellor's medallist Elected Fellow in 1852, and ordained in 1854, he became tutor of Trinity in 1857, Hulsean Professor of Divinity in 1861, canon of St Paul's in 1871, Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge in 1875, and Bishop of Durham in 1879 Dr Lightfoot was out of sight the most accomplished English scholar of his time in the departments he made his own, he secured a great European reputation, and in England his influence proved of incalculable importance. supreme grammarian and textual critic, he gave the world admirable commentaries on the epistles to the Galatians (1860), Philippians (1868), Colosstans and Philemon (1875) His work on the Apostolic Fathers embraces only Clement of Rome (1869-77, new ed 1890) and Iguatius and Polycarp (1885, 2nd ed 1889) Other works were On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament (1871), an edition of Mansel's Gnostic Heresies (1875), Leaders in the Northern Church (1890), The Apostolic Age (1892), Biblical Essays (1893), and several volumes of sermons, besides contributions to magazines, biblical dictionaries, and, originally in the Contemporary Review, his crushing answer to Supernatural Religion (reprinted 1889) is a short Life of him by Westcott (1894)

Henry Pairy Liddon (1829-90), born at North Stoneham, Hampshire, the son of a naval captain, went up from King's College School, London, to Christ Church, Oxford Ordnined in 1852 as senior student of Christ Church, from 1854 to 1859 he was vice-principal of Cuddesdon Theo logical College, and in 1864 became a prebendary of Sahsbury, in 1870 a canon of St Paul's, and Ireland Professor of Evergesis at Oxford (till 1882) In 1866 he delivered his Bampton Lectures on the Divinity of Our Lord (1867, 13th ed 1889), and was soon recognised as the ablest and most eloquent exponent of modern. High Church prin-He helped to make St Paul's once more the centre of the religious life of London, and by his sermons there took rank amongst the greatest of English preachers In matters academic he was, like his master Pusey, eminently conservative did not hesitate to take a strong side in public controversies bearing on faith and morals he strongly opposed the Church Discipline Act of 1874, and as warmly supported Mr Gladstone's crusade against the Bulgarian atrocities in 1876 He wrote many controversial articles, and published a dozen collections of sermons or addresses His unfinished Life of Pusey had to be taken over by others (see page 337)

Edward Augustus Freeman (1823-92) was the most voluminous writer on history and kindred subjects of his generation His career was uneventful, and may be easily sketched was left an orphan in early childhood, and was never sent to a public school, but he was a pre cocious student and a voracious reader as a boy After being at two small schools, he went to a private tutor, and in 1841 was elected to a scholarship at Trinity College, Oxford In 1845 he grimed a second class in the final classical school. and was soon afterwards made a Fellow of Trinity He had a sufficient income to free him from the necessity of earning a livelihood. In 1847 lie married Miss Eleanor Gutch, the daughter of his In 1847 lie former tutor, and settled down to the life of a student and a country gentleman After two or three changes of residence, he made his home at Somerleaze, near Wells, in Somersetshire, and it was there that the greatest part of his work was done. He had no lack of occupation, as he was a zealous magistrate, a frequent contributor to the Saturday Review and other journals, and a keen politician At one time he was ambitious to enter Parliament, but he only once went to the poll, and was then unsuccessful A professorship at Oxford was also an attraction to him, but twice he failed in his candidature for such a post At last, in 1884, when his friend William Stubbs left Oxford to be Bishop of Chester, Freeman was appointed to succeed him as Regius Professor of Modern History. For the next eight years he lived part of the year in Oxford and part at Somerleaze. He had always been an eager traveller, full of insight into local and architectural history in many countries. When his health became enfeebled in his later years, he spent some time in Sicily, an island that always had a peculiar interest to him on account of the continuity of its history through long and varying periods. He was on a tour in Spain with his wife and two daughters when he died on 16th May 1892.

Freeman's first book, a History of Architecture, was published in 1849, four years after he had taken his degree. It would take a good deal of space to enumerate all his works from that date till his death. He was always writing, and he published almost everything that he wrote. Many of his articles in magnitines were afterwards collected into volumes, and some of them are among the best things he did. But the chief works, on which his reputation as a historian must ultimately rest, were the History of Federal Government, which stopped short at the first volume in 1863, The History of the Norman Conquest, his most ambitious and best-known work, which appeared in successive volumes from 1867 to 1879 (6 vols, with index), The Historical Geography of Europe (1881-82), the Reign of William Rufus (1882), and History of Sicily (1891-92), which was left unfinished at his death

In estimating I reeman's merits as a historian and a writer, it must never be forgotten that he was a journalist and a politician, and in both capacities a very combative partisan His style was very largely formed by the strenuous endea vour to impress his views upon contemporaries, and it was a style that was better suited for a dogmatic lecture or a magazine article than for historical narrative He required a liabit of hammering his contention into the minds of his renders or hearers by repeating it in different This iteration was not unimpressive in a harangue or m a short article, but it became wearisome in a long and substantial work consequent prolivity was increased in Freeman's case by his inability to sift and select his facts. Everything which he had carefully investigated seemed to him of immense importance, and if he could not find a place for it in his text, he must put it into a lengthy appendix. It is difficult to believe that the Norman Conquest will be read in times to come by any but professed students. And the habit of controversy affected the historical value of I reeman's work His convictions on historical questions, as on other subjects, were very clearly formed and almost passionately asserted. When once he had formed such a conviction, he was extremely lorth to change it, even in the face of convincing evidence, and though he would have repudiated the charge of conscious unfairness, he was unquestionably inclined to read his convictions into his authorities, and to draw from them every One of thing that would support his own view his favourite dicta was that 'history is past politics, and politics are present history!' This led him to endeavour to look at the past from the political point of view, to try and place himself in the For such position of a politician in ancient times a purpose a keener and more sympathetic imagination was needed than Freeman possessed. Some of his most ambitious work is vitiated because he was too much of a nineteenth century politician to grasp the subtler differences between the con ceptions of the eleventh century and those of his own day

Although it may be doubted whether Freeman's larger books will prove to be of permanent literary importance, there can be no doubt that he did work of immense value in his generation. Many of the lessons which he set himself to teach he trught so thoroughly that they have become almost commonplaces to later students, and curously enough the most prolix of historical writers.

could be, when he chose, a master of the art of compression Few men could write a short book better than Freeman could when he was bound by precise limits of space. His 'William I' in the series of Tructue English Statesmen gives an admirable summary of the main conclusions arrived at in the six volumes of the Norman Conquest, and his General Sketch of European History, in a series of school innuinals which he himself edited for Messrs Macmillan, is a model of concise and clear narration. A youthful student of history can find few better introductions to the subject than the collected volumes of Freeman's Essays Ten men have had a wider knowledge of the general course of human history, and few have been such consummate masters of apposite and illuminating comparison. I reeman was at his best as a traveller. On a historic site his vast stores of knowledge enabled him to form and present with astonishing readiness a striking picture of all the important events which it suggested to his memory

If circumstances had been more favourable, Freeman would have been a really great professor of history. It was a misfortune to him, and perhaps to his subject, that he fulled to obtain election to the Chichele Professorship of Modern History in 1862. He had a real enthusiasm for teaching, and an Oxford chur would have given hun an admirable opportunity for developing his powers in that direction. But in 1884 the appointment came too lite. He was older than the great scholar whose place he took, he had done the bull of his worl, and most of the lessons which he wished to teach he had already formulated in the ways which were open to him. Oxford had altered very much since his own days of residence, and he had taken little direct part in the change. A school of modern history had grown up and reached a fairly advanced stage of development. Freeman was at once too big and too obstinate to fit himself into a ready made groove. His brusque and combative manner, which concerled real kindness of heart, helped to create rather than to remove misunderstandings Freeman was never quite happy or coinfortable in Oxford, and though he had warm and attached disciples, it cannot be held that he exercised the influence on the studies and life of the University which he would have done if he had entered upon his office twenty years earlier. And he was un e isily conscious that some of his main contentions, especially his insistence upon the predominance of German origins in the building up of modern Europe, were beginning to be questioned, and by some inquirers to be rejected. For a man who had been rather a ruthless critic of others. Preeman was singularly sensitive to attack was rather pathetic than inspiring to see a student of his eminence standing before an inadequate academie audience, not to tell them new truths, but to assert that he still adhered to assertions that he had made almost a generation ago, that he had nothing to unlearn and little to learn

The Death of Harold.

While Harold still lived, while the horse and his rider still fell beneath his axe, the heart of lingland failed not, the hope of Fugland had not wholly passed away Around the twofold ensign the war was still hercely riging, and to that point every eye and every arm in the Norman host was directed. The battle had raged ever since nine in the morning, and evening was now drawing in New efforts, new devices, were needed to overcome the resistance of the English-diminished as were their numbers, and wearied as they were with the livelong toil of that awful day. The Duke bade his archers shoot up in the air, that their arrows inight, 15 it were, fall straight from heaven. The effect was immediate and fearful. No other device of the wily Duke that day did such frightful execution. Helmets were pierced, eyes were put out men strove to guard their heads with their shields, and, in so doing, they were of course less able to wield their axes There was one point the supreme moment drew near of the hill at which the Norman bowmen were hidden specially to aim with their traest skill. As twilight was coming on, a mighty shower of arrows was launched on its deadly errand against the defenders of the standard There Harold still fought, his shield histled with Norman shafts, but he was still unwounded and un wearied. At last another arrow, more charged with destiny than its fellows, went more truly to its mark I alling like a bolt from heaven, it jucreed the ling's right eye, he elutehed convulsively at the weapon, he broke off the shaft, his axe dropped from his hand, and he sand in agony at the foot of the standard. Mean while twenty knights who had bound themselves to lower or to bear off the Inglish ensigns strove to ent their way to the same spot. Most of the twenty paid for their venture with their lives, but the survivors succeeded in their attempt. Four of them reached the standard at the very moment Harold fell Disabled as he was, the ling strove to rise, the four rushed upon him and despitched him with various wounds.

One pierced through the shield of the dying king and stabbed him in the breast, another smote him with the sword just below the fastenings of his helmet. But life was still in him—as he still struggled, a third pierced his body through with his lance, and a fourth finished the work by striking off his leg with his sword. Such was the manner which the boasted chivalry of Normandy meted out to a prince who had never dealt harshly or eruelly by either a domestic or a foreign foe. But we must add, in justice to the Conqueror, that he pronounced the last brutal insult to be a base and cowardly act, and he expelled the docr of it from his army

The Harrying of the North

One thing at least is certain, that the Norman Conquest erushed all hopes of Northumbrian dominion, as dominion, for ever—In this sense the Norman Conquest was in very truth a Saxon Conquest—It ruled that England should be for ever an united kingdom, and it further ruled that the seat of dominion of that united kingdom should be placed in its Southern and not in its Northern part Yet Northern England may at least boast this much, that in no part of the land did the Conqueror meet with stouter resistance, that on no part of the land did lus avenging hand fall more heavily. We read in the writers of the time of the harrying of the northern shires, of the fields lud waste, of the tovins left without inhabitants, of the churches crov ded by the sick and hungry as the one place of shelter We read in the formal language of documents how men bowed themselves for need in the evil day, and sold themselves into bondage for a morsel of bread. We read how the veary and home less met with such shelter, such alms, as one monastery and one town could give at the hands of good Abbot Athelwig of Evesham And, perhaps more striking than all, we read in the calm pages of Domesday the entries of 'waste,' 'waste,' down i hole pages, the records which show how lands which had supplied the halls of two or three English thegas could now yield hardly a penny of income to their foreign masters most of us all this is mere bool learning, it was mere book learning to me a few months back. But tales like these put on a new and fearful truth, they are clothed with a life which is terrible, indeed, to one who has seen the life with his own eyes. The harrying of Northumber land has ceased to be a more name to one a ho has seen something of the harrying of Herzegovina. The church yard of Evesham, crowded with the refugees who had fled from their wasted houses, becomes a reality in the eves of one "ho has looked on the same sad sight in the Inzzarello of Ragusa.

Ancient Greece and Mediæval Italy

As the Greek nation was the first which developed for itself anything worthy of the name of civilisation, Greece and the Greak colonie, naturally formed the whole extent of their own civilised v orld Other nations were simply outside Barbarians In the best days of Greece the in terference of a foreign power in her internal quarrels would have seemed as if the sovereign of Morocco or China should claim the presidency of a modern European congress In later times, indeed, Sparta and Thebes and Athens, each in turn, found it convenient to contract political alliances with the great king at Ekbatana, or with their more dangerous neighbour at Pella. But the Mede always remained a purely external enemy or a purely external paymaster, the Macedonian had himself to become a Greek before his turn came to be the domi nant power of Greece But in medieval Italy the case was videly different. She affected, indeed, to apply the name Barbarian to all nations beyond the mountain Nor did the assumption want some show of justification in her pulpable pre eminence in wealth, in retinement, in literature, in many branches of art, above all in political I not ledge and progress But, notwith standing this, it was impossible to place mediæval Italy so far above contemporary France or Spain or Germany as ancient Greece stood above the rest of her contem porary world All the states of Western Christendom were fragments of a single Empire, whose laws and language and general civilisation had left traces among them all A common religion, too, united them against the prynim of Cordova or Bagdad, too often against the schismatic vho filled the throne of Constantine. Italy for ages saw the lawful successor of her lings and Cæsars in a Barbarian of the race most alien to her feelings and language. Most of her highest nobility drev their origin from the same stock. No wonder, then, if nations less alien to her tongues and manners played a part in her internal politics which differed videly from any interference of Barbanans in the affairs of Greece parties ranged themselves under the German watchwords of Guelf and Ghibelin, and fought under the stan dards of Angevin, Provençal, and Aragonese invaders. Florence looked to Trance-hily to hily-as her natu ral ally and her chosen protector Sicily sought for her deliverer from French oppression in the rival power of so often welcomed into Italy, they had so often filled Italian thrones and guided Italian politics, that men perhaps hardly understood the change or foresaw the consequences when for the first time a king of France entered Italy in arms as the claimant of an Italian kingdom. Gradually, but only gradually, the strife v high had once been a mere disputed succession between an Angevin and an Aragonese pretender grew into a strife between the mightiest potentates of the West for the mastery of Italy and of Europe.

RICHARD LODGE.

William Stubbs (1825-1901) was born at Knarcsborough in Yorkshire. From a private school at Knaresborough he went on to Ripon Grammar School, and in 1844 matriculated at Christ Church, O'ford. In 1848 he took his degree with first-class honours in classics and a third-class in mathematics, and in the same year he was elected a Fellow of Trinity College. Two years later he resigned his fellowship on acceptance of the college living of Navestock in Essex It was while he held this living that he made his reputation as a strenuous and accurate student of the ecclesiastical and mediaval history of Eng-This he owed partly to the publication of the Registrum Sacrum Anglicanum in 1858, but mainly to the editorship of several chronicles in the Rolls Series No volumes in this invaluable collection were edited with such consummate scholarship, with such critical insight and convincing knowledge, as those which were entrusted to his care. And the prefaces which he prefixed to these chronicles, especially those to the Chronicles of Richard I and to the second volume of Benedict of Peterborough, proved that he was not only a master of the methods of research, but also a really great historian, capable at once of interpreting such remarkable characters as those of Henry II and his sons, and also of explaining the obscure workings of early institutions knowledge of detail was enormous, and no appeal for information on the knotticst points of consti tutional or genealogical history failed to clicit an answer from his stores of information another student of similar tastes, E. A. Freeman, his intercourse was at all times intimate and But there were many marked and friendly Freeman obvious contrasts between the two men was always writing to the press, reviewing books, attacking Froude, denouncing hunting and vivisection, expressing his opinion on Disestablishment, on tithes, on Ireland, on the Eastern question, and generally siding with the Radical party in politics Stubbs, on the other hand, was a retiring student, happy with his books and his family, and almost a recluse. Although a strong Conservative, he made no attempt to emphasise or assert his political opinions, and he often boasted in later years that he had never reviewed a book in his life.

Perhaps on account of this greater reticence, which preserved him from the enmittes which Freeman's outspokenness too often provoked, Stubbs was the more fortunate in gaining recognition for his work. In 1862 he was appointed librarian at Lambeth, a post in which he was succeeded by another historian, J R Green, and in 1866 he became Regius Professor of Modern The eighteen years which he History at Oxford spent in Oxford were certainly the most fruitful and possibly the happiest period of his life. chief publications were the Select Charters (1870), a collection of documents and extracts from chronicles to illustrate the constitutional develop ment of England to the end of Edward I's reign, and the Constitutional History of England, of which the first volume appeared in 1874, and the third and last in 1878 This latter book was at once accepted both in this country and on the Continent as the magisterial and, for the time, the definitive work on the subject. No doubt supplementary information may be and has been obtained, and upon points of detail Stubbs's conclusions may be open to modification, but the book is so crutious and based upon such exhaustive study that it is difficult to believe it can ever be quite superseded No fewer than thirteen volumes in the Rolls Series were edited by Stubbs during these years On the other side of his professorial work, as a lecturer, Stubbs was less obviously successful He read his lectures from manuscript, and he did not attract a large class. Every year he was bound to deliver two public lectures, a duty at which he always grumbled To these lectures more hearers came than to his consecutive courses, but he never drew such a crowd as came to listen to his predecessor, Goldwin Smith, or to his two successors, Freeman and Froude. Yet he was a really great and stimulating teacher To him. more than any other man, was due the foundation and organisation of the flourishing school of modern history in Oxford The secure basis upon which that school has been built was the strenuous study of the consecutive history of the English constitution, which Stubbs inculcated and for which he in large measure supplied the materials The most influential and formative book in the studies of the school from that day to this has been Stubbs's Select Charters

In 1879 Stubbs was appointed to a canonry at St Paul's, which he held along with his professorship in Oxford. He was now in a most enviable position, as his income was adequate to his needs, he had easy access to books both in Oxford and London, and in both places he was highly appre-

But in 1884 he was offered and accepted ciated the bishopric of Chester, and five years later he was translated to the see of Oxford. As a bishop he was energetic and liked by his clergy, while his learning added to the prestige of the Episcopil bench But it may be held that his ecclesiastical duties might have been as efficiently performed by a man who had less obvious powers in another direction As a bishop Stubbs was almost lost to history and to literature At Chester he edited two volumes of William of Malmesbury, and while he lived at Cuddesdon he resumed some of his former connection with the university, and sat once more on boards and committees But his only independent publication in the last sixteen years of his life was a collection of the public lectures which he had delivered with so much open repining during his tenure of the Oxford chair Some of them are of remarkable ment, and one or two show glimpses of that genial humour which was familiar to Stubbs's personal friends, but which is not conspicuous in his published works and by many readers is probably unsuspected He was fond of making epigrams, and one of them is worth quoting here

> Froude informs the Scottish youth That parsons do not care for truth The Reverend Canon Kingsley cries That History is a pack of lies

What cause for judgments so malign? A brief reflexion solves the mystery Froude believes Kingsley a divine, And Kingsley goes to Froude for history!

Perhaps constitutional history does not lend itself either to humour or to eloquence. At any rate, Stubbs was more eminent as a historian than as a man of letters For evidence of his ability to write with vigour and point the reader must go either to his little book on the Early Plantagenets, his only contribution to the innumerable manuals which have been produced in such profusion by later historians, or preferably to the Prefaces in the Rolls Series Since Stubbs's death these Prefaces have been collected and republished in a separate volume, and they will probably prove more attractive to the general reader than the Constitutional History, which is too solid and substantial for the ordinary appetite

Henry II and his Sons

Henry's division of his dominions among his sons was a measure which, as his own age did not understand it, later ones may be excused for mistaking, but the object of it was, as may be inferred from his own recorded words, to strengthen and equalise the pressure of the ruling hand in the different provinces of various laws and nationalities. The sons were to be the substitutes, not the successors of their father, the eldest as the accepted or elected sharer of the royal name, as feudal superior to his brothers, and first in the royal councils, stood in the same relation to his father as the king of the Romans to the emperor, he might rule with a full delegated power, or perhaps with inchorte independence, but the father's hand was to guide the helm of State

Unhappily the young brood of the eagle of the broken covenant were the worst possible instruments for the working of a large and complex policy the last creatures in the world to be inade useful in carrying on a form of government which the experience of all ngcs has tried and found wanting

Yet how grand a scheme of western confederation might be deduced from the consideration of the position of Henry's children, how great a dream of conquest may after all have been broken by the machinations of Lewis and Lleanor! What might not a crusade have effected headed by Henry II, with his valuant sons, the first warriors of the age, with his sons in law, William the Lion, William of Sierly, and Alfonso of Castile. with Philip of France, the brother in law of his sons. Prederick Barbarossa, his distant Liusman and close ally, the princes of Champagne and Handers, his cousins? In it the grand imagestic chivalry of the emperor, the wealth of Sieily, the hardy valour and practical skill of Spain, the hereditary crusading ardour of the land of Godfrey of Bouillon and Stephen of Blois, the statesman like vigour and simple picty of the great Saxon hero, under the guidance of the eraft and sagacity, the mingled unimpetuosity and caution, of Henry II, might have presented I urope to Asia in a guise v high she has never yet assumed. Yet all the splendour of the family confederation, all the close woven, widespread web that fortune and sagnetty had joined to we eve, end in the cruel desertion, the baffled rage, the fittle curses of the chained leopard in the last scene at Chinon lawful sons, the offspring, the victims and the avengers of a heartless policy, the loveless children of a loveless mother have left the last duties of an affection this did not feel to the hands of a hastard—the child of an early, obscure, misplaced, degrading, but not a merecnary love (From the Preface to Ben-dictus Abhas )

Impartiality in a Historian

For my own part, I do not see why an honest partisan should not write an houest book if he can persuade him self to look honestly at his subject, and make allowance for his own prejudices. I know it is somewhat critical work, and a man who knows himself in one way may be quite ignorant of himself in another. I tale Hallam as an illustrious example. Hallam I nev lumself to be a political partisan, and, wherever he knew that political prejudice might darken his counsel, he guarded most carefully against it he did not claim the judicial character without fitting lumself for it, and where he knew himself to be sitting as judge he judged admirably, so admirably that the advanced advocates even of his own views have long ago thrown lilin over as too timed and temporising for their purpose. Yet where he was not awake to his own prejudice, in matters, for instance, regarding religion and the Church, in which he seems to have land no doubt about his own infallibility of negation, how ludicrously and transparently unfair he is I

I do not see any necessity for this I do not see why a man should not say once for all I like Charles I better than Ohver Cromwell, I like the cause for which Charles behaved himself to be contending better than that for which Cromwell strove Charles is attractive to me, Oliver is repulsive, Charles is my friend, Oliver is my foe but am I bound to maintain that my friend is always right and my enemy always wrong, am I bound to hold Charles for a saint, Oliver for a monster, and I bound mover to mention Charles without a sigh or Obver without a sneer, am I bound to concerl the faults of the one and to believe every calumny against the other? If you like, put it the other way, believe in the great Protestant statesman, treat Charles as the overrated fine centleman, the narrow minded advocate of a theory which he did not understand, the jug braded maintainer of a cause you dislike. You may be a partisan, but can you not believe that, if you believe your own side of the question, truth will be found on your side? Misrepre sentation, exaggeration, dishonesty of advocacy, will only disparace the presentment which you desire to make of your own convictions and your own preposes sions. Any, I would go further, and as I should like Charles better than Oliver even if his cause were less my own than I conceive it to be I am ready to stiel to my friends and yote against my unfriends, but why should I shut my eyes to the false and foolish things that my friends do, or to the noble aspirations, honests, and good intentions of the e whom I think wrong in their means and mistaken in their ends? Yet, as I began by saying, without some info ion of spite it seems as if history could not be uniten, that no man's zeal is ron ed to unite rules it is moved by the de ire to write down. Of course I scent to be stating extreme on a , but it is extreme cases that make their own advertisements, and that do the erent mischief. Here the study of angient history has its gient advantage over modern, yet battles are sall fought over the character of Tiberius, and the 'lues rehab tandi' has given a new reading to the history of Manus and (From Le tures e : Mediar sta d Medern Hut ir)

KICHARD LODGE

Walter Bagehot (1826-77) was born at Langport, Somerset, and from school at Bristol he passed in 1842 to University College, London, where he took his MA, in 1848, in 1852 he was called to the Bar, but joined his father as a banker and shipowner at langport. From Paris in 1851 he had written a series of letters justifying Napoleon's ce if d'état. Soon after he became a writer for the periodicals, and was associated with R. H. Hutton on the Aational Reciery In 1858 he married a drughter of Mr Wilson, founder of the Ecoromist newspaper, and from 1860 till his death he was ns editor. His works include The English Constitution (1867), a book of great value, translated into several foreign tongues, Phys es and Politics (1872), applying to politics the evolution theory, I ombard Strict (1873), a standard work on the money market, and three volumes of literary, biographical, and economic studies, with Memoir by R H Hutton (1879-81, new ed 1895) Brgeliot was an unconventional, original, and suggestive thinker, a trenchant but sagacious critic, and a vigorous and even brilliant writer. He was rendier than most contemporaries to give due weight to the historical and evolutionary aspects of things, he recognised the limitations of the Ricardian economics, and treated political economy as a science not of rigorous laws, but of tendencies There are essays on him in Mr Birrell's Miscel lantes (1902) and in Sir Leslie Stephen's Stuates of a Biographic (2nd series, 1902)

Samuel Rawson Gardiner (1829-1902), ie of the great historical specialists of his time, we in his career a supreme example of a life voted to the realisation of a great idea opley in Hants, he was educated at Winchester chool and at Christ Church, Oxford Quitting xford in 1855, lie married Isabella, youngest ughter of Edward Irving, the founder of the postolic Church, of which communion he became member, and held high place in its hierarchy 1 1874 he was appointed Professor of History in ing's College, London-1 post which he held for urteen years, and throughout the same period e acted as lecturer for the London Society for e Extension of University Teaching In 1882 he ceived a pension of £150 from the Government Mr Gladstone, and in 1884 All Souls College, Nord, elected him to a Research Fellowship On e death of Mr Froude in 1894 he was offered the egius Professorship of History at Oxford, but, on in his sixty-fifth year, he declined the honour rat he might devote himself to the great work This life. He lind honorary degrees from Oxford, dinburgh, and Gottingen

From the date of his leaving Oxford (1855) ardiner addressed himself to the task which he nremuttingly pursued to the close of his life-the istory of England from the accession of James I the Restoration. In 1865 the first instalment f the work appeared in two volumes, and their accessors followed at regular intervals till, in the ist year of his life, he was disabled by ill licalth . fragment of the third volume of his History f the Commonwealth and Protectorate (1654-66) as posthumously published in 1903 The great ork, thus so nearly brought to completion, is monument of patient, exact, and disinterested abour, but it was lifewise a labour of love which om first to last engaged the whole heart and and of its author. It was by natural affinity that fardiner selected the special period of English istory of which he has produced such a minute nd exhaustive record Of deep, though unobtruive, religious feeling, he was naturally attracted o a period when religion played so large a part the national development. His sympathies were ith the Parliament rather than with the Crown in he great controversy that cleft the English nation n twain, but he was of too fair a mind and too enial a temper to do injustice to any mode of hought or feeling, however alien to his own stimates of the Royalists Strafford and Montrose re as generous as his estimates of the Parliamen arians Pym and Hampden Of Cromwell, the lominating figure in his work, he has presented portruit which in many of its traits differs from hat of Carlyle, yet (due deduction made for the Carlylean emphasis) the lineaments presented in ooth portraits are essentially the same Sardiner, Cromwell was the 'most representative Englishman that ever lived'—typical of his countrymen by his innate conservatism and his statesmanship never determined by abstract theories, but by the immediate perception of actual fact

The greatness of Gardiner's work does not proceed from his power as a thinker or from his skill as a literary artist, it was by his passion for truth and accuracy, his candour and breadth of sympathy, his unwearying industry, that he achieved a work which must ever hold its place among the chief historical productions in English literature. In the sense in which the expression is now employed, Gardiner was not, and did not desire to be, a 'scientific historian'. He did not conceive it to be the duty of the historian to efface himself in the presentation of his materials, nor to eschew all expression of his own opinion on the events and actions he has to narrate. Everywhere he frankly pronounces his judgments, whether of condemnation or approval, and in so doing he held that he was discharging not the least important function of the historial. In his conception, if history was not directly didactic, the writing of it is a vain labour, and the true scientific historian is he who most conscientiously seeks to ascertain and present the lessons which the past has to offer

Other works of Mr Gardiner besides his principal History are The Thirty I cars' War and The First Two Stuarts ('Epochs of Modern History') Student's History of England, An Introduction to English History (in conjunction with Dr Bass Mullinger), and Cromwell's Place in History (being the first series of Ford Lectures delivered in 1896)

James Gairdner was born at Edmburgh in 1828, and at eighteen entered the Public Record Office in London, where he became assistant-keeper He has shown a rare combination of erudition, accuracy, and judicial temper in editing a long series of historical documents, not ibly the letters and papers of Richard III and Henry VII, and the continuation of Professor Brewer's calendar of Henry VIII The same qualities are seen in his own worls, which include The Houses of Lun caster and York (1874), Life of Richard III (1878), Studies in English History (1881, written in con junction with Spedding), Henry 111 (1889), and a History of the English Church in the Sixteenth Century (1902) He edited the 'Paston Letters' in 1874, and re edited them in 1901

Richard Holt Mutton (1826-97), son and grandson of Unitarian ministers, was born at I ceds, and studied at University College, London, at Heidelberg and Berlin, and under James Martineau at the Manchester New College was for some time a Unitarian preacher, became principal of a Nonconformist university hall, and edited a Unitarian periodical, but under the in fluence of T W Robertson and F D Maurice he was drawn farther and farther from do matic Unit irranism, and ultimately joined the Church of Lighand He wrote for the Prospective Review assisted in editing the Economist, and, with his friend Bagchot, the new quarterly Autrorai Retriew, besides teaching mathematics in Bedford College from 1856 till 1865. In 1861 he and Mr. Townsend became associated as proprietors and joint editors of the Spectator (founded in 1828), to which he gave the impress of his accomplished, resolute, devout mind. His department was literature, as his colleague's was politics, but both agreed in siding with the North against the South in the American Civil War, and thus for a time injured the success of their paper. Later, both editors greatly strengthened opposition to Irish Home Rule Hutton became more and more a champion of Christianity in every form against naturalism, and he came to sympathise more and more fully with the neo Catholic movement, and to revere Cardinal Newman - It was inevitable that he should have constant regard to ethical and religious interests in his judgments of men and movements, whether literary, social, or political, and he was perhaps stronger in sympathetic exposition than in pure criticism. He edited Bagehot's works and wrote a Memoir Ilis Studies in Parhament (1866), Essays, Theological and Literary (1871, 3rd ed 1888), Modern Guides of English Thought (1887), and Contemporary Thought and Thinkers (1894) were partially recast and republished from the periodicals, his monograph on Scott ('Men of Letters,' 1878) was his least effective publication See a 'memorial volume' by Mr Hogben (1899) and a study by Dr Robertson Nicoll (1903)

Mortimer Collins/1827-76), son of cPly mouth solicitor, was for years a mathematical master in Guernsey, but in 1856 he settled in Berl shire, and kept up in incess intactivity in articles, novels, and playful verses. Of his novels the chief are Sweet Anne Page (1863), Marqu's and Merchant (1871), I voo Plunges for a Pearl (1872), Mr Carington, by Robert Turner Cotton' (1873), Franchingration (1874), I rem Midnight to Midnight (1875), and A Fight with Loriume (1876). John Veitch, II D (1829-94), born at Pechles, studied at Ldinburgh, and became Professor of Logic and Rhetoric at St Andre 5 in 1860, we Glisgow in 1864. His words include a Henritof Sit IV Hamilton (1869), I reed and other Poems (1875), History and Pechry of the Scottish Border (1877, new ed 1803), I celling for Nature in Section Poems (1867) Weeling and other Peems (1867, Dualism and Morism (1895), and Lorier Essars (1896). See his Life by Mary Bryce (1896).

James Hannay (1827-73, born at Dumfres, and dismissed from the navy for insubordination, edited the Edit lingle Conart 1865-64, and from 1868 till his death was British consulat Barcelon. Of his novels the best are Surgictor Lorteney (1850) and I ustace Courers (1855) His Lectures on Satire and Satirists (1834) deal with satirists of all ages-Horace and Juvenal, Erasmus and Buch man, Butler and Swift, Moore and Byronand are not less remarkable for his appreciative insight than for his own satiric power Ling. from the Quarterly (1861) show wide knowledge ind fine literary sense, and, like all his works are lighted up with an extraordinary wealth of epigram, simile, and successive allusion, classical and other Other works were Tire Handred Leurs of a Norman [the Gurnes] House (1865) and Studies or Thackeray (1869). The essay prefixed by him to an edition of Poe's poens was an admirable piece of work. There is an appre cintion of his work in the Bookn are for 1893

Hem v Morlev (1822-94), the son of a London apothecary, was educated at the Moravian school of Neuwied-on-the-Rhine and King's College, London After practising medicine at Madeles 1844-48, and keeping school at Manchester and Liverpool, he settled down in London in 1850 to literary work His first publication was a volume of verse called Sunrise in Italy (1848), his next ventures were in the migrames—Household Words, All the Year Round, and the Lannuer, a series of articles on public health being published also as a book. He was successively sub-editor and editor of the Examiner (1859-64), and, English lecturer at King's College for eight vears, was for nearly quarter of a century (1865–89) Professor of English Literature there Meanwhile he published Lives of Pilissy (1852), Cardan (1854), Cornelius Agrippy (1856), and Clement Marot (1870), Memoirs of Baitholomer Fair (1857), and two volumes of fairy tales (1859-60) To another category belong the works by which he is best known -lus Luglish Writers (carried down in 10 vols to Shakespeare, 1864-94), A First Sketch of English Laterature (1873, which before his death reached its 34th thousand), his Library of English Literature (5 vols 1876-82), his English Literature in the Reign of Victoria (1881), besides four admirable series edited by him-Morley's Universal Library (63 vols at a shilling, 1883-88), Cassell's National Library (214 vols at threepence, 1886-90), the Carisbrooke Library (14 vols 1888-91), and Morley's Companion Poets (9 vols 1891-92) Larly Papers and Some Memories (1891) were largely autobiographical

David Masson, the biographer of Milton, was born at Aberdeen in 1822, and educated at Marischal College there and at the University of Edinburgh, where he studied theology under Dr Chalmers While still but a boy in years he was editing an Aberdeen weekly paper, for a time he was on the literary staff of the publishers of the present work, and to their 'Educational Course' he largely contributed, but by 1847 he had settled in London, and was busy writing for reviews, magraines, and encyclopredias. In 1852 he suc ceeded to the clinir of English Literature in University College, vacated by A. H. Clough, in 1865 he was appointed to the corresponding chair in Edinburgh University, and this post he held till he retired from active work in 1895. From 1859 till 1868 he edited Macmillan's Magazine, his first published work, Essays, Biographical and Critical, saw the light in 1856, and was reprinted with other essays in 1874-76 in three volumes named from 'Wordsworth, Shelley, and Keats,' 'The Three Devils - Luther's, Milton's, and Goethe's,' and But his greatest life-'Chatterton' respectively work is the magistral Life of John Millon, which justly claimed to be 'narrated in connection with the Political, Ecclesiastical, and Literary History of his Time,' admittedly the most complete biog raphy extant of any Englishman, it has well been called 'a noble and final monument to the poet's memory' The six volumes which it comprises appeared between the years 1859 and 1880, and, resting as they do on wide and laborious researches, present a marvellous compendium of material invaluable for the study not merely of Milton's life, but for all contemporary history -political, social, literary, theological A three-volume edition of Milton's poems (1874, new ed 1890) was followed by two smaller editions Amongst Professor Masson's other works are books on the British novelists (1859), on recent British philosophy (1865), an exhaustive study of Drummond of Hawthornden (1873), a volume of Edinburgh Sketches and Memories (1892), and the admirable little book on De Quincey in the 'Men of Letters' series Personally and in his Writings (1885) bore testimony to a still more memorable friendship Masson !

edited the standard edition of De Quincey's works (1889-90), and as editor of the register of the Priva Council of Scotland from 1879 till 1898 lie put much admirable historical work into the exhaustive but luminous introductions to the annual volumes pub hshed under his charge. He delivered the Rhind Lectures in 1885, and was appointed royal historiographer of Scotland in 1893 In London he had been the zerlous secretary of the Irrends of Italy, in Edinburgh he took an active part in promoting the higher education of women, and a succession of eminent writers revere him as a spiritual fither A vigorous and original thinker, a learned, sagacious, and open-minded historian, he has accepted the high responsibility and maintained the dignity of the true man of letters, and has from the first been recognised as an author of weight, as a critic of exceptional breadth and sanity

Strafford's Doom,

The plot having been discovered, and those concerned in it having fled, the consequent indignation of the two Houses, backed by a perfect tumult in London, and eries of 'Justice, Justice,' from excited mobs in the streets was fatal to Strafford Knowing this, and that an attempt to bribe the Lieutenant of the Tower had failed, he him self wrote, on the 4th of May, to the King, expressing resignation to his fate, and only recommending his four young children to his Majesty's protection. On the 8th the Bill of Attainder passed the Lords in a thin House All then depended on the King.

It is not for a historian to be very ready with opinions as to what a king, or any other person, might, could, or should have done on this or that occasion there can be no doubt. All the sophistication in the world cannot make a doubt. If ever there may be a moment in a man's life when, with all the elamour of a nation urging to an act, all personal and State reasons persuading to it as expedient, and all the pressure of eir cumstances impelling to it as inevitable, still even they who would approve of the act in itself must declare that for that man to do it were dastardly, such a moment had To dare all, to see London and I'ng come for Charles land in uproar, to lose throne, life, and everything, rather than assent to the death of his minister, was Charles's plain duty Strafford lind been his ablest minister by for, had laboured for him with heart and head, had made the supremacy of the Crown the cause of his life, not an act he had done, one may say, but was with Charles's consent, or his implied command and approba tion, and it was in trust in all this, and in the royal promise that 'not a hair of his head should be touched,' that Strafford, against his own better judgment, had run the risk of coming to London If the words 'honour' and 'fidelity' have any meaning, there was but one right course for the king. How did he behave? On Sunday the 9th of May he had a consultation with Juxon, Usher, and Williams, as spiritual advisers, and with his Privy Conneillors generally, respecting his scruples of conscience Juxon and Usher gave him the manly advice that, if his conscience did not consent to the net, he ought not to do it, Williams drew some distinction or other between 'public conscience' and 'private conscience.' The sophistry helped Charles appointed a commission, consisting of Arundel and other lords, to give his assent to the Bill the next day On the 11th, however, he sent the young Prince of Wales to the Lords with a last message in Strafford's behalf would be 'an unspeakable contentinent,' lie said, if the Lords and Commons would agree to change Strafford's punishment into close imprisonment for life, on pun of death without farther process on the least attempt to 'If no less escape or to communicate with the King than his life can satisfy my people,' the letter ended, 'I must say Frat justitia, and then there was a postscript, suggesting at least a reprieve till Saturday request was granted, and on Wednesday the 12th of May that proud eurly head, the casket of that brain of power, rolled on the scaffold on Tower Hill

William Young Sellar (1825-90), born near Golspie in Sutherland, was educated at Edinburgh Academy, Glasgow University, and, as a Snell exhibitioner, at Balliol He graduated at Oxford with a classical first, in 1850 was elected a Fellow of Oriel, next acted as assistant professor at Durham, Glasgow (1851-53), and St Andrews (1853-59), filled for four years the Greek chair at St Andrews, and was elected in 1863 to the Latin chair at Edinbuigh He made his name widely known by his brilliant Roman Poets of the Republic (1863, enlarged 1881), which was followed by The Roman Poets of the Augustan Age -Virgil (1877) and Horace and the Elegiac Poets (1892), the latter left unfinished at his death, and edited by his nephew, Mr Andrew Lang, with a brief memoir in which it is said, not amiss, that his first book would, in France, have given him probably a claim to membership of the Academy'

John Configton (1825-69), born at Boston, was five years at Rugby, and while at Magdalen College, Oxford, carried off the Hertford and Ireland scholarships (1844) In 1846 he migrated to University College, where in 1848 he was elected Determining not to take orders, he tried า Fellow the study of law, but soon abandoned it, and was Latin professor at Oxford from 1854 until his untimely death at his native place. His greatest work is his edition of Virgil (3 vols 1861-68), with its singularly subtle and suggestive essays. It is as a skilful verse translator that he is best known, not so much for his metrical version of Horace's odes as for his rendering of the Eneid (1866), in Scott's ballad nietre-perhaps as good in its way as a verse translation by one not born a poet could be. He published also a prose translation of the Aneud He further completed Worsley's translation of the Ihad in the Spenserian stanza, and Englished Horace's Satires and Epistles admirably in the couplet of Pope. In 1872 appeared his edition of Persius and his Miscellaneous Writings, with a short Life of him by Professor H J S Smith

Thomas Edward Brown (1830-97), son of the incumbent of a small living at Douglas in the Isle of Man, was educated on the island till he came (as servitor) to Christ's Church College,

He won a double first, was elected a Oxford Fellow of Oriel, and after teaching in the Isle of Man and at Gloucester, where Henley was one of his pupils, spent thirty years (1863-92) as a master at Clifton College The rest of his life he spent in his beloved native island. His poetic temper was finer and richer than his poetic achieve ment, even his tenderest and most touching verses being somewhat rugged in form Some of his lyrics are admirable, his notablest works were narrative poems in Manx English Betsy Lee appeared in Macmillan's Magazine in 1873, and with other poems was included in Focsele Yarus Other collections were named from The Doctor (1887), The Manx Witch (1889), and Old John (1893), and all his poems were collected in one volume in 1900 His native humour, his warm love of nature and of the hills and winds and waves of Man, overflow into the two volumes of his letters published in 1900, with an introductory Memoir by Mr S T Irwin

James Payn (1830-98) was the son of a clerk to the Thames Commissioners, did not learn much at Eton, but was crammed successfully for Wool Health failing, he resolved to take orders, and while reading with a private tutor in Decon shire sent a contribution to Household Words, thus began the friendship with Dickens which influenced him for life. At Trinity College, Cam bridge, where he graduated in 1852, he published two volumes of verse, and finally decided to live by literature He wrote industriously for the magazines, and in 1859 became editor (first at Edinburgh, from 1861 in London) of Chambers's Journal, in which, till he withdrew in 1874, many of his stories and articles appeared. The Lost Sir Massingberd ran in the Journal in 1864, and attracted a great deal of notice. His best-known novel, By Proxy, appeared in 1878, and rested for its popularity more on its whimsical humour, its knowledge of men, its ingenious situations, than on special knowledge of Chinese life. In 1882 to 1896 he was Sir Leslie Stephen's successor as editor of Cornhill Of his other sixty novels the following are some of the most successful A Woman's Vengeance, Carlyon's Year, Not Wooed but Won, Thicker than Water, The Talk of the Town, The Heir of the Ages, A Modern Dick Whittington (1892), A Trying Patient (1893), and In Market Overt (1895) His weekly column of literary and other miscellanea was long a feature of the Illustrated London News Some Literary Recollections (1886) and Gleants of Memory (1894) are autobio graphical, and there is an admirable biographical introduction by Sir Leslie Stephen to The Backwater of Life, a volume of essays by Payn pub lished in 1900

Sir John Skelton (1831–97) was born in Edinburgh, called to the Scottish Bar in 1854, and in 1892 became chairman of the Local Government Board for Scotland, of which he had been secretary from 1868 Amongst his works were a defence of Mary Stuart (1876), sumptuous Lives of her (1893) and Charles I (1898), besides Mailland of Lethington (1887, a brilliant and picturesque but strongly biassed book), The Crookit Meg (1880, a graphic story of life at Peterhead, originally published in Fraser's Magazine), and the Table Talk of Shirley (1895–96) He wrote also on Dryden and on Bolingbroke, and was closely associated with Blackwood's Magazine, and, a friend and correspondent of Mr Froude's, he was made K.C.B in the year of his death

Edmund Yates (1831-94), born at Edinburgh, the son of the actor-manager Frederick Henry Yates, from 1847 till 1872 had a berth in the Post-Office, being for ten years chief of the missingletter department Busily engaged in journalism -mainly as dramatic critic-by 1854, he became widely known as author of an offensively personal article on Thackeray He produced many dramatic pieces, and published over a score of novels and other works, including Broken to Harness, Running the Gauntlet, and Black Sheep, was editor of Temple Bar, Tinsley's, and other periodicals, and in 1874 founded, with Grenville Murray, a successful 'society' weekly, The World, which, for a libel on Lord Lonsdale, involved him in 1884 in two months' imprisonment. The same year he issued his Recollections and Experiences

Laurence Oliphant was born at Capetown in 1829 Both his parents belonged to Scottish families of distinction His father was Sir Anthony Oliphant, at that time Attorney General at the Cape, afterwards, Chief-Justice of Ceylon mother was a daughter of Colonel Campbell of the 72nd Highlanders An only child, the idol of his parents, he was nurtured in such luxury that, had it not been for their religious disposition and the essential purity of his own character, he could hardly have escaped moral rum-the common fate of spoiled children As it was, it took him many years to fully realise that life held any responsibility for him more serious than that of amusing himself in relatively innocent ways was a traveller from his childhood-coming from Capetown to England at a very early age, and rejoining his parents in Ceylon when he was twelve years old Five years later he was about to enter Cambridge University, when his parents decided on a two years' tour through Europe, whereupon he persuaded them that from an educational point of view it would be best for him to accompany From that time forward, for twenty years, he was, to use his own description, 'a rolling stone' through Europe, Africa, Asia, and America Of the many important wars and revolutions of that stirring period there were few that he did not participate in, either actively or as an observer He conspired with Garibaldi and saw Victor Emmanuel crowned When war broke out with Russia he hastened to the Crimea. In 1856 he was assisting a filibustering adventure in Nicaragua, and narrowly escaped hanging Failing to enter Parliament at the general election of 1857, he joined Lord Elgin's embassy to China, calling on the way at India, where the Mutiny was in progress In China he accompanied the squadron which captured the Peiho forts, and was one of the party which scaled the walls of Tientsin he was in Yedo as one of the British Legation, and in that famous midnight assault with which the Japanese tried to expel the unwelcome foreigners he was severely wounded. After participating in the Polish insurrection of 1863 and the war in Schleswig-Holstein in 1864, he returned to London, meaning to enter Parliament. Well born, personally attractive, brilliant as a writer, witty and genial, he was already a fivourite in the fishionable world, and it seemed as though the highest social and political honours were at his disposal He entered the House of Commons as member for the Stirling Burghs, and was regarded with reason as amongst the most promising of coming Liberal statesmen

About this time, however, occurred a turningpoint in Oliphant's career He came under the influence of Mr Thomas Lake Harris, then an obscure preacher of mystical doctrines. The man of pleasure, careless but not vicious, was awakened by this teacher to a consciousness of some of the deeper realities of existence. Up to thirty-eight years of age Oliphant had been possessed by an absorbing passion for knowing whatever could be It had been a period of learning, of pre paration-a prolonged boyhood Of the meaning of life he had hardly begun to think But he had learned much, and qualified himself, as he said, to be 'a citizen of the world by an extended knowledge of it,' and, when he came to settle down, Mayfair and Parliament proved, by comparison, The long preparation had qualified him for something larger and better than anything they could offer, their prizes, precious to others, did not allure him When, at the moment of disillusion, Mr Harris opened out to him visions of broader and nobler possibilities in new worlds yet unexplored, he appealed alike to his conscious need and his love of adventure In 1867 he startled London society by his sudden departure for America, where he joined the community of the Brotherhood of the New Life at Brocton, on the shores of Lake Erie. He had thrown in his lot with Mr Harris, and with characteristic im petuosity and thoroughness had cast away his worldly prospects to work thenceforward, for the remainder of his days, for the regeneration, first of himself, and afterwards, when self-renunciation had qualified him, for the regeneration of mankind The basis of his philosophy and religion was a belief that there were latent forces in nature which could be utilised in the interests of the human race, but, misused, would prove to be sources of The first condition for successful grave peril work in this direction was absolute personal purity of life On the mystical doctrines of 'open breathing' and the 'two in one' which entered largely into Oliphant's beliefs it is not necessary to enlarge. He associated himself also with certain phases of spiritualism, disclaiming the authorship of some of his later books on the ground that he was simply the 'writing medium'. From the time he abandoned London society he lived a cheerful and even joy ous life in the service of others. By many of his friends his career, thus diverted at the hour of its brightest promise, was counted a failure, but Oliphant himself thought otherwise, and, considering what he gained by the renunciation, he counted the world well lost.

Oliphant's mother, Lady Oliphant, became a member of the Brotherhood of the New Life a year later than himself. In 1872 he was married to Alice le Strange, of Hunstanston, Norfolk, who also joined the community. Lady Oliphant died in 1881, and in the same year Oliphant and his wife severed their connection with Mr Harris. The following year they established a settlement at Haifa in Palestine, where, in 1886, Mrs Oliphant died. In August 1888 Oliphant was married to Rosamond, daughter of Robert Dale Owen, and granddaughter of the famous Robert Owen. Two days later he was seized with a severe illness, and before the close of the year he died.

Oliphant's contributions to literature were numerous, they included books of travel, graphically written, some clever satires on society, and two novels scarcely so successful His chief works are The Russian Shores of the Black Sea (1853), The Transcaucasian Campaign of the Turkish Army under Omer Pasha (1856), Narrative of the Earl of Elgis's Mission to China and Japan (1859), Patriots and Filibusters (1860), Piccadilly (1866), The Land of Gilead (1880), Traits and Travesties (1882), Altiora Peto, a novel (1883), Sympneumata (1885), Haifa, or Life in Modein Palestine (1885), Masollam, a novel (1886), Scientific Religion (1888) The authorised biography is the Memoir (2 vols 1891) by Mrs Oliphant the novelist, who justly acknowledges her inability to understand the mystical philosophy which had so important a bearing on Oliphant's character and career

A Filibustering Expedition.

It was on the last day of the year [1857] that the good ship Texas eleared out of New Orleans with three hun dred emigrants on board. At least we called ourselves emigrants—a misnomer which did not prevent the civic authorities, with the city marshal at their head, trying to stop us, but we had the sympathies of the populace with us, and under their regis laughed the law to seorn. It would have been quite clear to the most simple minded observer what kind of emigrants we were the day after we got out to sea and the men were put through their squad drill on deck. There were Englishmen who had been private soldiers in the Crimea, Poles who had fought in the last Polish insurrection, Hungarians who had fought under Kossuth, Italians who had struggled through the revolutions of '48, Western 'boys' who had just had six months' fighting in Kansas, while of the 'balance' the majority had been in one or other of the Lopez expeditions to Cuba Many could exhibit bullet wounds and sword cuts, and scars from manacles, which they considered no less honourable - notwithstanding all which, the strictest order prevailed. No arms were allowed to be carried There were nlways two officers of the day who walked about with swords buckled over their shooting jackets, and sixteen men told off as a guard to maintain discipline. Alas the good behaviour and fine fighting qualities of these amiable emigrants were destined to be of no avail, for on our arrival at the mouth of the San Juan River we found a British squadron lying at anchor to keep the peace, and the steamer by which we hoped to ascend the river in the hands of our enemies, the Costa Ricans Just before sunsct we observed, to our dismay, a British man of war's boat pull ing towards us, and a moment later Captain Coekburn, of II M S Cossack, was in the explain's cabin, making most indiscreet inquiries as to the kind of emigrants we It did not require long to satisfy him, and as I incautiously hazarded a remark which betrayed my nationality, I was incontinently ordered into his boat as a British subject, being where a British subject had no right to be As he further announced that he was about to moor his ship in such a position as would enable him, should fighting occur in the course of the night, to fire into both combatants with entire impar tiality, I the less regretted this abrupt parting from my late companions, the more especially as, on asking him who commanded the squadron, I found it was a distant cousin. This announcement on my part was received with some incredulity, and I was taken on board the Orion, an 80 gun ship, carrying the fing of Admiral Erskine, to test its veracity, while Captain Cockburn made his report of the Texas and her passengers. As soon as the Admiral recovered from his amazement at my appearance, he most kindly made me his guest, and I spent a very agreeable time for some days, watching the 'emigrants' disconsolately pacing the deek, for the Costa Ricans gave them the slip in the night and went up the river, and their opponents found their occupation gone Poor Walker he owed all his misfortunes, and finally his own untimely end, to British interference, for on his return to Central America, where he intended to make Honduras the base of his operations, he was cap tured at Truxillo by Captnin (now Sir Nowell) Salmon, and handed over to the Hondurus Government, who meontinently hanged him This was the usual fate which followed failure in this country, and those who fought in it knew they were doing so with a rope round their necks-which doubtless improved their fighting qualities I did not know, however, until my return to England, that rumour had accredited me with so tragic an end, when, at the first party I went to, my partner, a very charming young person, whom I was very glad to see again after my various adventures, put out two fingers by way of greeting, mised her eyebrows with an air of mild surprise, and said in the most silvery and unmoved voice, 'Oh, how d'ye do? I thought you were hung!' I think it was rather a disappointment to her that I was not. There is a novelty in the sensation of nn old and estcemed dancing partner being hanged, and it forms a pleasing topic of conversation with the other ones. (From Episodes in a Life of Ad enture)

WALTER LEWIN

Thomas William Robertson (1829-71) was born at Newark-on-Trent of a family that had for generations produced actors and actresses, and was himself brought up almost on the boards In 1848 the Lincoln circuit, with which his father was connected, ceased to pay, the company was broken up, and Tom came to London There and elsewhere he struggled for a living, acting as prompter and stage manager, writing unsuccessful plays, acting himself, writing for newspapers and magazines (Fun amongst them), translating French plays, and so forth, but he never became an actor of mark. His first success as a dramatist-when he was seriously thinking of becoming a tobacconist -was with David Garrick in 1864, the title-rôle of which was one of Sothern's great things Spite of its name, this was substantially an adaptation from the French, and it was followed by a more original study of English Bohemianism, his comedy Society, first produced at Liverpool (1865), and received there and in London with the warmest approval. Ours (1866), produced by the Bancrofts at the Prince of Wales's Theatre in London, thoroughly estab lished Robertson's fame, and from that time his pen was kept incessantly busy Caste (1867), Play (1868), School (1869), MP (1870)—all brought out by the Kendals at the Prince of Wales's, and Home (1869) and Dreams (1869), the former at the Haymarket, the latter at the Gaiety, were all equally But in the midst of his triumphs the successful His best comedies-notably Caste author died. and School-still retain their popularity, which rests on the excellence of their construction and stagecraft, their merry humour, their healthy tone, their happy contrasts, and the sunny spirit that shines through them His Principal Dramatic Works were published with a Memoir by his son in two volumes in 1880, and a more formal biography, his Life and Writings, by Pemberton in 1893

Henry James By1on (1834-84), the son of a British consul in the West Indies, was born in Manchester, and entered the Middle Temple in 1858, but became famous as a prolific and popular writer of burlesques and extravaganzas He wrote extensively for periodicals, was the first editor of Fun, and leased several theatres, where he produced more ambitious plays, in which he himself occasionally appeared-comedies or domestic dramas of a sort, enlivened by the smart dialogue and brisk incidents of farce The best was Cyril's Success (1868), the most successful, Our Boys, which had an unprecedented run in London for more than four years (from the beginning of 1875) The Upper Crust suited Toole admirably Byron excelled in depicting Cockney vulgarity, his dialogue is usually clever and amusing, but overladen with repartee and puns, for which he readily sacrificed probability and appropriateness plots have a considerable measure of originality and ingenuity, and even of human interest, but are always artificial and often mane. His verse was uniformly poor, and his work showed altogether a serious falling off from the standard even of Robertson

John Nichol (1833-94), son of a Glasgow professor of astronomy, was educated at Glasgow and Balliol College, Oxford, and from 1862 to 1889, when he resigned, was Professor of English Literature in Glasgow University Hannbal (1873), a drama, was his first notable achievement, The Death of Themistocles, and other Poems (1881), his next But, a pithy and accomplished writer both in verse and prose, he was known also as author of little books on Byron ('Men of Letters,' 1889), on Burns, and on Carlyle, and of a history of American literature (1882), originally contributed to the ninth edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica Professor Knight published a Life of him in 1896

Roden Nocl (1834–94)—in full the Hon Roden Berkeles Wriothesley Noel—was a son of the Lord Barham made Earl of Gainsborough in 1841, and graduated from Trinity College, Cambridge Behind the Veil (1863) was the first of a series of more than half a dozen poems or books of poems (including Songs of the Heights and Deeps and A Little Child's Monument), besides a drama in verse. There was also from the same pen a volume of Essays on various poets from Chatterton to Whitman, and a short Life of Shelley, and Mr Roden Noel edited selections from Spenser and from Otwav's plays

Joseph Henry Shorthouse (1834-1903) was born at Birmingham, and became a chemical manufacturer there He was profoundly interested in religious questions, bred a Quaker, he was as a grown man baptised into the Church of England The greater part of his working life he devoted to business, though to literature he gave of his best It was not till 1881, when he was within measurable distance of fifty, that his romance John Inglesant, on which he had been engaged for many years, and which had been privately printed the year before, carried his name over England, and people asked in surprise, 'Can such a thing come out of Birmingham, and be by a Birmingham manufacturer?' For the work was a protest in a modern and materialistic age and country in favour of old-world High Church religious fervour, chivalrous devotion to a sovereign, and holy reverence for woman. It awakened echoes in unlikely quarters, and stirred all readers who realise the eternal conflict between flesh and spirit mystical romance would never have been printed but for the urgency of Mr Shorthouse's friends, when submitted to James Payn it was rejected as defective in structure and lacking in the ele ments of popularity. It never was popular in the ordinary sense, yet a sale of over 80,000 copies had by 1901 testified to a grip on contemporary thought that was more than a success d'estime Little Schoolmaster Mark (1883-84) met with no such acceptance, not can Sir Percival (1886) be pronounced an artistic triumph, spite of its restrained power and the delicate, over-refined style which marked it and all the author's works The Countess Eve (1888) showed more of the author's characteristically tender spiritual suggestion A Teacher of the Violin (1888), Blanche, Lady Falaise (1891), prefaces or introductions to Herbert's Temple (1882), an essay on The Platonism of Wordsworth (1882), a translation from Molinos (1883), and one or two other republications practically exhaust the list of his published works

The Earl of Lytton (EDWARD ROBERT BULWER LYTTON, 1831-91), son of the first Lord Lytton (page 332), was educated at Harrow and at Bonn, and in 1849 went to Washington as attaché

and private secretary to his uncle, Sir Henry Bulwer. subsequently he was attaché, secretary of legation, consul or chargé d'affaires at Florence, Paris, the Hague, St Petersburg and Constantinople, Vienna, Belgrade, Athens, Lisbon, Madrid, and Paris 1873 he succeeded his father as second Lord Lytton, and in 1876 became Viceroy of India. Made Earl of Lytton on his resignation in 1880, he was in 1887 sent as ambassador to Paris, and there he died With more of the poetic equipment than his father possessed-imaginative vigour, facility of expression, metrical skill and grace he yet never seemed to put his best strength into his poems, which were to the last the work of a brilliant amateur His works, published mostly under the pseudonym of 'Owen Meredith,' include Clytemnestra (1855), a dramatic poem, The Wanderer, Lucile (1860), a novel in verse, probably his most successful work, a volume of what were called 'translations from the Servian,' The Ring of Amasis, a prose romance, Orval, or the Fool of Time, Fables in Song, Glenaveril (1885), an epic of modern life, in which, perhaps, he most nearly succeeded in imprining character and individuality on his work, After Paradise (1887), Maiah (1892), and King Poppy (1892) A selection from his poems by Miss M Betham Edwards appeared in 1890. He left his biography of his father incomplete—but only too complete on the unhappy relations between his father and mother

Charles Stuart Calverley (1831-84), prince of parodists, was the son of the Rev Henry Blayds, who in 1852 took the name of Calverley Martley in Worcestershire, from Harrow he passed to Balliol College, Oxford, whence in 1852 (the over exuberance of his boyish spirits having come into conflict with academic discipline-he would jump over the college walls) he migrated to Christ's College, Cambridge. He won the Craven and other distinctions, graduated as second classic in 1856, and in 1858 was elected a Fellow of his At the university he was famous less for his scholarship, brilliant though it was (for he was not so industrious as he might have been), than for his gifts as a writer of clever verse, as a musician, as a caricaturist, as a talker, and as an athlete. The famous Pickwick paper (in answering which Professor Skeat was first and Sir Walter Besant second) was one of his happiest jena d'espiti in prose, and was set in 1857, when he was a don. In 1865 he was called to the Bar, and settled in London, but a neglected fall on the ice at Oulton Hall, Leeds (his father-in-law's place), in the winter of 1866-67 put an end to what might have been an exceptionally brilliant career, for the remaining seventeen years of his life lie was a confirmed invalid, the original concussion of the brain being followed by other maladies One of the most gifted men of his time, and unrivalled as a humourist, Calverley will be remembered by his two little volumes, Verses and Translations (1862) and Fly-Leaves (1872) His serious verse is much of it very admirable, but it is for his humorous verses in various kinds that C S C is best known His parodies, particularly that of to the world Jean Ingelow, were obviously the best that had appeared since the Rejected Addresses, and in their own line are unequalled in modern English literature, innumerable as his imitators have been. Calverley's parodies have the highest qualities parodies can have they depend not on a bur lesque reproduction of the words or rhythms parodied, on the evaggeration of mannerisms, the caricaturing of mere externals, but get wonderfully near the whole spirit of the originals work exhibits a singular combination of delicate insight, creative imagination, genial but trenchant satire, lightness of touch, and mastery of rhythms Some of his parodies are poems themselves ripe scholarship found admirable expression in his numerous renderings from and into Latin and

Greek, and his Theocritus (1869) displays also his facile mastery of English verse. His Laterary Remains were published in 1885, with a Memoir by his brother-in-law, Sir W J Sendall, and reminiscences of Calverley by friends such as Dr Buller, Sir John Seeley, and Sir Walter Besant. An edition of the Complete Works appeared in 1901. The first of the examples quoted below, in which Rossetti's ballad manner is playfully 'taken off,' appeared in Chambers's Journal in 1869, the other is one of those in which some of Miss Ingelow's weaknesses were made fun of

Ballad

The auld wife sat at her ivied door,
(Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)
A thing she had frequently done before,
And her spectacles by on her approved knees

The piper he piped on the hill top high, (Butter and eggs and a found of cheese)
Till the cow said 'I die,' and the goose ask'd 'Why?'
And the dog said nothing, but search'd for fleas

The farmer he strode through the square farmyard, (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

His last brew of ale was a trifle hard—

The connexion of which with the plot one sees.

The farmer's daughter hath frank blue eyes, (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

She hears the rooks can in the windy skies,

As she sits at her lattice and shells her peas

The farmer's daughter both ripe red hips
(Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)
If you try to approach her, away she skips
Over tables and chairs with apparent ease

The farmer's daughter both soft brown hair, (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

And I met with a ballad, I can't say where,
Which wholly consisted of lines like these

She sat with her hands 'neath her dimpled cheeks, (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

And spake not a word While a lady speaks

There is hope, but she didn't even sneeze

She sat, with her hands 'neath her crimson checks, (Butter and eggs and a found of cheese)
She gave up mending her father's breeks,
And let the cat roll in her new chemise

She sat, with her hands 'neath her burning checks, (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

And gized at the piper for thirteen weeks,

Then she follow'd him out o'er the misty leas

Her sheep follow'd her, as their tails did them (Butter and eggs and a pound of cheese)

And this song is consider'd a perfect gem,

And as to the meaning, it's what you please.

Lovers and a Reflection.

In moss prankt dells which the sunbeams flatter (And heaven it knoweth what that may mean, Meaning, however, is no great matter)
Where woods are a tremble, with rifts atween,

Thro' God's own heather we wonn'd together, I and my Wilhe (O love my love) I need hardly remark it was glorious weather, And flitter bats waver'd alow, above

Boats were curtseying, rising, bowing, (Boats in that climate are so polite), And sands were a ribbon of green endowing, And O the sun dazzle on bark and bight '

Thro' the rare red heather we danced together, (O love my Wilhe!) and smelt for flowers

I must mention again it was gorgeous weather, Rhymes are so scarce in this world of ours—

C S CALVERLEY

By permission of Messts G Bell & Sons.

By rises that flush'd with their purple fix ours, Thro' beeks that brattled o'er grasses sheen, We walked and waded, we two young shavers, Thanking our stars we were both so green

We journeyed in parallels, I and Wilhe, In fortunate parallels! Butterflies, Hid in weltering shadows of daffodilly Or marjoram, kept making peacock eyes

Song birds darted about, some inky
As coal, some snowy (I ween) as curds, .
Or rosy as pinks, or as roses pinky —
They reck of no eerie To come, those birds!

But they skim over bents which the mill stream washes, Or hang in the lift 'neath a white cloud's hem, They need no parasols, no goloshes,

And good Mrs Trimmer she feedeth them

Then we thrid God's cowslips (as erst His heather)
That endowed the wan grass with their golden blooms,
And snipt—(it was perfectly charming weather)—
Our fingers nt Fnte and her goddess glooms

And Willie 'gnn sing (O, his notes were fluty, Wasts fluttered them out to the white wing'd sea)—
Something made up of rhymes that have done much duty, Rhymes (better to put it) of 'ancientry,'

Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828-82), christened Charles Gabriel Dante, was the eldest son and second child of Gabriele Rossetti, Italian scholar and patriot, who spent the last thirty years of his life in evile in London, and of Frances Polidori, the sister of Lord Byron's friend. In blood Rossetti was three-fourths Italian, the English strain coming through his mother's mother, whose muiden name was Pierce. He was born in London, and educated at King's College School, early took to painting, and in 1846 entered the antique school of the Royal Academy, where he made the acquaintance of William Holman Hunt and John Everett Millais By his personal magnet sm and his enthusiasm for the conversion of others to his own ideas, Ros setti was a natural leader of men, and he has the best title to be regarded as the founder of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, a movement to do away in painting with the grandiose conceptions and fluent technique of the Academies of Art, and to recapture something of the religious intensity and humble, painstaking attention to detail of the early Italian painters The immediate occasion, says Mr Holman Hunt, of the founding of the Brotherhood was the discovery, at Millais' house, of a book of engravings of the frescoes in the Campo Santo at Pisa. The short-lived magazine, The Germ, was planned in 1849 to promulgate the ideas of the Brotherhood, and in 1851 Mr Ruskin wrote to the Times to defend them from the contumely that they had already excited Rossetti's first oil-painting, 'The Girlhood of Mary Virgin, belongs to the year 1849, before this date he had produced some of his finest poetic work, notably The Blessed Damozel and The Portrait For the next ten years he worked hard at poetry and painting, and in 1861 published his first volume of translations, The Early Italian Poets The publication of his original poems was delayed by the death of his wife, Elizabeth Eleanor Siddal, who died in 1862, less than two years after their marriage. In the despair of his grief Rossetti buried the manuscript poems, many of which had been written for her, in her coffin Some seven years later he yielded to the persuasions of his friends and permitted them to be disinterred. The volume entitled Poems was published in 1870, and became the centre of fierce controversy. In 'The Fleshly School of Poetry,' an article contributed to the Contemporary Review (October 1871) over the signature 'Thomas Maitland,' and reprinted separately, Mr Robert Buchanan stated the case of Rossetti's assulants, which, faintly outlined a year before ın wood's Magazine, was restated later in the Quarterly (1872), and, after his death, with even greater ferocity and rancour in the British Quarterly (1882) Apart from personal innuendo, these attacks charged Rossetti's poetry with gross animalism and vapid affectation It is not easy to understand why Mr Buchanan's assault should have affected Rossetti as it did, but from this he became habitually depressed and moody, more secluded 117 his habits, and addicted to the frequent use of chloral He had lived and worked in a circle of sympathy, and this covert attack, delivered by a professed poet, revealed to him, perhaps for the first time, the breadth and depth of the popular misunderstanding of poetry. He replied, in a moderate and serious vein, under the title 'The Stealthy School of Criticism' (Athenaum, 1871), showing that in his sonnets, if they be not garbled by malice, 'all the passionate and just delights of the body are declared—somewhat figuratively, it is true, but unmistakably—to be as naught if not ennobled by the concurrence of the soul at all times' Years later, in a private letter, Mr Buchanan admitted that he liad been 'most unjust' when he 'impugned the purity and mis conceived the passion of writings, too hurriedly read, and reviewed currente calamo'

From his wife's death onward Rossetti lived in Cheyne Walk, Chelsea, where for a short time he shared his house with Mr Swinburne, Mr George Meredith, and his brother, Mr W M Rossetti In 1874 he published Dante and his Circle, a volume of translations wonderful for their fidelity to the matter and form of the originals, and in

In this and in others of his early poems, as, for instance, World's Worth, there is a purity of diction and a slow distinctness of enunciation that bespeak deep passion. There is no 'flow of language,' it is the ebbing of the life-blood, drop by drop

Rossetti is most widely and generally known as the author of The House of Life These famous sonnets, which range through a great diversity of moods, have but one subject—the passion, and the mystery, and the sacrament of love between man and woman The passion is so intense that it bears the seal of tragic fate on its forehead even from its birth, like the love of Romeo and Juliet or of Tristan and Iseult As we are carried along these rapids we hear the distant roar of the doom ahead It is perhaps over-curious to speculate on the different completion that Rossetti might have given to The House of Life had fate dealt more gently with him, and carried him out safely among the pastures where the river is deep and silent and the voices of children are heard Perhaps his gain would have been our loss, for where the shadow falls deepest and the doom impends, his thought tightens its grasp, and his expression becomes almost Shakespearian in its tortuous and complex strength His poetry fulfils the requirements of his own famous saying, which makes 'fundamental brain work' an essential of all poetry glamour of his passion and the intoxication of his admirers with the strange beauty that he celebrates interfered for a time with the due recognition of his speculative genius. But it is on the strength of this foundation—on the range and power of his vision—that his best claim to a place among the English poets must be based The attention of the public is at all times easily lured from substance to accident, and the early Italian angels and archaic musical instruments have obscured the calm sweep of the horizon that surrounds them In The Blessed Damosel, written by a boy of eighteen, these lines might well startle a critic looking only for costume and conceits

> From the fixed place of Heaven she saw Time like a pulse shake fierce Through all the worlds.

Rossetti has that great 'negative capability' which Keats found lacking in Coleildge, the power of resting content in the contemplation of mystery, without any irritable striving after certainty and system. Some of his profoundest reflections have thus been mistaken, even by favourable critics, for commonplaces. Commonplaces are great truths which from the dullness and flimsiness of man's mind have lost their power to move. They regain that power in the mind of a poet. A tree outlives the generations of man, and there comes a man whom the thought excites

Ye, who have passed Death's haggard hills, and ye Whom trees that knew your sires have ceased to know And still stand silent —is it all a show,— A wisp that laughs upon the wall?

The Burden of Nineveh is a splendid piece of historical imagining. The great winged stone bulls of Nineveh, newly dug up, are seen by the poet as they are carried into the British Museum, and they beget in him a passion of reverie. Their shadow, under which Sennacherib has perhips knelt, is now thrown on the London flags.

Lo thou! could all thy priests have shown Such proof to make thy godhead known? From their dead Past thou liv'st alone, And still thy shadow is thine own, Even as of yore in Nineveh

When Satan showed all the kingdoms of the world to Christ, did the desolation of Nineveli, already ruined, not rebuke him? The poem is compacted of thought, down to the last line, in which there comes a sense of misgiving with regard to our own civilisation, when it shall be looked back upon by coming generations

Those heavy wings spread high,
So sure of flight, which do not fly,
That set gaze, never on the sky,
Those scriptured flanks it cannot see,
Its crown, a brow contracting load,
Its planted feet which trust the sod (So grew the image as I trod)
O Nineveh, was this thy God,— Thine also, mighty Nineveh?

Since the whole bulk of Rossetti's poetic work is comparatively small, its variety deserves notice. A Last Confession is a dramatic monologue, not unlike some of Browning's, but built round a single impression-the sense of horror awakened in the soul by the sound of a coarse, empty laugh, which reveals, as no sight can reveal it, the abode of lost souls The whole tragedy, it is easy to divine, was built up from this single experience. In The King's Tragedy and The White Ship two memorable historical tragedies are recited with Sister Helen and Eden concentrated power Bower tell weird stories of supernatural terror in a revived ballad metre, with varied refrains. Perhaps those critics are right who insist on the insuperable difficulties of modern attempts to revive the ballad The refrain, well suited for the broad and simple effects of the old ballads, is teased and varied in Sister Helen for the purposes of a more restless and critical poetry, and the old effect is lost. Lastly, in The Stream's Secret, Love's Nocturne, and many shorter poems Rossetti proves himself unsurpassed in the power of evoking emotions of wonder and pathos and mystery from the subtle music of words

It is customary to conclude the critical consideration of a poet by noticing his limitations, and by enlarging on what he did not accomplish, which is like saying the Lord's Prayer backwards by way of thank offering for his achievements Rossetti, it is truly said, 'deals with man little as a social being, and not much as an ethical being he knows (save here and there) of no care for the many, of no conflict between duty and desire, the interest of the many and the passion of one. But he expressed the passion of one—the passion of man, hungry at heart and islanded between two eternities—with a stress of thought, a lyrical fervour, and a high command of the manifold chords of language which have not often been matched in the annals of English poetry

Sonnet VII.-Supreme Surrender

To all the spirits of Love that wander by Along his love sown harvest field of sleep
My lady lies apparent, and the deep Calls to the deep, and no man sees but I
The bliss so long afar, at length so nigh, Rests there attained Methinks proud I ove must weep
When Tate's control doth from his harvest reap
The sacred hour for which the vears did sigh
First touched, the hand now warm around my neck Taught memory long to mock desire and lot Across my breast the abandoned hair doth flow,
Where one shorn tress long stirred the longing ache
And next the heart that trembled for its sake

Sonnet LV -Still-born Love

Lies the queen heart in sovereign overthrow

The hour which might have been jet might not be,
Which man's and woman's heart conceived and bore
Yet whereof his was barren,—on what shore Bides it the breaking of Time's weary sen?
Bondehild of all consummate joys set free,
It somewhere sighs and serves, and mute before
The house of Love, hears through the echoing door
His hours elect in choral consonancy

But lo! what wedded souls now hand in lindd
Together tread at last the immortal strand
With eyes where burning memory lights love home?
Lo! how the little outcast hour has turned And leaped to their and in their faces yearned —
'I am your child O parents, ye have come!'

Sonnet LXXIII.-The Choice

Think thou and act, to morrow thou shalt die.

Outstretched in the sun's warmth upon the shore,
Thou say'st 'Man's measured path is all gone o'er Up all his years, steeply, with strum and sigh, Man clomb until he touched the truth, and I,
Even I, am he whom it was destined for '
How should this be? Art thou then so much more Than they who sowed, that thou shouldst reap thereby?
Nay, come up hither—From this wave washed mound Unto the furthest flood brin look with me,
Then reach on with thy thought till it be drown'd Miles and miles distant though the last line be,
And though thy soul sail lengues and lengues beyond,— Still, leagues beyond those leagues, there is more sea

Sonnet LXXVII -Soul's Beauty

Under the arch of Life, where love and death, Terror and mystery, guard her shrine, I saw Beauty enthroned, and though her gaze struck awe,
I drew it in as simply as my breath
Hers are the eyes which, over and beneath,
The sky and sea bend on thee,—which can draw,
By sea or sky or woman, to one law,
The allotted bondman of her palm and wreath

This is that Lady Beauty, in whose praise Thy voice and hand shake still,—long known to thee
By flying hair and fluttering hem,—the beat Following her daily of thy heart and feet,
How passionately and irretrievably,
In what fond flight, how many ways and days!

Sonnet XCI -Lost on Both Sides

As when two men have loved a woman well,
Each hating each, through Love's and Death's deceit, Since not for either this stark inarriage sheet
And the long pauses of this wedding bell, Yet o'er her grave the night and day dispel
At last their feud forlorn, with cold and heat, Nor other than dear friends to death may fleet
The two lives left that most of her can tell—

So separate hopes, which in a soul had woold
The one same Peace, strove with each other long,
And Peace before their faces perished since.
So through that soul, in restless brotherhood,
They roam together now, and wind among Its bye streets, knocking at the dusty inns

My Sister's Sleep

She fell asleep on Christmas I ve
At length the long ingranted shade
Of weary cyclids overweigh d
The pain nought else might yet relieve

Our mother, who had lenned all day Over the bed from chime to chime Then raised herself for the first time, And as she sat her down, did pray

Her little work table was spread
With work to finish For the glare
Made by her candle, she had care
To work some distance from the bed

Without, there was a cold moon up,
Of winter radiance sheer and thin,
The hollow halo it was in
Was like an icy crystal cup

Through the small room, with subtle sound Of flume, by vents the fireshine drove
And reddened In its dim aleove
The mirror slied a electroes round

I had been sitting up some nights,
And my tired mind felt weak and blank,
Like a sharp strengthening wine it drank
The stillness and the broken lights

Twelve struck. That sound, by dwindling vears Heard in each hour, erept off, and then
The ruffled silence spread again,
Like water that a pebble stirs

Our mother rose from where she sat Her needles, as she had them down, Met lightly, and her silken gown Settled no other noise than that

'Glory unto the Newly Born!'
So, as said angels, she did say,
Because we were in Christmis Day,
Though it would still be long till morn.

Just then in the room over us.
There is as a pushing beel of clintes,
As some who had not unawares.
So late, now heard the hour, and rose.

With anxious softly stepping haste.
Our mother went where Margaret las,
Fearing the sound o'erhead—should they Have broken her long watched for rest!

She stopped an instant, calm, and turned, But suddenly turned lack again, And all her features seemed in pain With woo, and her eves gazed and yearned

For my part, I but had my face,
And held my breath, and spoke no word
There was none spoken, but I heard
The silence for a little space

Our mother bowed herself and wept
And both my arms fell, and I said,
'God knows I I new that she was dead'
And there, all white, my sister slept
Then kneeling upon Christians morn
A little after twelve o'clock,

We said, ere the first quarter struck, 'Christ's bles ing on the newly born'

The Sea-Limits

Consider the sea's listless chime
'Time's self it is, made audible,—
The murniar of the carth's own shell
Secret continuance sublime
Is the sea's end—our sight may pass
No furlong further—Since time was,
This sound hath told the lapse of time.

No quiet, which is death's,—it both the mournfulnes of ancient life, Linduring always at dull strife. As the world's heart of rest and wrath, Its painful pulse is in the sands. Last utterly, the whole sky stands, Grey and not known, along its path.

Listen alone beside the sea
Listen alone among the woods,
Those voices of twin solitudes
Shall have one sound able to thee
Hark where the informurs of thronged men
Surge and sink bael and surge again,—
Still the one voice of wave and tree

Gather a shell from the strown heach And listen at its lips, they sigh. The same desire and mystery, The echo of the whole sea's speech And all mankind is thus at heart. Not anything but what thou art. And Larth. Sea, Man, are all in each

The Cloud Confines

The day is dark and the night.
To him that would search their heart.
No his of eloud that will plat.
Nor morning song in the hight.
Only going alone.
To him wild shallows are slown,
Deep under deep taknown.
And height above und song heigh.

Still 11 key a, we pa,—
Strange to think by the way.
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we I now ou day?

The Past is over and fled Named new, we name it the old,
Thereof some tale hath been told,
But no word comes from the deal,
Whether at all they be,
Or whether as bond or free,
Or whether they too vere me,
Or by what spell they have sped
Still ve say as we go —

* Strange to think by the vay
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we I now one day?

What of the heart of linte

That beats in the breast O Time?—
Red strife from the furthe t prime,
And anguish of hierce debate,
War that shatters her slain,
And peace that grands them as grain,
And eyes fixed ever in vain
On the patiless eves of I are Still we say as a ego,—

Strange to think by the way,
What ever there is to I now,
That shall we I now one day.

What of the heart of love
That bleeds in thy breast, O Man?—
Thy kisses snatched neath the lan
Of fangs that mock them above,
Thy bells prolonged unto I wells,
Thy hope that a breath di pels,
Thy bitter forlorn farewells
And the empty echoes thereof?
Still we say as we go,—
"Strange to think by the vay,
Whatever there is to know,
That shall we know one day"

The sky leans domb on the sea,
Awary with all its wings,
And oh! the song the sea sings
Is dail everlastingly
Our past is clean forgot,
Our present is and a not,
Our future s a scaled seed plot,
And what between them are we?—
We who as as we go —

"Strain e to think by he way Whatever there is to live w,
That shall we know ene day."

WHILL KALLIGH

Christian Rossetti (1830-94), the youngest child of Gibricle Rossetti, and sister to Dante Rossetti, spent the greater part of her life in London, where she wis born and died. Slic lived in great privacy, devoting herself to the care of her mother (who died in 1886), to her religious duties, and to poetry. She was an attached member of the Church of England, and, for reasons of religion, rejected two proposits of marriage, one from a Roman Catholic, the other from a sinter of sundefined and heterodox views. The series of sonnets entitled Monna Innominata, and some others of her best I nown poems, irc pro bibly as directly autobiographic d in import as Mrs Browning's Sor 110 icts from Portuguese llur carliest printed appe wed 101505 when 4he 1175 eleven years old, and from that time till her death she wrote, not volummously, but incessantly A volume called I cross was privately issued by her grandfither, Gactano Polidori, in 1847, she con tributed several numbers to The Germ (1850) over the signature

Ellen Alleyn, and thereafter wrote many poems, articles, essays, and short stories for various magazines. The best of her poems were collected by her in Goblin Market and other Poems (1862), The Prince's Progress and other Poems (1866), A Pageant and other Poems (1881), and Verses (1893). To these must be added the posthumous volume of New Poems (1896).

Though by the needents of association Christina Rossetti was brought near to the group of poets and printers who started the Pre-Raphaelite movement, she belongs to no school, and holds a place by herself in English poetry She is the least ambitious, and some would add the greatest, of Linglish poetesses. She has that rarest of gifts the gift of expressing deep feeling in quiet speech and perfect musical cadence. Her best sonnets, though they have not the splendour of the greatest of Shakespeare's, or Milton's, or Wordsworth's, or Rossetti's, yet come nearer than any of these to the purity and simplicity and perfection of form that mark the finest Italian sonnets. Her thoughts run naturally into a lyrical mould, and there is no sense of chort in all her worl. She made no attempt in the larger poetic lands of drama or romance, and was never betrayed by hierary admiration into imitating the worls of others at the sacrifice of sincerity and spont menty. Insitution has been the besetting sin of not a few Linglish poeter es. Mr. Aphra, Belin, a clever and excellent woman, has been a died vicious because she wrote factoristic coincides from the stand point of the courtly reconded from the stand point of the courtly recondible without livron, and this Browning of enforces her genuine yiths, even in her large, to that men do not know or feel and it is only be expressing these things that they can match men in literature. It was be simple loyalty to if or onn experience and their own vision that Jane Austen and Christina Rossetti achieved their unique positions among English writers.

Her genius is almost purely lyrical, and her poems are full of that beautiful redundance and that varied reiteration which are natural to all strong feeling and all spontaneous melody lyrics have very much the air of improvisations. slie chooses for theme some simple, elemental feel ing, and pours it into song, the expression rising unsmight, with incessant recurrence to the works or phrises given at first, and with a delicate sense of pattern which prescribes the changes in the endence. Her ideas are so essentially poetical that they can hardly be expressed in proseart is so subtly simple that critical analysis may well despur of explaining it. The whole bulk of her poems would vield but few quotations and perhaps not one generalised statement of moral truth Though, like many other poets famous for verbal nielody, she had no strong taste for music, her poetical gift is musical rather than pictorial. Her most characteristic imagery, such as is found in A Birthday or Death Watches, is passionate, not contemplative, it is the outcome of moments of feeling arrested, and yields little or nothing to thought, yet everywhere and always the soul of poetry is in her work.

The poems of many earlier religious poets are easily and sharply divisible into secular and sacred It would be vain to attempt any such bisection of Miss Rossetti's work. Some of her poems deal with religious themes, and some do not, but all alike are permeated with religious ideas especially noticeable in the very few of them that have any sort of claim to be called 'long poems' Goblin Market and The Prince's Progress are fairy stories, the one telling of certain goblin sellers of magic fruit who haunt a mossy valley, the other describing the temptations and adventures that befall a prince of fable on his way to claim his The stories are told without the smallest didactic intention, they are dream fantasies, but no one who reads them can fail to perceive that the ideas shadowed in them are all religious Market is an idyl of temptation and of vicarious sacrifice, The Prince's Progress is a history of the pilgrimage of the soul, unmindful of its destiny, blinded and hindered by the love of ease and pleasure, by the search for wealth or knowledge, and aroused from time to time by the chiding, wailing voices that are carried on the air A deep melancholy underlies all her most heart-felt poems, and if she resembles Shelley in lyrical elevation and the natural glow of lyrical utterance, there is more of the sadness of humanity in her poems than Her verses beginning, 'Passing away, saith the World, passing away, have been given the fame that they deserve by the praise of Mr Swinburne, who alludes to them as 'the great New-Year hymn of Miss Rossetti, so much the noblest of sacred poems in our language that there is none which comes near it enough to stand second, a hymn touched as with the fire and bathed as in the light of sunbeams, tuned as to chords and cadences of refluent sea-music beyond reach of harp and organ, large echoes of the serene and sonorous tides of heaven'

A Birthday

My heart is like a singing bird
Whose nest is in a watered shoot,
My heart is like an apple tree
Whose boughs are bent with thickset fruit,

My heart is like a rainbow shell That paddles in a halcyon sea, My heart is gladder than all these Because my love is come to me

Raise me a dais of silk and down,
Hang it with vair and purple dyes,
Carve it in doves and pomegranates,
And peacocks with a hundred eyes,
Work it in gold and silver grapes,
In leaves and silver fleurs-de lys,
Because the birthday of my life
Is come, my love is come to me.

Echo

Come to me in the silence of the night,
Come in the speaking silence of a dream,
Come with soft rounded cheeks and eyes as bright
As sunlight on a stream,
Come back in tears,

O memory, hope, love of finished years.

O dream how sweet, too sweet, too bitter sweet,
Whose wakening should have been in Paradise,
Where souls brim full of love abide and meet,
Where thirsting longing eyes
Watch the slow door
That opening, letting in, lets out no more.

Yet come to me in dreams, that I may live
My very life again though cold in death Come back to me in dreams, that I may give Pulse for pulse, breath for breath
Speak low, lean low,

As long ago, my love, how long ago

Reg

O Earth, he heavily upon her eyes,
Seal her sweet eyes weary of watching, Earth,
Lie close around her, leave no room for mirth
With its harsh laughter, nor for sound of sighs
She hath no questions, she hath no replies, Hushed in and curtained with a blessed dearth
Of all that irked her from the hour of birth,
With stillness that is almost Paradise
Darkness more clear than noonday holdeth her,
Silence more musical than any song,
Even her very heart has ceased to stir

And when she wakes she will not think it long

Collingwood published his Lafe in a Letters in 1808, and The Levis Carrell Picture Book in 1800

Charles Haddon Spurgeon (1834-02) born at Kelvedon in Issex in 1849 became usher in a school at Newmarket, and in 1854 paster of the New Park Street Chapel, London The vast

Metropolitan Tabernacle was erected for him in 1859-61, with it were connected almshouses, a pastor's college, and an orphanage, over all of which he exercised and maintained effective supervision. He had a unique gift as an orator, and enlivened his fervour with quaint humour, his voice was of marvellous clearness and reach, and he wielded his mother tongue with native vigour His theological acquirements were slender and his commentaries uncritical With the newer criticism he had no sympathy, and four years before his death he withdrew from the Baptist Union because no action was taken against persons charged with what he and conservative divines regarded as fundamental errors His sermons, issued weekly from 1855, showed enormous energy of produc tivity, and continued to be surprisingly fresh, they had an average issue of 30,000, and were trans lated into several foreign tongues. He published over a hundred volumes, including The Saint and his Saviour (1867), John Ploughman's Talk (1868), The Treasury of David (a commentary on the Psalms, 1865-80), Interpreter (1874), Sermons in Candles (1891), and Messages to the Multitude A collection of Spurgeon's speeches was edited by Pike (1878), there are short Lives by Pike, Ellis, and Shindler (1891-92), and the authoritative autobiography in four volumes was compiled by his vife and Mr Harland (1897-98)

Sir John Robert Seeley (1834-95) was the third son of Mr Seeley the publisher He was educated at the City of London School and at Christ's College, Cambridge, was bracketed with three others as senior classic in 1857, and next year was elected a Fellow of his college. In 1863 he became Professor of Latin in University College, London, in 1869 of Modern History at Cambridge, and there to the end of his industrious life he remained Lcce Homo had appeared anonymously in 1865, and excited an extraordinary commotion in the religious world It was denounced with vehemence by many evangelicals like Lord Shaftesbury as subverting the foundation of Christian faith and hope, on the other hand, its reverent tone and literary charm commended the book to many orthodox minds For while it deliberately excluded consideration of the supernatural and insisted on Christ's human work as the founder of a Church of humanity, it did not profess to deal with all the aspects of Christ's missionsome even expected it to be followed by an Ecce Deus, which was no part of Seeley's plan. The work certainly produced no little influence on contemporary thought. Strictly anonymous at first, it was soon pretty confidently referred to the Cambridge historian, and was ultimately acknowledged by him as his Natural Religion (1882), also anonymously published, was perhaps an even more effective presentation of the author's view of the essence of Christianity, but as an eirenicon between science and faith, it persuaded neither the Christian nor the Agnostic. For it posited a non-supernatural Christianity, and contented itself with a religion which was practically the pursuit of the ideal in life. Seeley's Life and Times of Stein (1879) was the best history of the creator of modern Germany, but, written without enthusiasm, it was generally pronounced tedious. His Short Life of Napoleon the First (1885) insisted on treating that portentous phenomenon as a clever and unscrupulous condottiere merely, and almost wholly ignored his power of political combination, his administrative sagacity, and his profound legislative achievement. In so far the historian showed himself liable to a prepossession. In his historical work generally Seeley sought for the driest light and refused to appeal to the emotions, and his concern in history was with the State and its development, with public documents and diplomatics though he strove to find in past political consecutions answers to the pressing problems of the present. In one work he struck a chord in the public breast, his Expansion of England (1883) did much to build up British Imperialism, to show the significance of the struggle between France and Britain in the eighteenth century, and to emphasise the value of Britain's oversea inheritance His Growth of British Policy, unfinished at his death, was an almost equally pregnant essay on our foreign policy, its conditioning causes, methods, and results, from the accession of Elizabeth down to the beginning of the eighteenth century, to this Professor Prothero prefixed a short Life of the author (1895) An Introduction to Political Science, published in 1896, comprises two series of lectures Seeley's work on Goethe, a reissue of magazine articles, was sound and sensible but not remarkably illuminative. For his service to the national cause he was created K.C.M.G. in 1804

Lord de Tabley was the title, borne after his succession in 1887 to his father, the second baton, by the Hon JOHN BYR' I LHICLSTIR WARRIN (1835-1895), one of the true t poets of his time, though he never attained popularity with the public, and even to many lovers of poetry became well known only a few years before his death. Lducated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford, he was for a time attached to the embassy at Constinuinople under Sir Stratford de Redeliffe In 1850 he was called to the Bar, and about the same time published, under a pseudonym, a volume of poems - his oan, and not, as has been erroneously said, the joint work of lumself and a dead friend. And another 1 and equally sensitive side of his character appears in the poems and passages which give rich and melodious utterance to the poet's heart felt joy in the meffable beauty of nature.

Reads in this Mental in siderated by Rice and partly written before the partner mp begin are The Golden Butterfor are probably he best known of all the books associated with Besands name, and though it be admitted that the books produced by the collaborated state richer in humour more vivid in characterisation, fresher and more enter tuning altogether this does not prove that these features were wholh or mainly Mr Rices con tribution, but that Besent grew order. Unquestionably the later novels were many of them somewhat incredible and factitions, didactic and overweighted with detail, as well apt to repeat Perhaps Besant was right ideas and situations in regarding Dorothi Lorster a story of the Earl of Derwentinter and the Rebellion of 1815, as his best tale. All Sorts and Conditions of Mer, on the other hand, was the most notable of a series which produced a marked and unexpected influence on the public heart and conscience they stimulated and guided the philanthropic (and fashionable) movement that led to the establish ment of the People's Palace in the east end of London

Another series of Sir Walter's literary enterprises concerned the topography and history of London

It was his ambition to be the Stow of nineteenthcentury London, and he projected a vast scheme in which he was to have the help of experts, retaining for his own share the general history of London from the earliest times to the end of the nineteenth century. This he seems ever to have regarded as his magnum opus, and to it he devoted the continuous labour of five years. To this plan, unfinished at his death, belonged the pleasant volumes on Westminster, London, South London, and East London (written by him with some assistance), as also London the 211 Eighteenth Century (1902), London under the Stuarts (1904), and London underthe Tudors From the Autobiography published in the same year it ap peared that he had completed a history of London from the beginning as far as the end of the eighteenth century His attitude to wards religious and theological prob lems was frankly expounded in the same book, and was by no means conservative. His relations with Mr Rice (who, it should be added, wrote a well known history of the British Turf)

he had explained in a preface to the library edition of Ready money Mortibos in 1887

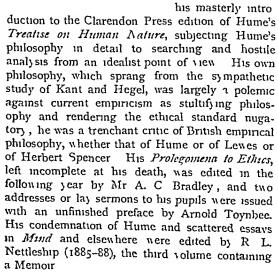

As secretary of the Palestine Exploration Fund Besant edited or wrote works on Jerusalem, Palestine, and the survey, and as first chairman of the Society of Authors he laboured strenuously to secure, especially to inexperienced writers for the press, as full a share as possible of the profits accruing from their labours. His zeal in their behalf, testified to by a great expenditure of time and work, led him ultimately to be unduly suspicious and not a little unfair to one of the two partners in the business of publishing books.

Further French studies were a work on the French humourists (1873) and small works on Rabelus, Montaigne, and Coligny, he wrote also Lives of Professor Palmer and Richard Jefferies, and there were opuscules from his hand on Whittington, Captain Cook, and King Alfred Ready money Mortiboy was dramatised by the author As We are and as We may be was a collection of miscellanies, posthumously published in 1903

Thomas Hill Green (1836-82) was born at the rectory of Birkin in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and educated at Rugby and Balliol College, Oxford, where he took a first in classics, and later a third in law and modern history He was elected and re elected a Balliol Fellow, became the first

Symonds in 1871, and became in 1877 Whyte's Professor of Moral Philoso phy Green's noble character, contagrous enthusiasm, philosophical independence and pro fundity, and strong interest in social questions gathered around him many of the best men at Oxford Popular education and temperance lay near his heart, and he gave himself with great carnestness School-Board work and political reform He was the 'Mr Gray' of Robert Elsmere In 1874 he contributed

John Richard Green (1837-83) was the son of an Oxford tradesman, and was educated at Magdalen College School till the age of fifteen, when he was sent to complete his education under the charge of a private tutor. In 1854 he competed successfully for an open scholarship at Jesus College, Oxford, and was matriculated at the end The choice of a college was probably of 1855 unfortunate, the members of Jesus College were mostly Welshmen, and they were rather isolated from the rest of the university Green made few intimate friends during his undergraduate days, refused to throw himself into the normal current of Oxford studies, and was content with a pass degree in 1859 That his time had not been wholly wasted, and that his early taste for reading had led him into the direction of his later work, is proved by some brilliant papers on the history of Oxford which he contributed during his last year of residence to the Oxford Chronicle In 1860 he took orders and accepted a curacy in London at St Barnabas, Goswell Road For a few months in 1863 he had charge of a parish in Hoston, but was compelled by ill-health to resign it. After another short period as a curate at Notting Hill, he received from Bishop Tait the curacy-in charge of St Philip's, Stepney, which he held for five He discharged his clerical duties with rare fidelity and devotion, but his sympathics were always with the Broad Church party, and as time went on he became more and more reluctant to bind himself to any definite religious dogmas had always been delicate, and the arduous labour of a clergyman in the east end of London overtaxed his strength When he resigned his charge at Stepney in 1869, he gave up all active clerical

During his life in London Green had managed to find time for literary work Whenever he could get away from his parish, he spent his time in the British Museum studying the authorities for early English history He had plans for a history of Somersetshire, and a history of the English Church in connection with the lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, but his favourite scheme was a history of England under the Angevin kings, a task which has since been performed by his disciple, Miss Kate Norgate A paper which Green read before the Somersetshire Archæological Society led to an intimate friendship with Freeman, by whom he was induced to become a contributor, and after a time a frequent contributor, to the Saturday Through Freeman he became acquainted with Stubbs, who was at the time Lambeth Librarian, an office in which Green succeeded him, and was also engaged in editing some of the most important volumes in the Rolls Series couragement which he received from these two older students was of immense value to Green, and he recognised his obligation when in 1878 he dedicated his History of the English People 'to two dear friends, my masters in the study of English History, Edward Augustus Freeman and William Stubbs'

Green's intention, when he abandoned the Church, was to earn a living by writing for the Saturday, but to devote almost the whole of his energy and time to the Angevin period a great blow to him to discover in 1869 that his lungs were affected, and that he would have to curtail his work and to live the life of an invalid For three successive winters he was compelled to Under these unwelcome and go to the South unexpected conditions he was induced to alter his plans, to abandon or postpone the unremunerative task of writing a lengthy book on a special period, and to undertake for Macmillan a Short History of the English People To the writing of this book he gave five years of such strenuous work as he could put into the limited hours allowed by medical advice It was published in 1874, and Green suddenly found himself famous. This was the more startling and gratifying, because the experts who had read the proof-sheets were by no means unani mous in prophesying success. But the verdict of readers was as decisive as in the case of Macaulty's first two volumes a quarter of a century before was not merely the vividness of the narrative and the picturesqueness of the style that secured such a notable triumph Green had presented the social side of English history in its connection with poli tical life and constitutional progress as nobody had presented it before. His life in the east end had been a more valuable training to him than Gibbon's experience as a militia officer lind been to the writer of the Dicline and Fall Green's intention was clearly stated in his Preface 'The aim of the following work is defined by its title, it is a history, not of English Kings or English Conquests, but of the English People. At the risk of sacrificing much that was interesting and attractive in itself, and which the constant usage of our historians has made familiar to English readers, I have preferred to pass lightly and briefly over the details of foreign wars and diplomacies, the personal adventures of kings and nobles, the pomp of courts, or the in trigues of favourites, and to dwell at length on the incidents of that constitutional, intellectual, and social advance in which we read the history of the nation itself. It was with this purpose that I have devoted more space to Chaucer than to Cressy, to Caxton than the petty strife of Yorkist and Lancastrian, to the Poor Law of Elizabeth than to her victory at Cadiz, to the Methodist revival than to the escape of the young Pre-Whatever the worth of the present work may be, I have striven throughout that it should never sink into a "drum and trumpet history" The mere abandonment of the time-honoured division into reigns was in itself a revolution No other European country had at that time found such a historian as Green, and though foreigners have since tried to emulate his methods, none have succeeded in equalling their inodel The Short History remains unique in historical literature

For nine more years Green was engaged in a heroic struggle to do as much work as increasing ill health would allow. His opportunities for research were seriously curtailed by the necessity of always wintering abroad. In 1877 he married Miss Alice Stopford, whose invaluable assistance made the remaining years of his life happier and more fruitful than they could otherwise have been. He never returned to his project of Angevin history, but set himself to work out the general history of England on an ever-increasing scale. In 1878-80 he published in four volumes his History of the English People, in which he expunded the Short History, and rewrote those periods of it which had been defectively treated in the former book. Then he began from the beginning to utilise on a large scale the authorities which he had been studying for so many years One volume, The Making of England, which brought the history down to 828, was published in January 1882. With feverish activity he went on dictating another volume to his wife, but it was still unfinished when he died at Mentone on 7th March 1883, it appeared as a posthumous work under the name of The Corquest of England It is to these list two books that we must look to estimate the immense labour which it had cost Green to draw his brilliant picture of the nation's progress, and it is in these books that we see most clearly the extraordinary imaginative power which enabled Green to throw himself into the life of the distant past. This is his supreme merit as a historian, and in this quality he has never been surpassed

Oxford in the Middle Ages

At the time of the arrival of Vacarias, Oxford stood in the first rank among English towns. Its town church of St Martin rose from the midst of a huddled group of houses, girt in with massive walls, that hy along the dry upper ground of a low peninsula between the streams of Cherwell and the upper Thames The ground fell gently on either side, enstward and westvard, to these rivers, while on the south a sharper descent led down across Around lay a snampy meadons to the city bridge wild forest, the moors of Cowley and Bullingdon fring ing the course of Thames, the great woods of Shotover and Bagley closing the horizon to the south and cast. Though the two huge towers of its Norman castle marked the strategic importance of Oxford as com manding the river valley along which the commerce of southern Ingland mainly flowed, its walls formed, perhaps, the least element in its military strength, for on every side but the north the town was guarded by the swampy meadows along Cherwell, or by the intricate channels into which the Thames breaks among the meadons of Osney From the midst of these meadons rose a mitred abbey of Austin canons, which, with the older priory of St Frideswide, gave the town some ecclesiastical dignity. The residence of the Norman house of the D'Oillis within its castle, the frequent visits of English kings to a palace without its walls, the presence again and again of important councils, marked its political weight within the realm The settlement of one of the wealthiest among the English Jewries in the very heart of the town indicated, while it promoted, the activity of its trade. No place better illustrates the transformation of the land in the hands of its Norman masters, the sudden outburst of industrial effort, the sudden expansion of commerce and accumulation of wealth which followed the Conquest To the west of the town rose one of the stateliest of English eastles, and in the meadows beneath the hardly less stately In the fields to the north the last of abbey of Osney the Norman Lings raised his prince of Berumont canons of St Frideswide reared the church which still exists as the diocesan cathedral, while the piety of the Norman Castellans rebuilt almost all the parish churches of the city, and founded within their new castle walls the church of the Canons of St. George We know nothing of the causes which drew students and teachers within the walls of Oxford. It is possible that here as elsewhere a new teacher had quickened older educational foundations, and that the cloisters of Osney and St Frideswide already possessed schools which burst into a larger life under the impulse of Vacanus. As yet, honever, the fortunes of the University were obscured by the glories of Paris. English scholars gathered in thousands round the chairs of William of Champeaux or Abelard The English took their place as one of the 'nations' of the I rench University John of Salisbari became famous as one of the Parisian teachers Beket wandered to Paris from his school at Merton through the peaceful reign of Henry the Second Oxford was quieth increasing in numbers and repute years after the visit of Vacarius its educational position was fully established. When Gerald of Wales read his amusing Topography of Ireland to its students, the mo t gloomy atmosphere, the poem reveals a distinct personality, and has engaging nimbleness and grace of artistic form. In the same volume the lyric 'To our Ladies of Death,' prompted by De Quincey's Suspiria, is very strikingly conceived and daintily elaborated. Thomson further illustrates his sovereign quality in Vane's Story and the attractive Oriental tale, Weddah and Om-el-Bonain, published with other poems in 1881 In his first two volumes appeared the author's best They include, besides the poems named, 'Sunday at Hampstead,' 'Sunday up the River,' and various other short pieces that evince a winning love of natural beauty and rare energy of lyrical rapture. In 1881 Thomson issued Essays and Phantasies, which are curious if not important Posthumous works are A Voice from the Nile, and other Poems, and Satures and Profamilies, both published in 1884, Shelley, a Poem, published in 1885, and Poems, Essays, and Fragments, issued in 1892 The collected Poems appeared in two volumes in 1895, and a volume of Prose was published in 1896 Mr Bertram Dobell prefixed a Life of Thomson to the volume entitled A Voice from the Nile, and other Poems, and in 1889 Mr H S Salt published a work which, as revised in 1898, has become the standard biography of the poet.

From 'The City of Dreadful Night'

Of all things human which are strange and wild
This is perchance the wildest and most strange,
And showeth man most atterly beguiled,
To those who haunt that sunless City's range,
That he bemoans himself for aye, repeating
How Time is deadly swift, how life is fleeting,
How naught is constant on the earth but change.

The hours are heavy on him and the days,

The burden of the months he scarce can bear,
And often in his secret soul he prays

To sleep through barren periods unaware,
Arousing at some longed for date of pleasure,
Which having passed and yielded him small treasure,
He would outsleep another term of care

Yet in his marvellous faney he must make

Quick wings for Time, and see it fly from us,

This Time which crawleth like a monstrous snake,

Wounded and slow and very venomous,

Which creeps blindwormlike round the earth and ocean,

Distilling poison at each painful motion,

And seems condemned to circle ever thus.

And since lic cannot spend and use aright
The little time here given him in trust,
But wasteth it in weary undelight
Of foolish toil and trouble, strife and lust,
He naturally claimeth to inherit
The everlasting Future, that his ment
May have full scope, as surely is most just.

O length of the intolerable hours,
O nights that are as mons of slow pain,
O Time, too ample for our vital powers,
O Life, whose woeful vanities remain

Immutable for all of all our legions
Through all the centuries and in all the regions,
Not of your speed and variance ve complain

We do not ask a longer term of strife,
Weakness and weariness and nameless woes,
We do not claim renewed and endless life
When this which is our torment here shall close,
An everlasting conscious manition!
We yearn for speedy death in full fruition, Dateless oblivion and divine repose in Glasgow The son was educated at Glasgow High School and University, where his closest friend was the short-lived David Gray (page 657) In the year 1860 the two set out for London to set the Thames on fire, but gloom and poverty hung over their steps, and fame did not come until too late for the elder of the pair Buchanan's first work, Undertones, a volume of verse, pub lished in 1863, was well received. The Idylls and Legends of Inverburn followed in 1865, and next year came London Poems, his first distinct success -1 rare combination of lyrical vigour and insight into humble life, lightened up with humour and sweetened with pathos Later volumes of verse were a translation of Danish ballads and Wayside Postes (1866), North Coast Poems (1867), Napoleon Fallen, a Lyrical Drama, and The Drama of Kings (1871), two rhapsodies suggested by the David Gray (1838-61), eldest of eight children of a handloom weaver, was born on the bank of the Luggie near Kirkintilloch He showed much promise at school, was destined in consequence for the ministry, and by dint of pupil-teaching paid his way for four years at Glasgow University But having contributed a considerable number of poems to the Glasgow Citizen, he determined, with his friend Robert Buchanan, to go to London, and begin the career of a man of letters. By mistake the two travelled by different trains, and, arriving ilone, Gray spent the first night in the open air, the result was a cold which soon became con-For a time the poet lived with his friend Buchanan in a garret in Blackfriars, and Mr Monckton Milnes (afterwards Lord Houghton) found him some literary work. But his disease increased, and, after a sojourn in the south of England, he returned to his father's cottage at Kirkintilloch to die During his remaining months he wrote a series of thirty sonnets, In the These breathe the very passion of Shadows despair, and remain his finest work His longest poem, 'The Luggie,' is a descriptive piece contain ing many passages of great beauty The poet of 'The Luggie' presents one of the most pathetic figures in Scottish literature, Pollok, Fergusson, and Bruce were all, like him, cut off before their prime, but none of these received the arrow of death with such a piteous cry His poems were published in 1862, after his death, with a Memoir by Dr Hedderwick of the Cetizen, and an Introduction by Lord Houghton

Sonnet

If it must be, if it must be, O God!

That I die young, and make no further moans,
That underneath the unrespective sod,
In unescuteheoned privaey, my bones
Shall crumble soon—then give me strength to bear
The last convulsive throe of too sweet breath!
I tremble from the edge of life to dare
The dark and fatal leap, having no futh,
No glorious yearning for the Apocalypse,
But, like a child that in the night times eries
For light, I cry, forgetting the eclipse
Of knowledge and our human destinies
O peevish and uncertain soul! obey
The law of life in patience till the day

(From In the Shadows )

Edward Lear (1812-88), born in London, had from boyhood a passion for drawing and painting, and by a book of fine coloured drawings of parrots interested the Earl of Derby, who gave him the opportunity of visiting Italy He settled in Rome and became a landscape painter, but in spite of ill health was an indefatigable traveller, visiting not merely the out of-the-way corners of Italy, Greece, and Turkey, but Egypt, Syria, Palestine, and India After 1837 he was very little in England, though he exhibited at the Royal Academy from 1850 to 1873, and he died at San Remo Lear is less known by his paintings than by his beautifully illustrated books of travel-Sketches of Rome (1842), Illustrated Excursions in Italy (1846), Journal in Greice and Albania (1851), Journal in Calabria (1852), and In Corsica (1869) Naturalists thought his drawings of birds equal to Audubon's, and Tennyson praised his Greek journal in a well-known But Lear is far best known by his Book of Nonseuse (1846, 29th ed with Introduction by Sir E Strickey, 1894), an original compound of wit, humour, paradox, and good sense in rhymes extraordinarily facile and felicitous, which have gone to the hearts of all English children The outcome of his friendship with the Derby family, the book was written to amuse the childhood of the fifteenth Earl of Derby (1826-93), afterwards a very grave statesman More Nonsense Rhymes followed in 1871, Nonsense Songs, Stories, and Botany in 1870, Laughable Lyrics in 1876

Charles Jeremiah Wells (1800-79) was born in London and educated at Edmonton, was a friend of Hazlitt and Keats (though from both he was ultimately estranged), and till 1830 practised as a solicitor in London. His book of Stories after Nature (1822), tales in poetic prose, fell still-born, and was followed in 1824 by the remarkable biblical drama, Joseph and his Brethren, which, though praised by R H Horne in The New Spirit of the Age in 1844, remained all but unknown until attention was directed to its beauties by Rossetti in Gilchrist's Life of Blake (1863) and by Mr Swinburne, who in the Fortnightly (1875) hailed him as 'a poet meant to take his place amongst the highest' Wells, who had abandoned professional work for a country life in Wales and Hertfordshire, went to Brittany in 1840, and finally settled at Marseilles After his wife's death in 1874 he burnt MSS of tragedies and poems that would have filled eight or ten volumes, but when a revised edition of Joseph had been published in 1876, the old man was moved to write some additional scenes for his chef dauvre, which Mr Gosse has described as 'an overgrown specimen of the pseudo Jacobean drama in verse popular in ultra-poetical circles between 1820 and 1830' to be regarded less as a play than as a poetical curiosity of florid eloquence and rich versification

See Mr Watts Dunton in the Attenaum (1876–1879) Mr Buxton Forman in Miles's Poets of the Century, and Linton's edition of Stories after Nature (1891).

Master of all of us,' said R L Stevenson Some critics have dilated on his lack of constructive skill, or even paradoxically affirmed that he violates every canon which the art of fiction should observe, and too much has been made of the obscurity and indirectness of his diction. The idiosyncrasies of his style, which in the later works is often provokingly compressed and elliptical, form a certain barrier to appreciation, and repel many at the outset, but those who have become accustomed to the atmosphere of his thought and utterance are agreed that there are few writers, living or dead, whose works will better repay a careful study Unintelligibility and obscurity are relative terms, and to the novel in its most complex and highest form it cannot be made matter of reproach that there are some—perhaps many—who lack the intelligence or the sensibility that can alone admit them to the charmed circle of appreciative readers difficulties of Mr Meredith's style and manner have been greatly evaggerated, and are felt to be a serious impediment to sympathetic understanding only by those who have not the patience to apply themselves to the study of the higher fiction with the same ardour that they would think necessary in the case of any other art No one has ever tried to make words convey so much meaning as Mr Meredith, and very few have had so much meaning to express His power of phrase-making is as wonderful as the variety and appositeness of his use of individual words (It should be noted that with the publication of The Ego.st in 1879, there was a marked change in Mr Meredith's style, a change not without its disadvantages—to a more fastidious choice of words, with an increasing command of felicitous phrases, and a more sedulous effort to put the fullest significance and suggestiveness into every sentence. Although Mr Meredith was long in gaining recognition, and is unlikely ever to be a popular writer in the ordinary sense, he is now regarded by the majority of cultivated readers as one of the most powerful and original intellectual forces of our time, distinguished alike for the large sanity of his outlook upon life, the subtlety and grasp of his insight into the springs of character, and his command of many of the most effective forms of artistic expression

From 'Love in the Valley'

Heartless she is as the shadow in the meadows

Flying to the hills on a blue and breezy noon

No, she is athirst and drinking up her wonder

Earth to her is young as the slip of the new moon

Deals she an unkindness, 'tis but her rapid measure,

Even as in a dance, and her smile can heal no less

Like the swinging May cloud that pelts the flowers with hulstones.

Off a sunny border, she was made to bruise and bless

Happy happy time, when the white star hovers

Low over dim fields fresh with bloomy dew,

Near the face of dawn, that draws athwart the darkness,

Threading it with colour, like yewberries the yew

Thicker crowd the shades as the grave East deepens Glowing, and with crimson a long cloud swells Maiden still the morn is, and stringe she is, and secret, Stringe her eyes, her cheeks are cold as cold sea shells

Pupe, happy Love! pipe on to these dear innocents!

The tide of colour has ebbed from the upper sky. In the West the set of sunken fire draws back, and the stars leap forth, and tremble, and retire before the advancing moon, who slips the silver train of cloud from her shoulders, and, with her foot upon the pine tops, surveys heaven

'And you are mine?'

A soft beam travels to the fern covert under the pine wood where they sit, and for answer he has her eves turned to, him an instant, timidly fluttering over the depths of his, and then downcast, for through her eyes her soul is naked to him

'Lucy! my bride! my life!'

The night jar spins his dark monotony on the branch of the pine. The soft beam travels round them, and listens to their hearts. Their lips are locked

Pipe no more, Love, for a time! Pipe as you will you cannot express their first hiss, nothing of its sweetness, and of the sacredness of it nothing. ## From 'Vittoria.'

It was he who preached to the Italians that oppor tunity is a mocking devil when we look for it to be revealed, or, in other words, whit for chance, as it is God's angel when it is ereated within its, the ripe fruit of virtue and devotion He eried out to Italians to wait for no inspiration but their own, that they should never subdue their minds to follow any alien example, nor let a foreign city of fire be their beacon Watching over his Italy, her wrist in his meditative clasp year by year, he stood lile a mystic leech by the couch of a fair and hopeless frame, pledged to revise it by the inspired assurance, shared by none, that life lind not forsaken it. A body given over to death and vultures-lie stood by it in the desert. Is it a marvel to you that i lien the carrion wings swooped low, and the claws fixed, and the beak plueked and savoured its morsel, he raised his arm, and urged the half resuseitated frame to some vindicat ing show of existence? Arise! he said, even in what appeared most fatal hours of darkness The slack limbs moved, the body rose and fell. The cost of the effort was the breaking out of innumerable wounds, old and new, the gain was the display of the miracle that Italy She tasted her own blood, and herself knew that she lived Then she felt her chains. The time was coming for her to prove, by the virtues within her, that she was worthy to live, when others of her sons, subtle and adept, intricate as serpents, hold, inquestioning as well bestridden steeds, should grapple and play deep for her in the game of worldly strife. Now-at this hour of which I speak-when Austrians marched like a merry stame down Milan streets, and Italians stood life the burnt out cinders of the fire prate, Italy s faint wrist was still in the clutch of her grave leech, who counted the beating of her pulse between long pauses, that would have made another think life to be heaving its last, not beginning

A revised edition of Mr Meredillis novely began to appear in 1837 and was completed three years later in thirty two volumes. Mr Meredilli's profound significance in connection with the Pena cence of Word's has been suggested in the easy introductory to the present volume.

JAMES OLIPHANT

Justin W'Carthy, born at Cork in 1830, early embraced a journalistic career, which, commencing in Liverpool, was most of it spent in England 1860 he joined the Reporters' Gillery of the House of Commons as representative of the Morning Star, and in 1864 became editor of that paper, later he was appointed a leader-writer on the Daily Yeas I or many years lie contributed copiously to the hterature of fiction, A Fair Saion (1873) and Dear Lady Disdain (1875) being perhaps his most suc cessful novels. But Mr M'Carthy's main interests have always been centred in public affairs. Not only did he for many years occupy a prominent position in the House of Commons as an active member and, for a time, the chairman of the Irish party, but his best literary worl has been done in the region of political history The History of Our Own Times, from the Accession of Queen Victoria (1878-97), is an excellent and, on the whole, ex tremely fair summary of the events of the Victorian era, the latter half of the work has the interest and value which attaches to a description of political events by one who was acquainted with many of the principal personages who figure in his pages A History of the Four Georges, written after the first volume of the History of Our Own Tintes had appeared, may be best described in an Irishism as a sequel of antecedent history, it is written on the same scale as the earlier work and treated in the But Mr M'Carthy is more at home same manner in the history of events which are still politics than of politics which have become history criticism may fairly be passed on The Regn of Queen Anne (1902) Among other works which blend history with politics are The Life of Sir Robert Peel (1891), Lives of Pope Leo XIII and of Mr Gladstone, and Modern England (1898) Mr M'Carthy retired from Parliament and from public life in 1896, and devoted himself exclusively to literary work, and in 1903 a Civil List pension was bestowed on him His Reminiscences (1899) contain effective sketches of contemporary per sonages, in British Political Leaders (1903) the sketches are too purely journalistic to be of endur ing value.- His son, Mr Justin Buntly M'Carthy (born 1860), is a novelist, dramatist, and historian.

James Hutchison Stirling, patrnrch of British philosophers, was born at Glasgow in 1820, studied at Glasgow University, and practised 1843-1851 as a surgeon near Aberdare in South Wales. but afterwards went to Paris and Heidelberg, and devoted himself to philosophy His Sccret of Hegel (1865, new ed 1900), a masterpiece of philosophical insight and expository genius, opened up an unknown world to English readers, and give a powerful impulse to the study of philosophy, in 1881 came his Complete Text-book to Kant LL D both of Edinburgh and of Glasgow, he delivered the first course of Gifford lectures at Edinburgh -Philosophy and Theology (1890) Other works, hardly less original, incisive, and influential, are an assault on Hamilton's doctrine of perception (1865), a translation, with notes, of Schwegler's History of Philosophy (1867, 12th ed 1893), Jerrold, Tennyson, and Vacaulay (1868), As Regards Protoplasm (1869, complete ed 1872), a reply to Husley, Lectures on the Philosophy of Law (1873), Burns in Drama (1878), Darvinianism (1894), a trenchant criticism of the three Darwins, What is Thought? or the Problem of Philosophy (1900), and, finally, The Categories (1903) In Germany, as well as in Italy and elsewhere, the Secret of Hegel was accepted as a profound, brilliant, and authentic exegesis, Emerson knew no modern British book that showed 'such competence to analyse the most abstruse problems of the science, and, much more, such singular vigour and breadth of view in treating the matter in relation to literature and humanity' And Carlyle thought its author 'the only man in Britain capable of bringing meta physical philosophy, in the ultimate, German or European, and highest actual form of it, distinctly home to the understanding of British men who wish to understand it?

Lewis Campbell was born 3rd September 1830, at Edinburgh, the son of a cousin of Thomas Campbell the poet, and was educated at the Academy of Edinburgh, the University of Glasgow, and Trinity and Balliol Colleges at Oxford He took Anglican orders, and in 1856-58 was vicar of an English parish, from 1863 to 1802 was Professor of Greek at St Andrews, where he delivered the Gifford Lectures in 1894-95 has edited the plays of Sophocles and three of Plato's dialogues, one of them in collaboration with Professor Jowett, and has translated Æschylus and Sophocles into spirited and graceful English verse Besides other books and articles on classical subjects he has published sermons, written (in collaboration with W Garnett) the Life of Clerk Maxwell, and (with Evelyn Abbott) edited Jowett's Life and Letters

Friedrich May-Willer (1823-1900), son of the German poet Wilhelm Müller, was born at Dessau, and educated at Leipzig, Berlin, and Paris, and through Bunsen was, as an accomplished Sanskritist, asked to England to edit the Rig Veda for the East India Company at Oxford, he was successively Taylorian Professor of Modern Languages and, from 1868, of Comparative Philology, a study he did more than any one else to promote in England, though many of his favourite doctrines have been superseded Besides a history of Sanskrit literature and books on the science of religion, of thought, and of mythology, he issued in singularly nervous, polished, and idiomatic English the essays he called Chips from a German IVorkshop (1868-75), and the Glasgow Gifford lectures on natural religion (1889–93) held numerous academic and other honours, and in 1896 was made a member of the Privi Council Auld Lang Syne (1898-99) was autobiographical, and his wife edited his Life and Letters (1902)

Thomas Hodgkin, born of Quaker stock at Tottenham in 1831, and educated at University College, London, became partner in a large banking house at Newcastle on Tyne Devoting learned leisure to historical writing, he has recorded the history of Italy after the fall of the Roman Empire in Italy and her Invaders (7 vols 1880-98), and as parerga wrote monographs on The Dynasty of Theodosius (1889) and Theodoric the Goth (1891), and a Life of Charlemagne (1897)

Frederic William Farrar (1831-1903), born in Bombay, graduated at London University and at Cambridge. Ordained in 1854, he was for many years a master at Harrow, and in 1871-76 head master of Marlborough College, in 1876 he became canon of Westminster and rector of St Margaret's, archdeacon of Westminster in 1883, and Dean of Canterbury in 1895. An eloquent preacher and a copious author, he wrote Errc and other stories of school life, books on philology and education, a Life of Christ (1874) which ran through twelve editions in as many months, a Life of St Paul, besides Lives of the Tathers and a History of Interpretation One of several volumes of sermons was Eternal Hope (1878), disputing the doctrine of eternal punishment Darkness and Dawn (1892) was a story of Nero's days, and Gathering Clouds (1895) of Chrysostom's Life by his son was published in 1903

Fredetic Harrison, born in London in 1831, was educated at King's College School, London, and Wadham College, Oxford, taking a classical first class in 1853. He became Fellow and tutor of his college, but was called to the Bar in 1858, and practised conveyancing and in the Courts of Equity. He has served on more than one Royal Commission, from 1877 till 1889 was Professor of Jurisprudence and International Law to the Inns of Court, and was an alderman in the London County Council. He is an advanced Liberal and Home-Ruler, and his outlook on the world is largely conditioned by his zeal as a convinced Comtist. Since 1880 he has been president of the English Positivist Committee. An eager student of history and literature, as a critic he wields a versatile and trenchant pen. He has written on the inclining of listory (1862), on order and progress, on education and the choice of books, on Byzantine history, and on early Victorian literature, edited the Positivist Calendar of Great Men, and published much on Positivist matters, especially on Comite's Positive Polity, as author of books on Cromwell, William the Salent, King Alfred, and Ruskin (1902), the litter containing much original and suggestive criticism, and we have further had from him a collection of critiques of Lennyson, Mill, and others, addresses delivered in America (1901), and the Byzantine historical romance Theophano (1904)

Sit Leslie Stephen, son of Sir Junes Stephen, for many years Colonial Under Secre tary, was born at Kensington Gore, 28th November 1832 He was educated at Eton King's College, London, and Frinity Hall Cambridge It was his intention to follow a clerical career, and he took holy orders, but in consequence of increas ing intellectual dissatisfaction with the creed of the Church, he abandoned the idea of becoming a clergyman and devoted lumself to literature Settling in London, he contributed to the Pall Mall Gazette is well as to the Loringhila Review, Fraser's Magazine, and Macmillan's Magazine In 1871 he was appointed editor of the Cornhill Hagazine, and retuned this position till 1882, when he resigned in order to undertake the duties of editor of the Dictionary of Vational Biography The first volume of the Dictionary appeared early in 1885, and under Stephen's editorship twenty quarterly volumes were published. He afterwards appointed Mr Sidney Lee-since 1883 his assistant -joint editor, and early in 1891, in impaired health, he abandoned the editorship to his coadjutor but continued to be contributor. In 1892 he was appointed president of the London Library in succession to Tennison, and in June 1902 was created a Knight Commander of the Bath thinker of singular independence and energy, a critic of exceptional learning, breadth, and sanity, Sir Leslie Stephen has been an industrious writer, amongst his works being The Playground of Europe (1871), Hours in a Library (three series, 1874-79), The History of English Thought in the Lighteenth Century (1876 and 1881), Essays on Freethinking and Plain Speaking (1879), The Science of Ethics (1882), Life of Henry Fawcett (1885), An Agnostic's Apology (1893), Life of Sir James Litzjames Stephen (1895), Studies of a Biographer (4 vols 1898-1902), The English Utilitarians (3 vols 1900), George Eliot in the 'Men of Letters' series (1902), and English Literature and Fuglish Society in the Eighteenth Century (1903) A disciple of Hume, Bentham, and the Mills, in his Science of Ethics he retained the utilitarian system as modified by the new light thrown upon the ethical development of man by Darwin and Spencer He died 22nd February 1904.

Stopford Augustus Brooke, born in 1832 at Letterkenny in Donegal, had a distinguished course at Irinity College, Dublin, and taling orders, became a curate in London incumbency was St James's Chapel (1866-75), his second, Bedford Chapel, Bloomsbury, where, in virtue of his independence of thought and the literary grace of his sermons, he came to be till his resignation in 1894 amongst the foremost London preachers In 1880, on dogmatic grounds connected with miracles, he severed his connec tion with the Church of Lighand I or a time he had been a royal chipliin. His Life of Robertson of Brighton (1865) from the first railed as a classical biography, his Primer of Linglish Litera ture (1876), unique amongst primers, was follored by his Ilistory of Early English Literature (2 vols 1892) and a one volume work on Linglish Litera ture to the Aorman Conquest (1898) Amongst his volumes of sermons and theological worl's are Jesus and Modern Thought and The Gospel of Joy A poet himself, he is a critic of sympathetic firsight, and he has published, besides a little book on Milton, import int studies of Tennyson (1894) and Browning (1902) With a colleague he prepired A Ireasury of Irish Poetry in the Linglish Tongic (1901), and the first section of the present work (Vol 1 pp 1-30) is from his pen

James Cotter Morison (1832-88), son of the proprietor of Morison's Pills, was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and lived much in France. His misterpiece, Inc Life of St Bernard (1863), was dedicated to Carlyle. For his friend Mr Morley he wrote Gibbon (1878) and Macaulty (1882) in the 'Men of Letters' scries, his list work, The Service of Man (1887), was a criticism of revealed religion from the Positive point of view

Sir Lewis Morris was born at Penrhyn m Carmarthen in 1833, and educated at Sherborne and Jesus College, Oxford, where in 1855 he took a first in classics and won the Chancellors prize. He practised at the Bar as a conveyancer from 1861 to 1881, and subsequently devoted himself to local work in Wiles in connection with education and politics, but failed (as a Liberal candidate) to gain a seat in Parliament for a Welsh constituency Songs of Two Worlds (3 vols 1872-75) by 'A New Writer' showed taste, grace, craftsmanship, and the influence of Tennison, The Epic of Hades (1876), by the same anonymous 'New Writer,' retold in a sufficiently modern spirit the myths and legends of uncient Greece—of Helen, Endymion, Mursyus. These pretty idvls were welcomed and the rest with joi by a great public. His critics were will ing here, as in his later work, to recognise attrac tive narrative, metrical skill, clear and sometimes forcible thought, unmistakable talent, but refused to acknowledge evidence of true poetic genius. He has since published Green, a Drama in Mono logue, The Ode of Life, Songs Unsung, Gycia, a Tragedy, A Vision of Saints (1890), Idylls and Lyrics (1896), Harvest Tide, and immy other books of verse, besides articles and addresses. In 1877 he was made an honorary Fellow of his old college, in 1895 he was made a knight-bachelor, and he holds a Greek decoration and some other honours

Edward Burnett Tylor was born at Camberwell in 1832, educated at the Friends' school, Grove House, Tottenham, and starting from Cuba in 1856 with a friend, made a scientific journey through Mexico, one result of which was his Anahuac, or Mexico and the Mexicans (1861) He was recognised as the most philosophical of English anthropologists and one of the moulders of the science when, already FRS and an honorary graduate of Oxford and St Andrews, he was appointed successively keeper of the Oxford University Museum (1883), Reader in Anthro pology, and Professor of Anthropology, and he lins been Gifford lecturer at Aberdeen and president of the Anthropological Society His Re searches into the Early History of Mankind (1865) and Primitive Culture (2 vols 1871, 3rd ed 1891) stand first among works of their class, in learning, arrangement, grasp of principles, and breadth of The foundation of his philosophy of man is involved in the significance lie finds in the various ideas, rules, and usages that accompany or flow from animism, the child like apprehension by the primitive savage of disembodied spiritual existences, as the minimum of religion and the basis of culture. One of the best introductory handbooks to a subject ever written is his attractive, luminous, and comprehensive Anthropology (1881)

Sir Edwin Arnold, the son of a Sussex magis trate, was born in 1832, and was sent to school at Rochester, to King's College, London, and to University College, Oxford, where he was elected a scholar He won the Newdigate (1853) with a poem on Belshazzar's Feast, for a while was second master at Birmingham, and afterwards became principal of the Deccan College at Poona Returning to England in 1861, he joined the staff of the Daily Telegraph, with which, as editor and otherwise, he has been since identified He published a volume of poems in 1853, and as early as 1875, in The Song of Songs of Iudia, was busy with his life-task of interpreting in English verse the life and thought of the East. His most im portant book is The Light of Asia, or the Great Renunciation (1879), a verse rendering of the story of the life of Buddha, with an exposition of Nirvana and Karma and the rest of his teaching, and, in-*cidentally, descriptions of the scenery and manners of ancient India His statement of Indian philo sophy has not been accepted by experts as impeccable, and his fluent and sometimes grandiose blank verse was by critics generally regarded as lacking in distinction, but the work attained great popularity, and by the end of the century had sgone through sixty English and eighty American editions In The Light of the World (1891) he attempted, more audaciously and less successfully, to do for Jesus Christ's life and teaching what he had done for Buddha. The subject was less unfamiliar, the inadequacy of the treatment more generally recognised, and the not infrequent infelicities more inevitably conspicuous. There was little to rivet attention, the paraphrases of the gospel story were found pedantic or purposeless, and, spite of much fine writing in smooth and copious (but monotonous) blank verse, the whole failed of effect. Other works are Pearls of the Faith, With Swadi in the Garden (translations from the Guilstan), The Tenth Muse, and other Poems,

William Morris

was born 24th March 1834 at Walthamston, not then a suburb of London, and educated at Marl borough and Oxford His writings form only one part of his life-work as poet, artist, and reformer, in each of these directions he did a full life's work. As artist the volume of original work produced by him or under his direction is enormous, and its effect-striking enough in England already-is only now beginning to manifest itself in anything like its true proportion in western and central Europe As reformer, the result of his life-work has been to revolutionise the decorative instincts of English homes, to emphasise, and to translate for the public, the meaning of decorative art, to bring back into English printing the ideals of an early age, 'printing books which should have a definite claim to beauty and at the same time should be easy to read and should not dazzle the eve or trouble the intellect of the reader to eccentricity of form in the letters,' and even in the Socialist agitation which took up so much of the latter years of his life, and which embodied for him so many of his ideals, to redeem it from the narrowness which characterises so many of the European Socialist parties, and to bring it into line with the aspirations common to the thinking men of all political parties His influence is apparent not in the work of his imitators only, but even more in the general Renaissance of style, the substitution of a truer feeling for beauty of line and colour in all the ordinary surroundings of life. He died 3rd October 1896

As a writer, Morris belongs to the Romantic school at its best and healthiest. The Prc-Raphaelite movement, of which his work is but the direct expression, is a phase of the great romantic development, which, arising in our country, finding its first expression in the poems of Ossian, the Percy Ballads, and the work of Chatterton, spread to the continent of Europe, made itself deeply felt in Germany and in western Europe generally, while pursuing in England a course freed from some of the excesses of disordered imagination which characterised it abroad As Mr Watts Dunton, in formulating his theory of the Renascence of Wonder, has finely pointed out, the English Romantic school did not aim merely at the revival of natural language, it sought rather to reach through Art the forgotten world of old Romance-that world of wonder and mystery and spiritual beauty of which poets gain glimpses through

Magic casements opening on the foam Of perilous seas, in facry lands forlorn

When Morris was beginning his career as a writer by his contributions to the Oxford and Cambridge Magazine, Tennyson had written his best poems, Browning was at his finest and freshest, Ruskin and Carlyle were applying a vigorous criticism in life and art. The moral and emotional life of the nation had been stimulated by the Tractarian movement and the Russian war, and be himself, prepared by a lifelong interest in medieval architecture and in such romance as was open to the reader of the day, had just made the acquaintance of Malory and Froissart It was at this time that The Blessed Damozel and Hand and Soul fell into his hands. We have heard him describe their thrilling effect upon him, and when this was reinforced by the remarkable personal influence of Rossetti and his paintings, the young poet found his bent determined owe to the acquaintanceship and intimacy then formed many of the more distinctive poems-such as The Defence of Guenevere, King Arthur's Tomb and The Blue Closet, and the Tune of Seven fowers-but Morris even in these owed little to Rossetti, except subject and a sort of courtly and intense note in the diction the two minds were essentially unlike He was much more influenced by Tennyson and by Browning, but his poems were fresher and less conscious than those of Tennyson, while Browning had taught something of his own insight without lending his fine worldliness to the observation of the younger mind In that sensitivity to the outward circumstances of things which we call sensuousness Morns approaches Keats 'Riding Together,' 'Summer Dawn,' or 'The Haystack in the Floods' should, any one of them, have established the poet's reputation they did not. The little volume was spoken of 'as a curiosity which shows how far affectation may mislead an earnest man towards the fogland of Art.'

Nearly ten years passed before Morris published his Jason, a poem originally designed to take its place in the framework of The Earthly Paradise, but which had outgrown in the making the limits of that scheme His early verse 'had gradually gained for itself an increasing audience amongst men of imaginative taste,' to quote again the words of the greatest critic of our days. It was followed by the Earthly Paradise itself, the collection of poems with which Morris's name is most often The device by which twelve classic legends are alternate with as many niedieval ones provided the poet with an opportunity of which he took the fullest advantage, while the introduction and the poems of the Months which connect the stories are little masterpieces no one who understands the charm of English country can be unmoved by them These works mark the second stage in his development as a writer early poems are all edge, these are distinguished by a flow so smooth and easy that 'the happiness of epitliet and of local colouring, the picturesque detail and the appropriate phrase which give life and individuality to his pictures, are for the most part known only by their effects and only fully appreciated in the retrospect.'

Low is Enough, published in 1872, was a bold innovation in point of form, written with a passionate quality such as one found in his earliest work, a much more mature balance in carrying out his scheme. It is perhaps the least popular of his works, and at the same time it is the most instructive for the student of his work, with its ordered intricacy, its architectural construction of four receding planes. In it real things are seen through a medium of strange and deceptive splendour, not enhanced but transformed, while the skill with which the difficult Middle English metres is handled enlarges the limits of English verse.

The third period of artistic development, dating from his visits to Iceland, is marl ed by a scries of translations from the Icelandic, culminating in his epic of Sigurd the Volsung, perhaps his finest work 'More musculine than Jason, more vigorous and romantic than the best of the stories in the Earthly Paradise, it will take its place among the epic poems of the world' A comparison of the way in which the subject of Sigurd was treated by Ampere among the French, Fouque among the Germans, and Morris among the English would present an instructive study of the development of the Romantic school in these three Translations of the Linerd, the Odyssey, and Beowulf mark another development of his energies Virgil was brought from Classical Art strught into Romance, but after all this was but just, as the Encid is the fountain head of Roman-In writing of his version of the Odyssey, we may again quote from Mr Watts Dunton 'The two specially Homeric qualities—those, indeed, which set Homer apart from all other poets -are eagerness and dignity That Tennyson could have given us the Homeric dignity his magnificent rendering of a famous fragment of the Iliad shows Chapman's translations show that the eagerness also can be caught could not have given the dignity of Homer, but then, while Tennyson has left us but a few lines speaking with the dignity of the Iliad, Morris give us a literal translation of the entire Odyssey, which, though it missed the Homeric dignity, secured the eagerness as completely as Chapman's free and ensy paraphrase.

As a prose writer his productions fall into three distinct classes-his controversial writings, his translations, and his prose romances. The works of the first class, including his lectures on art and his Socialist tales and tracts, A Dicam of John Ball, and News from Nowhere, are written in an English so simple and direct that it has no rivil since the best of Cobbett, yet with a distinction and grace all his own A little sketch, Under the Elm-tru, still lives in one's memory as the very embodiment of poetical ideas, expressed in plain and serious prose. Apart from its tendency, A Dream of John Ball is a work whose beautiful language, whose delicate fidelity to archaeological details and mediaval feeling, have conquered for it a place in the affections of many who are as the poles asunder from its author's sympithics. The translations from the Icelandic, which we have already mentioned, are remarkable for their close ness in point of form to their originals, and the same may be said for the three hitle. I rench romances, but in the case of the latter the Old French lends itself more gracefully to our tongue, of which it is, in truth, a sort of foster mother.

His published prose romances begin with The House of the Wolfings, 'i form of literary art so new that new canons of criticism have to be formulated and applied to it'. It is the tale of a little Northern tribe attacked by the Romans, and is told in prose interiningled with song speech—a true

Northern saga From that time forward a success sion of these tales poured from his pen, The Roots of the Mountains, The Story of the Glittering Plain, The Wood beyond the World, The Well at the World's End, The Water of the Wondrous Isles, and The Sundering Flood Round their language and diction a storm of criticism raged A public accustomed to the stereotyped form of the magazine and the newspaper found itself in face of a use of language as individual and as striking as that of Carlyle or Meredith, and wondered accord-For Morris the use of archaic words and old-world turn of phrase was an artistic necessity, if he were to create the atmosphere he required, to awaken the mind to the expectation of strange surroundings and simpler if unaccustomed motives He is not in the world of Caxton or of Malory, yet of such surroundings is his tale built up, and his language recalls, but does not copy, theirs this age of his romance never existed-1 fact which no man knew better than himself. Two pasts were always with him the historical, with I its riches of art and its squalid poverty, its high rims and marvellous performances, its misery and vice, its good and bad, and the bad very bad, the other in ideal age, five hundred years behind us and a thous and years ahead. The age in which he loved to move is one which contains only what is fairest and strongest in mediaval life, he peoples with his infiguration a little hollow land, sheltered by wide forests and desolate wastes, where his loved ones may live undisturbed, for from the focs of the outside world. Once, indeed, he began a story of the actual past—the adventures of one of his favourite Northmen in the decaying Roman civilisation, but he found the task of portraying its cul too great for what was to be the solace of his lessure hours, and he abandoned it half done. To the picturing, then, of this ideal v orld the poet, the artist in words, brought a style wholly new, which places these romances among the most original contributions to pure literature that our cooch has Morris's use of the supernatural, too, is very personal and quite northern in character, avoiding the bizarre, the cruel, the borderland of madness into which so in my of the German Romantic school fall. Perhaps the principal defect of these romances is a want of relief to the virtues of almost all the actors therein even the criminality which occurs is business lile and free from any taint of nic inness

The literary art of William Morris is, as we have said of the Romantic school, indeed in many respects it is not too much to say that the school touches its high water mark of achieve ment with him Perhaps no single line of his reaches the haunting beauty of certain stancas from Keats or the sensuous magic of Rossetti, but, on the other hand, he is free from the mysticism of the latter he has a fuller and stronger sacep of wing than the former. Analogies have been sought for him with Chaucer and with Spenser, but though he is a comantic story-teller like Chaucer, he is distinguished from him by the fact that he finishes his stories, and by his deliberate avoidance of humour in his writing, probably in accordance with the theories of art he held this avoidance was deliberate is known from the suppressed conclusion of Sir Peter Harpedon's End, of which Mr Watts Dunton has preserved His points of contact with Spenser the memory are more numerous, but no exact parallel can be His art as a story teller was that of the improvisatore, and he carried it to the highest The pictorial point of which it was capable quality of his work sets him in a class apart from His special other writers of the Romantic school bent of mind was historic, and there were few questions concerning the Middle Ages which he had not studied. Scott knew history perhaps as well, he had at his finger ends all that was to be known of olden times, but he did not see as Morris He could describe, he could not print in words 'My work,' said Morris, 'is the embodiment of dreams—to bring before men's eyes the image of the thing my heart is filled with' It was this characteristic—the pictorial view of things—which, in addition to the romantic spirit and the imaginative love of beauty, gave unity and harmony to all his work, artistic and literary

The Wedding Path.

He said 'We shall be home but a very little while after the first, for the way I tell of is as short as the Portway But hearken, my sweet! When we are in the meadows we shall sit down for a minute on a bank under the chestnut trees, and thence watch the moon coming up over the southern cliffs And I shall behold thee in the summer night, and deem that I see all thy beauty, which yet shall make me dumb with wonder when I see it indeed in the house amongst the candles.'

'O may,' she said, 'In the Portway shall we go, the torch bearers shall be abiding thee at the gate'

Spake Face of god 'Then shall we rise up and wend first through a wide treeless meadow, wherein nmidst the night we shall behold the kine moving about like odorous shadows, and through the greyness of the moonlight thou shalt deem that thou seest the pink colour of the eglimtine blossoms, so fragrant they are'

'O nay,' she said, 'but it is meet that we go by the Portway'

But he said 'Then from the wide meadow come we into a close of corn, and then into an orchard close beyond it. There in the ancient walnut tree the owl sitteth breathing hard in the night time, but thou shall not hear him for the joy of the nightingales singing from the apple trees of the close. Then from out of the shadowed orchard shall we come into the open town meadow, and over its daisies shall the moonlight be lying in a grey flood of brightness.

Short is the way across it to the brim of the Weltering Water, and across the water lieth the fining graden of the Face, and I have dight for thee there in little bout to wrift us across the might dark waters, that shall be like wavering flames of white fire where the moon smites them, and like the void of all things where the shadows hing over them. There then shall we be in the garden, beholding how the hall windows are yellow, and hearkening the sound of the hall glee borne across the flowers and blending with the voice of the nightingales in the trices. There then shall we go along the griss paths whereby the pinks and the cloves and the lavender are sending forth their fragrance, to cheer us, who faint at the scent of the over worn roses, and the honey sweetness of the likes.

'All this is for thee, and for nought but for thee this even, and many a blossom whereof thou knowest nought shall grieve if thy foot tread not thereby to night, if the path of thy wedding which I have made, be void of thee, on the even of the Chamber of Love.

'But lo! at last at the garden's end is the yew walk arched over for thee, and thou canst not see whereby to enter it, but I, I know it, and I lead thee into and along the dark tunnel through the moonlight, and 'hime hand is not weary of mine as we go But at the end shall we come to a wicket, which shall bring us out by the gable end of the Hall of the Face Turn we about its corner then, and there are we blinking on the torches of the torch beavers, and the candles through the open door, and the hall ablaze with light and full of joyous clamour, like the bale fire in the dark night kindled on a ness above the sea by fisher folk remembering the Gods '

'O nry,' she said, 'but by the Portway must we go, the strughtest way to the Gate of Burgstead'

In vnn she spake, and knew not what she suid, for even as he was speaking he led her away, and her feet went as her will went, rather than her words, and even as she said that last word she set her foot on the first board of the foot bridge, and she turned aback one moment, and saw the long line of the rock wall yet glowing with the last of the sunset of midsummer, while as she turned again, lo ' before her the moon just begin ning to lift himself above the edge of the southern chiffs, and betwixt her and him all Burgdale, and Face of god moreover (From the Rocks of the Mountains)

Summer Dawn.

Pry but one prayer for me 'twist thy closed lips, Think but one thought of me up in the stars
The summer night wineth, the morning light slips, Taint and grey 'twist the leaves of the aspen, betwist

That are patiently waiting there for the dawn Patient and colourless, though Heaven's gold Waits to float through them along with the sun Fir out in the meadows, above the young corn, the cloud bars,

The heavy elms wmt, and restless and cold The aneasy wind rises, the roses are dun, Through the long twilight they pray for the dawn, Round the lone house in the midst of the com

Speak but one word to me over the corn, Over the tender, bow'd locks of the corn

(From The Defence of Guenevere)

I know a little garden close

'I know a little garden close Set thick with his and red rose, Where I would wander if I might From dewy dawn to dewy night, And have one with me wandering

'And though within it no birds sing, And though no pillared house is there, And though the apple boughs are bare Of fruit and blossom, would to God, Her feet upon the green grass trod, And I beheld them as before

'There comes n murmur from the shore, And in the place two fair streams are, Drawn from the purple hills afar, Drawn down unto the restless sea, The hills whose flowers ne'er fed the bee The shore no ship has ever seen, Still beaten by the billows green, Whose murmur comes unceasingly Unto the place for which I ery

'For which I cry both day and night, For which I let slip all delight, That maketh me both deaf and blind, Carcless to win, unskilled to find, And quick to lose what all men seek.

'Yet tottering as I am, and weak, Still have I left a little breath To seek within the jaws of death An entrance to that happy place, To seek the unforgotten face Once seen, once kissed, once reft from me Anigh the murmuring of the sea.'

ROBERT STECLE

Thomas Mood the Younger (1835-74), son of a more famous father, Thomas Hood the Elder (see above at page 136), studied at Pembroke College, Oxford, published a poem, a 'Farewell to the Swallows,' in 1853, and a series of Pen and Pencil Pictures in 1857, and after a year or two of journalism in Cornwall and five years' clerking in the War Office, he became, in 1865, editor of Fun, to which he contributed largely in prose, in verse, and in drawings. He published half-adozen novels, the best Captain Master's Children (1865), and to a volume of his Favourite Poems (Boston, US, 1877) his sister prefixed a Memoir

Richard Gainett, born at Lichfield in 1835, the son of a keeper of books in the British Museum, held in the same institution a succession of posts, being latterly editor (1881-90) of the great catalogue and (1890-99) keeper of printed books. He has published several volumes of original verse, besides translations from German and Italian, essays, and books on Carlyle, Emerson, Milton, Blake, and E G Wakefield, as well as on the relics of Shelley, on The Age of Dryden, on Richmond on the Thames, and a History of Italian Literature Twilight of the Gods, published in 1888 with other tales, was a brilliant jeu-d'espiri He has also contributed much to encyclopædias and the Dictionary of National Biography, and was responsible for two of the volumes of English Literature, an Illustrated Record (4 vols 1903, the other volumes by Mr Gosse) He is LL.D and CB

Theodore Watts-Dunton.

Walter Theodore Watts-Dunton, poet, novelist, and critic, was born at St Ives, Huntingdon, in At the age of eleven he was sent to a private school at Cambridge, and he received there and afterwards at home an elaborate educa-At an early period of his life, in order to learn the Romany language, he saw much of the gypsics, and had those remarkable experiences with them which lend perhaps the chief colour to Aylwin and The Coming of Love In 1875, having settled in London, he became a prominent figure in a famous group of poets, and the leading critic of poetry on the La anuner and the Athenann Afterwards he took the same position on the  $\Sigma n$ cyclopædia Britannica, contributing to it a treatise on 'Poetry,' which has been described by an eminent writer as 'the literary crown of that vast work' This essay is alone sufficient to show how deep has been his study of poetic principles, and how completely justified was Mr Swinburne in styling him 'the first critic of our time, perhaps the largest minded and surest siglited of any age. In 1897 he published The Jubilee Greeting to the Men of Greater Britain, and in the same year his long-looked for volume of collected poems, The Coming of Love, which immediately set him in the front rank of contemporary poets. In the following year he published Aylwin, a poetical romance, which was placed by Lord Acton and Mr G B Gooch, in The Annals of Politics and Culture, first amongst the three most important books published in England in 1898 Aylwin, in this story, and Percy Aylwin, in The Coming of Love, may be regarded as the embodi ment of his philosophy of life. The two cousins, Henry Aylwin of the romance, and Percy Aylwin of the poem, are phases of a modern Hamlet, a Hamlet who stands at the portals of the outer dark ness, gazing with eyes made wistful by the loss of a beloved woman. In both the romance and the poem the theme is love at war with death, or, to use the words of the author, in his preface to the illustrated edition of Aylavin

It is a story written as a comment on Love's warfare with death-written to show that confronted as man is every moment by signs of the fragility and brevity of human life, the great marvel connected with him is not that his thoughts dwell frequently upon the unknown country beyond Orion where the beloved dead are loving us still, but that he can find time and patience to think upon anything else—a story written further to show how terribly despair becomes intensified when a man has lost -or thinks lie has lost—a woman whose love was the only light of his world-when his soul is torn from his body, as it were, and whisked off on the wings of the 'viewless winds' right away beyond the farthest star, till the universe hangs beneath his fect a trembling point of twinkling light, and at last even this dies away and his soul cries out for help in that utter dark It was to depict this phase of ness and loneliness human emotion that both As Frin and The Coming of Love were written. They were missives from the lonely watch tower of the unter's soul, sent out into the strange and busy battle of the world—sent out to find, if possible, another soul or two to whom the watcher was, without knowing it, akin

In Aylann the problem is symbolised by the victory of love over sinister circumstance, whereas in the poem it is symbolised by a kind of unistic dream of 'Natura Benigna.' Aylwin is so full of portruts of men of genius that no one can form a vivid conception of the higher literary and artistic life of the mid-Victorian epoch who lins not studied Notwithstanding the vogue of Aylwin, there is no doubt that it is on his poems, such as The Coming of Love, Christmas at the Mermaid, Prophetic Pictures at Venice, John the Pilgrim, The Omnipotence of Love, The Three Fausts, What the Silent Voices Said, Apollo in Paris, The Wood-Haunter's Dream, The Octopus of the Golden Isles, The Last Walk with Jowett from Boar's Hill, and Omar Khayyam, that Mr Watts Dunton's future position will mainly rest (see a study by the present writer, 1904) Here there is only room to touch upon The Coming of Love, a poem which, as a critic has said, 'has its chances for all time.'

Percy Aylwin is a poet and a sailor with such an absorbing love for the sea that he has no room for any other passion—to him an imprisoned sea-bird is a sufferer almost more pitiable than an imprisoned man, as will be seen by the following extract from the opening section of the poem

Mother Carey's Chicken

[Percy, on seeing a storm petrel in a cage on a cottage wall near Gypsy Dell, takes down the cage, with the view of releasing the bird.]

I cannot brook thy gaze, beloved bird,
That sorrow is more than human in thine eye,
Too deeply, brother, is my spirit stirred
To see thee here, beneath the landsmen's sky, Cooped in a cage with food thou canst not ext,
Thy 'snow flake' soiled, and soiled those conquering feet
That walked the billows, while thy 's vect sweet' Proclaimed the tempest nigh

Bird whom I welcomed while the sailors cursed, I'riend whom I blessed wherever keels may roam, Prince of my childish dreams, whom mermaids nursed
In purple of billows—silver of ocean foam, Abashed I stand before the mighty grief
That quells all other Sorrow's King and Chief,
Who rides the wind and holds the sea in fief,
Then finds a cage for home I

From out thy jail thou seest you heath and woods,
But canst thou hear the birds or smell the flowers?
Ali, no I those rain drops twinkling on the buds Bring only visions of the salt sea showers.
'The sea I' the linnets pipe from hedge and heath,
'The sea I' the hone; suckles whisper and breathe,
And tumbling waves, where those wild roses wreathe, Murming from inland bowers.

These winds so soft to others—how they burn I
The mayis sings with gurgle and ripple and plash,
To thee yon swallow seems a wheeling tern,
And when the rain recalls the briny lash,
Old Ocean's kiss we love—oli, when thy sight
Is mocked with Ocean's horses—manes of white,
The long and shadowy flanks, the shoulders bright—Bright as the lightning's flash—

When all these scents of heather and brier and whin,
All kindly breaths of land shrub, flower, and vine,
Recall the sea scents, till thy feathered skin
Tingles in answer to a dream of brine—
When thou, remembering there thy royal birth,
Dost see between the bars a world of dearth,
Is there a grief—a grief on all the earth—
So heavy and dark as thine?

But I can buy thy freedom—I (thank God!),
Who loved thee more than albutross or gull—Loved thee, and loved the waves thy footsteps trod—Dreamed of thee when, becalmed, we by a hull—
'Tis I, thy friend, who once, a cluld of six,
To find where Mother Carey fed her chicks,
Chimbed up the boat and then with bramble sticks Tried all in vain to scull—

The friend who shared thy Paradise of Storm—
The little dreamer of the cliffs and coves,
Who knew thy mother, saw her shadowy form
Behind the cloudy bastions where she moves,
And heard her call 'Come! for the welkin thielens,
And tempests mutter and the lightning quickens!'
Then, starting from his dream, would find the chickens
Were daws or blue rock doves—

Thy friend who owned another Paridise,
Of calmer air, a floating isle of fruit
Where sang the Nereids on a breeze of spice, While Triton, from afar, would sound solute
There wast thou winging, though the skies were calm,
For marvellous struins, as of the morning's shalm,
Were struck by ripples round that isle of palm Whose shores were Ocean's lute.

And now to see thee here, my king, my king,
Far glittering memories mirrored in those eyes,
As if there shone within each iris ring
An orbed world—ocean and hills and skies '—
Those black wings ruffled whose triumphant sweep Conquered in sport '—yea, up the glimmering steep
Of highest billow, down the deepest deep,
Sported with victories !—

To see thee here 'a coil of wilted weeds

Beneath those feet that danced on diamond spray, Rider of sportive Ocean's reinless steeds—

Winner in Mother Carey's Sabbutli fray
When, stung by magic of the Witch's chant,
They rise, each foamy crested combatant—
They rise and fall and leap and foam and gallop and pant Till albatross, sea swallow, and cormorant

Must flee like doves away!

And shalt thou ride no more where thou hast ridden,
And feast no more in hyaline halls and caves,
Master of Mother Carey's secrets hidden,
Master and monarch of the wind and waves,
Who never, save in stress of angriest blast,
Asked ship for shelter—never till at last
The form flakes hurled against the sloping mast Slashed thee like whirling glaives,

Right home to fields no seamew ever kenned,
Where scarce the great sea wanderer fares with thee,
I come to take thee—nay, 'its I, thy friend'
Ah, tremble not—I come to set thee free,
I come to tear this eage from off this wall,
And take thee hence to that heree festival

And take thee hence to that fierce festival Where billows march and winds are musical, Hymning the Victor—Sea'

Yea, lift thine eyes to mine Dost know me now?

Thou'rt free! thou rt free! Ah, surely a bird can smile!

Dost know me, Petrel? Dost remember how

I fed thee in the wake for many a mile,

Whilst thou wouldst pat the waves, then, rising, take

The morsel up and wheel about the wake?

Thou'rt free, thou'rt free, but for thine own dear sake

I keep thee caged awhile.

Away to sea! no matter where the coast

The road that turns for home turns never wrong,
Where waves run high inv bird will not be lost

Mis home I know "tis where the winds are strong—

Where, on a throne of billows, rolling lioary
And green and blue and splashed with sunny glory,
Far, far from shore—from farthest promontory—Proplietic Nature bares the secret of the story
That holds the spheres in song!

Percy, carrying the bird in the cage, suddenly comes upon a landsman friend of his, a Romany Rye (presumably the late F H Groome), who is just parting from a young gypsy-girl. She is so beautiful that Percy stands dazzled and forgets the petrel. It is symbolical of the inner meaning of the story that the bird now pushes its way through the half-open door and flies away. From that moment, through the magic of love, to Percy the land is richer than the sea, and this ends the first phase of the story. The first hiss between the two lovers is thus described.

If only in dreams may Man be fully blest,
Is heaven a dream? Is she I claspt a dream?
Or stood she here even now where dew drops gleam
And miles of furze shine yellov down the west?
I seem to clasp her still—still on my breast
Her bosom beats—I see the bright eyes beam
I think she kissed these lips, for now they seem Scarce mine—so hallowed of the lips they pressed
You thicket's breath—can that be eglantine?
Those birds—can they be Morning's choristers?
Can this be Earth?—Can these be banks of furze?
Like burning bushes fired of God they shine!
I seem to know them, though this body of mine
Passed Into spirit at the touch of hers!

Percy stays with the gypsies, and the gypsy girl, Rhona, teaches him Romany. This arouses the jealousy of a gypsy rival—Herne the 'Scollard' Percy Aylwin's family afterwards succeeds in separating him from her, and he is again sent to sea. While cruising among the coral islands he receives the letter from Rhona which of itself paints her character with unequalled vividness.

Rhona's Letter

On Christmas Eve I seed in dreams the day
When Herne the Scollard come and said to me,
He's off, that rye o yourn, gone clean away gentleman Till swallow time, he's left this letter see
In dreams I heerd the bee and grasshopper,
Like on that mornin, buz in Rington Hollow,
She'll live till swallow time and then she'll mer,
For never will a rye come back to her gentleman Wot leaves her till the comin o the swallow

All night I heerd them bees and grasshoppers,
All night I smelt the breath o grass and may,
Mixed sweet wi smells o honey from the furze
Like on that mornin when you went anay,
All night I heerd in dreams my daddy sal laugh Sayin, De blessed chi ud give de chollo girl—whole O Bozzles breed—tans, vardey, greis, and all—
To see dat tarno rye o hern palall back
Wots left her till the comin o the swallow

I woke and went a walkin on the ice
All white with snow dust, just like sparklin loon,
And soon beneath the stars I heerd a vice,
A vice I knowed and often, often shoon, hear

I I nowed it wirr my blessed mammy's mollo Rhona, she sez, that tarno rie you love,
He's thinkin on you, don't you go and rove,
You'll see him at the comin o the swallow Sez she, For you it seemed to kill the grass
When he wir gone, and freeze the brooklets gillies,
I here wornt no smell, dear, in the sweetest cas,
And when the summer brought the water likes,
And when the sweet winds waved the golden giv, wheat

The skies above em seemed as bleak and kollo

The months are long, but mammy says you'll live

As now, when all the world seems frozen yiv

By tlunkin o the comin o the swallow

MON

An then I seed a shape as thin as till,

She sez, The whinchit soon wi silver throat
Will meet the stonechat in the buddin whin,
And soon the blackcaps airliest gille ull float song
From light green boughs through leaves a peepin thin,
The wheat ear soon ull bring the willow wren,
And then the fust fond nightingale ull follow,
A callin Come, dear, to his laggin hen Still out at sea, the spring is in our glen,
Come, darlin, wi the comin o the swallow

And she wur gone 1 And then I read the words
In mornin twilight wot you rote to me,
They made the Christmas sing with summer birds,
And spring leaves shine on every frozen tree,
And when the dawnin kindled Rington spire,
And curdlin winter clouds burnt gold and lollo
Round the dear sun, wot seemed a volk o fire,
Another night, I sez, has brought him nigher,
Hes comin withe comin o the swallow

And soon the bull pups found me on the Pool—You know the way they barks to see me slide—But when the skatin bors o Rington scool Comed on, it turned my head to see em glide. I seemed to see you twirlin on your skates, And somethin made me clap my hans and hollo, It's him, I sez, achinnin o them 8s causing But when I woke like—I'm the gal wot waits Alone, I sez, the comin o the swallow

Comin seemed ringin in the Christmas chime, Comin seemed rit on everything I seed,
In beads o frost along the nets o rime,
Sparklin on every frozen rush and reed,
And when the pips began to bark and play,
And frisk and scrabble and bite my frock and wallow
Among the snow and fling it up like spray,
I says to them, You know who rote to say
He's comin withe comin o the swallow

The thought on t makes the snow drifts o December Sline gold, I sez, like daffodils o spring Wot wait beneath he's comin, pips, remember, If not—for me no singin birds ull sing No chorin chiriklo ull hold the gale cuckoo Wi Cuckoo, cuckoo, over hill and hollow There II be no crakiu o the meadow rail, There II be no Jug jug o the nightingale, For her wot waits the comin o the swallow

Come back, minaw, and you may kiss your han mine own
To that fine rawni rowin on the river, lady Ill never call that lady a chovihan,
Nor yit a mumply gorgie—I ll forgive her

Come back, minaw I wur to be your wife
Come back—or, say the word, and I will follow
Your footfalls round the world I ll leave this life (I ve flung away a ready that ere knife)—
I m dyin for the comin o the swallow

1 Tents, wagons, horses.

After a while Percy returns to England and proceeds to Gypsy Dell, reaching it at the very moment when 'the Scollard,' maddened by jealousy on discovering that Rhona is to meet Percy that night, has drawn his knife upon the girl under the starlight by the river-bank. But the courageous girl overcomes her antagonist and hurls him into the water, where he is drowned There are other witnesses-the stars, whose reflected light, according to a gypsy superstition, writes in the water, just above where the drowned man sank, mysterious hierogly placs legible only to a gypsy star readersigns telling the story of the deed For a Romany woman the penalty for marrying a Gorgio is death Notwithstanding this, Rhona, defying all perils, marries Percy Here is the bewitching picture of Rhona waking in the tent at dawn

The young light peeps through yonder trembling chink The tent's mouth makes in answer to a breeze, The rooks outside are stirring in the trees. Through which I see the deepening bars of pink. I hear the earliest anvil's tingling clink. I hear the earliest anvil's tingling clink. From Jasper's forge, the cattle on the lens. Begin to low. She's waking by degrees. Sleeps rosy fetters melt, but link by link. What dream is hers? Her eyelids shake with tears, The fond eyes open now like flowers in dew. She sobs I know not what of passionate fears. You'll never leave me now? There is but you, I dreamt a voice was whispering in my ears, "The Dukkeripen o' stars comes ever true."

But Rhona cannot free her mind from forebodings, and one night when they are on the river together, she herself reads the runes of the stars

The mirrored stars lit all the billrush spears, And all the flags and broad leaved his isles. The ripples shook the stars to golden smiles, Then smoothed them back to happy golden spheres. We rowed—we sang, her voice seemed in mine ears An angel's, yet with woman's dearer wiles. But shadows fell from gathering cloudy piles, And ripples shook the stars to fiery tears. What shaped those shadows like another boat Where Rhona sat and he Love made a liar? There, where the Scollard sank, I saw it float, While ripples shook the stars to 55 mbols dire, We wept—we kissed—while starry fingers wrote, And ripples shook the stars to a snake of fire

The gypsies, by reading the starry signs, get, as Rhona foresaw, a knowledge of the homicide, and, inveigling her from her husband, secretly slay her Percy, coming back to Gypsy Dell, tries wantly to find out where the gypsies have buried her. Then he flies from the dingle lest the memory of Rhona should drive him mad, and lives alone in the Alps, where he passes into the strange ecstasy, depicted in 'Natura Maligna,' which has been much discussed by the critics

The Lady of the Hills with crimes untold I ollowed my feet with azure eyes of prey. By glacier brink slie stood-by cataract spray-When mists were dire, or avalanche echoes rolled At night she glimmered in the death wind cold, And if a footprint slione at break of day, My flesh would quail, but straight my soul would say "Tis hers whose hand God's nuglitier living doth hold" I trod her snow bridge, for the moon was bright, Her reiele arch across the sheer erevasse. When lo, she stood ! God made her let me pass, Then felled the bridge ! Oh, there in sallow light, There down the clasm, I saw her, cruel, white, And all my wondrous days as in a glass.

Of this awful vision Sir George Birdwood, the orientalist, wrote in the Athenaum of 5th February 1881. 'Even in its very epithets it is just such a hymn as a Hindu Puritan (Suvite) would address to Kali ("the malignant") or Purvati ("the mountaineer"). It is to be delivered from her that Hindus shrick to God in the dehrium of their fear.' Finally, a magical dream comes to the anguished lover which prepares him for the true reading of 'The Promise of the Sunrise' and the revelation of 'Natura Benigna'

Beneath the loveliest dream there coils a fear Last night came she whose eyes are memories now, Her far off gaze seemed all forgetful how Love dimmed them once, so calm they shone and clear 'Sorrow,' I said, 'has made me old, my dear, 'Tis I, indeed, but grief can change the brow Beneath my load a seraph's neck might bow, Vigils like mine would blanch an angel's hair' Oh, then I saw, I saw the sweet lips move! I saw the love mists thickening in her eyes—I heard a sound as if a murmuring dove Felt lonely in the dells of Paradise, But when upon my neck she fell, my love, Her hair smelt sweet of whim and woodland spice

And now 'Natura Benigna' speaks to him, and he is consoled

What power is this? What witchery wans my feet To peaks so sheer they scorn the cloaking snow, All silent as the emerald gulfs below, Down whose ice walls the wings of twilight beat? What thrill of earth and heaven—most wild, most sweet—What answering pulse that all the senses know, Comes leaping from the ruddy eastern glow Where, far away, the skies and mountains meet? Mother, 'tis I, reborn I know thee well That throb I know and all it prophesies, O Mother and Queen, beneath the olden spell Of Silence, gazing from thy hills and skies! Dumb Mother, stringgling with the years to tell The secret at thy heart through helpless eyes

It is intensely interesting to the metrical student to see how in a form so novel, so concentrated, and so artistic, Rhona Boswell lives with an electric passion unrivalled save in the terse drama of the Border ballad or the 'lyrical cry' of Heine or Burns

Algernon Charles Swinburne

was born in Chapel Street, Belgravia, on 5th April His father, Admiral Charles Henry Swinburne, belonged to an old Northumbrian family, and his mother, Lady Jane Henrietta, was a daughter of George, third Earl of Ashburnham Although born in London, he is not a Londoner, for it was by chance that his birth took place at a time when his family were making a brief stay His father owned a beautiful in the metropolis place in the Isle of Wight-East Dene, Bonchurch -together with the well-known Landslip, and his grandfather (Sir John Edward Swinburne, Bart.) resided at Capheaton, his estate in Northumber-The two families for some years lived together, spending the summer at Capheaton and the winter at East Dene. Some of his later lyrics were written at The Orchard, a beautiful place at Niton Bay belonging to a relative He entered Eton in his twelfth and left it in his seventeenth year After leaving Eton he read for two years with the future Bishop Woodford A reminiscence of his school days appears in the Dedication to Poems and Ballads Speaking of his verses, he says

Some sang to me dreaming in classifme,
And truant in hand as in tongue,
For the joungest was born of boy's pastime,
The eldest are young

In 1856 he went to Balliol College, Oxford, where he joined a literary set, the chief members of which were John Nichol, T H Green, A. V Dicey, G Birkbeck Hill, and George Rankine Luke, a brilliant young student who was drowned (not unlike 'Lycidas') while swimming in the Isis Other contemporaries were Sir Michael Hicks Beach and the Right Hon James Bryce Four contributions by Mr Swinburne appeared in the Undergraduate Papers (1857-58), a publication edited by John Nichol, who has described it as being 'to our set what The Germ was to Rossetti's' Although in 1858 he took the Taylorian Prize for French and Italian, and a second class in classical moderations, Mr Swinburne left Oxford in 1860 without taking a degree, and shortly afterwards published at his own expense his first volume of poetry, The Queen Mother and Rosamund (1860), two Shakespearian plays full of dramatic fire and poetic presage, but although its promise was recognised by some literary men, the book fell dead In 1861 Mr Swinburne spent with his parents a few weeks in Italy At that time Walter Savage Landor was living at Fiesole Being already an ardent Landonan, Mr Swinburne had brought with him a letter of introduction to Landor from Lord Houghton (then Monckton Milnes), and the two poets met four or five times, the young generation mingling with the old

And with the white the gold haired head Mixed running locks, and in Time's ears Youth's dreams hung singing, and Time's truth Was half not harsh in the ears of youth

During the next few years Mr Swinburne contributed several poems to the Spectator, in which also appeared his famous letter on Mr George Meredith's Modern Love-the first authoritative recognition of his friend's genius as a poet Atalanta in Calydon appeared in 1865 praised by Monckton Milnes in the Edinburgh Remew, by the Athenaum, and by other literary journals, it immediately placed the young poet in the foremost files of fame Chastelard, the first part of his Mary Stuart trilogy, was published in the same year, and in the following year (1866) Poems and Ballads fell like a thunderbolt on Philistin If Atalanta made the poet Byronically famous, Poems and Ballads made him Byronically infamous Savagely assailed and maligned, he fiercely defended himself in Notes on Poems and Reviews (1866), but the British public was in 'one of its periodical fits of morality,' and the poet was 'singled out as an expiritory sacrifice.' For years the storm raged round his head, and the London clubs buzzed with fantastic legends and apocryphal gossip although, or because, Philistia howled, everybody knew 'Faustine' and 'Dolores' by heart. 'We all went about,' said a contemporary poet, 'chanting to one another those new, astonishing melodics' Mr Swinburne himself has described Poems and Ballads as péchés de jeunesse But 'Dolores' is more than a tour de force in double rhymes. It is one of the most poignantly moral lyrics in our literature. It is a passionate revelation of the pain of pleasure, the ennul of evil, and the It may seem a far cry from satiety of sin Solomon to Swinburne, but 'Dolores' is really a lyrical version of the seventh chapter of Proverbs. It is the despairing cry of the baffled voluptuary Vice has its renegades as well as virtue. We hear too much about the temptations of vice, and too little about the temptations of virtue. 'Dolores' shows that in the deepest depth of hedonism the hedonist is haunted by the eternal riddle of good and evil, that the wiles of vice are weaker than the wiles of virtue, and that the attainment of perfect depravity is infinitely harder than the attainment of perfect righteous Doubtless so daring a paradox was bound to épater le bourgiois, especially the conventional Pharisee, who habitually overvalues the power of evil and undervalues the power of good, but surely the purblindest prude might have perceived the ethical meaning of such lines as

Death laughs, breathing close and relentless
In the nostrils and eyelids of lust,
With a pinch in his fingers of scentless
And delicate dust.

No prophet or preacher has painted the agony and anguish of sin more remorselessly than Mr Swinburne With regard to the metrical structure of 'Dolores,' it is interesting to note that it is based on Byron's 'Stanzas to Augusta' ('Though the day of my destiny's over') By truncating the last line

After Lrechtheus the romantic tem per reconquered the poet's magna tion, and since then it has maintained its ascendency This no doubt is partly due to the influence of the closer intimacy which sprang up about this time between him and the great romantic poet and critic Mr Theodore Watts-Dunton It was in 1879 that the two friends became permanent housemates at The Pines, Putney Hill They have lived together ever since In these days when literary friendships are some times more perilous than literary enmities, the spectacle of a literary friendship which has endured for thirty years refutes a reproach which is often cast at the Republic of Letters. Though living so near London, Mr Swinburne is not of London, and his days pass serenely between the lintels of literature and life. Yet he is by no means the bookish recluse of popular legend He sees

Assuredly the poet gave his 'best,' for besides Tristram, in which the impressioned splendour of his lyrical genius culminated, the volume contains some of his finest sonnets (including the superb cameos of the Elizabethan dramatists) and that lovely nosegay of child songs, 'A Dark Month' In A Midsummer Holiday (1884), which was also inscribed 'To Theodore Watts,' Mr Swinburne commemorated a holiday spent with his friend on the East Anglian coast As this volume contains some of Mr Swinburne's most magnificent seaballads, a word about his passion for the sea may not be out of place. Doubtless other poets have sung the sea, but no other poet has sung it so spontaneously and so sincerely Most of our poets, from Cumpbell to Kipling, regard the sea either as a stage for our naval heroes, or as material for metaphor, or as a stock pot of sentiment, or as a reservoir of rhetoric. Even Byron addresses the ocean as if it were a public meeting Mr Swinburne was the first poet to escape from all these artificialities and to do for the sea what Wordsworth did for the land. His clean rapture in the sea is free from literary affectation glorious description of Tristram swimming is written in the grandly spacious manner of the greatest poetry

And he, ere night's wide work lay all undone,
As earth from her bright body easts off night,
Cast off his raiment for a rapturous fight
And stood between the sea's edge and the sea Naked, and godlike of his mould as he Whose swift foot's sound shook all the towers of I rov.

So elothed with might, so girt upon with joy,

As, ere the knife had shorn to feed the fire His glorious hair before the unkindled pyre Whereon the half of his great heart was laid, Stood, in the light of his live limbs arrayed, Child of heroic earth and heavenly sea, The flower of all men scaree less bright than he, If any of all men latter born might stand, Stood Tristram, silent, on the glimmering strand Not long but with a cry of love that rang As from a trumpet golden monthed, he spring, As toward a mother's where his head might rest Her child rejoicing, toward the strong sca's breast That none may gird nor measure and his heart Sent forth a shout that bade his hips not part, But triumplied in him silent no man's voice, No song, no sound of elarions that rejoice, Can set that glory forth which fills with fire The body and soul that have their whole desire Silent, and freer than birds or dreams are free Take all their will of all the encountering sea. And toward the foam he bent and forward smote, Laughing, and launched his body like a boat Full to the sea breach, and against the tide Struck strongly forth with amorous arms made wirle To take the bright breast of the wave to his And on his lips the sharp sweet minute's kiss Given of the wave's hip for a breath's space curled And pure as at the daydawn of the world And round him all the bright rough shuddering sea Kindled, as though the world were even as he, Heart stung with exultation of desire And all the life that moved him seemed to aspire, As all the sea's life toward the sun and still Delight within him waxed with quickening will More smooth and strong and perfect as a flame I hat springs and spreads, till each glad limb became A note of rapture in the tune of life, Like music mild and keen as sleep and strife Till the sweet change that bids the sense grow sure Of deeper depth and purity more pure Wrapped him and lapped him round with clearer cold, And all the rippling green grew royal gold Between him and the far sun's rising rim And like the sun his heart rejoiced in him, And brightened with a broadening flame of mirth And hardly seemed its life a part of earth, But the life kindled of a fiery birth And passion of a new begotten son Between the live sea and the living sun And mightier grew the joy to meet full faced Each wave, and mount with upward plunge, and taste The rapture of its rolling strength, and cross Its flickering crown of snows that flash and toss Like plumes in battle's blithest charge, and thence To match the next with vet more strenuous sense, Till on his eyes the light beat hard and bade

His face turn west and shoreward through the glad Swift revel of the waters golden clad, And back with light reluctant heart be bore Across the broad backed rollers in to shore

As examples of Mr Swinburhe's later sea poetry, we may mention those magnificent ballads, 'In the Water' and 'On the Verge'

Since the publication of A Midsummer Holiday Mr Swinburne has devoted himself mainly to poetic drama in the Elizabethan manner In Marino Taliero (1885) he handled with great power the well-known story of the octogenarian doge of Faliero is a magnificent conception, and the stainless loves of Bertuccio and the Duchess are as pure and as fresh as the loves of Dante and Beatrice It is indeed a curious error to imagine that the Swinburnian conception of love is solely or even mainly sensual The truth is that in Mr Swinburne's poetry many phases of the love passion are found. No doubt he seems to accentuate the sensual as distinguished from the sentimental side of love, and the explanation is to be sought not only in the poet's pas sionate temperament, but in his saturation with Greek poetry, in which love is an animal appe tite like hunger or thirst Turther, his Elizabethanism leads him into direct locutions which are at variance with the modern taste for veiled suggestion Stress is often laid on his Gallicism, but in point of fact his temper is utterly different from the Gallic temper, preferring plain, downright Saxon to salacious euphemism and suggestive periphrasis. The present literary convention is not likely to be permanent, and it must be said that Mr Swinburne's fearless candour is broader and larger and in essence more wholesome than the mankish sentimentalism of the fading Victorian age Chastelard is a poignantly true study of a young man fascinated by the selfish conicism of a beautiful noman. Everybody knows that there are women who dominate men not by their nobility, but by their ignobility—nomen whose charm is a repulsive attraction Sumburne shows other aspects of love It would be hard to match in our literature the extreme evaltation and heroic purity of the crotic passages in Tristram Here the love-passion is shown in its healthiest and wholesomest phase, a phase which stands midway between Greek animalism and Victorian sentiment Since Marino Fatiero Wr Sumburne has published three plays Locrine (1887), The Sisters (1892) and Rosamund, Queen of the Lombards (1899) In addition to the volumes of poems already mentioned, he has pub lished Songs of Two Nations (1875), Poems and Ballads Second Series (1878), Poims and Ballads Third Series (1889), Songs of the Springtides (1880), Studies in Song (1880) The Heptalogia, or the Seven against Sense (1880), A Century of Roundels (1883), Astrophel (1894), The Tale of Balen (1896) He has also made a volume of Selections from his poetical works His prose ! works include George Chapman a Critical Essay (1875), A Note on Charlotte Brontō (1877), A Study of Shakespeare (1880), Miscellanies (1886), A Study of Victor Hugo (1886), A Study of Ben Jonson (1889), Studies in Prose and Poetry (1894) He has also contributed to the Encyclopadia Britannica and to the leading monthly reviews many valuable critical monographs and essays. In his numerous studies of the Ehzabethan dramatists he has done more than any writer save Charles Lamb to revive interest in the great poets so long overshadoved by the genius of Shakespeare

In many respects, indeed, Mr Swinburne is more Elizabethan than Victorian Like Ben Jonson be is 'passionately kind and angry,' and like Mar lowe he is 'all air and fire'. No modern poet is more utterly born and more utterly made a There seems to be no thread of prose in his nature. His imagination is perpetually incan descent, his poetic energy always at white heat He sees everything in terms of poetry no gift of prose compromise or secular concilia His intellect is worked by his imagination so swiftly that it seems uncontrollable, but in reality he is a perfect master of his vehicle. It is possible for a poet to be too poetical for his time, for in all save the golden ages of literature, poetry is a foreign language to four men out of five and to nine critics out of ten Learning does not endow a man with the power of knowing poetry when he sees it. That is why so much modern criticism is preoccupied with the unpoetic elements of poetry -with its philosophy, its morality, its message to the age, its anecdotes, and so forth poetry like Mr Swinburne's didactic criticism is dumb, searching in vain for the facile novelette, the easy platitude, the pious truism He is a singer and nothing but a singer

He sings in music for the music comes

In Tennyson's just phrase, 'he is a reed through which all things blow into music.' This, far from being a defect, is a unique power, for he has made poetry almost as sensuously emotional and imagi native as music. It is with music that his poetry ought to be compared, for it affects the intellectual feelings not merely through the logical ficulty, but mainly through the aural imagination along in vast volumes of subtly modulated melody, in long, undulant waves of rhythmic harmoni that elate and exalt, trouble and charm, thrill and enthral the mind It enters the soul not by the avenue of the eve, but by the avenue of the ear, not like the coloured song of Milton or Shakespeare, Keats or Wordsworth, but like the sym phonies and sonatas, the operas and oratorios, of the great musical composers. Other poetry may be read by the eye his must be read by the ear Unfortunately, in modern times the habit of read ing poetry aloud has died out, and most men in the presence of poetry are like the deaf at a concert or That is why the colour blind in a picture gallery the magnitude of Mr Swinburne's creative energy is unsuspected by students trained in the old didactic school Bewildered by his manifold music, they charge him with masking his intellectual poverty under sonorous verbinge. It is strange that a fallacy so uncritical should pass for criticism In sheer intellectual power of the imagination Mr Swinburne is surpassed by none of his The fact that his intellect excontemporaries presses itself in so many new metrical forms proves rather than disproves its strength for in his best work the conquest of sense is not less complete than the conquest of sound, the mastery of mind is as triumphant as the mastery of music. The quality of intellectual imagination displayed in 'Atalanta,' 'Erechtheus,' 'Tristram,' 'Hertha,' 'Tiresias,' 'The Hymn to Proserpine,' 'The Hymn of Man,' 'The Eve of Revolution,' 'Ave Atque Vale' (a threnody as fine as Lycidas or Adonais), 'The Triumph of Time,' 'A Forsaken Garden,' 'Hesperia,' 'The Garden of Proserpine,' 'By the North Sea,' 'A Nympholept,' 'A Song in Time of Order,' 'Itylus,' 'Jacobite Song,' 'Cor Cordium,' 'Ilicet,' 'Christmas Antiphones,' and in scores of lyrics, songs, and sonnets, is of the first order Full justice has never been done to the intellectual subtlety of such a poem as 'Hertha'

I am that which began,
Out of me the years roll,
Out of me God and man,
I am equal and whole,
d changes, and man, and the form o

God changes, and man, and the form of them bodily, I am the soul

Beside or above me,

Nought is there to go,

Love or unlove me,

Unknow me or know,

I am that which unloves me and loves, I am stricken, and I am the blow

I the mark that is missed,
And the arrows that miss,
I the mouth that is kissed
And the breath in the kiss,
The search, and the sought, and the seeker, the soul and the body that is

But what thing dost thou know, Looking Godward, to cry
'I am I, thou art thou,
I am low, thou art high'?
thou, whom thou seekest to find him

I am thou, whom thou seekest to find hun, and thou but thyself, thou art I

No doubt it is Mr Swinburne's diffuseness which has engendered the critical delusion that he is mainly a gorgeous verbalist. But although in one sense he is the most diffuse of poets, in another sense he is the least diffuse. Few poets can pack an iambic line more cunningly and more closely, with more magical feets of elision, or beat more music into a sonnet or a song. As has been pointed out, he is diffuse only in anaprestic and dactylic metres. The true test of the Swinburnian lyric is not verbal parsimony, but musical richness, for here it is music that expresses emotion-music and music alone, music often without colour, music often without pictorial flashes Of course there are unvitalised tracts in Swinburne, as in all poets, where the music expresses no emotion, and then, no doubt, as Mr Myers said, we must read the emotion into the music. But true criticism must recognise that diffuseness is as legitimate in anaprests and dactyls as it is illegitimate in lambs. For it has been shown that, owing to the dominance in English of the consonants over the vowels, the anapæstic line, with its crowded syllables, becomes 'pebbly' unless the corners are bevelled off by liquids, and the available words containing I's and r's being limited, the expression of the thought must be manipulated in order to include them The result is that the poet in his search for music diverges from concise and direct utterance, deliberately sacrificing verbal brevity to verbal Another charge brought against Mr Swinburne concerns his undoubtedly excessive use of alliteration. Here again the explanation is to be found in the laws governing anapæstic and dactylic verse, for if daring liquidation is necessary to oil the clogging consonants, daring alliteration is necessary to drive them along Therefore criticism must recognise that bold alliteration is as legitimate in anapæsts and dactyls as it is illegitimate in lambs. If we study, for example, one of the loveliest choruses in Atalanta, the hymn to Artemis, we shall see that its rhytlimical beauty could not have been achieved without liquidation and alliteration

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,
The mother of months in meadow or plain Fills the shadows and windy places
With hisp of leaves and ripple of rain,
And the brown bright nightingale amorous
Is half assuaged for Itylus,
For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
The tongueless vigil, and all the pain

Come with bows bent, and with emptying of quivers, Maiden most perfect, lady of light,
With a noise of winds and many rivers,
With a clamour of waters, and with might,
Bind on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,
Over the splendour and speed of thy feet,
For the faint east quickens, the wan west shivers,
Round the feet of the day, and the feet of the night

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to her,
Fold our hands round our knees, and cling?
O that man's heart were as fire and could spring to her,
Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring!
For the stars and the winds are unto her
As raiment, as songs of the harp player,
For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
And the south west wind and the west wind sing

For winter's rains and ruins are over,
And all the season of snows and sins,
The days dividing lover and lover,
The light that loses, the night that wins,

And time remembered is grief forgotten, And frosts are slun and flowers begotten, And in green underwood and cover Blossom by blossom the spring begins

The full streams feed on flowers of rushes,
Ripe grasses trammed a trivelling foot,
The funt fresh flame of the young year flushes
From leaf to flower and flower to fruit,
And fruit and leaf are as gold and fire,
And the oat is heard above the lyre,
And the hoofed heel of a satyr crushes
The chestnut lines at the chestnut root

And Pan by noon and Bacelius by night, Pleeter of foot than the fleet foot kid,
Follows with dancing and fills with delight
The Monad and the Bassarid,
And soft as lips that laugh and hide
The laughing leaves of the trees divide,
And screen from seeing and leave in sight
The god pursuing, the maiden hid

The ny falls with the Breehand's hair
Over her eyebrows hiding her eyes,
The wild vine shipping down leaves hare
Her bright breast shortening into sighs
The wild vine ships with the weight of its leaves,
But the berried my catches and cleaves
To the limbs that glitter, the feet that scare
The wolf that follows, the fawn that flies

It may seem superfluous to prose the metrical splendour of this immortal lyric, but one may pardonably dwell on the magical effect produced by the introduction of the couplet after the fourth line, by the choice of a dactyl for the opening of the second stanza instead of the anapæst used for the opening of the first stanza, and by the thunderous resteration of the word 'fire' in the fourth line of the third stanza.

It must be admitted that in rhymed iambic measures Mr Swinburne is often too diffuse and too alliterative. This is due partly to his training in dancing metres, and partly to his undoubted passion for sacrificing the demands of the eye to the demands of the ear. His habit of allowing the rhyme to master his inargination continually retards the imaginative περιπέτεια

For rhyme the rudder is of verses, With which, like ships, they steer their courses

Indeed, it must be said that no great poet has ever defied so defiantly the maxim, Ars est celare at tem. He seems to reveal his art as carefully as other poets conceal it. But it would be absurd to suppose that he does so by chance and not by design. He doubtless deliberately accepts the loss in illusion for the sake of the gain in music. It is uncritical, therefore, to censure as insincerity what is evidently a deliberate means towards a definite end. The question whether the end justifies the means is a question of ear as well as eye, for undoubtedly undue servility to the eye tends towards metrical monotony as great as the metrical monotony produced by undue servility to the ear

On the whole, it must be allowed that Mr Swin burne, by undicating the stifled claims of lyneal music, has enriched our poetry with an almost mexhaustible variety of new rhythms, new metres, new measures, and new rhymes. He has, indeed, no rival as a metrical inventor. As a specimen of his extreme subtlety in this respect, it is sufficient to cite 'Super Flumina Babylonis,' one of the many grandly sonorous metrical structures which he has built upon the prose cadences of the Old Testament

By the waters of Babylon we sat down and wept, Remembering thee,
That for ages of agony hast endured, and slept,
And wouldst not see.

Apart from its rhythmical beauty, this poem illustrates the Hebraic temper of the poet's genius. In prophetic grandeur and moral sublimity he is close of kin to the great Israelitish seers. His imaginative metempsychosis of the august Hebrew spirit is, indeed, one of the most original features of his poetry, and suggests a comparison with Milton's Hebraism which would, however, take us too far afield.

Another marvellous feat of metrical creation is the home in Atalanta, remarkable for rhythmical qualities quite different from those displayed in the poems already mentioned

In all poetry there is no funeral dirge so heavily—niclancholy, so sorrowfully dolorous, so plangently solemn. The rhythms and the rhymes rise and fall like the slow feet of mourners, and the syllables bent with the very pulse of grievous despair. Another kind of metrical invention is found in 'The Eve of Revolution,' where the magnificent sublimity of the music is heightened and deepened by the splendid leitmotif of the trumpet that breaks up the night. Tremendous are the metrical antitheses and antiphones in Tristram of Lyonesse, notably in the book entitled 'Iscult at Tintagel,' where the wind and the sea chant a terrible choral accompaniment to the anguish of the Queen

And swordlike was the sound of the iron wind, And as a breaking battle was the sea. And as a full field charging was the sea And as the ery of slain men was the wind And all her soul was as the breaking sea, And all her heart anlingered as the wind And all their pist came wailing in the wind, And all their future thundered in the sea And as men's anguish clamouring cried the wind, And as God's anger answering rang the sea And like a world's cry shuddering was the wind, And like a God's voice threatening was the sea. And like man's heart relenting sighed the wind, And as God's wrath subsiding sank the sea.

There is a perpetual play and counterplay of symbolical imagery throughout the poem. The leitmotif of tragic passion appears at the close of the first book, 'The Sailing of the Swallow'

Their lieads neared and their hands were drawn in one, And they saw dark, though still the insunken sun Far through fine rain shot fire into the south, And their four lips became one burning mouth

And at the end, when Iseult steps on shore and finds Tristram dead, it resumes the whole tragedy of their tragic love

And ere her ear might hear her heart had heard, Nor sought she sign for witness of the word, But came and stood above him newly dead,
And felt his death upon her, and her head
Bowed, as to reach the spring that slakes all drouth,
And their four hips became one silent mouth

In many respects Tristram of Lyonesse must be regarded as Mr Swinburne's masterpiece. It is the noblest 'lyrical epic' in our literature. In it the heroic couplet is transformed from the cold artificial cadence of Dryden and Pope into a grandly sonorous and sinuous rhythmical life, full of cunningly linked harmonies and anapæstic undulations more nearly resembling the Homeric hexameter than any of the innumerable attempts to reproduce 'the strong-winged music of Homer,' and at the same time approximating very closely to the fluent continuity of blank verse. Where, for example, can such a passage as the description of Tristram rowing be matched?

And while they sat at speech as at a feast, Came a light wind fast hardening forth of the east And blackening till its might liad marred the skies, And the sea thrilled as with heart sundering sighs One after one drawn, with each breath it drew, And the green hardened into iron blue, And the soft light went out of all its face. Then Tristram girt him for an oarsman's place And took his oar and smote, and toiled with might In the east wind's full free and the strong ser's spite Labouring, and all the rowers rowed hard, but he More inightily than any wearier three And Iseult watched him rowing with sinless eyes That loved him but in holy girlish wise For noble joy in his fair manliness And trust and tender wonder, none the less She thought if God had given her grace to be Man, and make war on danger of earth and sea, Even such a man she would be, for his stroke Was mightiest as the mightier water broke, And in sheer measure like strong music drave Clean through the wet weight of the wallowing wave, And as a tune before a great king played I or triumph was the tune their strong strokes made, And sped the ship through with smooth strife of oars Over the mid sea's grey foam paven floors, For all the loud breach of the waves at wall So for an hour they fought the storm out still, And the shorn foam spun from the blades, and high The keel sprang from the wave ridge, and the sky Glared at them for a breath's space through the run

Or take the great couplet in the description of Tristram's last fight

But on the slayer exulting like the flame Whose foot foreshines the thunder Tristram came.

Or the sunset in Joyous Gard

So that day
They communed, even till even was worn'away,
Nor aught they said seemed strange or sad to say,
But sweet as night's dim dawn to weariness
Nor loved they life or love for death's sake less,
Nor feared they death for love's or life's sake more.
And on the sounding soft funereal shore

They, watching till the day should wholly die, Saw the far sea sweep to the far grey sky, Saw the long sands sweep to the long grey sea. And night made one sweet mist of moor and lea, And only far off shore the form gave light, And life in them sank silent as the night.

Or Iseult's piteous prayer

Yea, though deep lips and tender hair be thinned, Though check wither, brow fade, and bosom wane, Shall I change also from this heart again. To madenhood of heart and holiness? Shall I more love thee, Lord, or love him less—Ah miserable! though spirit and heart be rent, Shall I repent, Lord God? shall I repent? Nay, though thou slay me! for herein I am blest, That as I loved him yet I love him best—More than mine own soul or thy love or thee, Though thy love save and my love save not me.

Or the large imagery in the lines telling how Tristram-

Let all sad thoughts through his spirit sweep. As leaves through air or tears through eyes that weep. Or snowflakes through dark weather and his soul,. That had seen all those sightless seasons roll. One after one, wave over weary wave, Was in him as a corpse is in its grave.

Or this flash of romantic glamour

And like the moan of lions hurt to death

Came the sea's hollow noise along the night.

Or this troubling picture of the queen

And all that strange hair shed Across the tissued pillows, fold on fold Innumerable, incomparable, all gold

The failure of modern poets to raise blank verse to the Shakespearian or to the Miltonic height suggests that the Swinburnian heroic couplet may be more suited to the genius of a language which craves for the rich emphasis of rhyme. Before Tristram was written our poets assumed, perhaps too hastily, that the heroic couplet was an artificial form incapable of being made ductile and flexible. Tristram overthrew that assumption, and perhaps the Tristram couplet may be still further developed by poets who cannot build the loftier harmonies of blank verse. It is, indeed, a pity that Mr Swinburne has not continued an experiment so fruitful

In conclusion, it may be well to clear away certain uncritical ideas with regard to Mr Swinburne's religious poems. It is absurd to assume that, because he scourges the crimes of Christless Christianity, he is therefore blind to the moral grandeur of Christ. Now and again an ignorant and illiterate person speaks of such a poem as 'Before a Crucifix'—a vindication of Christ against theological caricatures of Christ—as if it were an attack on Christ Himself! It would indeed be strange if a poet who has drawn his inspiration so largely from the Bible were unable to realise its of chical splendour. It is because he realises it more intensely than some of its professional in terpreters that he perceives the paradox of an unchristian Christianity—

Of Christian creeds that spit on Christ.

His conception of Christ is summed up in his sonnet 'On the Russian Persecution of the Jews,' with its prophetic appeal

Face loved of little children long ngo, Head hated of the priests and rulers then, Say was not this thy passion, to forcknow In death's worst hour the works of Christian men?

There is really no deep difference between the Pantheism of Browning and the 'Pananthropism' of Swinburne, and the spiritual interpretation of the Incarnation brings the most liberal theologians very close to the Swinburnian conception of the divinity of man. It is not a paradox, therefore, but a platitude to say that Mr Swinburne, for from being irreligious, is one of the most religious poets of our time. Faults he has, but they are superficial faults of taste and judgment rather than deep flaws of the spirit, and the day is coming when it will be universally acknowledged that he has pursued his artistic aims with a high nobility of soul and with a lofty faith in the spiritual future of humanity

Thomas Hardy.

Thomas Hardy, one of the greatest novelists of the period, was born at Upper Bockhampton near Dorchester, 2nd June 1840 He was brought up and practised as an architect, gaining in 1863 the prize and medal of the Institution of British Architects and Sir William Tite's prize for archi His intention was to become tectural design an architect, and his earliest work in print is an account of the building of a house, published in Chambers's Journal in 1865 But he gradually became absorbed in literature, and from the be ginning of his career till now he has steadily risen in the estimation alike of critics and the public. Always a diligent student, he was in his early years deeply impressed by the poetry of The Dorsetshire poems of his friend and neighbour, the Rev William Barnes, were also favourites, and he has written more than one critical appreciation of these, remarkable for depth and subtlety - Mr Hardy, who has resided for many years at Max Gate, Dorchester, has had no public life, and his jealously guarded his privacy. But on various occasions he has spoken frankly of his own intention in his novels, partly in his interesting prefices and partly in occasional replies to critics. He has removed the thin veil which hangs over the scenery of his fiction Mr Hardy's first novel, Desperate Remedies, was published anonymously in 1871 Though it had no popular success, its great power was recognised by the critics, notably the Athenaum and the Spectator-'We see no reason why he should not write novels only a little inferior to the best of the present generation? In 1872 the charming idyl Under the Greenwood Tice appeared, and was recognised as a singularly fresh and delightful sketch of rural life, comparable with the masterpieces of George Sand - It describes the love affairs of a country schoolmistress, 'a bright little bird,' with the vicar, the churchwarden, and the tranter's son, who wins the prize. It was followed in 1873 by A Pair of Blue Lyes, a tragedy wrought out with much subtlety and pathos irony prevented it from being very popular, though the heroine is one of the most winning among the author's creations Mr Hardy gained his first notable success with his next book, Far from the Madding Crowd, first published in the Cornhill Magazine, under the editorship of Mr Frederick Greenwood Appearing anonymously, it was attributed by many readers to George Eliot, though some of the younger critics of the day did not hesitate to deny this on the ground that the story was much too good for her From that day Mr Hardy had his own circle of warm admirers, both among reviewers and readers. In Far from the Madding Crowd there is a sure and easy power, a wealth of material, an unfailing distinction of expression, and a dramatic power which places the book among the author's finest productions Hand of Ethelberta, which followed in 1876, is a very clever and brilliant evercise in comedy The herome, Ethichberta, is a butler's daughter, who finds herself placed by marriage in an aristocratic environment, and the tale describes the reactions between her and her circumstances Next came The Return of the Native, perhaps the greatest and most original of all Mr Hardy's books, the most masterly in style, and the profoundest in its apprehension of nature and character. It was somewhat coldly received, but has steadily grown in favour Then came The Trumpet Major, a slighter and more popular book, on the lines of Las from the Madding Crowd It was succeeded by A Laodician and Truo on a Tower, both highly finished works, but neither marking an advance The Mayor of Casterbridge (1886) is a sound and strong study of human nature, and The Wood landers (1887) is a book of more complex and still greater power, ranking with Far from the Madding Crowd and the Return of the Native Tess of the D'Urbervilles (1891) was the first story of Mr Hardy's that had a really great circulation, and in some respects it marked a new departure in his There was no change in the underlying convictions and preferences to which he has been constant from the beginning, but he asserted his right to deal more frankly and explicitly with the problems of life and destiny This claim was pushed still further in Jude the Obscure (1895), which called forth much hostile criticism. It is certain that Tess and Jude are in every respect among the highest achievements of the author, whatever be thought of their philosophy By the time they were published, comparisons between Mr Hardy and the popular novelists who reigned over the dreamest period of British fiction were felt to be ridiculous In 1897 The Well beloved, published some years previously in serial form, appeared as a book Il essex Tales (1888) contains some of the best short stories in the language, and A Group of Noble Dames (1891) embodies in fiction some Wessex traditions. Two volumes of poetry, Wesser Poems (1898) and Poems of the Past and the Present (1901), are characteristic expressions of the author's mind, rugged and sombre, but often with a haunting melody of their own

Mr Hardy is first of all a most original writer He is influenced by no master, although it is easy to see that Heine and Schopenhauer have touched As a stylist he occupies a high place, though he has cared supremely for rendering the truth as he has seen it in fact and life. He is born of the earth, born of Wesser almost in a more special sense than her other children Teniers like power of citching and fixing phases of peasant life is unapproached except in Sliake speare. At their best his peasants are comparable only with those in Hamlet and A H'nter's Tale It has been complained that he brings the phrases and thoughts of culture into the conversation of his rustics, intertwining distinct phases of either thought or language, or of both. It may be replied that the humours of his peasantry are bound up largely with their use of scriptural language, but the true answer is that such creations of genius attest themselves like Shakespeare's His sensitiveness to scenic and atmospheric effects, to the moods and changes of day and night, to the voices of the heathbells, the trees, and the winds, to the delicate harmonies of colour, achieves an effect impossible to the closest observation and the minutest vision It brings the reader into the inmost heart and shrine of nature In Mr Hardy's view of life the main interest is that of love has hardly any place for children. His heroes and heromes are isolated. Family ties count for little. The ordinary ambition for a career is scarcely recog-In his characters the element of flexibility is wanting, and when the phase of passionate love is ended there is little to follow but misery His women have been described as 'Undines of the earth' They are fascinating, vivacious, incalculable. They have an elemental purity of nature, and so long as they are led by instinct they are true, but they make no fight against circum-They show an impassioned receptivity, and their love is blind and impulsive. From the first but more explicitly in his later books, Mr Hardy has proclaimed that human life is governed by inscrutable forces, that human beings are puppets of fate, and destined to misery an artistic point of view, it is difficult to secure the full effect of tragedy in a book where tragedy itself is treated as hardly more than a deeper tinge of the common leaden colour in the hum in lot, and it might be fair to say that in the Return of the Native the final impression is rather that of human miserableness than of human grief. But this cannot be said of Tess and Jude the Obscure. There we have a true rendering of the anguish of the human spirit, of the depths, though not of the heights, in life

From 'The Return of the Native'

The place became full of a watchful intentuess now, for when other things sank brooding to sleep the heath appeared slowly to awake and listen. Every night its litting form seemed to await something, but it had waited thus, unmoved, during so many centuries, through the crises of so many things, that it could only be imagined to await one last crisis—the final overthrow

It was a spot which returned upon the memory of those who loved it with an aspect of peculiar and kindly con-Smiling champings of flowers and fruit hardly do this, for they are permanently harmonious only with an existence of better reputation as to its issues than the Twilight combined with the scenery of Egdon Heath to evolve a thing majestic without severity, im pressive without showiness, emphatic in its admonitions, grand in its simplicity. The qualifications which fre quently invest the façade of a prison with far more dignity than is found in the façade of a palace double its size lent to this heath a sublimity in which spots renowned for beauty of the accepted kind are utterly wanting Tair prospects wed happily with fair times, but alas, if times be not fur! Men have oftener suf fered from the mockery of a place too smiling for their reason than from the oppression of surroundings over sadly tinged Higgard Egdon appealed to a subiler and scarcer instinct, to a more recently learnt emotion, than that which responds to the sort of beauty called charming and fair

Indeed, it is a question if the exclusive reign of this orthodox beauty is not approaching its last quarter. The new Vale of Lempe may be a gaunt waste in Thule human souls may find themselves in closer and closer harmony with external things wearing a sombreness distasteful to our race when it is young. The time seems near, if it has not actually arrived, when the chastened sublimity of a moor, a sea, or a mountain will be all of inture that is absolutely in keeping with the moods of the more thinking among mankind, and, ultimately, to the commonest tourist, spots like Iceland may become what the vineyards and myrtle gardens of South Europe are to him now, and Heidelberg and Badeu be passed unliceded as he lastens from the Alps to the sand dunes of Scheveningen

It was at present a place perfectly accordant with man's nature—neither ghastly, hateful, nor ugly neither commonplace, unmeauing, nor tame, but, like man, slighted and enduring, and withal singularly colossal and mysterious in its swarthy monotony. As with some persons who have long lived apart, solitude seemed to look out of its countenance. It had a louely face, suggesting tragical possibilities.

Valenciennes

(1793)

We trenched, we trumpeted and drummed, And from our mortars tons of iron hummed Ath'art the ditch, the month we bombed The Town o' Valencieen

'Twas in the June o' Ninety dree (The Duke o' Yark our then Commander been) The German Legion, Guards, and we Laid siege to Valencieen.

This was the first time in the war
That French and English spilled each other's gore, —God knows what year wall end the roar Begun at Valencieen!

'Twas said that we'd no business there
A topperen the French for disagreën, However, that's not my affair—
We were at Valencieen

Such snocks and slats, since were began Never knew raw recruit or veteran Stone deaf therence went many a man Who served at Valencieen

Into the streets, ath'art the sky,
A hundred thousand balls and bombs were fleën,
And harmless townsfolk fell to die
Each hour at Valeneieen!

And, sweaten wi' the bombardiers,

A shell was slent to shards anighst my ears

"Twas nigh the end of hopes and sears

For me at Valencieen!

They bore my wownded frame to camp, And shut my gapèn slull, and washed en clean, And jined en wi' a zilver clamp, This night at Valencieën 'We've fetched en back too quick from dead, But never more on earth while rose is red Will drum rouse Corpel!' Doctor said O'me at Valencieën

'Twer true No voice o' friend or for Can reach me now, or any liven been, And little have I power to know Since then at Valencieen!

I never hear the zummer hums O' bees, and don' know when the cuckoo comes,
But night and day I hear the bombs
We threw at Valencieen

As for the Duke o' Yark in war,
There be some volk whose judgment o' en is incan,
But this I say—'a was not far
From great at Valencieen

O' wild wet nights, when all seems sad,
My wownds come back, as though new wownds I'd had,
But yet—at times I'm sort o' glad I fout at Valencieën

Well Heaven wi' its jasper halls
Is now the on'y Town I care to be in Good Lord, if Nick should bomb the walls
As we did Valencieen

W ROBLRTSON NICOLL

Alfred Austin poet-laureate from 1896 on wards, was born of Catholic parents at Headingley, Leeds, in 1835, and, educated at Stonyliurst and Oscott, he graduated at the University of London in 1853, and was called to the Bar in 1857, but practised for little more than three years, having on his father's death in 1861 adopted literature as a profession His first efforts in poetry and fiction (Randolph, a Tale of Polish Grief, &c ) had hardly been successful, but The Season, a Satire (1861), was distinctly bright and clever. In The Poetry of the Period (1870) he distinguished himself more by the audacity of his judgments on Tennyson, Browning, Arnold, and Swinburne than by real critical insight. The Golden Age, Interludes, Madonna's Child, The Tower of Babel ('a celestral love drama'), The Human Tragedy, Lyrical Poems, and Narrative Poems (vol vi of a 'collected edition of his works) are volumes of verse in various kinds, as are Savonarola (a tragedy), Prime Lucifer (a drama in verse), England's Darling, The Conversion of Winckelmann and other Poems, and Flodden Field, performed at His Majesty's Theatre in 1903, and we have further had from him the idyllic prose books The Gaiden that I Love, In Veronica's Garden, and Lamia's Winter Quarters, not to speak of Spring and Autumn in Ireland and A Tale of True Love From 1883 Mr Austin had been the energetic editor of the National Review, and in 1896 (four years after the death of rennyson) he was named poet-laureate. The appointment has caused an unfair standard to be applied to his work—Tenny son could have no successor in his own rank. But Mr Austin's best lyrics, if they lack the true lyrical ring, are simple, sincere, fresh, and graceful, like much of his prose. His worst, unhappily, are some of his official elucubrations as laureate, or such verses as he felt called to produce in praise of the Jameson Raid

Sir Alfred Comvus Lyall was born, the son of a clergyman, at Coulston in Surrey in 1835, and was educated at Eton and Haileybury for an Indian career KCB (1881) and Lieutenant Governor of the North West Provinces in 1882-87, he was in 1888 appointed a member of the Council of India His Verses written in India proved him to be not merely a keen critic of the life about him but a poet. His Asiatic Studies (1882, new ed 1899) showed a rarely sympathetic insight into the actual beliefs of the Indian people, and has been heartily accepted as a standard authority. He has also written a book on Warren Hastings, and one on the rise of the British dominion in India (1893), and, in a different field, a critical study of Tennyson (1902) He is a member of the Privy Council and holds honorary degrees of Oxford and Cambridge

Alfred Ainger, son of a London architect, was born in 1837, graduated from Trinity Hall, Cambridge, and after holding a cure near Lichfield, in 1866 became a reader at the Temple Church, in 1887 a canon of Bristol, and in 1894 Master of the Temple Author of the articles on Limb and Hood in this work, of selections, with a memoir, from Hood, and of a book on Crabbe ("Men of Letters" series, 1903), he is best I nown in literature as biographer (1882, 1888) and editor (6 vols 1883-88) of Lamb He died 8th I ebruary 1904

William Edward Hurtpole Locky,

historian and moralist, was born at Dublin on 26th March 1838, and educated for the Irish Church first at Cheltenham and then at Irmity College, Dublin His first book (1860) was on The Reli gious Tendencies of the 1ge. He soon resolved to make historical research his life work, and after a a distinguished literary career he was from 1895 till 1903 MP for Dublin University In 1861 he published anonymously The Leaners of Public Ofunion in Ireland, four bulliant and sympathetic essays on Swift, Flood, Grattan, and O Connell the greatly enlarged edition of 1903, which omitted Swift, expanded the O'Connell article into what is the best history of Ireland from the Union to the potato famine. His final judgment on Swift appeared in the introduction to an edition of the Dean's works 1897) His learned, luminous, and dispassionate History of the Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe (2 vols 1865, new ed. 1899) does not deal with rational ism in the sense of religious free thought or mere anti supernaturalism in interpreting the Bible—still less with rationalism in the stricter sense of one specific school of German Biblical criticism has for its subject the dawn of the age of reason and the decline of the age of unlicitating futh, the gradual revolt, conscious or unconscious, against traditional, ecclesiastical, and clerical standards of judgment in all that concerns life and manners The decay of the belief in witchcraft and magic, fading faith in the miraculous as an explanation of mysteries, the sapping of the persecuting spirit by the growth of tolera tion, the disappearance of superstition and the secularisation of life-all fall within the scope of this scholarly and original vork. The statements, guardedly made, are supported by a mass of copious notes and references, and though the worl is well written, Lecky attached more importance to the substance of what he said than to the manner of saying it. The tone is nowliere that of a partisan, but the ethical philosopher is the unhasitating friend of progress, and in his own sense of the word is a broad minded rationalist. He did, and did admirably, some of the work Buckle proposed to do, but his spirit was not the spirit of Buckle-it was more truly historical, more genial and broad minded

The Ilistory of England in the Eighteenth Century (8 vols 1878-90, 12th ed in 12 vols 1899) is not a history in strict chronological form, but rather a philosophical study of events and their causes, a succession of dissertations on the manners of the last age, relieved by an admirable series of finished historical portruts. Perhaps the most origin il portion of the vork is the treatment of the American war of independence, but the five volumes dealing with Ireland are even more valuable, and it should count is a special ment that one Irish Instorians as able to treat Irish poli tical history with moderation and charit Lecty. stands midway between the drimmer school of literary historians and the modern scientific type of researchers in irchives the are not ashamed of the dryacdust method. He rurely obtrude any personal propossession, and is singularly free from prejudice, he is afried of purple pitches and epigrams as disturbing the judicial attitude, but when he gives the rems to his imagination be commands an impressive diction. In him the first of the lustorian is not so much to paint a peure as to solve a problem—to explain a nation s present by the past. The History of European Morals from Annistus to Charlemagie 12 vols ruly is ilso learned, Liborious, and judicial, and it occupies a field of its own, showing exceptional power of guildring vast masses of detached social phenoment, too much unheeded into a rew light, and of interpreting their eignificance and their lesson. A volume of poems (1801) was not generally considered to show Leely at he best he was essen tially a thinker and expositor, and not a lyrist, but as counterpieces to his last prove the ver-es a e of great interest to his renders. I celly, who was in substance i Whig and a Moderate, tool in spine of his warm trish sympathics, a strong side against Home Rule, and as MP for Dublin University from 1895, and in his Deviceracy and Liverty (1896. new ed 1899), revealed the anti-Radical somewhat too mindful of the defects and dangers of unre strained democracy The Map of Life Conduct and Chiracter (1899, though it demands only the freedom's high is consistent with a determine view of life, is not a disquisition on the foundation of morals but a compendium of practical observations on such subjects as the management of character, success, money, marriage national and individual ideals, and the disproportionate amount of English energy devoted to political interests. Lecky, who was LLD and DCL, was admitted to the lang Council in 1897, one of the first authors to receive the new Order of Merit in 1902 he was the first to be removed by death (22nd October 1903)

Persecutions of the Weslevans.

From the time of the institution of lay preachers Methodism became in a great degree independent of the Lstablished Church. Its chapels multiplied in the great towns, and its unnerant missionaries penetrated to the most seeluded districts. They were accustomed to preach in fields and gardens, in streets and lecture rooms, market places and churchyards. On one occasion find Whitefield at a fair mounting a stage which have creeted for some wrestlers, and there dene pleasures of the world, on another, preaching mountebanks at Moorfields. On a third, attract his pulpit 10,000 of the spectators at a raceo.

fourth, standing beside the gallows at an execution to speak of death and of eternity Wesley, when excluded from the pulpit of Epworth, delivered some of his most impressive sermons in the churchyard, standing on his father's tomb Howell Harris, the apostle of Wales. encountering a party of mountebanks, spring into their midst exclaiming, in a solemn voice, 'Let us pray,' and then proceeded to thunder forth the judgments of the Lord Rowland Hill was accustomed to visit the great towns on market-day in order that he might address the people in the market place, and to go from fair to fair preaching among the revellers from his favourite text, 'Come out from among them. In this manner the Methodist preachers came in contact with the most savage elements of the population, and there were few forms of mob violence they did not experience. In 1741 one of their preachers named Seward, after repeated ill treatment in Wales, was at last struck on the head while preaching at Monmouth, and died of the blow not, while Wheatley was preaching at Norwich, a poor woman with child perished from the kicks and blows of the mob At Wednesbury-a little town in Stafford shire—then very famous for its cocklights—numerous houses were wrecked, the Methodists were stoned, beaten with cadgels, or dragged through the public kennels Women were atrociously abused The leaders of the mob declared their intention to destroy every Methodist in the county Wesley himself appeared in the town, and the moters speedily surrounded the house where he was staying. With the placid courage that never deserted him in danger, he descended alone and unarmed into their midst. His perfect calmness and his singularly venerable appearance quelled the most noisy, and he succeeded by a few well chosen words in producing a sudden reaction His captors, however, insisted on his accompanying them to a neighbouring justice, who exhorted them to disperse in peace. The night had now fullen, and Wesley was actually returning to Wednes bury protected by a portion of the very crowd who had attacked him, when a new mob poured in from an adjoin ing village. He was seized by the hair and dragged through the streets Some struck at him with cudgels Many cried to knock out his brains and kill him at once. A river was flowing near, and he imagined they would throv him into the water. Yet in that dreadful moment his self possession never failed him. He uttered in loud and solemn tones a prayer to God He addressed those who were nearest him with all the slill that a consummite knowledge of the popular character could supply, and he speedily won over to his side some of the most powerful of the leaders Gradually the throng paused, wavered, divided, and Wesley returned almost uninjured to his house To a similar courage he owed his life at Bolton, when the house where he was preach ing was attacked, and at last burst open, by a furious crowd thursting for his life Again and again he preached, like the other leaders of the movement, in the midst of showers of stones or tiles or rotten eggs fortunes of his brother were little different At Cardiff, when he was preaching, women were kicked and their clothes set on fire by rockets At St Ives and in the neighbouring villages the congregation were attacked with endgels, and everything in the room where they were assembled was shattered to atoms At Devizes a water engine played upon the house where he was stry His horses were seized The house of one of his supporters was ransacked, and bull-dogs were let loose upon him. At Dublin Whitefield was almost stoned to death. At Exeter he was stoned in the very presence of the bishop. At Plymouth he was violently assaulted and his life seriously threatened hy a naval officer.

Early Christianity and Patriotism

The relations of Christianity to the sentiment of patri otism were from the first very unfortunate. While the Christians were, from obvious reasons, completely sepa rated from the national spirit of Judea, they found them selves equally at variance with the lingering remnants of Roman patriotism Rome was to them the power of Antichrist, and its overthrow the necessary prelude to the millennial reign. They formed an illegal organisation, directly opposed to the genius of the empire, anticipating its speedy destruction, looking back with something more than despondency to the fate of the heroes who had adorned its past, and refusing resolutely to participate in those national spectacles which were the symbols and the expressions of patriotic feeling. Though scrupulously averse to all rebellion, they rarely concealed their senti ments, and the whole tendency of their teaching was to withdraw men as far as possible both from the functions and the enthusiasm of public life. It was at once their confession and their boast that no interests were more indifferent to them than those of their country regarded the lawfulness of taking arms as very question able, and all those proud and aspiring qualities that constitute the distinctive beauty of the soldier's character as emphatically nuchristian. Their home and their in terests were in another world, and, provided only they were unmolested in their worship, they avowed with frankness, long after the empire had become Christian, that it was a matter of indifference to them under what rule they lived Asceticism, drawing all the enthusiasm of Christendom to the desert life, and clevating as an ideal the extreme and absolute' abnegation of all patriot ism, formed the culmination of the movement, and was undoubtedly one cause of the downfall of the Roman Empire.

There are, probably, few subjects on which popular judgments are commonly more erroneous than upon the relations between positive religious and moral enthusiasm Religions have, no doubt, a most real power of evoking a latent energy which, without their existence, would never have been called into action, but their influence is on the whole probably more attractive than erentive They supply the channel in which moral enthusiasm flows, the banner under which it is enlisted, the mould in which it is east, the ideal to which it tends idea the phrase 'a very good man' would have suggested to an early Roman would probably have been that of great and distinguished patriotism, and the passion and interest of such a man in his country's cause were in direct proportion to his moral elevation. Ascetie Chris tinnity decisively diverted moral enthusiasm into another channel, and the civic virtues, in consequence, neces sarily declined. The extinction of all public spirit, the base treachery and corruption pervading every depart ment of the Government, the cowardice of the army, the despicable frivolity of character that led the people of Treves, when fresh from their burning city, to call for theatres and circuses, and the people of Roman Carthage to plunge wildly into the excitement of the chariot rices, on the very day when their city succumbed beneath the Vandal—all these things coexisted with extraordinary displays of ascetic and of missionary devotion. The genius and the virtue that might have defended the empire were engaged in fierce disputes about the Pelagian controversy, at the very time when Attila was encircling Rome with his armies, and there was 10 subtlety of theological metaphysics which did not kindle a deeper interest in the Christian leaders than the throes of their expiring country. The moral enthusiasm that in other days would have fired the armies of Rome with an in vincible valour, impelled thousands to abandon their country and their homes, and consume the weary hours in a long routine of uscless and horrible maceitations

From a Pholograph by Russell & Sons.

When the Goths had captured Ronic, St Augustine, as we have seen, pointed with a just pride to the Christian Church, which remained an unviolated sanctuary during the horrors of the sack, as a proof that a new spirit of sanctity and of reverence had descended upon the world The Pagan, in his turn, pointed to what he deemed a not less significant fact—the golden statues of Valour and of Fortune were melted down to pay the ransom to the con-Many of the Christians contemplated with an indifference that almost amounted to complacency what they regarded as the predicted ruin of the city of the When the Vandals swept over Asrica, the fallen gods Donatists, muddened by the persecution of the orthodox, received them with open arms, and contributed their share to that deadly blow The immortal pass of Ther mopylæ was surrendered without a struggle to the Goths A Pagan writer accused the monks of having betrayed it It is more probable that they had absorbed or diverted the heroism that in other days would have defended it The conquest, at a later date, of Egypt by the Moham medans, was in a great measure due to an invitation from the persecuted Monophysites. Sub-equent religious wars have again and again exhibited the same phenomenon. The treachery of a religious to his country no longer argued an absence of all moral feeling. It had become compatible with the deepest religious enthusiasm, and with all the courage of a martyr.

Lord Acton (1834-1902), born at Naples John EMERICH TOWARD DALPERG ACTON, was the grandson of the Minister of Lerdinand IV of Naples, and succeeded his fither as baronet in 1838 He was educated it Oscott under Cardinal Wiseman, and at Munich by Dr Döllinger, whose views he zerlously espoused, distinguishing himself in Rome in 1870 by his hostility to the dogma of papal infallibility. He sat in Parliament for Carlow (1859-65), and was rused to the peerage by Mr Gladstone in 1869 as Baron Acton of Aldenham The leader of the Liberal Catholics in England, he was for a time editor of the Home and Foreign Remark, and afterwards of the Weelly Correrade and British Quarterly, but it was rather by his universal repute as a scholar of singular learning and breadth of mind than be his virtings on the Vatican decrees (1874), Wolsey (1877), German Schools of History (1886), and other occarional publications, that he had shown himself exceptionally well qualified to hold the Cambridge chair of History is Scales a successor (1803). His inaugural lecture on The Study of History expounded the high and deep view he took of the subject. The inherent worth and interest of humanity was his leading thought, the course of listory was for him a philosophy of history. Historical facts were for him 'not a burden on the memory, but an illumination of the soul? His point of view was cosmopolitin, his crudition was tast and his insight profound. But his lofty ideal of fastidious accuracy himited his productiveness. No scholar of anything like his learning wrote or published so little, perhaps his chiefest bequest to posterity was his planning and mapping out and laying the foundations of the great Cambriage Modern History, of which the first volume appeared in His enormous library, the verr of his death purchased after his death by an American million aire, and presented to Mr John Morley, found an appropriate resting-place in the University of Cambridge A bibliography of the vorks of Bishop Stubbs, Bishop Creighton, and Lord Acton was edited for the Royal Historical Society in 1903, Acton's letters to Mrs Drew appeared in 1904.

William John Courthope, the son of a Sussex clergyman, was born in 1842, studied at Harrow and New College, Oxford, and besides being a Civil Service Commissioner, has been Professor of Poetry at Oxford Editor of Pope's works and author of a Life of him, he has written, besides a short Life of Addison, The Paradise of Birds, and other works, a magistral History of Poetry (4 vols 1895–1904)

John Morley, son of a surgeon at Blackburn, was born on the 24th December 1838. He entered Lincoln College, Oxford, in 1856, and three years later took his degree. At that time the Fracturan movement, which had long dominated Oxford, had spent its force, and was followed by a movement in the direction of Liberalism, J. S. Mill succeeded to the intellectual throne vacated by Newman. At a formative period of his life Mr. Morley came under the influence of Mill, to whose memory he has paid a noble On the tribute conclusion of his university course he embarked upon a literary career, and after a few preliminary ven tures (as in editing the Literary Gazelle and the Morning Star), he was appointed editor of the Fortnightly Remew. in succession to G H Ienes 1880 he became editor of the Pall Mall Gazette, then the leading organ of advanced Liberalism in London. notably in dealing with Irish politics, and lic conducted the Pall Mall till he was sent (1883) to Parliament by Neucistle 1886 he was ap pointed Secretary for Ireland in Mr Gladstone's Home Rule administra tion, with a seat in the Cabinet, and in 1892, when the Gladstone Government again held office, he returned to his old post. In 1895 Mr Morley was one of those who lost their seats in the disaster which overtook the Liberal party, his loss of popularity being largely due to the stand he made against Socialistic interference with the hours of Libour in the form of a compulsory eight hours, day. In 1896 he re entered Parliament as meinber for the Montrose Burghs. Since 1894 he has been a trustee of the British Museum

Mr Morley's speeches, models of literary excellence, are distinguished by dignity of tone, elevation of thought, and manifest sincerity. In recent years, especially on foreign questions—notably on the South African will—Mr Morley has taken the unpopular side, but by the force of his personality and his steadfast adherence to his principles he has retained the respect of those who have differed most violently from him. The key to Mr Morley's public career is to be found in his writings. A friend and admirer of J. S. Mill, he has carried to the study of modern problems the spirit and methods of Philosophical Liberalism, and he has freed the creed of his masters from many of its crudities. On the historic side the old Liberals were always weak. They condemned or approved institutions, not accord ing to their relative values, but accord ing to their rch tion to an abstract system of political philosophy error was noted by Mill, but he came upon the scene too early to profit by the revolution worked in political philosophy, espe cially on the historic side, by the cvolutionary con cention of society Mr Morley accepts in the main the leading conceptions of the Philo sopluc Liberalsnamely, a belief in individud and social progress along the lines of freedom and knowledge - pro gress being ac celerated by the growth of justice and sympathy His political creed, rooted in a passionate desire for justice and freedom, makes him look coldly upon recent Socialistic developments. And it is his intense interest in the piogress of humanity which explains his antipathy to the Imperialist conception, in his view, Great Britain should be not the nulltary dictator but the moral pioneer of humanity. Mr Morley is entirely free of the crude views of the cirly Radicals, who hoped in their day to see the establishment of the Age of Reason, evolution, not revolution, is the keynote of his thinking. His study of Burke and Cointe has shown him the relative value of old ideas and old institutions, and by his deep historic sense, his fondness for the concrete, his vital interest in humanity, apart from philosophic shibboleths, Mr

Morley has left behind him the old revolutionary Liberalism of his misters, and has advanced to what may be called evolutionary Liberalism

Mr Morley's philosophy of life must be gathered from a study of his writings, of which that On Compromuse (1874) is one of the most characteristic In his Voltaire (1872) we have his attitude towards religion, particularly to that form of it which in his view has been the main obstruction to individual and social progress. In his Dide of and the Lawsclopædists (1878) we have his insistence upon the paramount importance of knowledge and freedom as the two vital fictors in progress, and a generous tribute is paid to the advanced thinkers of the Revolution period, who fought so valiantly for the liberation of humanity In Rousseau (1873), along with appreciation of Rousseau's influence as supplementary to the hard, dry, critical influence of Voltaire, we have a protest against the dangers of importing into political life sentimentalism and intuitionalism In Buile (1879) Mr Morley pre sents us with a sketch of the ideal politician, in whom the desire for progress is held in check by a profound regard for the principles of order and continuity In his Life of Cobden (1881) he does justice to those great politico economic principles which, in his opinion, tend to internationalise commerce and industry, thereby promoting the brotherhood of man Two series of Critical Miscellances (1871 and 1877) and a volume of Studies in Literature (1891) are an integral part of Mr. Morley's literary work, and the Oliver Cromwell (1900) showed how fairly Mr Morley could deal with a man and a revolution dominated by religious conceptions he does not share His Life of Glad stone (3 vols 1903) was sure to be not merely a permanent addition to the political history of the time, but a literary masterpiece. Yet as Gladstone's career was so bound up with the public life of his time, there was an obvious danger that the historian would encroach on the biographer, that against the massive historic background the figure of Gladstone would shrink into something quite indistinct and shadowy. But in this greatest of our political biographies, Mr Morley's intuitive sense of literary proportion stood him in good stend, the history of the time is depicted with superb and attractive lucidity, while Gladstone all through remains the central figure

The Political Spirit.

It is at least well, and more than that, it is an indispensable condition of social well being, that the divorce between political responsibility and intellectual responsibility, between respect for what is instantly practicable and search after what is only important in thought, should not be too complete and universal. Even if there were no other objection, the undisputed prominence of the political spirit has a plain tendency to limit the subjects in which the men animated by it can take a real interest All matters fall out of sight, or at least fall into a secondary place, which do not bear more or less directly and patently upon the material and structural welfare of the community In this vay the inembers of the community miss the most bracing, widening, and elevated of the whole range of influences that create great characters First, they lose sincere concern about the larger questions which the human mind has raised up for itself. Second, they lose a fearless desire to reach the true answers to them, or if no certain answers should prove to be vithin reach, then at any rate to be satisfied on good grounds that this is so Such questions are not immediately discerted by commonplace minds to be of social import. Consequently they, and all else that is not obviously conneeted with the machinery of society, give way in the public consideration to what is so connected with it, in a manner that cannot be in tal en-Hor momentors a disadvantage this is we can best know by contempla ing the characters which has a conclumes lighted up the old times. Men were then devoutly per haded that their eternal salvation depended on their having true bend. Any slackness in finding out y luch beliefs are the true ones would have to be answered for before the throne of Almights God, at the sure in I and peril of evera mg domination. To what quarter in the large lastone forms ment can we turn our eves with such cer units of leng stirred and clavated, of thinking better of human life and the worth of those who have been mos deaply penetrated by its seriousness, as to the annals of the intropid spirits whom the Protestant doctrine of in te feasible personal respon ibility brought to the front in Germany in the sixteenth century, and in England and Scotland in the seventeenth? It is not their faintness, call less is it their theology, which males the great Paritan chiefs of Ingland and the siern Covenanters of Scotland so heroic in our signt. It is the fact that they sought truth and ensued it, not thinking of the practical nor cautiously counting majorities and minorities, but each man pondering and searching so has ever in the great Tasl master's eye ' (From On Comfron ut)

James Brice, son of Dr Jimes Brice, geologist and schoolmaster, was born at Belfast, 10th May 1838, and educated at Glasgon High School and University, and Frinity College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1862 as double Elected a Fellow of Oriel, and called to the Bar in 1867, he was Regius Professor of Civil Lav at Oxford from 1870 to 1893, and entered Parlia ment as a Liberal in 1880. In 1886 he was made Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, and in 1892 Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and he is a member of the Privy Council His literary works give him a place among the most accomplished scholars of the day. His first book of note, The Holy Reman Empire, which appeared in 1884, was an elaboration of a university prize essay, and contains a luminous sketch of the central political institutions of the Middle Ages, his Transcaucasia and Ararat (1877) is the record of a visit to the East, in which he climbed the historic mountain. The monumental work on The American Commonwealth (1888) marked him as the successor of De Tocqueville, and won him the honour of a corresponding membership of the Institute of France. His later works are Impres sions of South Africa (1897), Studies in History and Inrisprudence (1902), and an interesting volume of Studies in Contemporary Biography (1903)

Sir George Otto Trevelynn, son of Sir Charles Edward Trevelyan, Governor of Madras and Baronet, and Hannah, the sister of Lord Michally, was born in 1838 at Rothley Temple in Leicestershire, the birtliplace of his illustrious Educated at Harrow and Tranty College, Cambridge, he graduated as second classic in 1861, and gave high promise of distinction in literature by his Aristophanic slits of Horace at the University of Athens (1861) and The Ladies in Parlia-In 1865 he entered Parliament as a ment (1869) Liberal, and sat, infinly for Scotch constituencies, until 1897, filling at different times the Cabinet offices of Chief Secretary for Ireland and Secretary for Scotland His earlier prose works were the Letters of a Competition Wallah (1864) and the brilliant but rather too emphatic narrative of the defence and fall of Ca unpore (1864) In 1876 he enriched English biography with his admirable Life and Letters of Lord Macaulay, which ranks next to the masterpieces of Boswell and Lockhart, and in 1880 he followed it up with a vivid picture of later eighteenth century politics in The Early History of Charles James For The American Revolution (parts 1 and 11, 3 vols 1899-1903) was in a sense a continuation of the Fox-His voungest son, Ceorge Macaulay Trevelian, born in 1876, has also applied himself to historical studies, and published a volume on England in the Age of 11 schffe (1899)

William Hale White was born at Bedford about 1830, the son of a bookseller who was from 1850 to 1880 doorkeeper to the House of Commons. In 1848-51 Mr Hale White qualified at Cheshunt and New College for the Congregational immistry, but was expelled for his views on inspiration, whereupon he became a jour nalist and miscellaneous writer. His translation of Spino a's Ethic (1883, revised by Miss Hutchison Stirling, new ed. 1894) was published under his own name, but he owes his literary eminence to the powerful studies of domestic social, moral, and theological problems contained in the remarkable trilogy of novels, The Automography of Mark Rutherford (1881), Mark Rutherford's Deliverance (1885), and The Revolution in Fanner's Lane (1887), 'edited by Reuben Shapcott' Mark Rutherford's' later novels, Mirram's Schooling, Catherine Furze, and Clara Hopgood (1896) attracted less notice. He collected and edited in 1897, as The Inner Life of the House of Commons, a series of articles contributed by his father to a weekly paper. In a book on The Apostasy of Wordsworth (1898) he vindicated the poet's consistency, in 1900 he gave us Pages from a Journal, in 1904 a study of Bunyan.

William Robertson Smith (1846-94), the son of the Free Church minister at Keis in Aberdeenshire, was educated at Aberdeen, I'din burgh, Bonn, and Göttingen, and in 1870 became Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Exegesis in the Free Church College at Aberdeen 1 or his article on the 'Bible' in the ninth edition of the Encyclopadia Britannica he was prosecuted before the General Assembly of the Ircc Church of Scotland on a charge of heresy, but acquitted, in 1880 Another article on 'Hebrew Language and Literature' cost him his chiur, from which he was dismissed in 1881 quently he delivered in Edinburgh and Glasgow the lectures republished as The Old Testament in the Jervish Chinen (1881) and The Prophets of Israel (1882), and after assisting and succeeding Professor Spencer Baynes in the editorship of the Eucyclopædia Britannica, lie was made Professor of Arabic in Cambridge University in 1883 and university librarian. Ere his death he had gained the reputation of one of the foremost Semitic scholars in Turope, The Religion of the Semites (1889) containing some of his most pregnant work

Edward Dowden, born at Cork in 1843, was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where in 1867 he became Professor of English Literature him we one Shalspere, his Mind and Art (1875), a work which gave a decided impulse to Shakespearern study and gave him high standing as a Shakespearean scholar—the invaluable Shaksfore Primer, the Introduction to Shalsfer (1893), the standard Life of Shelley (1886), and an excellent small book on Southey, besides poems, several volumes of studies in literature, a H story of French Literature (1897), and Puritar and Inglican (1900) He has also edited Shelley, Wordsworth, selections from Souther, critical editions of Hamlet, of Romeo and Juliet, and of the Sources the correspondence of Sir Henry Taylor, and that of Southey with Caroline Bowles Professor Donden contributed the article on Matthew Arnold to the present work

John Pentland Hahaffs was born near level, Switzerland, in 1849, studied in Germans and at Trinite College, Dublin and from 1871 to

1899 was Professor there of Ancient History He has written on Kant, on primitive civilisation, on Greek antiquities, on paper, and on the art of conversation, but is best known for a series of fresh and interesting works on Greel history, such as Greek Social Life from Homei to Menandei, Alexander's Empire, Greek Life and Thought from Alexander to the Roman Conquest, and The Empire of the Ptolemies

Henry Austin Dobson was born at Ply mouth on the 18th of January 1840, and at the age of eight went with his parents to Holyhcad in Educated at Beaumaris and Coventry, and afterwards at the gimnase of Strasburg, he returned to England in 1856, intending to follow his father's profession of civil engineer, but it was fitted that he should enter the Civil Service as a clerk in the Board of Trade, where-for the last seventeen years as principal of his departmenthe served until his retirement in 1901 work did not debar him from favourite studies in art, or from practising in prose and verse. His first poetical contribution to a magazine was to Temple Bar in December 1864 But his literary career practically began in March 1868, when he became a contributor of verse to St Paul's Magazine, then under the editorship of Anthony Trollope, and to the editor his first volume of poems, Vignettes in Rhyme and Vers de Société, was dedicated at its publication in October 1873 Proverbs in Porcelain followed in 1877, Old-World Idylls in 1883, and At the Sign of the Lyre in 1885 Whether in the artificial forms of old French verse—rondel, ron deau, ballade, tnoiet, chant royal, and villanelle (which he was among the earliest to write syste matically)—or in more familiar and less elaborate rhythms, his poems are remarkable for perfection of teclinique, for freshiness, spontaneity, and sprightly humour, while many are instinct with true pathos or genuine satire. Activity in prose composition and editorial work soon followed 1879 Mr Dobson began his literary studies of the eighteenth century with the Life of Hogaith (ex prinded in the subsequent editions of 1891, 1898, and 1902), and continued them in the monograph on Fielding in the 'English Men of Letters' (1883, new American ed 1900), since followed in the same series by Richardson (1902) and Tanny Burney (1903), in Thomas Bewick and his Pupils (1884, new ed 1889), in Steele (1886) and Goldsmith (1888), in Horace Walpole (1890), in Eighteenth-Century Vignettes (1892-96), A Paladin of Philan throps (1897), and Side Walk Studies (1902) By these he has approved himself an accurate and sympathetic biographer and an exquisite critic, having at command the rare gift of combining the results of conscientious and laborious research with lightness and brightness of presentment Through his various works in prose and verse, and through his editing of a selection of Eighteenth Century Essays (1882), and the Fables of Gry (1882), the poems of Prior (1889), and the plays, poems, and novel of Golusmith, as well as by his contributions to Ward's English Poets, Crail's English Prose, and to most of the principal magnzines and reviews, Mr Dobson has attained critical rank as the supreme authority on the lighter literary aspects of the ages of Pope and Johnson, and his intimate I nowledge of French literature is seen in his I our Frenchwomen (1890) His prose has the same pleasant ease and dainti ness of style as distinguishes his poems, which with some new additions, were collected in 1897 The fifth edition (1902) contained selections from Carmina Votiva, poems first privately published In 1902 Edinburgh conferred on him in 1901 its honorary degree of LLD He contributed important articles to the Dictionaly of National Biography, to the Encyclopadia Britannia, and to Chambers's Encyclepadia, and the value of his contributions to the present work (see Vol II, pages 1-13, 294-300, 339-348, 478-494) cannot ful to be recognised by every reader

A Garden Song

Here, in this sequestered close, Bloom the hyaeinth and rose, Here beside the modest stock Flaunts the flaring hollyhock, Here, without a pang, one sees Ranks, conditions, and degrees.

All the seasons run their race In this quiet resting place, Peach, and apricot, and fig Here will ripen, and grow big, Here is store and overplus,—More had not Aleinous!

Here, in alleys cool and green, Far alread the thrush is seen, Here along the southern wall Keeps the bee his festival, All is quiet else—afar Sounds of toil and turmoil are.

Here be shadows large and long, Here be spaces meet for song, Grant, O garden god, that I, Now that none profane is nigh,—Now that mood and moment please,—Find the fair Pierides!

In After Days

In after days when grasses high
O ertop the stone where I shall he,
Though ill or well the world adjust
My slender claim to honoured dust,
I shall not question or reply

I shall not see the morning sky,
I shall not hear the night wind sigh,
I shall be mute, as all men must
In after days!

But yet, now living, fain were I
That some one then should testify,
Saying—'He held his pen in trust
To Art, not serving shame or lust'
Will none?—Then let my memory die
In after days!

The Letter

Dear John (the letter ran), it can't, can't be, For Father's gone to Chorley Fair with Sam, And Mother's storing Apples,—Prue and Me Up to our Elbows making Damson Jam But we shall meet before a Week is gone,—"'Tis a long Lane that has no turning," John!

'Only till Snnday next, and then you'll wait Behind the White Thorn, by the broken Stile— We can go round and catch them at the Gate, All to Ourselves, for nearly one long Mile, Dear Prue won't look, and Father he'll go on, And Sam's two Eyes are all for Cissy, John!

'John, she's so smart,—with every Ribbon new,
Flame coloured Sack, and Crimson Padesoy
As proud as proud, and has the Vapours too,
Just like My Lady,—calls poor Sam a Boy,
And yous no Sweet heart's worth the Thinking on Till he's past Thirty
I know better, John'

'My Dear, I don't think that I thought of much Before we knew each other, I and you, And now, why, John, your least, least Finger touch, Gives me enough to think a Summer through See, for I send you Something! There, 'tis gone! Look in this corner,—mind you find it, John!'

Alfred Perceval Graves, born in 1816 in the south of Ireland, thoroughly understands the southern peasant. His billids are the work of a generation carlier than that of Mr Yeats, and they embody an earlier and very different-not on that account, perhaps, a less accurate-conception of Irish character, he may be said to belong to the school of Lever and Lover His best known some 'I ather O'I'lynn,' is an admirable example of the school of Irish humour to which it belongshumour genuine and never coarse - April Linghter, bright and wholesome, but with a tear of tender ness never far off. Sir Francis Couley Burnand, Implica in 1002, was born in 1836, and educated it Lian and Cambridge for Analysis orders, but in 1858 became a Roman Calholic. He was called to the har in 1862 but the success of some early dramatic ventures altered his plans, and he has produced over a hundred and twenty pieces chiefly light coinedies and built-ques including Tre Celer I and Cea and Rea (to Sullivan's music). He had joined Mr II J. Byron in starting I un but in 1863 left that paper for Pull, of which in 1880 he became editor. Amongst his own contributions of Punch were Happy Thoughts (1868), Tre Modern Sandford and Merter (1872) and Strapmers, hi 'Weeder' (1878) My Jame and real Precere with it (1874) was followed in 1903 by a more considerable autobiographical Reminister is

George Robert Sims was born in London in 1847, and was educated there and at Bonn Having joined the staff of Fun in 1874, he soon commenced his 'Dagonet' ballads and other contributions to the Referee Among his plays are Crutch and Toothfick (1870), Mether in ha i (1861), The Lights & London (1881), Fle Roman Rie (1882), and, written in collaboration, In the Rarks, Harbour Lights, The Golden Ladder, Little Clris

topher Columbus, The Gipsy Earl, The Gay City, and Scarlet Sin His novels include Rognes and Vagabonds, Memoirs of Mary Jane, Mary Jane Married, Memoirs of a Landlady, and The Ten Commandments His Daily News letters on the housing of the London poor were effective work in a very different category

Sydney Grundy, the son of a Manchester mayor, was born in 1848, educated at Owens College, and called to the Bar in 1869. He practised as a barrister for seven years, and had meanwhile made his first literary and dramatic ventures, including a novel in 1876. His first dozen plays were mainly adaptations from the French. A White Lie and A Fool's Paradise (both in 1889) were on similar lines, but original in substance, and his art was developed in a long series of plays, of which Sowing the Wind (1893), The New Woman (1894), The Greatest of These (1895), A Marriage of Convenience, The Black Thip, and A Debt of Honour have been amongst the most entertuning and successful.

Henry Arthur Jones, the son of a Buckinghamshire farmer, was born at Grandborough in 1851, was educated in the county, and from thirteen to twenty-seven was engaged in business first nameworthy play, A Clerical Error, was produced m 1879, his first lit was The Silver King (1882) He passed from melodrama in Saints and Sinners (1884) to serious criticism of modern country life, and this was followed by The Middleman (1889), The Dancing Girl (1891), and The Crusaders, showing greater depth and maturity. Of more than a score of plays produced by him-many of them with a piquant element of social satire—some of the most notable were The Case of Rebellions Susan (1894), Michael and lus Lost Angel (1896), The Liars (1897), The Manauvies of Jane (1898), and Mrs Dane's Defence (1900)

Arthur Wing Pinero, the son of a London solicitor, was born in 1855, and bred at private schools with a view to his father's profession, but in 1874 made his début on the stage at Edinburgh, in 1875 joined the Lyceum company, and continued an actor till 1881 The player had ere then made bimself known as a promising playwright, his earlier pieces including £200 a Year (1877) and The Squire (1881) His farces The Magistrate, The Schoolinistress, and Dandy Dick proved him a genial humourist, Sweet Lavender (1888) was a sentimental drama. The Profligate was a new departure, The Heaker Sex, Lady Bountiful, and one or two others are also 'modern' and real But it was in The Second Mrs Tanqueray (1893) that Mr Pinero produced a play that marked an epoch in the history of modern English drama, and the serious problems of modern social life were the keynotes of those that followed-I he Notorious Mrs Ebbsmith (1895), The Benefit of the Doubt, Trelawny of the Wells, The Princess and the Butterfly (1897), The Gay Lord Quex (1899), Iris (1901), and Letty (1903)

William Ernest Henley (1849-1903) was born at Gloucester and educated at the Crypt Grammar School there While lying in hospital at Edinburgh he was visited by Robert Louis Stevenson, and the two became intimate for years, collaborating especially in a series of plays, Deacon Brodie, Beau Austin, Admiral Guinea, and Robert Macaire Henley edited The Magazine of Art, The Scots (later National) Observer, The New Review, and other serials, two or three anthologies of lyrics, an edition of Burns (with Mr T E Henderson) and one volume of an edition of Byron, part of a Shakespeare, and the 'Tudor Translations,' and republished in volumes Views and Reviews on literary and artistic subjects With Mr Farmer, he worked on a great dictionary of slang, practically completed at his death. His poetry is vigorous and vivid in expression and rapid in movement, shows a fondness for unrhymed lyncal measures and experiments in unusual rhythms, for odd words and curious locutions, and is lacking chiefly in simplicity and grace The 'Hospital Rhymes' in the first Book of Verses (1888, 4th ed 1893) are full of the grimmest realism, whereas the 'Bric-à-brac' series are largely exercitations in artificial verse forms The London Voluntaires, published with the Song of the Sword (1892), had more of true poetry in them, of music and magic. A collected edition of his poems appeared in 1898, but For England's Sake (1900) and Hawthorn and Lavender (1901) were later volumes All his work, prose and verse, reflects his virile temperament, his 'unconquerable soul' had to contend against physical disabilities and broken health His best poems were short, in much of his verse there were rough, even coarse, passages, and he could celebrate the speed of the motor car in a poem which is as little a thing of beauty as the vehicle itself. Yet some of his poems, and parts of many, were exquisite, at times he heard 'the voice of strange command'

Out of the sound of the ebb and flow,
Out of the sight of lamp and star,
It calls you where the good winds blow,
Where the unchanging meadows are,
From faded hopes, and hopes agleam,
It calls you, calls you night and day,
Beyond the dark, into the dream
Over the hills and far away

In criticism he was confident, aggressive, full of pre judices, anti conventional in his judgments, arrogant and contemptuous but stimulating, pungent, and trenchant in style. He commanded an exceptional wealth of epigram and dealt largely in inexplicit allusions, and his intolerance of dullness led to eccentricity and paradox. He strenuously maintained Byron's claim to be regarded as the great English poet of the nineteenth century. His long essay on Burns prefixed to the edition of the works by him and Mr Henderson aggreed worshippers of the bard by insisting overmuch that Burns was 'a lewd peasant of genius' who completed rather than initiated a development in national song, and he outriged Stevensonians by the manner of his protests against the representation of R I S given As editor he 'discovered,' in the official Life encouraged, trained, or stimulated a remark ible series of writers who became noted for their gifts

Edmund Gosse, the son of Philip Henry Gosse (1810-88) the distinguished naturalist, was born in London on 21st September 1849, and educated in Devonshire Appointed assistant librarian at the British Museum in 1867, he became translator he had appeared as a poet in a volume of Madia gals, Songs, and Sonnets, in which he collaborated with Mr J A Blukie, this was followed in 1873 by another volume of lyrics entitled On I rol and Flute In 1872-74 he had visited Norway, Den mark, and Sweden, and familiarised himself still more thoroughly with Scandinavian literature, in 1877 he made a similar literary tour in Holland For some years afterwards he devoted himself mainly to verse, producing King Iril, a tragedy on a Norse theme (1876), the Unluation I over, in dramatic form 1878), and New Poems (1879), which were followed by Firlansi it I tile 1886: and In Russet and Silver (1894) The spont metty grace, and lightness of touch displayed in his lyrical poetry were universally recognised. His first prose work of note, Northern Studies, was published in 1879, and was the fruit of his Scandi navian and Dutch researches, Mr Gosse's essays on Ibsen were the earliest efforts to introduce the great Norwegian drainatist and poet to the English public In 1882 he contributed the excel lent monograph on Gray to the series of 'Linglish Men of Letters,' and he has since shown his interest in the work of that eighteenth-century classic by editing Grav's works in 1884 Thenceforth he devoted himself mainly to the illustration of Lng lish literature in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, his work comprising Seventeenth Century Studies (1883), a review of the transition From Shakespeare to Pope (1885), a Life of Congresion (1888), a History of Lighteenth Century Literature (1889), Jacobean Parts (1894), and, on larger lines, the I sfe and Letters of Dr Donne (1899) Other volumes of essays were Gossip in a Library, Questions at Issue, and Critical Kit-Kats (1896), and a suggestive History of Modern English Literature appeared in 1897 In 1890 Mr Gosse performed a pious duty in publishing a life of The Secret of Narcisse (1892) was a prose romance of the Renaissance in France, Hypolympia, or the Gods in the Island (1901), was a delightful 'ironic phantasy' Mr Gosse's editorial care has also been exercised on a selection of English Odes (1881), and on collecting the works of Lodge, the Elizabethan dramatist, in 1882, and of Thomas Lovell Beddocs in 1890-91 Translations of Ibsen's Hedda Gabler (1891) and, in collaboration with Mr William Archer, of l

In 1884 he lectured at Harvard, Yale, Johns Hopkins, and other American Mr Gosse's taste and enthusiasm universities have done much for the intelligent understanding of literature. The is a strict but sympathetic entire, and the polished prove of his critical vorb shors much of the grace and lucidity of his verse. In 1884 his literary distinction was recognised by his appointment, as successor of Sir Leslie Stephen, to the Chrl Tectureship in English Literature it Trinity College, Combrid, c, next year another to the Board of Trade in 1875. Tive years earlier ! honour followed in the honourry degree of MA. conferred by the University, and St Andrews added its LLD in 1899. #### Two Points of View

If I forget,-

May joy pledge this weak heart to sorrow ! If I forget -

May my soul's coloured summer borrow The hucless tones of storm and run, Of ruth and terror, shame and pain,-If I forget !

Though you forget,-There is no binding code for beauty Though you forget,-Love was your charm, but not your duty, And life's worst breeze must never bring A rufile to your silken wing, Though you forget.

If I forget,—
The salt creek may forget the ocean,
If I forget
The heart whence flows my heart's bright motion,
May I sink meanlier than the worst, Abandoned, outcast, crushed, accurst,—
If I forget!

Though you forget,—
No word of mine shall mar your pleasure,
Though you forget,—
You filled my barren life with treasure,
You may withdraw the gift you give,
You still are lord, I still am slave,—
Though you forget.

Robert Louis Stevenson,

essayist and romance-writer, was the only child of Thomas Stevenson, a distinguished civil engineer, himself the youngest son of one still more famous, Robert Stevenson, the builder of the Bell Rock Lighthouse. Mathematical and engineering talent was hereditary in the family, who for three generations have been pre eminent in the construction and illumination of lighthouses. His mother was Margaret Balfour, of the old Scottish family of the Balfours of Pilrig From her he inherited the delicacy which made him a chronic invalid He was born in Edinburgh throughout his life on the 13th of November 1850 Even in childhood his health gave constant anxiety, and his education was interrupted and irregular from his thirteenth to his seventeenth year much of his time was spent in travelling in the south of England and abroad. He was destined for the hereditary profession of his family, and between 1867 and 1871 went through a course of engineering study at Edinburgh University, also gaining some practical experience, and that familiarity with the sea and sea-folk which is so marked a feature in his writings, chiefly in connection with the great Wick breakwater and the Dhu Heartach Lighthouse But he had no aptitude for the scientific side of the profession, and insufficient health for the exposure and physical hardships which its practice involves. Even as a boy, he was completely wrapped up in two interests and the curious study of human life in all its ispects, with a strong leaning towards its more sorded and squaled aspects, and as strong a revolt rightst convention and respectability In 1871 he definitely abandoned engineering and began to rend law, being admitted an advocate at the Scottish Bar in 1875 To his legal studies he only give an absolute minimum of attention, but whether in Edinburgh, at his father's countryhouse among the Pentlands, or in rambles far and wide over both Lowlands and Highlands, he was an industrious student of human nature, an eager devourer and assimilator of all sorts of imaginative and historical literature, and, to use his own phrase, 'a sedulous ape' of the writers upon whom he had an ambition of forming his style of the mot propre, a quality then, even more than now, rather French than British, became his consuming passion Fortunately his admiration for the large manner of the Romantic school, and the underlying Puritanism of his own temperament, kept him from dropping into a mere follower of the school of Flubert. In or about his twenty-fifth year the formative influences in his artistic life came in rapid succession first the acquaintance, which soon ripened into a close and lifelong friend ship, with Mr Sidney Colvin, then his own initiation into authorship through Mr Leslie Stephen and the Cornhill Magazine, and, a little later, his intro duction by Mr Stephen to Mr W E Henley at the In the summer of that year beginning of 1875 his cousin, the brilliant artist and critic, R. A. M Stevenson, took him to Fontainebleau and intro duced him into the cosmopolitan artists' colony at For three years he passed much of Barbizon his time there In 1876 he made, together with Sir Walter Simpson, the canoe-journey from Antwerp to Pontoise, the record of which, In Inland Voyage (1878), was his first published work. Though it had no wide or striking success, it gave him a significant place in literature among the small circle who ultimately form public taste. In the same year with it there appeared (in magnitines) the series of fantastic stories entitled New Arabian Nights, and also the striking study or apologue called Will of the Mill, one of his first and most successful essays in that mixture of psychology and romance which he was to make peculiarly his own. In 1879 appeared Travels with a Donkey through the Cevennes, the journal of a tour taken in southern France in the previous autumn During these years Stevenson lived almost as much in France as in Edinburgh or London Barbizon he had made the acquaintance of a Californian lady, Mrs Osbourne, whom he afterwards married, and who was his critic and collaborator in much of his work thereafter mainly to renew relations with her that in the summer of 1879 Stevenson went out to California. This was the darkest period of his fortunes writing as yet only brought him a very small and very precarious income, the hardships of the journey, which, partly for economy's sake, and partly to grin r new experience (recounted in Across the Plains), he took as an ordinary emigrant, greatly reduced his small stock of bodily strength, and the winter of 1879-80, spent in poverty, loneliness, and dejection, almost wore through the fruil thread of his life. With his marriage and return to Europe in 1880 the tide of his fortunes began to turn, but there was no physical recovery, and for the rest of his life he had to struggle against con stant ill health which seldom allowed him to work for more than two or three hours in the day, and often for months together debarred him from both work and companionship The volume and excel lence of the work he produced under these appalling difficulties during the next few years are equally amazing His laborious apprenticeship was now bearing fruit. The collected volume of essays en titled Virginibus Puerisque was published in 1881, after a winter spent at Davos, in that year, among many other works planned or begun, he wrote the brilliant story of Scottish diablerie called Thrawn land, began the series of verses of childhood which took the world by storm when they appeared four years later, and began also the first of his serious romances of adventure, the epoch-making Treasure Island It was printed and pub lished in 1882, and obtained immediate and almost universal recognition Hither-Stevenson had only been known to a comparatively small circle of ap preciative critics He now took his place as one of the foremost imaginative writers of his time The New Arabian Nights already men tioned were collected and published about the same time, and were followed by a fresh series, More New Arabian Nights. in 1883, in 1882 also appeared a second volume of collected essays, Familiar Studies of Men and Books, which estab lished his reputation as a fine and subtle critic, and as the expounder of a suggestive and original philosophy of life From this time forward he was not only a writer of unquestioned originality and distinction, but the head of a school, and an influence in literature of profound import

Two years at Hydres did nothing to restore his health, and in the autumn of 1884 he settled at Bournemouth, where he remained until the summer of 1887 The first fruit of this period was the singular and interesting Prince Otto, a romance in a manner quite new to him, and one which he never repeated The influence of Mr George Meredith is very marked in it, and to that influence may be at least in part attributed the fact that, alone among all his romances, it makes a serious if not wholly successful attempt to create women and make them integral to the story. For the absence of female interest is one of the most marked features of-Stevenson's work. On men, and more especially on young men and boys, he lavished all his art and all his refined psychology, his heroines, where there are any, are mere boys in petticoats. and his subsidiary women characters little more than part of the scenery or background of the action Two years' labour was spent over Prince Otto, but some months before it appeared there was published the celebrated Child's Garden of Verse, as decisive and important a success in its own field of literature

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON From a Photograph by W J Hawker, Bournemouth.

The essay logy called Child's Play, which had origin ally appeared in the Cornhill Magazine as early as 1878, and was included in the Virginibus Puerisque volume of 1881, had broken ground in this direction, with singular delicacy and depth of insight. But now Stevenson was able to address his vindication and interpretation of childhood urbi et orbi, these verses, perpetually reprinted, quoted, in many cases set to music and sung, have become household words among the whole English speaking world

A few months after Prince Otto appeared the brief but very highly finished psychological romance, The Strange Case of Dr Jekyll and Mr Its fortunes were at first doubtful, the public were a little shocked, a little puzzled, and greatly inclined to be scandalised. Like the story of the Suicide Club in the New Arabian Nights, it was thought to deal too lightly and fantastically with a subject in itself painful and even shocking, as to which conventional good taste suggested that the lips should be closed, if not the eyes shut But it soon conquered popularity, and it has, alone among Stevenson's works, added two names to the common stock of these imaginative creations which are as real and as widely known as any historical figures During those years much of his time was also spent in writing plays and dramatic sketches, for the most part in collaboration with Mr Henley A volume containing four of the plays which they completed between 1880 and 1885, Deacon Brodie, Beau Austin, Admiral Guinea, and Vacaure, was pub lished in 1892 Neither author had any notable dramatic gift. Two of the four plays have been produced on the stage, but rather as literary curiosities than as pieces which could attract the public, or which had any essential vitality best that can be said of Stevenson's plays is that they are not feebler or more ineffective than Scott's

But by this time Stevenson had turned to a field for romance with which he was, alike by birth and training, peculiarly qualified to deal-Scotland of the eighteenth century. A passionate lover of Scotland and the Scottish character, he had also since boyhood been a student of Scottish history, and was versed in the annals of both the Whigs and the Jacobites The celebrated political and criminal trials of that period had been his favourite reading as a student of law and a briefless advo-He had planned and begun to collect materials for more than one historical work dealing with Scotland between 1660 and 1800 Edinburgh still in his boyhood retained a tradition of the period when it was a centre of national life as various, crowded, and thrilling as had ever been in Athens or Florence And the eighteenth cen tury had from the first strongly attracted his At the age of four-and-twenty he imagination had written of it in words of quite remarkable insight and sympathy 'the spirit of a country orderly and prosperous, a flavour of the presence of magistrates and well-to-do merchants in bagwigs, the clink of glasses at night in fire lit parlours, something certain and civic and domestic,' and yet withal in the fullest sense of the word romantic. Where the great magician had been, it might seem presumptuous to follow, but the field from which Scott had reaped with so large and careless, yet so sure and fine a hand, still left ample resources for the new methods which the mere lapse of half a century necessarily implied To this period and setting belong the four works which are the core and consummation of Stevenson's achievement in romance Kidnapped (1886), The Master of Ballantrae (1889), Catriona (1893), and Weir of Hermiston, left a fragment at the author's death

In 1887 Stevenson's lung disease had become so serious that neither the English nor the French Riviera was any longer a safe refuge for him He left England that autumn in order to spend the winter in the dry air of the Adirondack Mountains at Lake Saranac, and from that time never returned to Europe The charming volume of poems, Underwoods, was published just after his departure. In verse Stevenson was only a brilliant amateur, but these poems have all the curious fascination that attaches to the work of a trained artist who diverges for his own amusement into an alien though cognate art. The same year was issued the collected volume of short stories entitled The Merry Men, and in the following year The Black Arrow, a romance of adventure of which the scene is hid in England during the Wars of the Roses Here, as always when he went back beyond the eighteenth century, his touch is uncertain and his success very imperfect With the Middle Ages he had no sympathy, and the fifteenth century, although it lies beyond the Middle Ages properly so called, was almost equally alien from him. In the summer of 1888 the voyage in the Southern Pacific, which had been one of his cherished dreams since boyhood, was actually undertaken The climate there was favourable, the semi-barbaric and adventurous life of the Polynesian Islands fascinated him, and after wanderings in the South Seas extending over nearly two years, he bought a piece of land in Samoa and settled there for the remainder of his Through the six years spent by him in the South Seas he was writing constantly politics of Samoa absorbed much of his interest, but his journals and letters failed to arouse any great corresponding interest in the audience for whom he wrote Nor did he obtain any striking success by his stories of life in the islands (the Island Nights' Entertainments of 1893 and The Ebb tide of 1894), though they contain much admirable description and characterisation went on, however, at the same time working on his main central line, and whenever he laid his scene in Scotland, his certainty of touch and vigour of handling remained almost unimpaired In another work of this period, The IVrecker (1892), he made an attempt at filling a larger canvas, working into it the suggestions and memories of his earlier life in Edinburgh and among the artists of Paris and Fontamebleau, with his later experiences of California and the Pacific The result was a strangely amorphous and ineffective book, containing much excellent work that is on the whole The two works last named, and some others of minor importance, were written in collaboration with his stepson, Mr Lloyd Osbourne By this time physical debility had greatly affected Stevenson's power of continuous or constructive St Ives, the story of the adventures of a French prisoner of war in Great Britain during the Napoleonic wars, is perhaps the neakest and most flaccid of all his romances. He left it incomplete, but its own vitality, no than his, was already exhausted In the last months of his life he was able to rally his powers for a last effort, and the opening chapters of Weir of Hermiston (the scene of which is again in Scotland towards the end of the eighteenth century) are on a level with his best and finest work this was the last flare of a dying flame. On the 3rd of December 1894 he died suddenly in his home at Vailima in Samoa

Great as is the positive and essential merit of Stevenson's work when at its best, it is as an influence in letters and in thought that his position is In some respects he is an interestmost notable ing parallel to William Hazlitt, a writer whom, both in substance and manner, he took in youth for one of his chief models If to Hazlitt may be applied the caustic saying of Voltaire, Sa réputation s'affermu a toujours, parce qu' on le lit guère, so more than half of the various and unequal work that fills the long shelf of Stevenson's collected works will probably become the possession of a small circle of men of letters and be disregarded or forgotten by the wider public The same fite has already overtaken De Quincey, who likewise resembles Stevenson in multifariousness, in a cer tain extravagance and whimsical ty of mind, and in the possession of a style of great fascination and marked individuality, highly artificial in origin and construction, but become a second nature to its author, and handled with perfect case and consummate skill Stevenson as an essayist stands apart from both in virtue of his refined and subtle as a romance-writer he belongs to a different order of literature. The name by which he was known among the native Samoans, Tusitala, 'the teller of tales,' is that on which his permanent reputation will rest. His delight in stories of adventure was that of a boy, and his story-telling instinct (one of the rarest of literary qualities) unsurpassed within the limits which his nature had assigned to him. He was one of those persons who in a sense never outgrow their boyhood has been already remarked, one half of the human race remained for him throughout life almost a scaled book. 'I have never pleased myself with inny women of mine, he wrote towards the end of his life, and the criticism is just. Even his men are for the most part larger children romance of boyhood and adolescence, and, going still farther back, of the feelings and inner life of childhood, he is an unsurpassed master the philosophy of life developed in both his essays and his romances is that rather of a gifted boy than of a mature man. Like his style, it was fully developed in him by the age of five and twenty, and it underwent no change thereafter except, in his last years, an imperceptible and silent reversion towards the traditions of his birth and blood has been called, not unjustly, the best loved of modern writers, and the Gods, according to the Greek saying, also loved him for he died young

From 'Notes on Edinburgh.'

The ancient and famons metropolis of the North sits overlooking a windy estuary from the slope and summit of three hills. No situation could be more commanding for the head city of a kingdom, none better chosen for noble prospects. From her tall precipice and terraced gardens she looks far and wide on the sea and broad champaigns. To the east you may catch at sinset the spark of the May lighthouse, where the Tirth expands into the German Ocean, and away to the west, over all the carse of Stirling, you can see the first snows upon Ben Ledi

But Edinburgh pays eruelly for her high seat in one of the vilest chimates under heaven. She is hable to be beaten upon by all the winds that blow, to be drenched with rain, to be buried in cold sea fogs out of the east, and powdered with the snow as it comes flying south ward from the Highland hills The weather is raw and boisterous in winter, shifty and ungenial in summer, and a downright meteorological purgatory in the spring The delicate die early, and I, as a survivor, among bleak winds and plumping rain, have been sometimes tempted to envy them their fate. For all who love slielter and the blessings of the sun, who hate dark weather and perpetual tilting against squalls, there could scarcely be found a more unhomely and harassing place of residence Many such aspire angrily after that. Somewhere else of the imagination, where all troubles They lean over the great bridge are supposed to end which joins the New Town with the Old-that windiest spot, or high altar, in this northern temple of the winds -and watch the trains smoling out from under them and vanishing into the tunnel on a voyage to brighter Happy the passengers who shake off the dust of Edinburgh, and have heard for the last time the cry of the east wind among her chimney tops l And yet the place establishes an interest in people's hearts, go where they will, they find no city of the same distinc tion, go where they will, they take a pride in their old home

Venice, it has been said, differs from all other eities in the sentiment which slie inspires. The rest may have admirers, she only, a famous fair one, counts lovers in her train And indeed, even by her lindest friends, Edinburgh is not considered in a similar sense. These like her for many reasons, not any one of which is satis factory in itself They like her whimsically, if you will, and somewhat as a virtuoso dotes upon his cabinet. Her attraction is romantic in the narrowest meaning of the term Beautiful as she is, she is not so much beautiful as interesting She is pre eminently Gothic, and all the more so since she has set herself off with some Greek airs, and erected classic temples on her In a word, and above all, she is a curiosity The Palace of Holyrood has been left aside in the growth of Edinburgh, and stands grey and silent in a workman's quarter and among breweries and gasworks It is a house of many memories Great people of yore, kings and queens, buffoons and grave ambassadors, played their stately farce for centuries in Holyrood Wars have been plotted, dancing has lasted deep into the night, murder has been done in its chambers. There Prince Charlie held his phantom levées, and in a very gallant manner represented a fallen dynasty for some Now, all these things of clay are mingled with the dnst, the king's crown itself is shown for sixpence to the rulgar, but the stone prlace has outlived these changes For fifty weeks together, it is no more than a show for tourists and a museum of old furniture, but on the fifty first, behold the palace reawakened and mimick ing its past. The Lord Commissioner, a kind of stage sovereign, sits among stage courtiers, a couch and six and clattering escort come and go before the gate, at night the windows are lighted up, and its near neigh bours, the workmen, may dance in their own houses to the palace music. And in this the palace is typical. There is a spark among the embers, from time to time the old volcano smokes Edinburgh has but partly abdicated, and still wears, in parody, her metropolitan Half a capital and half a country town, the whole city leads a double existence, it has long trances of the one and flashes of the other, like the king of the Black Isles, it is half alive and half a monumen tal marble There are armed men and cannon in the citadel overhead, you may see the troops marshalled on the high paride, and nt night after the early winter evenfall, and in the morning before the laggard winter dawn, the wind carries abroad over Edinburgh the sound of drums and bugles Grave judges sit bewigged in what was once the seene of imperal deliberations Close by in the High Street perhaps the trumpets may sound about the stroke of noon, and you see a troop of eitizens in tawdry masquerade, tabard above, heather mixture trowser below, and the men themselves trudg ing in the mud among unsympathetic bystanders grooms of a well appointed circus trend the streets with a better presence. And yet these are the Heralds and Pursuvants of Scotland, who are about to proclaim a new law of the United Kingdom before two score boys, and thickes, and hackney coachmen. Meanwhile every hour the bell of the University rings out over the hum of the streets, and every hour a double tide of students. coming and going, fills the deep archways. And lastly, one night in the springtime-or say one morning rather, at the peep of day-late folk may hear the voices of many men singing a psalm in unison from a church on one side of the old High Street, and a little after, or perhaps a little before, the sound of many men singing a pralm in unison from another church on the opposite side of the way There will be something in the words about the dew of Hermon, and how goodly it is to see brethren dwelling together in unity And the late folk will tell themselves that all this singing denotes the conclusion of two yearly ecclesiastical parliaments—the parliaments of Churches which are brothers in many admirable virtues, but not specially like brothers in this particular of a tolerant and peaceful life.

From 'Kidnapped.'

The next day Mr Henderland found for me a man who had a boat of his own and was to cross the Linnhe Loch that afternoon into Appin, fishing. Him he prevailed on to take me, for he was one of his flock, and in this way I saved a long day's travel and the price of two public ferries I must otherwise have passed

It was near noon before we set out in dark day with clouds, and the sun shining upon little patches. The set was here very deep and still, and had scaree a wave upon it, so that I must put the water to my lips before I could believe it to be truly salt. The mountains on either side were high, rough and burren, very black and gloomy in the shadow of the clouds, but all silver freed with little watercourses where the sun shone upon them It seemed a hard country, this of Appin, for people to care as much about as Alan did

There was but one thing to mention. A little after we had started, the sun shone upon a little moving climp of scarlet close in along the waterside to the north It was much of the same red as soldiers' coats, every now and then, too, there came little sparks and lightnings, as though the sun had struck upon bright steel

I asked my boatman what it should be, and he answered he supposed it was some of the red soldiers coming from Fort William into Appin, against the poor tenantry of the country. Well, it was a sad sight to me and whether it was because of my thoughts of Alan, or from something prophetic in my bosom, although this was but the second time I had seen King George's troops, I had no good will to them

At last we came so near the point of land at the entering in of Loch Leven that I begged to be set on shore My boatman (who was an honest fellow and mindful of his promise to the catechist) would fain have carried me on to Balachulish, but as this was to take me farther from my secret destination, I insisted, and was set on shore at last under the wood of Lettermore (or Letter vore, for I have heard it both ways) in Alan's country of Appin

This was a wood of birehes, growing on a steep, craggy side of a mountain that overhung the loch. It had many openings and ferny howes, and a road or bridle track ran north and south through the midst of it, by the edge of which, where was a spring, I sat down to eat some out bread of Mr Henderland's, and think upon my situation

Here I was not only troubled by a cloud of stinging midges, but far more by the doubts of my mind. What I ought to do, why I was going to join myself with an outlaw and a would be murderer like Alan, whether I should not be acting more like a man of sense to tramp back to the south country direct, by my own guidance and at my own charges, and what Mr Campbell or even Mr Henderland would think of me if they should ever learn my folly and presumption these were the doubts that now began to come in on me stronger than ever

As I was so sitting and thinking, a sound of men and horses came to me through the wood, and presently after, at a turning of the road, I saw four travellers come into view The way was in this part so rough and narrow that they came single and led their horses by the The first was a great, red headed gentleman, of an imperions and flushed face, who carried his hat in his hand and fanned himself, for he was in a breathing heat The second, by his decent black garb and white wig, I correctly took to be a lawyer. The third was a servant. and wore some part of his clothes in tartan which showed that his master was of a Highland family, and either an outlaw or else in singular good odour with the Government, since the wearing of tartan was against If I had been better versed in these things, I would have known the tartan to be of the Argyle (or Campbell) colours. This servant had a good sized port manteau strapped on his horse, and a net of lemons (to brew punch with) hanging at the saddle-bow, as was often enough the custom with luxurious trivellers in that part of the country

As for the fourth, who brought up the tail, I had seen his like before, and knew him at once to be a sheriff's officer

I had no sooner seen these people coming than I made up my mind (for no reason that I can tell) to go through with my adventure, and when the first came alongside of me, I rose up from the brief en and asked him the

He stopped and looked at me, as I thought, a little oddly, and then, turning to the lawyer, 'Mungo, and he, 'there is many a man would than this more of a warning than two pysts. Here mu I on my road to Duror on the job ye len, and here is a young lad starts up out of the bracken, and species if I am on the way to Aucharn'

"(denure," said the other, "this is an ill abject for jesting,"

These two had now drawn close up and were gainst at me, while the two followers had halted about a tone cast in the rear

"And what seek ye in Auchari?" aid Colin Ros Campbell of Glenure him they called the Red Lox for he it was that I had stopped

"The man that live there" said I

'James of the Glons,' says Glenure, musingly and then to the lawyer. 'Is he jatherin, his propte, thing ye?'

"Anyway," says the lawver "we shall do better to bule " where we are, and let the olders rally a

"If you are concerned for me," and I down moth r of his people nor your, but and hore t subject of Kin George, owing no man and fear no no man

Why, very well and, replie the lactor. But if I may make so ball as ask, what does the hone tamage of fir from his country? and who does he come see me the brother of Ardshiel? I have power here. I must the you. I am king's Lactor upon several of these estate and have twelve files of soldiers at my back!

I have beard a waif word in the country will, a little nettled, "that you were a hard man to drive

He still kept looling at me, as if in doul

Welt,' said he at lat, your tongue is hold but I am no unfriend to plalines. If yo had a led me the way to the door of Jame. Stewart on any other day but this, I would have set yought and but lense God speed. But to day—th, Mungo? And he turned again to look at the lawyer.

But just as he turned there came the shot of a finded from higher up the full, and with the very coind of it. Glenner fell upon the road

O, I am dead " he cried, several times over

The lawyer had caught him up and held turn in his arms, the servant standing over and clasping his hands. And now the wounded man looked from one to another with seared eyes, and there was a change in his voice that went to the heart.

"Tal ceare of yourselves," save he "I am dead"

He tried to open his clothes as if to look for the wound, but his fingers shipped on the buttons. With that he gave n great sigh, his head rolled on his shoulder, and he passed away.

It is the season now to go About the country lugh and low, Among the blacs hand in hand, And two by two in fairy land.

The brooding boy, the sighing maid, Wholly fain and half afraid, Now meet along the hazel d brook. To pass and linger, pause and look.

A year ago, and blithely paired, Their rough and tumble play they shared, They kissed and quarrelled, laughed and ened, A year ago at Eastertide.

With bursting heart, with fiery face, She strove against him in the race, He unabashed her garter saw, That now would touch her skirts with awe

Now by the stile ablaze she stops, And his demnrer eyes he drops, Now they exchange averted sighs Or stand and marry silent eyes

And he to her a hero is, And sweeter she than primroses, Their common silence dearer far Than nightingale and mayis are.

Now v hen they sever wedded hands, Joy trembles in their bosom strands And lovely langhter leaps and falls Upon their lips in madrigals

Blows the wind to-day, and the sun and the rain are flying,

Blows the wind on the moors to-day and now, Where about the graves of the martyrs the whaups are crying,

My heart remembers how!

Grey recumbent tombs of the dead in desert places,
Standing stones on the vacant wine red moor,
Hills of sheep, and the homes of the silent vanished races,
And winds, austere and pure

Be it granted me to behold you again in dying, Hills of home! and to hear again the call,

Hear about the graves of the martyrs the peewees crying, And hear no more at all

The only complete collection of Steven.ons works is the Edin burgh edition in twenty-eight volumes (1894-98), but most of his romances, essays, and miscellaneous writings are in general circulation. His Life, by Mr Graham Balfour (2 vols. 1901), does little more than supplement the two volumes of Letters to his Family and Friends, edited by Mr Sidney Colvin (1899). Some further biographical details are given in R L Steventon's Edin burgh Days, by Miss E B Simpson (1899). Ont of the hundred of critical articles on the man and his work which have appeared during the later years of his life and since his death, few are of any substantial value. Among those which are, two only are of sufficient importance to demand mention. Mr Colvin's preface—really an informal biography—to the two volumes of letters just mentioned, and Professor W Raleigh's able, if somewhat academic, appreciation R L Stevenson (1895).

John Churton Collins, born in 1848 in Gloucestershire, studied at Balliol, has written much for the reviews and magazines, edited works of Tourneur, Herbert of Cherbury, Greene, Dryden, Tennyson, and written books on Sir Joshua Reynolds, on Bolingbroke and on Voltaire in England, and on Swift, besides A Study of English Literature, Illustrations of Tennyson, Essays and Criticisms, and Ephemera Critica

William Hurrell Mallock, born in 1849 at Cockington Court, Devon, won the Newdigate in 1871 whilst at Balliol, Oxford He made a hit with The New Republic (1877) and The New Paul and Virginia (1878), has written A Romance of the Nineteenth Century, and other novels, has published a poem on Lucretius and other volumes of verse, and in Aristocracy and Evolution, Religion as a Credible Doctrine, and other works has sought to make serious contributions to the solution of religious, political, and sociological problems

Hemy Rider Haggard, born at Bradenham Hall in Norfolk 22nd June 1856, and educated at Ipswich Grammar School, held several official positions in South Africa in 1875-79, and on his return was called to the Bar His first book, Cetewayo and his White Neighbours (1882), attracted little notice, and two novels, Dawn (1884) and The Witch's Head (1885), were only successful after King Solomon's Mines (1885) and She (1887) had by their novelty and imaginative ingenuity won great and immediate popularity. Among his other novels are Jess (1887), Allan Quatermain (1887), Marwa's Revenge (1888), Cleopatra (1889), Allan's Wife (1890), Nada the Lily (1892), Montezuma's Daughter (1893), Joan Haste (1895), and S-vallow, a Story of the Great Trek (1897) The H orld's Desire (1891) was written in collaboration with Mr Andrew Lang Mr Haggard is keenly interested in agricultural conditions and problems. and has published A Farmer's Year (1899) and Rural England (1903), a somewhat pessimistic survey of the present agricultural position, based on elaborate personal inquiries

Hrs Humphry Ward was born in 1851 at Hobart in Tasmania, eldest daughter of Thomas Arnold, second son of Dr Arnold of Rugby, who, having resigned his Tasmanian inspectorship of schools on becoming a Roman Catholic, was by Dr Newman appointed Professor of English Literature in a Catholic college at Dublin Mary Augusta Arnold was already known as a scholarly and accomplished writer when in 1872 she married Thomas Humphry Ward, editor of The English Poets She began early to contribute to Macmillan's Magazine, and gave the fruits of her Spanish studies to Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Christian Biography A child's story,

Milly and Olly (1881), Miss Bretherton (1884), a slight novel, and the translation of Amiel's Journal Intime (1885) prepared the way for the spiritual romance of Robert Elsmere (1888), which became the novel of the season It embodied in attempt to describe the struggle of a soul in its voyage towards newer theistic aspirations after losing the landmarks of the old faith Profound spiritual insight, broad human sympathy, and strong thinking are manifest throughout, but as a work of art it is marred by diffuseness, didactic persistency of purpose, and a fatal want of mastery over the fundamental secret of the novelist-the power to make her puppets live rather than preach Its successor, David Grieve (1892), showed all its faults and fewer merits

As Associated (1894) and Str George Tressady (1895) are novels of English politics and society with much that is truly felt and movingly represented, yet too didactic withal Helbeck of Bannisdale (1898) and Eleanor (1900) deal with aspects of modern Catholicism, and Lady Rose's Daughter (1903) is another novel of society, depicting a situation that recalls the relations of Mdlle. de l'Espinasse and Madame du Deffand

Madame Duclaux, a bilingual authoress, was born at Leamington in 1857, was educated at Brussels, in Italy, and at University College, London, and under her maiden name of Agnes Mary Frances Robinson was well known as an English poetess ere, in 1888, she married Professor James Darmesteter, a learned Parisian, who was professor at the Collége de France (died 1894) 1901 she married Professor Duclaux, Director of the Pasteur Institute (died 1904) Her Handful of Honeysuckles showed her a poetess of rare gifts, and the impression was confirmed by her Crowned Hippolytus, a translation from Euripides, The New Arcadia and other Poems, An Italian Garden, a book of songs, Songs, Ballads, and a Garden Play, and Retrospect and other Poems She has published a novel, Arden, and books on the End of the Middle Ages and on Emily Bronte, in French and English, Lives of Margaret Queen of Navarre and of M Renan, and a medireval anthology, and in French, a book on Frousart (in the 'Grands Ecrivains' series), and Grands Ecrivains d'Outremanche (1901)

Michael Field is the pseudonym adopted by two ladies who write poetry in collaboration, and whose names are understood to be Miss Bradley and Miss Cooper They have produced about a dozen plays in verse, and also three or four Some of the plays, like volumes of lyrics Callurrhoe (1884) and Brutus Ultor (1887), have classical themes, but the majority are based on passages of English and Scottish history are Fair Rosamund (1884), The Father's Tragedy (1885), dealing with the fate of David, Earl of Rothesay, William Rufus (1886), Canute the Great (1887), and The Tragu Mary (1890), who of course is Mary Queen of Scots These latter are written after the Elizabethan manner, and by some critics have even been called Shakespearian Callirrhoe is pretty and ingenious, but not at all Hellenic in tone or quality The lyrical poems pub lished under the pseudonym as Long Ago (1889), Sight and Song (1892), and Under the Bough (1893) are less ambitious and have more decided charm.

Alice Weynell, daughter of Mr T J Thompson, and younger sister of Lady Butler (Miss Elizabeth Thompson) the battle-painter, was educated entirely by her father, with whom she lived in England and Italy until her marriage in 1877 with Mr Wilfrid Meynell, who has written much for the reviews, and in 1903 published a Life of Beaconsfield. Preludes (1875), her first volume of verse, was illustrated by her sister, and was republished with some changes and additions in It was praised by Ruskin and Rossetti, and contains verse of high quality and finish for so young a poetess as she was when most of its contents were written. For many years afterwards her literary activity was mainly employed in essay writing in the newspapers and reviews, but in 1897 she edited an Anthology of English Poetry, showing delicate literary discernment. The list of her published works includes The Rhythm of Life (1893), The Colour of Life and The Children (1896), The Spirit of Place (1898), a sympathetic criticism of Ruskin, and a volume of Later Poems (1902)

Mary St Leger Harrison, at the beginning of the twentieth century one of the most conspicuous and powerful of women novelists, is the younger daughter of Charles Kingsley, and as Mary St Leger Kingslev spent her girlhood at Eversley She married the rector of Clovelly in that North Devon which was so dear to her father, but became a widow in 1897 Under the penname of 'Lucas Malet' she made her mark in 1882 with Mrs Lorimer, a sketch in black and white, and had a great success in Colonel Enderby's Wife (1885)-both of them, like most of her novels, dealing frankly with the ethical aspects of human Little Peter and 4 Counsel of life and society Perfection were succeeded by The Wages of Sin (1891), The Carissima (1896), The Gateless Barrier (1900), and The History of Sir Richard Calmady, a 'strong' rather than pleasant study of an unamable dwarf and his noble mother (1901) In 1899 Mrs Harrison had become a member of the Roman Catholic communion

Fiona Macleod is the name borne by the authoress of a remarkable series of Celtic tales, romances, and poems which began to appear in 1894 with Pharais, a Romance of the Isles followed in quick succession The Mountain Lovers and The Sin-Eater (1895), The Washer of the Ford and Green Fire (1896), and The Laughter of Peterhin (1897), most of which were collected in 1897 in a three-volume reprint. Later books are The Dominion of Dreams (1899), The Divine Adventure (1900), and Drostan and Iseult (1902) Fiona Macleod finds her themes in the Celtic myths of early Ireland and Scotland, which in her pages are so effectively treated as to make her one of the chief representatives of that 'Celtic Revival' of which Mr W B Yeats is the protagonist. From the Hills of Dream is a collection of lyrics, Through the Ivory Gates, poems, The Immortal Hour, a drama based on a Celtic legend In the dedication to Mr Meredith of The Sin-Eater she says 'The beauty of the world, the pathos of life, the gloom, the fatalism, the spiritual glamour—it is out of these, the spiritual inheritance of the Gael, that I have fashioned these tales'

James Matthew Barrie was born in 1860 at Kirriemuir, a Forfarshire village to which he has given a popularity it never formerly enjoyed Educated at first at the village school, he passed to Dumfries Academy and Edinburgh University, taking his VI A in 1882. After eighteen months work on the staff of a Nottingham newspaper, he settled in London as a contributor to such weekly journals as the Speaker and the National Observer. His first book, Better Dead (1887), was largely a satire on London life, his second, The Auld Licht Idylls (1888), and its successor and sequel, A Window in Thrams (1889), made him one of the most popular writers of the day. sketches of Scottish village life show as much keen observation and quaint humour as are to be found in these vignettes of an extinct generation of country weavers Less successful was Mr Barrie's next venture, The Little Minister, a full length novel published in Good Words in 1891, which, though clever in description, dialogue, and character-drawing, showed a lack of constructive power on a large design and of skill in the handling of a theme involving serious passion. Other works of fiction from his pen are When a Man's Single (1888), My Lady Nicotine (1899), Sentimental Tommy (1896), with its sequel, Tommy and Griscl (1900), and The Little II hite Bird (1902) Margaret Ogilvie (1896) is a pathetic picture of the life and death of his mother His dramatic ventures, including Walker, London (1892), a slight but agreeable farce, in the title rôle of which Mr J L. Toole made one of his last successes, The Professor's Love Story (1895), a charmingly fresh comedy, and a setting of his own novel The Little Minister (1897), which displayed many of the faults of the novel, were wonderfully well received on the stage, and have been followed by The Wedding Guest, a rather melodramatic piece, The Idmirable Crichton, a clever fantasy, Quality Street, and the 'delightful joke' Little Mary (1903) There is a book on Barrie and his work by Hammerton (1900)

Goorge Bernard Shaw, novelist and play wright, was born at Dublin in 1856 He had no university education, but in 1876 came to London and there embarked, at first with smill success, in a career of journalism and literary work tween 1880 and 1883 he produced four novels, the best known of which is Cashel Byron's Profession, In 1883 he became i with a boxer for hero Socialist agitator, and helped to form the programme of the Fabian Society, editing the essays of the League, to which he had contributed in Several tracts from his pen were also pub lished by the same adventure, among them The Quintessence of Ibsenism in 1891 In 1892 appeared the first of his clever and eccentric plays, II idowers' Houses, produced by the Independent Theatre Society, and followed by Irms and the Van (1894), Candida, The Man of Honour and The Man of Destruy in 1897, and others in the same erratic vein A collection of them, under the title of Plays Pleasant and Unpleasant, was issued in 1898, Three Plays for Puritans followed in 1900, and Man and Superman (1903) combines comedy with a paradoxical philosophy of life

John Davidson, son of a minister of the Evangelical Union, was born at Barrhead in Renfrewshire in 1857, and educated at Greenock After studying for one session at Edinburgh University, he spent some twelve venrs in desul tory employment as chemist's assistant, mercantile clerk, and teacher in various schools at Greenock, Perth, Glasgow, Paisley, and Crieff In 1890 he went to London as a journalist, and wrote for the newspapers until his verses began to attract Already he had published dramas-Bruce, a Chromele Play (1886), after the Elizabethan manner, Smith, a Tragic Farce (1888), and Scaramouch in Naxos (1889) These were followed in 1891 by a volume of poems entitled In a Music Hall, and before the end of the century he had produced seven or eight other volumes of poetry and drama, the most notable of which are Fleet Street Lelogues (1893-95), Ballads and Songs (1894), New Ballads (1896), The Last Ballad (1898), Godfrida, 1 play, and The Testament of an Empire Builder (1902) His verse is forcible, graceful, and luxuriant, in his treatment of some metropolitan scenes he shows a quite poignant realism, in his dramatic works he is more successful with a theme like that of the story of Arindne than with the heroic history of a nation's struggle for freedom

William Watson, son of a Yorl shire farmer, was born at Burley in Whirfedale in that county on 2nd August 1858. His father afterwards be came a merchant at Liverpool, where the son was brought up. None of our universities can claim the honour of educiting him, but from an early age he showed a poetic bent and gift, and in 1880 appeared The Prince's Quest, his first published work, manifesting strongly the influence of William Morris Neither it, however, nor the Epigrams of Art, Life, and Nature, which came out in 1884, attracted much attention, and it was not till the thoughtful and touching verses on 'Wordsworth's Grave,' in the measure of Gray's Elegy and the manner of Matthew Arnold, were issued along with some other short pieces in 1890 that Mr Writson was generally recognised as a poet. In 1892 he produced another pleasing clegy entitled 'Lachryma Musarum,' on the death of Tennyson, bringing it out along with several other lyrics, one of which 'England my Mother,' bears close resemblance to Mr Henley's much more powerful verses to 'England, my England' published earlier in the sunc vear The Elofing Ingels (1893) is a clever exprise in Byronic offara i ma, and, lile the majority of its predecessors, has something of the air of an echo of the great masters. More original and personal are the sonnets on The Year of Shame and He Purple East (1896), although they are deformed by their fierce and almost historical deminciation of the 'unspeak able Turl' The most notable of Mr Watson's other poems are his Father of the Forest (1895) and The Hope of the World (1897), which were collected along with the rest of his verse in 1898, m 1902 he produced one of the many odes on the coronation of King Edward VII, and in 1903 published For Lingland Poems written 11 Estrangement In prose he has written a volume of essays entitled Excursions in Criticism (1893) In 1895 he received a Civil List pension in recognition of his work

Oscar O'Flahertie Wilde (1856-1900), poet and dramatist, was the younger son of Sir William Wilde, eminent both as surgeon and as antiquary, and of Jane Ligee, a lady who under the nom de guerre of 'Speranza' contributed some inspiring verse to The Spirit of the Nation educated first at Frinity College, Dublin, and afterwards at Magdalen, Oxford, where he won the Newdigate prize in 1878 by a poem on Here he began that cult of 'asthe Ravenna ticism' for which he quickly became fumous both in England and America This movement, which for a few years took an astonishing hold on the British public, derived its impulse mainly from Wilde, and its influence has been much more than ephemeral In 1881 appeared a volume of poems, marked by a singular mixture of verbal felicity and affected sentiment. In 1888 Wilde entered on a period of great activity, first as a writer of novels and stories, and later as a drumatist. In the former kind Dorian Graj (1891) is his chief work, and its success was due, in part at least, to qualities not cyclusively literary The popularity of his plays was more legitimately earned. Lady II indermere's Fan (1892), A Woman of No Importance (1893), The Ideal Husband, and The Importance of being Larnest (1895) were all of them successful on the stage, and are admirable specimens of light comedy, abounding in vivacious dialogue and dexterous situations. Wilde's career was abruptly terminated in the height of his drimatic success, and after undergoing two years imprisonment for an odious criminal offence, he was released in 1897, and passed his remaining years in France, where shortly before his death he was received into the The Ballad of Reading Roman Catholic Church Gaol (1898) embodies his experiences as a convict

George Moore, novelist, playwright, and art critic, was born in 1857, son of a Mayo landowner and MP, who, like most of the Young Ireland party, to which he was attached, united literary talent with political activity Educated at Oscott, Moore early give proof that his father's taste for letters had descended to him His carliest venture was in verse. Flowers of Passion appeared in 1878, and Martin Luther, a tragedy, in 1879 ing these efforts, Moore spent several years in the study of art in Paris, where he imbibed views which have coloured all his subsequent work. 1885 a translation of Zola's Pot bouille expressly avowed the direction which Moore's artistic and literary sympathies had now taken, but in A Mummer's IVife, a novel published in the previous year, he had indicated his enthusiasm for 'realism' plainly enough. Vain Fortune (1891) and Esther Waters (1894) are in the same sein career has been chiefly associated with what is known as the Celtic Revival, and is somewhat at odds with his earlier tendencies. That his intimate connection with the modern school of art and letters in France should have led him to the con clusion that the English language has ceased to be an apt vehicle for literary purposes, is less surprising than that the disciple of realism should find the clixir of a new literary life in the idealism of the Celtic movement. With Mr Yeats, Mr Martyn, Dr Hyde, and others, he has been a contributor to Ideals in Ireland (1901), and has written The Bending of the Bough for the Irish Literary Theatre It is perhaps as an art critic that he has most deservedly won distinction, his best work in this kind is to be found in Modern Painting (1898) In 1903 he renounced the Roman Catholic faith, mainly on Celtic national grounds

Sit Atthur Conan Doyle was the son of a clerk in the Exchequer Office in Edinburgh who possessed a share of the artistic gifts of his famous brother Richard Doyle, born in 1859, he was educated at Stonyhurst and Edinburgh University for a medical career He practised medicine on land and on an Arctic ship, but was writing for Chambers's Journal when still a student, and in 1887 and 1888 attracted notice by A Study in Scarlet and Micah Clarke, which were followed in 1890 by the still more popular IVhite Company, and save that he evercised his medical profession with the troops during part of the war in South Africa, and that he stood in 1900, unsuccessfully, as Unionist candidate for a seat in Edinburgh, he has since 1890 been known as a successful author by profession, especially as the creator of a special type of detective story, The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, first published in the Strand Magazine, and in 1891 in book form Brigadier Gerard, Rodney Stone, and The Hound of the Baskerniles are amongst his most successful He also wrote The Great Boer II ar (1900) and a short work on The Cause and Conduct of the War, issued to explain and defend the action of Britain against misrepresentation in Europe and America. For his services in this connection he was knighted in 1902. In a straightforward, unaffected, agorous style he writes stories full of invention, movement, and interest.

Sidney Lee, to whom Britain is largely indebted for the carrying out of the monumental Dictionary of National Biography, was born in London in 1859, studied at the City of London School and Balliol College, Oxford From the beginning of the Dictionary of National Biography to the twenty-first volume (1883-90) he was assistant-editor, in 1890-91 (vols \viii-\vivi) he was joint-editor with Sir Leslie Stephen, and from 1891 to the conclusion of the work (with the sixty third volume), besides supplement (3 vols) and epitome (1891-1903), was sole editor. In 1883 he produced a new edition of Lord Berners's translation of Huon of Bordeaux, which was followed by a recension and continuation of Lord Herbert of Cherbury's autobiography, he wrote on Stratford on Avon from the earliest time till Shakespeare's death, and on the first folio Shakespeare, and he has published Lives of Shakespeare and of Queen Victoria, expanded from the articles on them contributed by him to the Dictionary article on Shakespeare in this work is from his pen

Israel Zangwill, born in London in 1864, the son of an immigrant, was successively teacher and journalist, has written essays, poems, and plays, but is best known as author of Children of the Ghetto, Ghetto Tragedies, The King of Schnorers, Dreamers of the Ghetto, and other stories showing his keen insight into all aspects of Jewish life and his sympathy with his race, as well as his literary skill and power

Anthony Hope Hawkins, born in 1863, the son of a London head master and clergyman, was educated at Marlborough and Balliol College, and called to the Bar in 1887 The Prisonce of Zenda (1894) was not his first book, but it was that which made his pen name of 'Anthony Hope' familiar, and, compounded of romanticism, satire, modernity, and burlesque, has served as a model to many attempts in the same genre. The amusing Dolly Dialogues belong to the same year, and other notable works are Rupert of Hentzau, The King's Mirror, Quisante, Tristram of Blent, and The Intrusions of Peggy Rudy and Kipling. Journalist, writer of short stories, poet and novelist, was born at Bombay on 30 li December 1865. His father, Mr John Lockwood Kipling, CIE, is an artist of considerable knowledge and skill, his mother (mic Alice Macdonald) has, in conjunction with her daughter, published a volume of poems (Hand in Hand, 1902) showing no small literary power combined with rare delicacy and refinement of Mr Rudyard Kipling was educated at the United Services College, Westward Ho, North Microards returning to India, he became a journalist and acted at Allahabad as assistant editor on the Ciril and Military Gazette and the Proneer, in which were printed the stories which, when collected and republished in book form, first dres the attention of the reading public to his Mr Kipling has travelled in China Japan, Africa, Australia, and America. It was during his seven years' residence in the United States that he all bu' succumbed to an attack of pneumonia, which called forth an extraordinary manifestation of s mpaths on the part of the American public After this he returned to England, but he has since then made more than one visit of considerable deration to South Africa. Mr Kiplings publica.

tions include Departmental Ditties (1886), Plant Tales from the Hills, Soldiers Three, In Black and White, The Story of the Gadsbys, Under the Deodars, The Phantom Rickshaw, Hee Wilhe Winkie, Life's Handicap, The Light that Failed, The Naulakha (written in collaboration with Wolcott Balestier), Barrack Room Ballads, Many Inventions, The Jungle Book, The Second Jungle Book, The Seven Seas, Captains Courageous, The Day's Work, Stalky & Co, From Sea to Sea, Kim, Just So Stories, The Five Nations (poems), and Traffics and Discoveries (1904)

Mr Kipling is still a young man with many years of work, it may be hoped, before him No attempt could therefore in any case be made to fix the place which he will eventually occupy in the The task would literature of his age and country be made additionally difficult by the curious and almost freakish developments and changes which have marked his literary power during the list eighteen vears He became known originally as a writer of short stories dealing with Indian life, and particularly with the life of the British soldier in These showed him to be possessed of a method at once vivid and strong, and of an uncompromising directness of expression somewhat rare amongst the writers of the day. The stories were not less remarkable for the extraordinary keenness of observation displayed by the writer. He may be said (although not a few soldiers might hesitate to concur in this dictum) to have represented the common soldier with a futliful accuracy that left but little to be desired, there, limned to the life, were the Cockney, the Yorkshireman, and the Irishman, three types of the great mass of their fellows who make up the rank and file of the army Their weaknesses and the peculiar code of morals that is supposed to distinguish the regular soldier from his civilian fellow countrymen were set down as faithfully as their courage, their fatalistic en durance, their admiration of manliness, and their The success of Soldiers Three resourcefulness and Plain Tales from the Hills was incontestable, and they were followed by sketches displaying the same graphic power in conjunction with imagina tive insight and a vein of tenderness in some of the tales that formed a strange contrast to the somewhat brutal but intentional roughness of other writings by the young author Less success ful was The Light that Failed, Mr Kipling's first attempt at a novel. The same qualities and the same contrast are to be observed in this book as in the collections of shorter stories, but the coarse ness outweighs and overpowers the tenderness, and the style of writing which, in spite of its jerkiness and its lack of emotional restraint, carried the writer triumphantly through the few pages of the short story seems to lay and halt when forced into his service for a novel. While the two Jungle Books and Kim must not be forgotten by those who endeavour to estimate Mr Kipling's position, it may safely be said that of late

Mr Kipling's chief triumphs have been gained by his poems. The best of these, such as, to take only 'wo examples, 'The Ballad of East and West' and 'The Recessional,' reach a very high level indeed In the 'Ballad' is to be found that union of fiery descriptive power with nobility of feeling and an artfully simple metrical dexterity which stamps all great ballads The subject fortunately forbade that overwrought attention to its technical details which is a mark of some of Mr Kipling's pieces both in everse and prose, but there is, on the contrary, a downright and straightforward narration of a heroic and knightly incident which makes its appeal to the reader without any adventitious trickery No doubt many of Mr Kipling's pieces in verse, notably the Barrack Room Ballads, with their course dialect jargon and their almost affected brutality of sentiment, are destined merely to a passing Of many of his other pieces, too, it popularity may be said that the strenuous and often aggressive patriot has submerged the poet, but if he be judged by the best of his work in poetry, it my be affirmed that amongst writers of the day he is unsurpressed for vigour of diction combined with an imaginative power that holds the reader in its spell even when the subject dealt with by the poet is most terrible and distressing

RUDOLF C LEHMANN

Stephen Phillips, born at Somerton near Oxford in 1868, is the son of an English clergyman, and was educated at the Grammar Schools of Stratford and of Peterborough, where his father was Precentor of the Cathedral After studying a while for the Civil Service, he went on the stage, playing parts of all kinds in Benson's Company, and subsequently became an army tutor he turned to literature, and in 1897 drew critical notice by his striking poem Christ in Hades, afterwards included in the volume of Poems published in the same year, which was 'crowned' by the Academy journal The author's theatrical experience helped, with their own dramatic and poetic merit, to secure success on the stage for the poetical dramas Paolo and Francesca (1899), Herod (1900), and Ulysses (1902), The Sin of David, on a plot from the English Civil War, followed in 1904 As a poct Mr Phillips is admitted by the best critics to have true and high poetic endowment, with a real gift for epigrammatic and memorable lines

William Butler Teats, born in Dublin in 1865, of Anglo Irish parentage, his steeped his inagination in the legend and myth of the Irish Celt, and it has been apparently the chief ambition of his maturer years to give reality to that conception of an individual Irish literature, divorced from English influences, which has inspired the movement of which the Irish Literary Society and the Irish Literary Theatre are the organised champions. Yet it may be doubted whether the Ideas of Good and Fell (1903), over which he has brooded in The Celtic Trustight (1902), in which he loves to sit, are really Irish ideas, or whether his art is as Celtic as he supposes Certainly, in spite of his 'Cathleens' and 'Maircs,' his 'Finns' and 'Brans,' one may read the latest and most carefully revised edition of his Poems without finding any very direct evidences of a distinctively Celtie imagination Mr Yeats was born with a delight in the vague, the mystical, and the unreal) These are poetical qualities, but they are not the peculiar characteristic of Irish folklore any more than they are the peculiar characteristic of the Scandinavian sagas. In every race and in every literature, of you go back to the primitive myth and unrecorded tradition, you go back to the vague, the mystical, and the unreal) If the past be but remote enough, even realities become unreal, and action no more than a dream Whatever his tongue, the bard or story-teller can only speak of 'old, unhappy, far off things, and battles long ago Mr Yeats is a poet of imagination, and he has found in the realm of Celtic mith, which Ferguson was the first to explore, material which mates with his fancy But to speak of his verse or of his prose tales-charming as many of the latter are—as an interpretation of Irish character is to profoundly misinterpret that character. It is characteristic of Mr Yeats's delight in dreams and shadows that the poet who has most attracted and influenced him is William Blake, whose works he edited in 1892 in conjunction with Mr E J Ellis

It is nineteen years since Mr Yeats, then a lad of nineteen, first appeared in print in the pages of the Dublin University Review Since then, though he has published many volumes, he has written comparatively little verse. He is to be commended for the restraint he has exercised, and the fasti diousness with which he has pruned his poems Though he has published since 1888 several volumes of poetry, the collected edition, which contains 'all of his published poetry which he cares to preserve,' is still of modest size interpreter of Celtic myth and tradition, and an exponent of the Celtic influences in literature, Mr Yeats takes himself, as we have seen, very Every one may not take the same view of his mission that he does himself But no one can doubt that he is a poet. When he is least self conscious Mr Yeats can fulfil with real charm of manner and of language one of the highest functions of a poet, that of expressing in the language of the imagination the dimly realised feelings of less gifted persons. If he can give the world more of such poetry as the lyric in which he has sung for every prisoned toiler in the smoke of cities the haunting charm of nature's lonely solitudes, the world will forgive him readily enough for many าก๊ectations

I will arise and go now, for always night and day
I hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore, While I stand on the roadway or on the payements grey,
I hear it in the deep heart's core

ENGLISH LITERATURE IN THE BRITISH DOMINIONS BEYOND THE SEAS

English Literature in Canada.

HE Dominion of Canada, even without its Arctic islands, occupies more of the surface of the North American continent than the United States, and is in area little less than the whole of Europe But at the beginning of the twentieth century the energetic population who had already given it its rank amongst the most promising countries and communities of the world numbered less than five and a half millions—a little more numerous than the people of the Netherlands at the same date, larger by a million than the popu lation of Scotland, but less by a million than the population of Greater London. Only since the early years of the seventeenth century has any part of what we now call Canada been the home of men of European blood and speech earliest settlers were Frenchmen, whose sparsely peopled settlements on the shores of the St Lawrence and in Acadia were till near the end of the century but little disturbed by the English colonists to the south From New England the tide of colonisation gradually flowed towards north and west. Collisions between French and English interests, between French and English colonists, became frequent and almost inevitable, and in the middle of the eighteenth century Chinda was the stake for which France and England contended in wars fought out partly in Europe and partly in America. The capture of Quebec by Wolfe in 1759 practically ended the struggle, and by the Treaty of Paris in 1763, what was then called Canada, with the parts of New France between the Alleghanies and the Mississippi, was ceded to Great Britain During the revolution which led to the constitution of the United States as a new nation, Canada remained loval to the mother-country And the immigration into Canada at the close of the war of some thirty or forty thousand United Empire Lovalists, sadly shaking off the dust of their feet against the new republican polity, greatly strengthened the still numerically weak English element in the loval province, and permanently saved British interests in the vast area where till of late settlers of English speech had been greatly outnumbered by those of French

French literature in Canada, beginning with the books of the old explorers and missionaries, and including in modern days the poems of Fréclictie, Crémazie, Le May, and Sulte, lies wholly without the scope of this work. And the earliest books in English written in Canada or about Canadasuch as the accounts of their explorations by the Londoner Samuel Hearne and the Scotsman Alexander Mackenzie, all dating from the end of the eighteenth and beginning of the nineteenth century-need only passing mention. Nor have the Earl of Selkirks writings, William Smiths History of Carada (1815), or David Thompson's The Har of 1812 much to do with the develop ment of Canadian literature, as in the other colonies, a majority of the earlier writers were British born From 1828 onwards Joseph Howe made his newspaper, the Nova Scotian, published in Halifax, an important literary as well as political organ, and secured for it Haliburton's humorous In virtue of his three years' sojourn in Canada, and of his Lawric Todd, Bogle Corbet, and other works dealing with Canadian life, John Galt (see pages 296-300) is at least associated with Canadian literature, and whoever it was who wrote it, the 'Canadian Boat Song,' referred to on page 298, is (in contrast to Moores) a very noteworthy and early poetic outcome of a Scottish exile's life in the Crinidian backwoods R M Ballantyne's stories (see page 623) reflect his experiences in the Hudson Bay territories, and have made two generations of British boys familiar with some aspects of life in those regions

The first considerable verse writer in Canada was Mrs Susannah Moodie, youngest sister of Miss Agnes Strickland. With her husband, a Scottish officer who had seen service in the Low Countries and South Africa, she settled in Ontario in 1832, and before her death in 1885 produced a good deal of verse (including notable poems on the maple and the canoe) and much minor fiction. Charles Heavysege (1816–76), a Liverpool cabinetimaker, published after he settled in Canada, in 1853, sonnets, longer poems, novels, and several tragedies, of which the most important was Saul Isabella Valances Crawford (1851-87), born in Dublin, came to Canada as a child, and 15 gratefully remembered for her lyrics, such as 'The Master Builder' and 'The Ave of the Pioneer, George Frederick Cameron (1854-85), a Nova Scotian born, deserves to be regarded as the first native poet whose lyrics, intense and passionate, were greeted as admirable by the foremost English critics and poets at Queen's University, Kingston, Cameron became editor of a Kingston newspaper, and is perhaps best known for his defiant 'What reck we of the creeds of men?' At the end of the nineteenth century an enthusiastic Canadian anthologist was able to commemorate the work of no less than a hundred and thirty five Canadian poets, of whom C G D Roberts, Bliss Carman, W W Campbell, and Sir Gilbert Parker may be reckoned amongst the foremost

In novels, tales, and stories Galt's first successor was Major John Richardson, author of Walousta (1833), who was born in Ontario of Scottish parents. William Kirby, G. M. Adam, Miss Lily Dougall, and Miss M. M. Saunders are but a fer amongst recent or living authors of romance and story. Grant Allen, though Canadian born, came to Oxford as a youth, and was reel oned amongst English authors. Sir Gilbert Parker, though serving as English M.P. from 1900, is still accounted a Canadian poet and Canadian novelist, and is the most conspicuous Canadian man of letters.

Amongst historical writers, besides Bourinot and C G D Roberts, Kingsford and Goldwin Smith, should be named Robert Christie, James Hannay, George Bryce, J C Dent, and G M Mr Arthur Doughty's six volumes on Wolfe's campugn (1903) constitute a very important contribution to Canadian history Alpheus Todd produced in his Parliamentary Government in England (1867-68) what even in England ranks as an authoritative work. Sir Daniel Wilson had attained eminence in Scotland as an antiquarian and historian ere in 1853, in mid time of his life, he came to Toronto as Professor of History and English Literature. Sir William Logan, geologist, was the first native man of science who can be reckoned amongst really eminent representatives of his profession the Dawsons, father and son-Sir J W Dawson and Dr G M Dawson-worthily maintained the tradition Sir John Murray 'of the Challenges,' a supreme authority on oceanography, was born in Coburg, Ontario, and partly educated in Canada, but has done most of his scientific lifework in Britain Dr Theal (see page 730) is a New Brunswicker Dr J B Crozier, though settled in London, may be claimed by Canadians as one of their most original and stimulating thinkers Professor John Watson of Kingston went from Scotland to Canada in 1872, and has since then published a series of works on Kant, Schelling, Comte, Mill, and Spencer, on ethical philosophy and Christian idealism, which rank him amongst our most fruitful writers on philosophy

On the beginnings of literature in Canada, see the Transactions of the Popal Society of Car ida (1833 et seq.), especially a paper by J G Bourinot in 1803, published also as a separate book, Canada's Intellectual Strength and Weakness the same authors Intellectual Development of the Caradian People the relevant portions of the Instories of Canada particularly that by Roberts, Light halls collection of Songs of the Great Dominion (1880) and his anthology of Canadian Peems of Lars ('Canterbury Poets, 1891), Sladen and Roberts, Founger American Poets (1891) Stedman's Luctorian Anthology (1895) Wetherell's Later Canadain Peems (1893), Rand's Tressury of Canadian I erse (1900)

Thomas Chandler Haliburton (1796-1865) was born at Windsor in Nova Scotia, and educated Called to the Bar in 1820, in his native town he became a member of the House of Assembly, Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas (1828), and Judge of the Supreme Court (1842) In 1856 he retired and settled in England, was made DCL by Oxford, and in 1859-63 was Conservative MP for Launceston He takes rank in British American literature mainly as creator of 'Sam Slick,' Yankee pedlar and clockmaker, whose quaint drollery, unsophisticated wit, simple but trenchant satire, knowledge of human nature, and aptitude in the use of 'soft sander' have given him a fair chance of immortality. The newspaper sketches (written anonymously) in which this character first appeared were collected in 1837-40 as The Clockmaker, or Sayings and Doings of Samuel Slick of Slickville, and were continued as The Atlaché, or Sam Slick in England (1843-44), the typical Yankee having been brought to England in this new capacity. Haliburton's other works include A Historical and Statistical Account of Nova Scotia (1825-29), Bubbles of Canada (1839), The Old Judge, or Life in a Colony, The Letter-bag of the Great Western, Wise Saws and Modern Instances, Nature and Human Nature, Traits of American Humour, and Rule and Misrule of the English in America (1850) The Canadian humourist has had few successors in his own country, but he is accognised as the father of all such as have anywhere in America written There is a Memoir humorous work in dialect by Γ B Crofton (1889)

Joseph Hone (1804-73) was the son of an emigrant loyalist who came from Boston to Halifax after the American Revolution—Bred, like his father, a printer, he soon showed exceptional journalistic gifts, and in 1828 became proprietor and editor of the Nova Scotian, remarkable not merely as the paper in which Haliburton's 'Sam Slick' made his bow to the world, but for its editor's own brilliant contributions—These comprised sketches of his own experiences, 'Western and Eastern Rambles,' a series of papers, 'The Club,' on the model of Noctes Ambrosianæ, and his weightier 'Legislative Reviews'—He became the most conspicuous man in provincial public life, the most eloquent speaker in the Assembly, Secretary of State, and

Governor of Nova Scotin His Speeches and Public Letters were published (1858), and there is a Life of him by Fenety (1896)

William Kingsford (1819-98), author of the standard History of Canada, was born in I ondon, at sixteen he enlisted in the Dragoon Guards, and in 1837 went with his regiment to Canada. He had risen to be sergeant when, in 1841, he left the army to do surveying work, and as surveyor or engineer he was till 1879 engaged on canals, rail ways, and harbours in the United States, Panamá, and Canada His first publications were on roads, canals, and his own travels. His History of Canada (10 vols 1887-97), the result of seven teen years' patient labour in Canadian archives, is more remarkable for its fairness, fullness, and fidelity to its sources than for its literary style.

Goldwin Smith, born at Reading in 1823. passed from Eton to Oxford, took a first in classics in 1845, and in 1847 was elected a Fellow of University College and called to the Bar A zealous promoter of university reform, he was assistantsecretary to the first and secretary to the second Oxford University Commission, and served on an Education Commission in 1858 Regius Professor of History at Oxford in 1858-66, he was during the American Civil War a strenuous upholder of the North, in 1864 he lectured in the United States, and in 1868 he was elected to the chair of English and Constitutional History in Cornell University Four years later he settled in Canada, edited the Canadian Monthly 1872-74, and founded and edited The Week and The Bystander, and forty years' residence and literary work entitle him to rank as a conspicuous Canadian publicist and author He has written on the study of history, on Irish history, on Three English Statesmen (Pym, Hampden, Cromwell), a political history of the United States, and a political history of the United Kingdom, vigorous in style, luminous in exposition, and rich in suggestion. He is the author of books or pamphlets on university reform, the American Civil War, and questions of the day here and in America. Believing profoundly in the mission of the English race, he is antiimperialist both in British and in American politics, supported the disestablishment of the Irish Church, but opposed Home Rule He has always insisted (in The Political Destiny of Canada and in Canada and the Canadian Question) that, geographically and commercially, Canada is bound ultimately to gravitate towards incorporation in the United He is an anti-Socialist but a Radical in most respects, an idealist but somewhat of a pessi mist, an independent thinker and a very trenchant There are monographs from his pen on Cowper, on Jane Austen, and on Lloyd Garrison He has produced in A Trip to England and Oxford and her Colleges glorified guide books for American tourists Bay Leaves and Specimens of Greek Tragedy show his skill in verse And in Rational Religion (1861), Guesses at the Riddle of Existence (1897), and a short book on The Founder of Christianity, insists on free inquiry, and demands a reconstruction of our faith

Sir John George Bourinet, born in Sydney, Nova Scotia, in 1837, studied at Trinity College, Toionto, and for years edited the Halifan heporter, but in 1880 became Clerk of the Dominion House of Commons He was one of the original members of the Royal Society of Canada, of which he has been president and honorary secre He has written largely on constitutional history, on parliamentary procedure and parlia mentary government in Canada, a book on Cape Breton and one on Canada under British rule, besides the two works noted above on The Intel lectual Development of the Canadian People (1880) and on Canada's Intellectual Strength and Weak ness (1893, originally, like many of his works, printed in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Canada) He was made KCMG in 1898, and has received academic honours from Laval University

Charles Grant Allen (1848-99) born at Kingston in Canada, graduated from Merton College, Oxford, in 1871 After four years at Queen's College, Jamaica, as Professor of Logic and Principal (1873-77), he returned to England, and, adopting a literary career, published Physiological Æstlictics (1877), Colour Sense, Lvolutionist at Large, Dai win, Colin Clout's Calendar, Flowers and then Pedigrees, The Story of the Plants, mainly connected with the exposition and popularisation of the evolution theory make a livelihood by scientific work, he turned to novel writing, and showed a marvellous fertility and attained remarkable popularity under the cir cumstances Babylon, In All Shades Philistia, The Devil's Die, were written frankly to please the public, in The Woman who Dul (1895), first of his 'Hill top Novels,' he sought to expound and promote his views on life and society—in this case unconventional and startling views on marriage and the relation of the sexes Evolution of the Idea of God (1897) was an anti-Christian philosophy of religion. He wrote also n small book on Anglo-Saxon Britain, and a series of admirable historical guide-books to Paris, Florence, and Belgium

John Benttie Crozier, born of Scotch parents at Galt, Ontario, in 1849, was educated at the Grammar School in Galt and at Toronto University, and having qualified as M D (1872), came to England and settled in practice in London But he found time to produce as early as 1880 an important work on The Religion of the Future, first of a series of original and suggestive contributions to the history of civilisation and culture, Civilisation and Progress (1885) being followed in 1897 by the first volume of The History of Intellectual Development on the Lines of Modern Evolution My Inner Life (1898) he described as 'a chapter on personal evolution and autobiography,' and he wrote a study of Lord Randolph Churchill and English democracy

W. H. Drummond, born in 1859 in the west of Ireland, came to Quebec province in 1869, and settled as doctor in a typical mixed village, Bord a Plouffe, peopled by French and English-speaking voyageurs, Indians, half-breeds, and French Scotch Irish Canadians, who ran the rapids and served with Wolseley on the Red River expedition He handles in a masterly manner the mixed patois of English and French spoken around him, and in his verse the grotesqueness of the combination strikes one less than the poetry and tenderness and fire of the narrative. The Habitant and other French-Canadian Poems made him favourably known in 1898, Phil-o-Rnin's Canoe and Madeleine Vercheres were his next ventures (1899), Johnnie Courteau and other Poems followed in 1901

Charles George Douglas Roberts, born at Douglas, New Brunswick, in 1860, studied at the University of New Brunswick, and after holding one or two minor educational posts, edited the Week at Toronto, was Professor of English Literature and of Economics in King's College, Windsor, Nova Scotia, from 1885 till 1895, and for two years edited a paper in New York His best-known work in poetry is contained in Orion and other Poems (1880), In Divers Tones (1887), Poems of Wild Life (1888), an ode for the Shelley centenary, Songs of the Common Day, and The Book of the Native But he has written largely in prose on a variety of subjects, from guide books and histories of Canada to Earth's Enigmas, The Raid from Beausejour, The Forge in the Forest, Around the Camp fire, By the Marshes of Minas, The Heart of the Ancient Wood, and Barbara Ladd (1903), a story of Connecticut child life.

Archibald Lampman (1861-99), descended from a family of German loyalist-emigrants from Pennsylvania, was born at Morpeth in Ontario, studied at Trinity College, Toronto, and made a name for himself as a poet while holding an appointment in the Ottawa Post Office. Among the Millet (1888) and Lyrus of Earth (1895) were his chief collections of verse, and a memoir of him was prefixed to a collected edition of his Poems by D C Scott (1900)

William Bliss Carman, born at Fredericton in New Brunswick in 1861, studied at the university of his native province, at Edinburgh, and at Harvard, and was successively engineer and teacher, but since 1890 has edited or contributed to papers in New York, Chicago, and Boston When Low Tide on Grand Pré appeared in 1893 he was universally acclaimed as a poet of power and originality A Sea mark, Behind the Arras, and Ballads of Lost Haven followed With a friend, Richard Hovey, he has produced three series of Songs from Vagabondia St Kavin, a Ballad, At Michaelmas, The Girl in the Poster, The Green Book of the Bards, and The Vengeanec of Noel Brassard appeared between 1894 and 1899

William Wilfred Campbell, born at Berlin in western Ontario in 1861, was the son of an Anglican clergyman, and educated in Toronto and in Massachusetts, became rector of a church in St Stephen, New Brunswick. In 1891 he withdrew from clerical work and took a post in the Civil Service at Ottawa Lake Lyrics and other Poems, fresh descriptive verses, won him a hearing as a poet in 1889, Beyond the Hills of Dreams (1899) contains vigorous patriotic lyrics, such as 'Victoria,' England,' and 'The World Mother'

Lily Dougall. born in Montreal in 1858, was educated at home and at Edinburgh University, and is L L A of St Andrews Her novels Beggais All (1891) and What Necessity Knows dealt effectively with soul problems, and have been followed by The Zeitgeist, A Question of Faith, The Madonna of a Day, A Dozen Ways of Love, The Mormon Prophet (1898)

Mrs Everard Cotes, born at Brantford, Ontario, in 1861, contributed largely to papers and magazines, and as Miss Sara Jeannette Duncan became famous for A Social Departure (1890), based on a tour round the world, and An American Gril in London (1891) In 1891 Miss Duncan married Mr Cotes, an Indian journalist, and lins written a series of tales of Anglo-Indian life—His Honour and a Lady (1896), The Simple Adventures of a View Sahib, The Pool in the Desert (1903, four short stories), and others

Charles William Gordon, born near Glengarry, Ontario, was for some time a teacher, but qualified at Toronto and in Edinburgh for the Presbyterian ministry, and in 1894 became minister of a church in Winnipeg Under the penname of Ralph Connor, he is author of Beyond the Marshes, Black Rock, Given's Canyon, The Sky Pilot (1898, a tale of an evangelist on the Rockies), and Ould Michael

Sir Gilbert Parker, born in Canada in 1862, and educated at Trinity College, Toronto, travelled much in Canada and in the Southern Seas, and for a time was on the staff of a Sydney paper. He published two or three plays, a book on Australia (1892), and a volume of poems (1894). But it was with Pierre and his People (1892), a fine presentation of Canadian character, that he first tapped the mine that has proved so rich. Other stories of Canadian life in the past or in the present, amongst habitants, half breeds, and the rest, are The Translation of a Savage, The Trail of the Sword, When Valmond came to Pontiac, The Seats of the Mighty (a historical novel, dealing with Wolfe and the siege of Quebec), The Pomp of the Lawellettes, The Lane that had no Turning, and The Right of Way. The scene of The Battle of the Strong (1898) is laid in Jersey, and that of Donovan Pasha (1902) in Egypt, but neither of these ap pealed so strongly as his Canadian stories even to non-Canadian readers. In his historical work on Old Quebec (1903) he had the help of a collaborator. Sir Gilbert had been settled in England for some years when in 1900 he was elected M.P. for Gravesend, as a Conservative, he was knighted in 1902.

Australasian Literature.

HE great southern island continent we call Australia begins to take shape on French and German maps in the first half of the sixteenth century. The Portuguese may have seen Australian coasts by the middle of

But it is not till the beginning that century of the seventeenth that we know of Dutch ships actually in these waters, and by their enterprise the Dutch earned in that century the right to bestow their long-current names on New Holland and Van Diemen's Land And Tasman invented the Dutch Latin name Nova Zeelanda when he discovered the islands in 1642, but slightly (and not quite correctly) Anglicised when in 1840 New Zealand became definitively a British colony The name Australia, of happy omen, dates only from the Voyage to Terra Australis published by Matthew Flinders in 1814 It was Cook's voyages in 1770 and later that made parts of Australia and New Zealand really well known to Europeans, and the first period of European settlement, associated with British penal stations, began in 1788 interior of Australia was wholly unknown till after The discovery of gold in 1851 brought a flood of fresh blood and adventurous energy into the settlements, but it was the slower and soberer pastoral and agricultural colonisation that by 1901 had permanently secured wealth and well-being for the five Australian colonies, which, with Tasmania, in that year entered on a new epoch as the Commonwealth of Australia. At the inauguration of the Commonwealth its population (3,775,000, fully two thirds native born) was less than that of the English county of Lancashire or of London, and was excelled by that of four several States of the American Union at the same date. But it was considerably more than the total white popula tion of the thirteen United States at the first census in 1790 (3,172,000) New Zealand, with its white population of nearly 790,000, has all the elements of another great and prosperous state of English blood and speech

To all the colonies the settlers, or a proportion of them, brought their love of the home literature, and erelong one and another began to write songs and stories in imitation of the poets of the mother-country and of America, Poe's influence has been traced as well as that of Wordsworth and Byron, of Tennyson and Browning Among the first were

Barron Field, a judge of the Supreme Court m New South Wales, who as early as 1819 published a volume of poems, The Firstfruits of Australian Poetry, reviewed by Charles Lamb in the Examiner, W C Wentworth, and the statesman Sir Henry Parkes Some of what R H Horne wrote was inspired by his Australian experiences (page 413). Alfred Domett's principal poem was the Moon epic named below Charles Harpur (1812-68) was even called 'the Australian Wordsworth' Lionel Michael attracted notice in 1857 by his Songs cuthout Music By far the greater part of Australian literature has been the work of men born and bred in Great Britain Henry Clarence Kendall was the first Australian born writer to secure a permanent place in the affections of Australians. But even now Adam Lindsay Gordon's verse is oftenest on Australian lips and Gordon came from the Kendall and Lindsay Gordon began old country a new and more important stage in Australian J Brunton Stephens, a Scotsman, literature became 'the Queensland poet' But the most characteristically Australian native born poets are the so called 'Bulletin School, whose gifts have been developed in and by the Sadney Bulletin-John Farrell, author of How he Dud (1895), A B Paterson, author of The Man from Snowy River (1895), Edward Dyson, author of Rhymes from the Mines (1896), and Henry Lawson, author of While the Billy Boils, in prose, and In the Days when the H orld was With, in verse (1896) Mr Lawson, whose rough and swinging verses denounce with vehemence the vices of civilisation and glorify the 'good old days,' has been described as the most representative writer Australia has yet produced

Of novels dealing with Australian subjects, probably the most important as literature have been written by two great English novelists, one of whom never even saw Australia, while the other was but for a few years a colonist. In It's Never too Late to Mend, Charles Reade (see page 482) carefully followed his documents, but Henry Kingsley's descriptions of bush-life and of the pioneer settlers in Geoffrey Hamlyn and The Hillyars and the Burtons (see page 513) are singularly vivid and true and attractive. Much of R. L. Stevenson's later work was produced under the Southern Cross, and is racy of the Southern Sea if not of Australasia. Marcus

Clarke is on the whole the most conspicuous prose writer of those who may fairly be called Australians though European born 'Rolf Boldrewood' has been called the 'national novelist of Australia.' Ada Cambridge and 'Tasma,' both English born, and Mrs Campbell Praed, a colonial, are the most eminent women writers, though Mary Gaunt (Mrs Lindsay Miller) has also done good work in short stories and longer 'George Egerton,' Australian born, is cosmopolitan in her works Guy Boothby, born in Adelaide in 1867, the son of a member of the South Australian House of Assembly, has produced a score of stories, of which On the Wallaby (1894) and Billy Binks are sufficiently Australian in subject. But domiciled in England, he is rather identified with his most notable book, Dr Nikola, and its continuations Louis Becke, born in Port Macquarie, New South Wales, in 1848, has stuck more exclusively to Southern subjects, and utilised in his stories his experiences as a supercargo on shipboard amongst the South Sea Islands and as an Australian journalist. Some of his work he has done m collaboration with Walter Jeffery, who, born in Portsmouth in 1861, went to sea, and in 1886 settled in Sydney, where in 1891 he became editor of a paper Joseph Jacobs, born in Sydney in 1854, was educated partly there and partly at Cambridge, and has become a first-rate authority on the mediæval history of the Jews (his own people) and on fairy tales James Francis Hogan, author, journalist, and MP, was born in Tipperary in 1855, and was in infancy taken by his parents to Melbourne, where he was educated, and whence he returned in 1887 William Henry Fitchett, born in 1850, and educated at Melbourne University for the Methodist ministry, has written popular and patriotic books on British heroic history Haddon Chambers, journalist, story-writer, and dramatic author, was born at Stanmore near Sydney in 1860, and had been stock-rider and Civil servant ere in 1882 he settled in England. Ernest William Hornung, novelist and journalist, born at Middlesbrough in 1866, found two years in Australia enough to provide him with materials for several Australian stories Equally short was the sojourn in Australia of Hume Nisbet, who gave an Australian colouring to his stories Fergus Hume, British born, was a barrister in New Zealand before he took to story-writing Brereton Marriott Watson, born in 1863 near Melbourne, and educated at Christchurch, N Z., in 1885 began literary work in England Gilbert Aimé Murray, born in Sydnes in 1866, is the son of the President of the NSW Legislative Council, Professor of Greek at Glasgow in 1889-99, he is an accomplished Greek scholar, and has shown true poetic power in his own plays and in masterly translations from Euripides

In the Australian novel the four main aspects of colonial life liave been all duly chronicled—the convict period, the pastoral development, the gold exploitation, and the triumphant democracy of industry and labour

Records of explorations, lives of explorers, and histories of the colonies form another large section of the literary output of Australisian historians Mr G W Rusden is perhaps the most comprehensive and voluminous A disproportionate amount of talent and energy is absorbed in journalism, and it should be added that many of the duly papers and the magazines of Australia F W L Adams (1862-93) are very ably written made some stir in Australia both by his verse and prose while on the staff of the Sydney Bulletin, wrote novels of Australian life and criticisms of things Australian, and a notable autobiographical novel, The Child of the Age Born in Malta, an army doctor's son, he shot himself at Margate, already doomed to death by lung disease Charles Henry Pearson (1830-94), author of National Life and Character, spent twenty years in Australia, sat in the colonial parliament, and in 1886-90 was Victorian Minister of Education Sir Charles Gavan Duffy (page 583) may also here be named Samuel Butler's Lrewhon (page 624) seems to have taken shape in New Zealand

In New Zealand as in Australia, literary impulses have mainly found vent in journalism. There are many books on the country, its geology, ornithology, and history. Probably those which most distinctly deserve to rank as literature are Manning's Old New Zealand (1865), a description of Maori life by an Englishman who married a Maori wife and became a naturalised Maori, he has been for his humour called the 'Charles Lever of New Zealand.' And The Long White Cloud (1898), so called by its author, Mr W P Reeves, a colonial, from the poetical Maori name for the colony, is admirably written throughout.

Adam Lindsay Gordon, born at Fayal in the Azores in 1833, was the son of a retired armycaptain of Scottish family, who latterly taught Hindustani at Cheltenham College Meant also to be a soldier, Adam was sent to school at Cheltenham and to Woolwich, and kept several terms at Merton College, Oxford But already an inordinate passion for horsemanship and openair sports overbore all other interests, and led him into various irregularities At twenty lie sailed to Adelaide, and was successively policetrooper, horse-breaker, and livery stable keeper, becoming withal the best gentleman steeplechaserider in the colony He led an adventurous life in the South Australian bush, vet at odd times read the classics and English poets. He wrote a good deal of verse, and even sat for a spell in the pro vincial legislative assembly. But neither here nor in Victoria, where he ultimately made his home, was he in any of his various vocations persistent and sedulous enough to make a decent in elihood, and he soon ran through a legacy his father left He was sensitive, proud, solitary, and melan choly in temperament. He had married a domestic servant and believed himself to have lost caste most unreasonably, for there is evidence that he retained to the last the affection and respect of his friends, avoided the grosser excesses not uncommon in the bush, was chivalrous to women, and had no sorded interests in the turf. He was severely disappointed when his hopes of securing the succession to the Scottish estate of Esslemont in Aberdeen shire turned out to be barred by legal obstacles Financial embarrassment deepened his natural gloom and unhinged his mind, and he shot himself at Brighton, a seaside suburb of Melbourne had earned the love of all lovers of poetry amongst his countrymen by Sea-spray and Smoke drift (1867), Ashtaroth (1867), and Bush Ballads and Galloping Rhymes (1870) 'The Sick Stock rider' is a marvellously vivid transcript from the bush life he knew, and 'How we beat the Tavourite' is perhaps the best ballad of the turf in English 'From the Wreck' and 'Wolf and Hound' are colonial experiences, so that his subjects are occasionally Australian But on the whole the spirit and temper are, as in the bulk of Australian verse and prose, those of a typical and representative Briton Unlike Kendall, he never made Austrahan scenery the sole subject of any poem, even 'Whispering in the Wattle Boughs' is not the voice of the Australian forest, but, like 'An Exile's Farewell,' 'Early Adieus,' 'Wormwood and Nightshade,' the echo of his own sad memories, not unmixed with sense of failure and remorse glorified the horse and his rider in such a way as to secure local enthusiasm, but he owed more to Byron and Browning, Tennyson and Swinburne, than to Australia or anything Australian He was fond of short dramatic romances based on medieval literature, as in 'The Rhyme of Joyous Garde' and 'The Romance of Britomarte,' Ashtaroth, a dramatic lyric, suggests the influence of Faust and Manfred It is not the specifically Australian element that commends him to his readers, but the vitally human utterance of man hood, gallantry, energy, and pathos Marcus Clarke wrote a biographical introduction to Gordon's collected poems (1880, repeatedly reprinted), and under the not too appropriate title of the Laureate of the Centaurs, J Howlett Ross published a memoir in 1889

Henry Clarence Kendall (1841-82) was born in a poverty-stricken hut at Ulladulla in New South Wales, and was brought up in the solitudes of the bush. His father, the son of a missionary, had fought in Chili under Dundonald, his mother was a granddaughter of Leonard MacNally, Irish playwright and informer. From a lawver's office in Sydney Henry pissed to a clerkship in the government service. From boyhood he had written verses, and he found time to do a good deal of journalistic work struggled ineffectually against his dipsomaniac lieredity, resigned his post in the Colonial Secre tary's office in 1869, did not prosper in business with his brothers, and secured a small appointment as an inspector of forests Unlike Lindsay Gordon, he lind a keen feeling for nature as revealed in Australian sceners and life in the bush, and sang of Australian mountains, streams, and forests with a wistful charm. In virtue of this and of his national odes he has been called the national poet of Australia, and he has earned a permanent place in the esteem of Australians, but he has not come home to their hearts as Lindsay Gordon did, though his verse is more carefully finished and What glimpses he gives of his own melodious life experiences are said and depressing, and confessedly he has not Gordon's force or verve. Yet 'September in Australia,' 'The Hut by the Black Swamp,' 'Death in the Bush,' 'The Grave of Leichardt,' and many other of his poems show true poetic gifts His most sustained effort is 'Orara,' a narrative poem of tragedy and adven-His best work is found in his ture in the bush Leaves from an Australian I orest (1869), commently racy of the soil his earliest in Songs and Poems, his last in Songs from the Mountains A collected edition appeared in 1886

Marcus Clarke (1846-81), the son of a London barrister, after an undisciplined and precocious youth emigrated to Australia when he was eighteen, and failed to interest himself in his work either in a Melbourne bank or on an up country sheep But from the time that he secured an appointment on the Melbourne Argus it was plain he had found his true life work, and though he remained a Bohemian, improvident, vexatiously erratic, and indisposed to drudgery or patient, persistent labour of any kind, lie was recognised as having the makings of a brilliant journalist and man of letters In Long Odds, a pessimistic study of a mesalliance and the victimising of an easy going hero by two or more villains, he had to get friends to help in supplying instalments to keep up the supply of copy for the serial in which the tale He wrote much for magazines, was published produced pantomimes, burlesques, and controversial pamphlets, and succeeded admirably with some short realistic tales, such as Pretty Dick and Gentleman George's Bride, but it is mainly as author of For the Term of his Natural Life that he has been called the most notable Austra linn prose writer His chef-docuvre is a powerful but prinful story expressly meant to bring out the appalling brutalities that—almost inevitably -- recompanied and flowed from the hap hazard system of transportation of criminals and the hiring out of convict labour in the settlements.

The terrible realism hardly goes beyond the facts, and is relieved by a humour only too savage and cynical, and an occasional touch of romance, Lord Rosebery said that it 'has all the ghastliness of truth' The ingenuity of the plot is perhaps less satisfactory than the dramatic power of the development and the life-like reality with which the characters are endowed, Clarke's keen insight and the accuracy of his observation are more remark-But his extravagant able than his creative power and improvident ways forced him to write so much and to have so many irons in the fire that he failed to do justice to his powers, and, like Lindsay Gordon and Kendall, he died young-he was but thirty-five at his death

Alfred Domett (1811-87), Browning's 'lost Waring,' was, like Browning, a Camberwell man, studied at St John's, Cambridge, and after being called to the Bar, migrated to New Zealand in 1842. In swift succession he occupied the principal public posts in the colony, that of Prime Minister amongst the rest. The year after his return to England (1871) he published his famous—but too lengthy—Maori epic Ranolf and Amohia, a South Sea Day Dream. He had contributed verses to Blackwood in 1837, his Flotsam and Jetsam (1877) was dedicated to Browning

Tames Brunton Stephens (1835–1902), born at Borrowstounness in Scotland and educated at Edinburgh University, was for thirty years closely associated with the intellectual life of Australia. His Connet Once (1871), an elaborate poem in hexameters on a sad story, was written while he was a tutor in a Queensland squatter's family He subsequently held a post in the Civil Service, and in virtue as much of his shorter humorous pieces ('The Chinee Cook,' 'Ode to a Black Gin') as of his more serious and finished work ('The Angel of the Doves,' 'Mute Discourse'), was commonly known as the Queensland poet.

Thomas Alexander Browne has, under the pen name of Rolf Boldrewood, written Robbery under Arms (1888), A Modern Buccaneer (1894), The Squatter's Dream (1895), A Canvas Town Romance (1898), Ghost Camp (1902), and other Australian tales of adventure Born in London on the 6th August 1826, he was taken to Australia in 1830 by his father, Captun Sylvester John Browne, a founder of Melbourne, and there, after a good education and a varied experience in stock-farming and other vocations, he became a police magistrate and goldfields commissioner in New South Wales, till 1895. His Old Melbourne Memories contain vivid sketches of up-country life on the cattle stations in 'the day's before the gold'

Benjamin Leopold Farjeon (1836-1903), of the Australian plu born in London, went almost straight from school to try his luck at the Australian gold-diggings, but settled in New Zealand, wrote a story or two, and at Dunedin was manager and part proprietor of the first daily newspaper published in New Zealand By 1870 he was in London working as dramitist and novelist. His first success, Grif, was followed by Blade o'-Grass, Joshua Marvel, The Mesmerists, The Mystery of the Royal Mail (1902), and a long series of other stories, in some of which his colonial experiences are utilised

Ada Cambridge, born at St Germains in Norfolk in 1844, sailed in 1870 with her husband, the Rev G F Cross, for Victoria, where they settled—since 1893 in a Melbourne suburb her maiden name Mrs Cross has since 1891 become famous as a novelist-The Three Miss Kings, the story of three bush bred girls, being followed by A Marked Man, A Little Minx, Materfamilias, Path and Goal, The Devastators (1901), and other novels, besides poems and Thurty Years in Aus tralia (1903), reminiscences and views of Victorian life, manners, and problems In most of her stories the interest centres on the human and English element in the characters, often both strong and tender, and depends but little on 'local colour' even when the scene is wholly or partly laid in Australia. She is strong in pathetic scenes, and her style is simple and natural

Mrs Campbell Praed, born in 1851 Rosa Prior, daughter of the Postmaster-General of Queensland, has written some thirty novels dealing largely with the political and social life of well-to do colonials. In Policy and Passion (1881), one of her first stories, she professed that her aim was to depict 'certain phases of Australian life in which the main interests and dominant passions of the personages concerned are identical with those which might readily present themselves upon a European stage, but which directly and indirectly are influenced by striking natural surroundings and conditions of being in separable from the youth of a vigorous and impul sive nation,' and she has sought to fulfil this aim in most of her Australian novels. Notable amongst her works-in which a pessimistic tone is noticeable -are Policy and Passion, Nadine, Miss Jacobsen's Chance, The Romance of a Station, and The Insanc Root (1902) She married Mr Mackworth Pried in 1872, and in 1902 she published My Australian Girlhood, autobiographical reminiscences Tasma, born in London about 1860, came with her father, Mr Huybers, to Hobart in infancy, and when little more than a girl was writing stories, sketches, and reviews in colonial journals. In 1879 she went to live in France, where she wrote for the reviews and lectured, and in 1885 she married M Auguste Couvreur, a Belgian publicist Her first and best-known novel, Unch Piper of Piper's Hill, published in 1889, deals with types of the Australian plutocraev, and has been compared with the Silas Lapham of Mr Howells. In her Earliest Youth, Not Counting the Cost, and The Penance of Portia Janes deal also with Australian character.

George Egerton is the pen name of Mrs Golding Bright, bred an artist, but a novelist by profession Born in Melbourne about 1870 (her maiden name Dunne), she has been thrice married, and has lived in Ireland, the United States, South America, London, and elsewhere, and her works include Keynotes, Discords, Symphonies, Fantasias, The Wheel of God, Rosa Amorosa

English Literature in South Africa

APE COLONY, destined to be the nucleus of a vaster British South Africa, did not become permanently a British possession till 1814 What has been written by Dutch colonists in Dutch or in the Cape taal is not of literary value, and lies outside the scope of the The earlier literature in English present work connected with South Africa is rather about it than of it, and, as has been already said, consists mainly of books that are no books, such as government reports, or of the experiences of missionaries, hunters, explorers, or shipwrecked sailors, all of them English born and European in culture and The Rev John Campbell's Travels in South Africa was in 1814 a notable contribution to a series that included Dr Livingstone's first volume of Missionary Travels (1857), and later records of exploration, travel, and adventure, and books on South Africa were multiplied prodigiously by the troubles that led to the Boer War of 1899-To another category belong the letters sent from Africa in 1797-1801 by the lady ever dear to Scotsmen as the author of Auld Robin Gray, Lady Anne Barnard, who as wife of the Colonial Secretary had exceptional advantages-and disadvantagesfor studying life at the Cape (see Vol II p 804)

Thomas Pringle, also Scottish, was not much longer-hardly six years-in Africa, but in his verses written there struck an actually African note, and by his African Sketches awakened interest in the small and troubled colony, which already in vision he saw extending northward to, and even 'peradventure, in after days,' beyond the equator (Vol II p 791) The autobiography (1901) of Sir Harry Smith, the governor commemorated in the names of Harrismith and Ladysmith, gives a vivid picture of colonial conditions in the middle of the nineteenth century Bishop Colenso's famous book on the Pentateuch was not merely written in South Africa, but originated in problems raised by a Zulu anxious inquirer, as the controversy mainly concerned theology in Britain, Colenso has been treated above (Vol II p 452) Some of Mr Rider Haggard's novels reproduce very successfully the local colour and atmosphere of South Africa, and in so far may distinctly rank as African

George McCall Theal, born in 1837 at St John, New Brunswick, went in youth to South Africa, was active as a journalist, and by 1877 was recognised as an authority on all that concerns Bantu history, customs, and folklore. On behalf of the Cape Government he successfully carried out a mission to keep a Kuffir tribe from taking part in the war which had just broken out, in the Busuto War of 1867-68 he fulfilled a like mission with singular tact and insight into native character For fourteen years he was chief clerk in the Department of Native Affairs, and having for a time been Keeper of the Archives of the Colony, he was ultimately inade Colonial Historiographer His History of South Africa, which for comprehen sweness and conscientious research takes rank with our greater European histories, has been in progress for over thirty years, and suffers somewhat from the piecemeal publication corresponding with the course of his researches thus, while The History of South Africa from 1486 to 1691 appeared in 1888, The Beginning of South African History, incorpornting much newly discovered matter bearing on parts of the same period, saw the light only in 1902 He has striven to attain impartiality, and only by the hasty has been reproached for Dutch or 'pro Boer' prepossessions LLD of Queen's University, Kingston, and D Lit of the University of the Cape, he has published fifteen volumes of South Ifrican Records in Portuguese, Dutch, and English, Genealogical Registers of colonial fimilies, shorter books on the history of the colony, and a volume on Kaffir foll lore.

Mrs Cronwright Schreiner is doubtless the most original author to whom South Africa lias given birth Daughter of a missionary of German family in the service of the London Missionary Society (her mother a Londoner), slie was born in Basutoland about 1865, and while yet in her teens startled the conventional English world of letters by her Story of an African Farm, a powerful series of imperfectly finished pictures of life on a Boer farm, and of the spiritual problems and struggles that rend an inquiring soul professedly by 'Ralph Iron,' but when it was known to be the first work of Miss Olive Schreiner, a brilliant literary future was prophesied for her Dreams (1890), a group of spiritual allegories, hardly increased her reputation, and when, after her marriage (1894) to Mr S C Cronwright, the controversial note became dominant, her work lost in charm and interest as well as in power Trooper Peter Halket (1897) was practically an anti-Rhodesian pamphlet More explicitly polemi cal were (jointly with her husband) The Political Situation (1895) and An English South African's View of the Situation (1899), on the problems that issued in the Boer War, her view being strongly in sympathy with the Cape Dutch

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

E 'slender beginnings' of American literature (see Vol I p 832), in the main written by authors of English birth and published in the mother-country, yielded little of even antiquarian memory beyond Roger Wilhams's The Bloudy

Tenent of Persecution, Anne Bradstreet's poems, and the Bay Psalm Book Life in the colonies was, indeed, further illustrated by sermons, diaries, letters, and other records either then issued or collected since and made accessible by historical societies, but their importance is rather social than literary, and the same is true also of the most popular poem of the New England colonies, Michael Wigglesworth's The Day of Doom, or a Poetical Description of the Great and Last Judgment (1662), which for more than a century was in the place of a church classic for the Puritan Commonwealths There was plenty of scholarly learning of the ecclesiastical sort then flourishing among the English Nonconformists, intellectual activity was vigorous among the leaders, the people at large enjoyed a mental and spiritual life, but nothing of literary permanence was produced

The writers of the first generations born upon the soil, whose books characterise the scattered communities then conglomerating into groups of colonies along the seaboard in the later seventeenth and earlier eighteenth centuries, departed but slightly from the pattern set by their fathers The north eastern colonies, and, in particular, those of New England, were the chief, and, in fact, almost the exclusive sources of such literature as there was Sermons and writings of a cognate kind made up its bulk, annals and personal narratives of all sorts gave way to books of a more formal historical nature dealing with the colonial past and the relations of the people with the Indians and the home Government, meagre scientific observations were recorded, but of polite literature there was at best only a small product, and that consisted of the most feeble, awkward, and mane imitation of the reigning English schools Touches of originality have been sought for in the way of looking at things disclosed by observers of manners, but such traces of a rising American spirit are practically imperceptible, or if a subtle analysis seems to find them, they are unimportant in the general mass. Tradition governed the form and substance of all that was written, the matter and method of the Puritan mind constituted the main stream, originality—a new life—stirred only in the secular and political fields, and there did not at once find literary expression. Men rather than books are the landmarks of the time to the eye of memory, titles are but the shadows of personalities, and these are memorable rather as high-water marks of certain Puritan forces in the region of character than for the value of what they bequeathed by their pens

In the earlier part of the period under review, during which the ecclesiastical mind remained dominant, two names only definitely survive-Cotton Mather and Jonathan Edwards the third of the name, represents the consummation of the elder conservative Puritan clergy, and his great work, Magnalia Christi Americana (1702), is the chief monument of the seventeenthcentury New England which it records, as well as the most important literary achievement of the New World up to that time Its author was prepared for this and his other labours by heredity His grandfather, Richard Mather, was a jointauthor, with Thomas Welde and John Eliot, the translator of the Indian Bible, of the Bay Psalm His father, Increase Mather, a graduate of Harvard and of Trinity College, Dublin, and President of Harvard, is credited with one hundred and thirty six titles, of which the major part was, of course, sermons, but he is historically remembered as the forerunner of Franklin in representing the colonies at London, where he secured the new charter, and also as the head, though not without strenuous and successful opposition, of the clerical hierarchy of New England In succession to him Cotton Mather took the post of the conservator of the old ways, but in his time the power of the clergy was already weakened, and he was less powerful in the State than his father had been. though he was more highly distinguished as a writer and also as an ascetic and visionary saint of his caste. Jonathan Edwards in the next generation shows the onward course of time by the fact that he dealt not at all with affairs, but retiring into the intellectual sphere of dogmatic theology, won lasting fame as a metaphysical schoolman applying the logic of the reason with marvellous efficiency to the matter of Calvinism, and carrying that particular theory of God's nature and ways to the final stage of its development. His reputation for intellectual force has never fuled to be recognised, and is now widespread, but it is the faculty, and not its fruits in thought, that is admired.

Apart from these two celebrated men, one the example of the contents and the other of the power of the Puritan mind in the colonies, the literary works of the early eighteenth century have no more than parochial value, and they are without interest except for the antiquarian reader. A very human picture of life in the community about Wassachusetts Bay is contained in Samuel Sewall's Diary (published only in 1878-82), of especial importance for the time of the witchcraft delusion at Salem, in which he bore a prominent part, he is also historically remembered as the author of the first auti slavery tract, The Schling of Joseph (1700) He was Chief-Justice of Massachusetts, and of the highest layman type of character, with curious foibles of human nature about him, and a touch of poetic susceptibility to the beauty of nature rarely to be found in that age. A document hardly inferior to The Day of Doom in its revelation of the everyday religious state of mind of the Puritan people is The New England Primer, which from about the year 1690 was for a century and a half current in New England households, and for the greater part of that time dominant in the teaching of the young. Its contents varied in successive editions, but its substance remained unimpaired through all changes It was known among its renders as the 'Little Bible' The natural democ ricy of New England, which was so inbred that it was lodged even in the heart of the autocratic clergy, found its most significant expression in the writings of John Wise, a neighbour of Sewall's, the pastor of Chebacco, an opponent of the Mathers His Vindication of the Government of New England Churches (1717), together with other works, contuned principles and declarations in which the political thought of the Revolution could be heard labouring up the horizon, he was perhaps the chief precursor of the students of government History, to which the founders, Bradford and Winthrop, had given just attention, was cultivated for Massachusetts Bay by William Hubbard, and more conspicuously by Thomas Prince, and later by the last of the royal governors, Thomas Hutchinson, and in Virginia by Robert Beyerly and William Stith Virginia also produced a gentleman of broad culture in William Byrd, a I ellow of the Royal Society, whose writings, illustrative of life and affairs in that colony, have been recently collected, but, like Daniel Denton's Brief Description of New York (1670) and George Alsop's Character of the Province of Maryland (1666), they appeal only to students of colonial life. In New England similar books were produced in A vein of satire, as thin as that of belleslettres, both so insignificant as to leave neither that in him the whole eighteenth-century spirit seemed to come at a birth in a form of marvellous mental freedom and practical material efficiency Being all this by native genius, he found in his environment just the world in which such qualities would shine with most illumination. He was fed from the beginning on books and printed matter. and his main business was producing more of the same sort and disseminating it. The list of his own imprints is a principal index to the reading of his compatriots, like the catalogue of the library he founded, whose exemplary influence has been so great in providing public reading for a whole nation. He fertilised the community with reading matter and the spirit of reading, he was a vast promoter of book-power, if one may use the phrase in the new country The sort of reading that he made prevail, too, was of the prudent, matter-of fact. scientific, encyclopædic kind information for the mind, maxims for the conduct. In the two books by which he is remembered in his own right, the Autobiography (1817) and Poor Ruhard's Almanack (1733), the character of the man and of his counsel for life are plainly set forth. His position and labours, however, are something more and other than his books. His is one of the illustrious names of the world, and his place in American literature is only a small incident of his fame. The coincidence of such a supreme intelligence with that moment when the worldly interests of a young nation first came to the fore in its own conscious ness, and became the goal of its intense effort, makes Franklin's American greatness, and his long life enabled lum to foster the play of those consolidating forces of which at their climax of danger he was to be so great a servant in the eye of the world

The secular spirit of the colonies, of which Franklin was the conspicuous representative, belonged to all of them in a greater or less degree, and was developed out of their material interests, rapidly increasing, it prepared the diverse settlements for the federating impulses preceding the Revolution, and facilitated the imperfect union of the first stage of independence. It left slight traces in literature. Only when the struggle had fairly begun, and principles and policies were necessarily declared and the cause pleaded in the public forum of church and newspaper and pamphlet, did the colonial power of literary expression again become vigorously alive. Sermons on the topics of the Revolution were innumerable everywhere, and the secular press was busily employed by the pens of laymen Lawyers naturally took a leading part in the discussion. The spring of the Revolution has been found in the mainten ance of old English rights, in the absorption of French philosophical generalisations, and in the habit of the transplanted law to resort to broad principles in establishing the new customs of the country Whether or not these were all co-operating causes, in any aspect of the matter legal I thinkers would have the first place in the literature of the Revolution. A brief and distinguished era of political writing resulted. Its most shining name is Thomas Jefferson The Declaration of Independence is its great State-paper as in Franklin's case, Jefferson's place in literature is an incident only in a much larger career that belonged to him as a man of affairs, whose utili tarian social services were various and important over and above his work as a lifelong statesman Jefferson's writings, apart from the Declaration, have no element of literary greatness stitution gave birth to the one book of power in the same field, The Federalist (1788), the work of Alexander Hamilton and James Madison, a treatise in which the essentials of free government are memorably handled. It is customary for the American mind, at least, to add to these prized and celebrated documents Washington's Inaugurals (1789-93) and Farewell Address (1706) The political writings of the period also include speeches and pamphlets of the patriots James Otis, Samuel Adams, Joseph Warren, John Adams, and Thomas Paine (Vol II p 559) The period was one of great distinction for oratory, rhetoric, and thought, as well as for the remarkable persons who were engaged in the conduct of its affairs

The titles of polite literature that survive by courtesy from the eighteenth century are certainly more substantial than those that illustrate the sterility of the ecclesiastical era in New England. The first place is held by Philip Freneau, a patriot in whose verse revolutionary sentiment and incident are embalmed in his British Prison-ship (1781), and in several brief pieces which, together with poems of a more conventional inspiration, appeared in two volumes (1786-88), forming the most considerable poetic work then done in America. The abundant source of the verse of the period, however, was Yale College, from whose young graduates issued John Trumbull's MFingal (1782), a revolutionary satire in imitation of Hudibras, Timothy Dwight's Conquest of Canaan (1785), an artificial epic, and Joel Barlow's Vision of Columbus (1787), afterwards elaborated into Th. Columbiad These aspirants for the large honours of the poetic art are known as the Hartford wits, though the name more properly belongs to the young men of still inferior literary talent who drew about them These were the beginnings of American verse, in them the presence of the national spirit is plain, whose most striking manifestation, however, was the popular song, 'Hul, Columbia, (1798), the work of Joseph Hoplin-In prose, John Woolman's Journal (1774) stands alone.

The foregoing sketch of the fortune of literature in the American colonies, though brief, is abundant for its meagre material. Literature in a true sense did not exist in the first two centuries of life there. A few sporadic books cannot assume that title, and the interest of these, the Magnalia.

Franklin's Autobiography, Woolman's Journal, is not literary The printed word was used as a social instrument with great power, but not for literary ends, it was in the service of theology, history, government, the practical or pious life, it was primarily speculative, religious, legal, employed for discussion and record There was no literary class, nor any room for one, in the scheme of life, there was no market for their works. Yet the community, especially in the north, was a lettered one it read much, it had school and college and a learned class, it maintained and continued high respect for the intellectual and scholarly life and the power of the mind Its leaders had the classics of learning, which they knew thoroughly, and the urban literature of England, and later of France. for their leisure, its people had, in New England The rise especially, the Bible, their one great book of a literature of high, if not the first, rank in the next century is not surprising, but such a literature was impossible in the preceding conditions of the colonies, north or south. The intellectual history of the colonies, ecclesiastical and governmental, is summed up in a few notable figures

For the whole period of colonial literature. Stedman's Literary of Imerican Literature (11 vols. 1888-97) is invaluable because of the sarety and fullness of the illustrations there continued, and the excellent judgment shown in the selection. Trent's Colonial Prose and Pectry (3 vols. 1901) is a handy small cyclopedra, and in his American Literature (1903) the authors and their works are treated with thoroughness and justice. Tyler's History of American Literature 1007-1706 (2 vols. 1870), and Literary History of the American Resolution (2 vols. 1897) are still the best authorities on the whole subject matter.

G. E. WOODBERRY

Cotton Mather (1663-1728), born at Boston, son of Increase Mather and grandson of the celebrated Puritan minister, John Cotton, was the most distinguished clerical writer of his time, and the head of the conservative party in the Church He was precocious as a child, a graduate of Harvard at the age of fifteen, and co pastor with his father at the North Church, where he remained through life. He had extraordinary capacity for mental labour, was indefatigably industrious, and acquired immense erudition. He was gifted also with extraordinary curiosity, and is found exerting himself in unusual fields. His range is indicated by the contrasted facts that he was a chief persecutor of the witches and also an early advocate of the practice of inoculation for the smallpox private life he was an ascetic, gave himself to fasting and similar exercises of the religious rule, and saw visions He appears to have spent no inconsiderable fraction of his time prostrated upon the floor of his study. His fruitfulness was prodigious even for those days, and nigh four hundred titles are credited to him Of these the Magnalia Christi Americana, or the Ecclesiastical History of New England from its Trist Planting, in the Year 1620, unto the Year of our Lord 1698, is the chief It is an immense work of many hundred pages, and contains the history of the settlement, the lives of the governors, the lives of sixty famous divines, the history of Harvard College, creeds, disciplines. remarkable providences, wars with the devil in many forms of sectarianism, and much other like multifarious matter. The work, with all its necessary defects, is an invaluable illustration of colonial life and thought. Other important works are Late Memorable Providences relating to Witchcraft and Possession (1689), The Wonders of the Invisible World (1603), Parentator (1724), and the Manuductio ad Ministerium (1726) The traits of his writing are described by Tyler as 'the expulsion of the beautiful from thought, from sentiment, from language, a lawless and a merci less fury for the odd, the disorderly, the grotesque, the violent, strained analogics, unexpected images, pedantries, indelicacies, freaks of allusion, mon strosities of phrase' The same authority describes him as in character 'a person whose intellectual endowments were quite remarkable, but inflated and perverted by egotism, himself imposed upon by his own moral affectations, completely sur rendered to spiritual artifice, stretched, every instant of his life, on the rich of ostentatious excr tion, intellectual and religious, and all this partly for vanity's sake, partly for conscience' sake.' He, nevertheless, filled a great place in the world that knew him, he was in correspondence with many persons of distinction abroad, and was a Fellow of He failed of the presidency the Royal Society of Harvard College, and the fact showed that he belonged to the dying past which he embodied in both his own spirit and his works

The Design of the 'Magnalia'

I write the wonders of the Christian religion, flying from the depravations of Europe to the American strand and, assisted by the Holy Author of that religion, I do, with all conscience of truth required therein by Him, who is the truth itself, report the wonderful displays of His infinite power, wisdom, good ness, and faithfulness, where with His Divine Providence both irradiated an Indian wilderness

I relate the considerable matters that produced and attended the first settlement of colonies which have been renowned for the degree of reformation professed and attained by evangelical churches erected in those ends of the earth and a field being thus prepared, I proceed unto a relation of the considerable matters which have been acted thereupon

I first introduce the actors that have, in a more exemplary manner, served those colonies, and give remarkable occurrences in the exemplary lives of many magistrates, and of more ministers, who so lived as to leave unto posterity examples worthy of everlasting remembrance.

I add herennto the notables of the only Protestant University that ever shone in that hemisphere of the New World, with particular instances of Criolians, in our biography, provoking the whole world with virtuous objects of emulation

I introduce, then, the actions of a more eminent importance that have signalized those colonies whether the establishments, directed by their synods, with a rich variety of synodical and ecclesiastical determinations, or, the disturbances with which they have been from all sorts of temptations and enemies tempestuated, and the methods by which they have still weathered out each horrible tempest

And into the midst of these actions I interpose an entire book, wherein there is, with all possible veracity, a collection made of memorable occurrences and amazing judgments and mercies befalling many particular persons among the people of New England

Let my readers expect all that I have promised them in this bill of fare, and it may be that they will find themselves entertained with vet many other passages, above and beyond their expectations, deserving likewise a room in history in all which there will be nothing but the anthor's too mean way of preparing so great entertainments, to reproach the invitation

His Father's Manner of Life

The Dr still had many opportunities for special service continued unto him, and he approved himself a prudent and faithful steward of his talents. He grew in the exercises of repentance and of patience, and of all piety and communion with God, and in the painful discharge of his ministry, and vatchfully laid hold on all opportunities to bear testimonies for the cause of God, and of his people, as the matter might require. But if I cut the chapter into little sections, it may add something to the relish of it.

His purpose and manner of life is exactly described in a book about holiness which was written by him twenty years before he died. In that book he offers admirable rules for growth towards a perfection of holiness, in the fear of God. Which he introduces with saying, I shall not set before you directions impossible to be followed, or heavy burdens which I would be both myself to touch. No, we saw his rules livelily exemplified. But his daily course may be inquired after. Besides his patient continuance in that stroke of well doing which lay in his course of setting apart whole days for the religion of the closet, and which he continued until the last year of his life was coming on, his daily course was this. And what a grateful spectacle to angels in it.

In the morning repairing to his study (where his custom was to sit up very late, even until midnight and perhaps after it), he deliberately read a chapter, and made a prayer and then plied what of reading and writing he had before him. At nine o'clock he came down, and read a chapter and made a prayer, with his He then returned unto the work of the study Coming down to dinner, he quickly went up again, and began the afternoon with another prayer There he went on with the work of the study till the evening with another prayer he again went unto his Father, after which he did more at the work' of the study. At nine o'clock he came down to his family sacrifices went np again to the work of the study, which anon he concluded with another prayer, And so he betook hiniself unto his repose

In the prayers of the day, what there fell short of the number in the hundred and sixty fourth verse of the hundred and nineteenth psalm was doubtless made, np with numberless ejaculations—Of such ejaculatory prayers, no doubt, is to be understood, what antiquity reports of the apostle Bartholomew, That he prayed one hundred times in a day, and of one Paulus, That he did it three hundred times I can't say, That this one Eusebius had so many ejiculatory prayers as these come to, But he was the happy man, that had his quiver full of them!

He commonly spent sixteen hours of the four and twenty in his laborious hive! Being very much of Thomas a Kempis his mind, Nusquam requiem intension in libro et in claustro. He was there, some thought, even to a fault. More of his pastoral visits were wished for Jonathan Edwards (1702-58) was born at East Windsor, Connecticut. His boyhood was remarkable for precocity, shown not only in metaphysical interest but in physical research, and the mind which so announced itself has been deemed capable of greatness in any intellectual career he might have chosen. He was a graduate of Yale College, and then a tutor there, but spent his life as pastor of the church at Northampton from 1727 to 1750, and for eight years thereafter as missionary to the Indians near Stockbridge, after which he held for a few weeks the presidency of Princeton, in which office he died of the smallpox moral and spiritual character was on a plane equal to his mental endowments, though he was not an orator, he was an impressive speaker, and succeeded by the intensity of his nature perhaps as much as by the terror of his subject. His power of logical thought, however, surpassed his talent for description, minute and imaginative as the latter was, and the works on which his great reputation as the ablest American theologian rests are distinguished by reasoning only. His three important works are Treatise concerning the Religious Affections (1746), On the Freedom of the Will (1754), Treatise on Original Sin (1758) His most famous sermon is Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God (1741) The first extract illustrates the vivid directness of his sermons, the second his metaphysical style.

The Wrath of the Almighty

Thus it will be with you that are in an unconverted state, if you continue in it, the infinite might, and majesty, and terriblenes of the Omnipotent God shall be magnified upon you in the ineffable strength of your torments you shall be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb, and when you shall be in this state of suffering, the glorious inhabitants of heaven shall go forth and look on the awful spectacle, that they may see what the writh and fereceness of the Almighty is, and when they have seen it, they will fall down and adore that great power and majesty. 'And it shall come to pass, that from one moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship before me, saith the Lord And they shall go forth and lool upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me, for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh '

It is everlasting wrath It would be dreadful to suffer this fiereeness and wrath of Almighty God one moment, but you must suffer it to all eternity there will be no end to this exquisite, horrible misery when you look forward you shall see a long forever, a boundless duration before you, which will swallow up your thoughts and amize your soul, and you will absolutely despuir of ever having any deliverance, any end, any mitigation, any rest at all, you will know certainly that you must wear out long ages, millions and millions of ages, in wrestling and conflicting with this Almighty merciless vengcance, and then, when you have so done, when so many ages have actually been spent by you in this manner, you will know that all is but a point to what remains your punishment will indeed be infinite Oh, who can express what the state of a soul in such circumstances 15! All that we can possibly say about it gives but a very feeble, faint representation of it, it is mexpressible and inconceivable for 'who knows the power of God's anger?'

How dreadful is the state of those that are daily and hourly in danger of this great wrath and infinite misery l But this is the dismal case of every soul in this con gregation that has not been born again, however moral and strict, sober and religious, they may otherwise be Oh that you would consider it, whether you be young or old! There is reason to think that there are many in this congregation, now hearing this discourse, that will actually be the subjects of this very misery to all eternity We know not who they are, or in what scats they sit, or what thoughts they now have It may be they are now at ease, and hear all these things without much disturb ance, and are now flattering themselves that they are not the persons, promising themselves that they shall escape. If we knew that there was one person, and but one, in the whole congregation, that was to be the subject of this misery, what an awful thing it would be to think of! If we knew who it was, what an awful sight would it be to see such a person! How might all the rest of the congregation lift up a lamentable and bitter ers over him! But alas! Instead of one, how many is it likely will remember this discourse in hell! And it would be a wonder if some that are now present should not be in hell in a very short time, before this year is out it would be no wonder if some persons that now sit here in some seats of this meeting house in health, and quiet and secure, should be there before to morrow morning

From 'The Freedom of the Will.'

The plain and obvious meaning of the words Freedom and Isberts, in common speech, is power, opportunity, or advantage that any one has, to do as he pleases. Or, in other words, his being free from hindrance or impediment in the way of doing, or conducting in any respect, as he wills. (I say not only doing, but conducting, because a voluntary forbearing to do, sitting still, keeping silence, &c., are instances of persons' conduct about which Liberty is exercised, though they are not so properly called doing). And the contrary to Liberty, whatever name we call that by, is a person's being hindered or unable to conduct as he will, or being necessitated to do otherwise.

If this which I have mentioned be the meaning of the word Liberty, in the ordinary use of language. as I trust that none that has ever learned to talk, and is unprejudiced, will deny then it will follow that in propriety of speech neither Liberty nor its contrary can properly be ascribed to any being or thing but that which has such a faculty, power, or property as is called For that which is possessed of no such thing as will cannot have any power or opportunity of doing according to its will, nor be necessitated to act contrary to its will, nor be restrained from acting agreeably to it. And therefore to talk of Liberty, or the contrary, as belonging to the very will itself is not to speak good sense, if we judge of sense and nonsense by the original and proper signification of words. For the will itself is not an agent that has a will the power of choosing itself line not a power of choosing Plat which has the power of volition or choice is the man or the soul, and not the power of volution itself. And he that has the Liberty of doing necording to his will is the agent or doer who is possessed of the will, and not the will which he is possessed of We say with propriety that a bird let loose has power and I iberty to fly, but not that the bird's power of flying has a power and Liberty of flying 10 be free is the property of an agent who is possessed of powers and freulties, as much as to be cunning, valiant, bountiful, or realons. But these quali ties are the properties of men or persons and not the properties of properties

There are two things that are contrary to this which is called Liberty in common speech. One is constraint, the same is otherwise called force, compulsion, and coaction, which is a person's being necessitated to do a thing contrary to his will. The other is restraint, which is his being hindered, and not having power to do according to his will. But that which has no will cannot be the subject of these things. I need say the less on this head, Mr Locke having set the same thing forth with so great clearness in his Essay on the Human Understanding.

But one thing more I would observe concerning what is vulgarly called Liberty, namely, that power and opportunity for one to do and conduct as he will, or according to his choice, is all that is meant by it, with out taking into the meaning of the word anything of the cause or original of that choice, or at all considering how the person came to have such a volition, whether it was caused by some external motive or internal habitual bias, whether it was determined by some internal antecedent volition, or whether it happened without a cause, whether it was necessarily connected with something foregoing, or not connected person come by his volition or choice how he will, yet, if he is able, and there is nothing in the way to hinder his pursuing and executing his will, the man is fully and perfectly free, according to the primary and common notion of freedom

Benjamin Franklin (1706-90) was born at Boston, but his life is rather associated with Philadelphia, to which city he early migrated. He followed the printer's trade, and became a publisher of newspapers and books. He had a political career from 1736, and his public activities grew more diversified and more important till he had become the most useful citizen of the State, and the most profitable servant of the colonies abroad as their agent at London and, during the Revolu-He was illustrious in science from tion, at Paris the time of his discoveries in electricity reputation his name still enjoys is that of one of the great citizens of the world He was primarily a citizen, not a writer, and the list of his inventions, foundations, and organisations is a long one In the formative period of American society he was the principal suggester of new methods and ends and the chief organiser of new activities (see above at page 732) Most of his writings have consequently to do with practical affairs, but the Autobiography stands apart from the others, and is the work by which he is universally known The style he used is one of the best of that day of excellent prose

His Religious Views

I had been religiously educated as a Presbyteman, and, though I early absented myself from the public assemblies of the seet, Sunday being my studying day, I never was without some religious principles I never doubted, for instance, the existence of the Deity, that He made the world, and governed it by His providence, that the most acceptable service of God was the doing good to man, that our souls are immortal, and that all crime will be punished and virtue rewarded either here or hereafter These I esteemed the essentials of every religion, and being to be found in all the religions we had in our country, I respected them all, though with different degrees of respect as I found them more or less mixed with other articles which, without any tendency to inspire, promote, or confirm morality, served principally to divide us and make us unfriendly to one another This respect to all, with an opinion that the worst had some good effects, induced me to avoid all discourse that might tend to lessen the good opinion another might have of his own religion, and as our province increased in people, and new places of worship were continually wanted, and generally erected by voluntary contribution, my mite for such purpose, whatever might be the seet, was never refused

Though I seldom attended any public worship, I had still an opinion of its propriety and of its utility when rightly conducted, and I regularly paid my annual subscription for the support of the only Presbyterian minister or meeting we had in Philadelphia. He used to visit me sometimes as a friend, and admonish me to attend his administrations, and I was now and then prevailed on to do so, once for five Sundays successively Had he been in my opinion a good preacher, perhaps I might have continued, notwithstanding the occasion I had for the Sundry's leisure in my course of study, but his discourses were elitefly either polemie arguments or explications of the peculiar doctrines of our sect, and were all to me very drv, uninteresting, and unedifying, since not a single moral principle was inculcated or enforced, their aim seeming to be rather to make us Presbyterians than good citizens

At length he took for his text that verse of the fourth chapter of Philippians 'Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, what soever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any pruse, think on these things,' and I imagined, in a sermion on such a text, we could not miss of having some morality. But he confined himself to five points only, as meant by the apostle. I Keeping holy the Sabbath day. 2 Being diligent in reading the holy Scriptures. 3 Attending duly the public worship. 4 Partaking of the sacrament 5 Paying a due respect to God's ministers. These might be all good things, but, as they were not the kind of good things that I expected from that text, I desputed of ever meeting with them from any other, was disgusted, and attended his preaching no more. I had some years before composed a little liturgy, or form of prayer, for my own private use [in 1728], entitled 'Articles of Belief and Acts of Religion' I returned to the use of this, and went no more to the public assemblies. My conduct might be blamable, but I leave it without attempting further to excuse it, my present purpose being to relate facts, and not to make apologies for them.

The Way to Wealth.

Courteous Render I have heard that nothing gives an author so great pleasure as to find his works respect fully quoted by other learned authors. This pleasure I have seldom enjoyed, for, though I have been, if I may say it without vanity, an eminent author (of almanaes) annually, now a full quarter of a century, my brother authors in the same way, for what reason I know not, have ever been very spring in their applauses and no other author has taken the least notice of me, so that, did not my writings produce me some solid pudding, the great deficiency of praise would have quite discouraged me.

I concluded at length that the people were the best judges of my merit, for they buy my works, and, besides, in my rambles where I am not personally known, I have frequently heard one or other of my adages repeated with 'As Poor Richard says' at the end of it. This give me some satisfaction, as it showed not only that my instructions were regarded, but discovered likewise some respect for my authority, and I own that, to encourage the practice of remembering and reading those wise sentences, I have sometimes quoted myself with great gravity

Judge, then, how much I must have been gratified by an incident I am going to relate to you. I stopped my horse lately where a great number of people were collected at an auction of merchants' goods. The hour of the sale not being come, they were conversing on the badness of the times, and one of the company called to a plain, clean old man with white locks, 'Pray, Father Abraham, what think you of the times? Will not these heavy taxes quite ruin the country? How shall we ever be able to pay them? What would you advise us to do?' Father Abraham stood up and replied, 'If you would have my advice, I will give it to you in short, for A word to the wise is enough, as Poor kichard 'vys' They joined in desiring him to speak his mind, and gathering round him, he proceeded as follows

'Friends,' said he, 'the taxes are indeed very heavy, and if those laid on by the Government were the only ones we had to pay, we might more easily discharge them, but we have many others, and much more grievous to some of us. We are taxed twice as much by our idleness, three times as much by our pride, and four times as much by our folly, and from these taxes the commissioners cannot ease or deliver us by allowing an abatement. However, let us hearken to good advice, and something may be done for us, God helps them that help themselves, as Poor Richard says

'It would be thought a hard Government that should tax its people one tenth part of their time, to be em ployed in its service, but idleness taxes many of us much more, sloth, by bringing on diseases, absolutely shortens life. Sloth, like rust, consumes faster than labour wears, while The used key is always bright, as Poor Richard says But dost thou love life? Then do not squander time, for that is the stuff life is made of, as Poor Richard says How much more than is necessary do we spend in sleep, forgetting that the sleeping fox catches no poultry, and that there will be sleeping enough in the grave, as Poor Richard says. If time be of all things the most precious, wasting time must be, as Poor Richard says, the greatest prodigality, since, as he elsewhere tells us, Lost time is never found again, and what we call time enough always proves little enough Let us, then, be up and be doing, and doing to the purpose, so by diligence shall we do more with less perplexity Sloth makes all things difficult, but industry, all easy, and, He that riseth late must trot all day and shall scarce overtake his business at night, while Laziness travels so slowly that Poverty soon overtakes him Drive thy business, let not that drive thee, and, Early to bed, and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise, as Poor Richard says'

Franklin's Works are edited by John Bigelow in len volumes (1887-89) the Antobiography in three volumes (1863). Excellent Lives of him are J B M Master's (1887) and J T Morse's (1889).

John Woolman (1720-72) was born at Northampton in New Jerse), and after a humble beginning, he began to teach poor children and to preach as an itinerant among the Quakers. For a quarter of a century he travelled extensively in the Atlantic States, and was from the start an abhorrer of slavery. His Journal tells the story of his journeys, and in the narrative discloses a pious soul simply and sincerely. It owes some thing of its vogue to Charles Lamb's love of it, and to Whittier's eulogy. A brief extract shows its quality

An Angelic Vision

In a time of sickness with the pleurist, a little npward of two years and a half ago, I was brought so near the gates of death that I forgot my name. Being then desirous to I now who I was, I saw a mass of matter of a dull, gloomy colour, between the south and the east, and was informed that this mass was human beings in as great misery as they could be and live, and that I was mixed in with them, and that henceforth I might not consider myself as a distinct or separate being this state I remained several hours. I then heard a soft, melodious voice, more pure and harmonions than any I had heard with my curs before, I believed it was the voice of an angel, who spake to the other angels. The words were 'John Woolman is dead.' I soon remem bered that I once was John Woolman, and being assured that I was alive in the body, I greatly wondered what that heavenly voice could mean. I believed leyond doubting that it was the voice of an holy angel, but as yet it was a mystery to me

I was then carried in spirit to the mines, where poor, oppressed people were digging rich treasures for those called Christians, and heard them blaspheme the name of Christ, at which I was grieved, for His name to me was precious. Then I was informed that these heathen were told that those who oppressed them were the followers of Christ, and they said amongst themselves, if Christ directed them to use us in this sort, then Christ is a cruel tyrant.

All this time the song of the angel remained a nivs tery, and in the morning my dear wife and some others coming to my bedside, I asked them if they knew who I was, and they telling me I was John Woolman, thought I was light headed, for I told them not what the angel said, nor was I disposed to talk much to any one, but was very desirous to get so deep that I might understand this mystery. My tongue was often so dry that I could not speak till I had moved it about and gathered some moisture, and as I lay still for a time, at length I felt divine power prepare my mouth that I could speak, and then I said, 'I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ that liveth in me, and the life I now live in the flesh is by faith in the Son of God, who loved me, and gave Himself for me.' Then the mystery was opened, and I perceived there was joy in heaven over a sinner who had repented, and that that language, 'John Woolman is dead,' meant no more than the death of my own will. Soon after this I couglied and raised much bloody matter, which I had not done during this vision, and now my natural understanding returned as before.

Here I saw that people getting silver vessels to set off their tables at entertainments were often stained with worldly glory, and that in the present state of things I should take heed how I fed myself from out of silver vessels. Soon after my recovery, I, going to our monthly meeting, dined at a Friend's house where drink was brought in silver vessels, and not in any other, and I, wanting some drink, told him my case with weeping, and he ordered some drink for me in another vessel. The like I afterward went through in several Friends' houses in America, and have also in England, since I came here, and have cause, with humble reverence, to acknowledge the loving kindness of my heavenly Father who hath preserved me in such a tender frame of mind that none, I believe, have ever been offended at what I have said on that occasion

GEW

George Washington (1732-99) has been referred to above (page 713) as a conspicuous representative of the political literature of this period. The writings of Jefferson and Washington were incidental to their public life, and though the style of one is censured as rhetorical and that of the other as cold, the inspiration is felt in the first and dignity in the second with a fire and weight that make their sentences imperishable. The language of the Declaration is well known. His Farewell Address is a noble example of Washington's power to utter character in words, putting himself into his wisdom, veneration for the man is a part of the impressiveness of what he says

From Washington's 'Farewell Address'

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion In the discharge of this trust, I will only say that I have with good intentions contributed towards the organisation and administration of the government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable Not unconscious, in the outset, of the in feriority of my qualifications, experience in my own cyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself, and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services, they were temporary, I have the con solation to believe that while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is in tended to terminate the career of my public life, my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honours it has conferred upon me, still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment, by services futhful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise, and as an instructive example in our annals, that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were hable to mis lead, amudst appearances sometimes diblous, vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging, in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of enticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts, and a guarantee of the plans by which they were effected Profoundly penc trated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave, as a strong incitement to uncersing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence, that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual, that the free constitution, which is the nork of your hands, may be sacredly maintained, that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue, that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so care ful u preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applicuse, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop But a solicitude for your welfare, which cannot end but with my life, and the appreliension of danger, natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation, and to recommend to your frequent review, some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all important to the permanency of your felicity as a People. These will be offered to you with the more freedom, as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget, as an encouragement to it, your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every higament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment

The unity of Government, which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independ ence, the support of your tranquility at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very Liberty which you so highly prize But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the con viction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and netively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly esti mate the immense value of your national Union to your collective and individual happiness, that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the Palladium of your political safety and prosperity, watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety, discountenancing whatever may sug gest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens, by birth or choice, of a common country, that country has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of Patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, liabits, and political principles You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together, the Independence and Liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately Here every portion of our country to your interest finds the most commanding motives for carefully guard ing and preserving the Union of the whole

Lindley Mullay (1745-1826), the gramma rinn, was born of Qunker parentage, the eldest of twelve children, at Swatara, Pennsylvania, and was educated at Philadelphia, New York, and Burlington, having at fourteen run away to school from his father's counting house. He studied law nt New York, and was called to the Bar in 1763 At twenty two he married, and in 1770-71 first visited England, where from 1785 he made his home at Holgate, York, for the last sixteen years never leaving the house In 1787 he published his Power of Religion on the Mind, and his English Grammar (1795), long a standard on both sides of the Atlantic, was followed by A Compendium of Faith and Practice, The Duty of a Daily Perusal of the Scriptures, and Memoirs, written in a series of six letters by himself, and concluded by Elizabeth Frank (1826) Spite of his proverbial credit as an authority, his own style was by no means a model of excellence, it was not impeccable even on grammatical grounds, the 'misallied participle' being only too frequent.

Joel Bailow (1754-1812), born at Redding in Connecticut, studied at Dartmouth and Yale Colleges, and served as a military chaplain during the war of independence. In 1788 lie came to France as agent for a land company, in 1792 published in London a poem entitled The Conspiracy of Kings, spent some years on the Continent in political, literary, and mercantile pursuits, in which lie made a fortune, served as American consul at Algiers, and was appointed ambassador to France in 1811 He died near Cracow when on his way to a conference with Napoleon His Columbiad (1807) is a historical review of events from the time of Columbus to the French Revolution Other works are his intemperate Advice to the Privileged Orders (1791-95) and the would be humorous poem, Hasty Pudding See Todd's Life and Letters of Joel Barlow (1886)

Charles Brockden Brown (1771-1810) was born of Quaker stock in the Quaker city of Philadelphia, yet, bred for law, deliberately chose literature as a profession, and ranks as the first American to make this choice. The French Revolution and Godwin's influence, political and literary, drew him wholly away from Quaker sym pathies, and it was in New York that he wrote Aleuyn (1797) on the rights of women His first novel, Wieland, or Transformation (1798), turned on ventriloquism. In the next three years he produced four more novels—Arthur Mervyn, Ormand, Edgar Huntley, and Clara Howardand secured the proud position lie maintained for twenty years as first of American novelists, until his star paled before Fenimore Cooper's of his early work consisted of tales of terror and horror, morbid and improbable enough, and show ing Godwin's influence all too plainly, but with passages of real intensity and power, and charac teristic touclies all his own He anticipated Cooper in exploiting the forest life of the continent, and patriotic critics have discovered in him suggestions of Poe, of Hawthorne, and even of later Ameri canism His first magazine ran only a year, his second Literary Magazine lived from 1803 till 1805, and the half-yearly American Register was thriving at his death, when he was engaged on a system of geography and a treatise on Rome under the Antonine emperors His last novel, Jane Talbol, had appeared in 1801, and he had written in defence of the Justice of Restrictions on Foreign Commerce His Life by Dunlop (2 vols 1815) was reissued with the seven-volume edition of his novels (1827), there were reprints of his works in 1857 and 1887, and on his life and work, see Prescote's Biographical and Critical Miscellanies

James Kirke Paulding (1779-1860) was born in Dutchess county, New York, and, though strongly drawn to literature, was mainly self-A friend of Washington Irving, he educated wrote part of the wonderfully popular Salma gundi During the war of 1812 he published the Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan, an effective satire, and in 1814 a more serious work, The United States and Lugland, which gained him an appointment on the Board of Naval Commissioners A continuation of Sal magundi by his own pen was a failure. But he produced a very successful romance of old New York, The Dutchman's Fireside (1831), and a Kentuckian story, Westward Hol (1832)-not to speak of a good deal of poetry, a Life of Wash ington (1835), and a defence of Slavery in the United States (1836) In 1837 he became Secre tary of the Navy Even at his best he had been overshadowed by Irving and Cooper, and he is now but little read See his Literary Life by his son (1867), and Grant Wilson's Bryant and his Friends (1886)

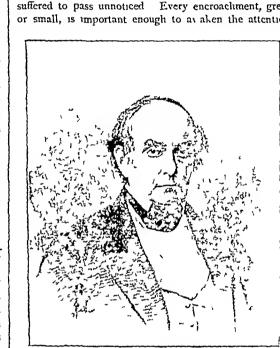

William Ellery Channing (1780 - 1842), preacher and writer, was born at Newport in Rhode Island, graduated at Harvard in 1798, and in 1803 was ordained minister of a Congregational church in Boston, where his sermons were famous for their 'fervour, solemnity, and beauty' He was somewhat of a mystic, held Christ' to be more than man, but was ultimately the leader of the Unitarians, though to the end he shrank from dogmatic definitions and one-sided apprehension of Christian truth In 1821 he was made D D of Harvard for his works on the Christian evidences, his address on war, and his sermons, and next year he visited Europe, and made the acquaintance of Wordsworth and Coleridge Among his Works (6 vols 1841-46) are treatises on national literature, on Milton, on Fénelon, on slavery, and on selfculture It was of him that Coleridge said, 'He has the love of wisdom and the wisdom of love.' His character was as attractive as his eloquence, and almost as influential as the vigour, pure taste, and infectious earnestness of his literary work. He laboured zealously in all good causes, social and philanthropic, and pled for peace, charity, temperance, and the cause of the slaves (though never an extreme abolitionist), and a higher tone in political life. In virtue of his personal influence as well as through his published works, he ranks almost along with Emerson as one of the intel lectual leaders of New England in the early nine teenth century There are Lives of him by his nephew, W H Channing (3 vols 1848, new ed. 1880), by Frothingham (1887), and by the Rev J White Chadwick (1903)

Daniel Webster (1782-1852) was the son of a farmer at Salisbury in New Hampshire, studied at Dartmouth, Salisbury, and Boston, and after eight years at the Bar, was sent to Congress in 1813. From 1816 he was eminent as an advocate in Boston, and as orator became famous by his oration at the Pilgrim Fathers' bicentenary Massachusetts representative in Congress from 1823, he found few rivals there, in 1827 he was transferred to the Senate. He had favoured free trade, but in 1828 he vigorously defended the new protective tariff He was called into Harrison's Cabinet as Secretary of State, and under Tyler negotiated the Ashburton treaty with Great Britain In the Senate in 1845 he helped to avert a war with England over the north west boundary, he opposed the war with Mexico, but though he said that he abhorred shvery, he refused on that score to risk breaking up the Union Careless in money matters, he accepted pecuniary assistance from political friends, but easily repelled a charge of corruption (1866) Under Fillmore he was called to his former post as Secretary of State to settle differences with England, and he was deeply disappointed at not receiving the Whig nomination for the presidency in 1852, the year of his death. At all times he showed too great deference to established institutions, and on the slavery question his conscience but very imperfectly matched his intellect though he thus fell short of the first runk amongst American statesmen, he was unquestionably foremost of American orators His speeches were published in 1851, his Private Correspondence 1857 There are Lives of him by G T Cur (1869), H C Lodge (1884), N Brooks (189 N Hapgood (1899), and S W McCall (1900)

The British Drum-Beat

The question is, therefore, whether, upon the treprinciples of the Constitution, this exercise of power by the President can be justified. Whether the consequence be prejudicial or not, if there be an illegenerise of power, it is to be resisted in the propriation. Even if no harm or inconvenience result from transgressing the boundary, the intrusion is not to of those who are entrusted with the preservation of constitutional government We are not to wait till gre public mischiefs come, till the government is overthrow or liberty itself put into extreme jeopardy Wc shou not be worthy sons of our fathers were we so to regul great questions affecting the general freedom. Tho fathers accomplished the Revolution on a strict question of principle. The Parliament of Great Britain asserte a right to tax the Colonies in all cases whatsoever and it was precisely on this question that they made the Revolution turn The amount of taxation was triffing but the claim itself was inconsistent with liberty, ar that was, in their eyes, enough. It was against the recital of an act of Parliament, rather than against ar suffering under its enactments, that they took up arm They went to war against a preamble. They fough seven years against a declaration They poured or their treasures and their blood like water, in a conte against an assertion which those less sagacious and no so well schooled in the principles of civil liberty woul have regarded as barren phraseology or mere parte of words They saw in the claim of the British Parli

ment a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unju power, they detected it, dragged it forth from under neath its plrusible disguises, struck at it, nor did it elude either their steady eye or their well directed blow till they had extirpated and destroyed it, to the smallest fibre. On this question of principle, while actual suffering was yet afar off, they rused their flag against a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared, a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drum beat, following the sun, and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England (From a Speech in the Senate in May 1834)

Washington Inving

was born in the city of New York on 3rd April 1783, the son of a Presbyterian Scotsman from Shapinshay in Orkney, who claimed descent from William de Irwan, armour bearer of Robert Bruce, his mother, from Falmouth in Cornwill, a woman of a sunny, loving temper, was attached to the Episcopal Church. His education was scanty and desultory His brothers were sent to college, but he showed no inclination to study, being 'a dreamer and a saunterer'-owing doubtless to a hereditary tendency to pulmonary disease was named after the father of the country, from whom as a child he received a personal blessing Whilst at four schools he versified a bit and wrote a play, at sixteen he entered a law-office, at nine teen contributed humorous articles to a paper as 'Jonathan Oldstyle.' Threatened with consump tion, he sailed for Europe, landed at Bordeaux in 1804, and went by Marseilles to Italy, escaping with difficulty from Bonaparte's police, who persisted in regarding him as an English spy Rome he was intoxicated by Italian art, and having met Allston the American printer, was tempted to become an artist. He visited Paris and the Netherlands, and at London saw John Kemble In 1806 he returned to New and Mrs Siddons York in improved health, and was admitted to Those were 'Corinthian days,' and he led a rather idle life, much in society, and greatly admired

His first writing was in the Salmagundi, a semimonthly shect in imitation of the Spectator, con ducted jointly by himself, his brother William, and J K. Paulding It ran for twenty numbers, and then stopped without explanation in the fullness of success. There was considerable ment of a superficial sort in those early attempts, but there was no evidence of serious literary purpose, the papers were apparently written with a view only to social distinction His first characteristic v ork, that by which he will be best remembered, was A History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker, published in 1809 Everybody knows the little man in knee breeches and cocked hat as one of the permanent figures in the gallery of literary portraits The History has a substratum of truth, but is openly a good natured burlesque upon the old Dutch settlers of Minhattan Island. His humour and the gravity which mask it are alike irresistible, it may be doubted if there is in the language a more delightful or more perfectly sustained piece of drollery. Readers of Scott will remember his warm praise of the book, written while 'his sides were sort with laughing'. In the United States it was universally read, and even now it is to the American people as real in its way as the Pilgrim's Progress.

For eight years after this Irving was in partnership with his two elder brothers in a business that had relations on both sides of the Atlantic, but in the end was unsuccessful, and when later he had won his place among authors and was receiving a good income, he supported two of his brothers and five nieces with unselfish devotion In May 1815 he nent to Lurope for the second time, and did not return for seventeen years, in August 1817 he visited Scott at Abbotsford It was in 1818 that the misfortunes of his firm culminated in bank ruptcy, and thereafter he turned his whole atten tion to literature. He declined liberal offers for magazine work, and would undertake nothing that was to interfere with his plans The Shelch Book, of which the first number appeared in New York in 1819, and the last in 1820, was received in the United States with universal delight, its early success in Great Britain was largely due to the powerful support of Scott All the pieces in this miscellany have a certain charm-if for nothing more, for their felicitous touch and purity of style. But the chief interest centres in 'Rip Van Winkle,' 'The Legend of Sleepy Hollow,' and 'Westminster Abbey' The last is one of the most finished descriptive essays of the century, though perhaps a little lacking in simplicity. The two legendary tales are in a way related to the History of New York, and have had a currency and an influence difficult to measure. 'Rip Van Winkle' is a distinct creation of genius, and with its fellow has made the lower reach of the Hudson classic ground, for the first time there had been produced in the United States a literary work on the highest level of contemporary excellence. Bracebridge Hall (1822) fairly maintained but did not raise the author's reputation-' Geoffrey Crayon, Gent,' was already at the summit of favour After a few vears passed on the Continent he published (1824) Tales of a Traveller, a work he thought his best in regard to style, but which some critics think over-refined

In 1826 he went to Spain and began the long and arduous studies which were the foundation of his more important serious works. These were The Life of Columbus (1828), The Conquest of Granada (1829), Vojages of the Companious of Columbus (1831), The Alhambra (1832), Leginds of the Conquest of Spain (1835), Mahonet and his Successors (1850), but the two or three works last named were only sketched or partly written before his return to the United States in 1832 It was Irving who first revealed to English readers the rich stores of Spanish history and romance. and whatever may have been done to correct or expand his narratives, to him must be given the praise of having produced some of the most fascinating books in existence. He had intended to write the history of the conquest of Mexico, for which he had collected materials, but generously, and to his own loss, relinquished his design to Prescott when he learned that the latter proposed to under The sums obtained by Irving for his copyrights in England form an interesting item in literary history Mr Murray gave £200 for the Sketch Book, but afterwards doubled the sum. for Bracebridge Hall he give 1000 guineas, for Columbus, 3000 guineas, and for the Conquest of Granada, £2000 At the end of this sojourn in Sprin, Irving was for a short time secretary to the United States Legation in London On his return to his native city (1832) he was received with great enthusiasm, but he declined political honours, and continued his literary work. After an excursion in the then Far West, he published (1835) A Tour on the Prairies In the same year he issued Recollections of Abbotsford and Newstead Abbes . he was also at work upon the last of the books in the Spanish series. In writing Astoria (1836) he was assisted by his nephew, his future biogripher The Adventures of Captain Bonneville (in the Rocky Mountains) appeared in 1837 biography of Goldsmith was mainly written about this time, though not published until 1849 remodelled for his home an old Dutch house in Tarrytown, New York, near his 'Sleepy Hollow, but his intended retirement to 'Sunnyside' was postponed by his appointment in 1842 as United States minister to Spain. He returned in 1846. and once more set lumself to work. Goldsmith and Mehamet appeared as already mentioned, then, in 1855, Wolfere's Roost, a miscellant His last work was the Life of George Washington (5 vols 1855~ 1859), he died at Sunnyside, 28th November 1859, and in Sleepy Hollow at Tarrytown he lies buried Irving was never married. In his youth he was betrothed to Miss Hoffman, a beautiful girl of eighteen, daughter of the lawyer with whom he pursued his studies, and separated from her by her unumely death, he remained all his life futbful to her memory In all his works there is chival rous deterence and tenderness towards women, he was exceedingly fond of children, and was always beloved by them In his youth he was well made and hand-ome, and then as afterwards, was courted by the best society Tender feeling and ibundant humoir marl his writings he had a quite exceptional power to seize the attention of cultivated readers by his keen observation, his graphic touches of description, and his limpid and musical style. The early books which first page him fine and those which came from his studies in Spain are his best claims to permanent remembrance; his later works would not have given him the high rank he deservedly holds. His was a fortunate and honourable life, and, on the y hole, though inferior in genius to more than one American author, he must be accounted the most successful writer of the New World.

The American in England.

England is as classic ground to an American as Italy is to an Englishman, and old London teems with as much historical association as niighty Rome

But what more especially attracts his notice are those peculiarities which distinguish an old country and an old state of society from a new one. I have never vet grown familiar enough with the crumbling monuments of past ages to blunt the intense interest with which I at first belield them Accustomed always to scenes where history was, in a manner, in anticipation, where everything in art was new and progressive, and pointed to the future rather than the past, where, in short, the works of man gave no ideas but those of young exist ence and prospective improvement—there was something mexpressibly tonehing in the sight of enormous piles of architecture, gray with antiquity and sinking to deery I cannot describe the mute but deep felt enthusiasm with which I have contemplated a vast monastic run like Tintern Abbey, buried in the bosom of a quiet valley, and shut up from the world, as though it had existed merely for itself, or a warrior pile, lil e Conwas Castle, standing in stern loneliness on its rocky height, a mere hollow yet threatening phantom of departed poyer They spread a grand and melancholy, and, to me, an unusual, charm over the landscape. I for the first time beheld signs of national old age and empire's decay, and proofs of the transient and perishing glories of ait, amidst the ever springing and reviving fertility of nature

But, in fact, to me everything was full of matter, the footsteps of history were even where to be traced, and poetry had breathed over and sanctified the land. I experienced the delightful feeling of freshness of a child to whom everything is new I pictured to myself a set of inhabitants and a mode of life for every habitation that I saw, from the aristocratical mansion, amidst the lordly repose of stately groves and solitary parks, to the straw thatched cottage, with its scanty garden and cherished woodbine. I thought I never could be sated with the sweetness and freshness of a country so com pletch carpeted with verdure where every air breathed of the balmy pasture and the honeysuckled hedge continually coming upon some halle document of poetra in the blossomed hawthorn, the daisy, the conship, the prinirose, or some other simple object that his received a supernatural value from the muse. The first time that I heard the song of the nightingale, I was intoxi ented more by the delicious eroald of remembered reso clations than by the inclody of its notes and I shall never forget the thall of costasy with which I first saw the lark rise, almost from beneath ms feet, and using its musical flight up into the morning ski

A Rainy Sunday in an Inn

It was a rain. Sundre in the gloom month of November. I had been de uned in the course of a journey by a shight in hisporition from which I was still fever. It, and was obliged to seemed to fall asleep too, for the wick grew long and black, and cabbaged at the end, and dimmed the little light that remained in the chamber. The gloom that now prevailed was contagious. Around hung the shape less and almost spectral box coats of departed travellers, long since buried in deep sleep. I only heard the ticking of the clock, with the deep-drawn breathings of the sleeping toper, and the drippings of the rain—drop, drop—from the eaves of the house.

Rip Van Winkle's Return.

The appearance of Rip, with his long grizzled beard, his rusty fowling piece, his nncoath dress, and an army of women and children at his heels, soon attracted the attention of the tavern politicians They crowded round him, eyeing him from head to foot with great curiosity The orator hustled up to him, and drawing him partly aside, inquired 'on which side he voted' Rip stared in vacant stupidity Another short but husy little fellow pulled him by the arm, and rising on tiptoe, inquired in his eur, 'whether he was a Federal or Democrat' Rip was equally at a loss to comprehend the question, when a knowing, self important old gentleman, in a sharp cocked hat, made his way through the crowd, putting them to the right and left with his elbows as he passed, and planting himself before Van Winkle, with one arm akimbo, the other resting on his cane, his keen eye and sharp list penetrating, as it were, into his very soul, de manded in an nustere tone, 'what brought him to the election with a gun on his shoulder, and a mob at his heels, and whether he meant to breed a not in the village?' 'Alas' gentlemen,' said Rip, somewhat dis maved, 'I am a poor, quiet man, a native of the place, and a loval subject of the king, God bless him!'

Here a general shout burst from the hystanders—'A tory! a tory! a spy! a refugee! Hustle him! away with him!' It was with great difficulty that the self important man in the cocked hat restored order, and, having assumed a tenfold austenty of brow, demanded again of the unknown culprit what he came there for, and whom he was seeking? The poor man humbly assured him that he meant no harm, but merely came there in search of some of his neighbours, who used to keep about the

'Well, who are they?-name them'

Rip bethought himself a moment, and inquired, 'Where's Nicholas Vedder?'

There was a silence for a while, when an old man replied, in a thin, piping voice, 'Nicholas Vedder' why, he is dead and gone these eighteen years. There was a wooden tombstone in the churchyard, that used to tell all about him, but that's rotten and gone too'

'Where's Brom Dutcher?'

'Oh, he went off to the army in the beginning of the war, some say he was killed at the storming of Stony Point—others say he was drowned in a squall at the foot of Antony's Nose I don't know—he never came back again!

'Where's Van Brummel, the schoolmaster?'

'He went off to the wars too, was a great militia general, and is now in Congress.'

Rip's heart died away at hearing of these sad changes in his home and friends, and finding himself thus alone in the world

Every answer puzzled him, too, by treating of such enormous lapses of time, and of matters which he could not understand war—Congress—Stony Point,—he had no courage to ask after any more friends, but cried out in despair, 'Does nobody here know Rip Van Winkle?'

'Oh, Rip Van Winkle!' exclaimed two or three 'Oh, to be sure! That's Rip Van Winkle yonder, leaning against the tree.'

Rip looked, and beheld a precise counterpart of him self as he went up the mountain apparently as lazy, and certainly as ragged. The poor fellow was now completely confounded. He doubted his own identity, and whether be was himself or another man. In the midst of his bewilderment, the man in the cocked hat demanded who he was and what was his name?

'God knows,' exclaimed he, at his wits' end, 'I'm not myself—I'm somebody else—that's me yonder—no—that's somebody else got into my shoes—I was myself last night, but I fell asleep on the mountain, and they ve changed my gun, and everything's changed, and I'm changed, and I can't tell what's my name or who I am!'

The bystanders now began to look at each other, nod, wink significantly, and tap their fingers against their fore heads. There was a whisper, also, about securing the gun, and keeping the old fellow from doing mischief, at the very suggestion of which the self important man in the cocked hat retired with some precipitation. At this critical moment a fresh, comely woman passed through the throng to get a peep at the gray headed man

She had a chubby child in her arms, which, frightened at his looks, hegan to cry 'Hush, Rip,' cried she, 'hush, you little fool, the old man won't hurt you'. The name of the child, the air of the mother, the tone of her voice, all awakened a train of recollections in his mind.

'What is your name, my good woman?' asked he

'Judith Gardenier'

'And your father's name?'

'Ah, poor man' Rip Van Winkle was his name, but it's twenty years since he went away from home with his gun, and never has been heard of since—his dog came home without him, but whether he shot himself, or was carried away by the Indians, nobody can tell. I was then but a little girl'

Rip had but one more question to ask, but he put it with a faltering voice

'Where's your mother?'

'Oh, she too had died hut a short time since, she broke a blood vessel in a fit of passion at a New England peddler'

There was a drop of comfort, at least, in this intelligence. The honest man could contain himself no longer. He caught his daughter and her child in his arms. 'I am your father!' cried he—'young Rip Van Winkle once—old Rip Van Winkle now!—Does nobody know poor Rip Van Winkle?'

All stood amuzed, until an old woman, tottering out from among the crowd, put her hand to her brow, and pecring under it in his face for a moment, exclaimed, 'Snre enough! it is Rip Van Winkle—it is himself! Welcome home again, old neighbour Why, where have you been these twenty long years?'

Rip's story was soon told, for the whole twenty years had been to him but as one night. The neighbours stared when they beard it some were seen to wink at each other, and put their tongues in their cliecks, and

James Tenimore Cooper (1789-1851) was born at Burlington, New Jersey, son of a Federalist member of Congress, of Quaker descent, but in 1790 the family removed to a property near Otsego Lake, on what was afterwards to be known as Cooperstown, New York, then in a wild frontier region of great natural beauty. Cooper was much influenced in his second home by forest surroundings, red men, traders, and Indian traditions, his sense of mystery and his imagination being strongly stimulated He entered Yale College in 1802, a boy of thirteen, and after remaining there three years, he was dismissed for neglect of his studies and defiance of academic discipline. In 1806 lie shipped as a common sailor in the merchant service, and in 1808 entered the navy as a midshipman He rose to the rank of a lieutenaut, but in 1811 resigned his commission, and married a sister of Bishop De Lancey of New York, a high For ten years he devoted himself to farming and family life, and plunged into authorship somewhat suddenly His first novel, Precaution (1819), was a failure, and the thirty two tales which followed it were of extremely unequal Among those which had exceptional merit and signal success may be named The Spi (1821), The Pilot (1823), The Last of the Molucans (1826), The Prairie (1826), The Red Rover (1831), The Brazo (1831), The Pathfinder (1840), The Decestayer (1841), The Two Admirals (1842), Wing and-Wing (1842), and Satansto. (1845) His other writings include a meritorious Naval History of the United States (1839, abridged edition, 1841), and Lives of Distinguished American Naval Officers (1846) His novels, upon the whole, and in spite of conspicuous faults, well deserve all the favour they received, the sea-tales and stories of frontier life being out of sight his best. His de scriptive talent was as vet unequalled in America, and some of his characters, such as 'Natty Bumppo,' Long Fom Coffin, 'Harvey Birch,' Uncas,' Chingreligook,' and especially 'Leather-Stocking,' are drawn with extraordinary vigour and vividness From the beginning of his literary career he was greeted as proving that an American had done work which might almost be compared with that of 'the author of Waverley' The peace of mans of the later years of his life was much disturbed by literary and newspaper controversies and actions for libel-usually against Horace Greeley and other Whig editors, for he was often denounced as a for, and aristocrat, and in nearly all of them he was successful. He conducted his own lawsuits, and usually pleaded his cases with admirable tact One good result of these suits was to impose upon the newspaper press of America some degree of restraint from the scandalously swage and virulent freedom of speech which had till then prevaled. On either side of the Maitic Coopers own sevents of language won him no entall amount of personal unpopularity, act no high regard for the nobler side of the English character, and his appreciation of the grand achievements of British history, found frequent expression in his writings. These writings, other than the best of his novels, contained much to exite opposition, and they brought upon him, not altogether undeservedly, the reputation of being a proud, contentious, and somewhat wrong-headed man, yet there was in his real character much sweetness, great strength and dignity, and unqualified honesty. He was excessively proud, no doubt, but his pride was without vanity, his faults were those of temper and judgment rather than of character.

When Cooper is treated—as he still often is, even in Anicrica-mainly as a writer of boys' books, he has an injustice done him. He wrote too much, many of his men are as contentional as his women usually are, his conversations are stilted, his style is careless, and his prejudices are constantly aired. But he had a very true and very great gift as a story-teller, he was the first to take the virgin forest and the prairie into the domain of fiction, and he wrote the prose epic of the planting of his country. Modern ethnologists do not sneer, as it was once the fishion to do, at his Indians as mere creations of the faircy Some of his characters are perminent additions to literature, and his power is best felt when he is compared with his predecessor, Brockden Brown 'He belongs emphatically to the American nation,' as Washington Irving said, and his painting of nature under new aspects gave him a name that will never die

By Lake Otsego

On all sides, wherever the eve turned, nothing met it but the mirror life surface of the lake, the placed view of heaven, and the dense setting of voods. So rich and fluery were the outlines of the forest that scarce an opening could be seen, the whole visible earth, from the rounded mountain top to the water's edge, presenting one unvaried line of unbrolen verdure As if regulation were not satisfied with a friumph so complete, the trees overhung the like itself, shooting out towards the light and there were nitles along its eastern shore where a boat might have pulled beneath the branches of dark Kembrandt looking hemlocks, quivering aspens, and melancholy pines. In a ord, the hand of nian had never yet defreed or deformed any part of this mative scene, which lay bathed in the sunlight, a glorious picture of affluent forest grandeur, saftened by the balminess of June, and relieved by the beautiful variety afforded by the presence of so broad an expan e of water

It fell into a trough of the sea, and in a few moments more its fragments were ground into splinters on the adjoining rocks. The eockswain [10m] still remained where he had cast off the rope, and beheld the numerous heads and arms that appeared rising, at short intervals, on the waves, some making powerful and well directed efforts to gain the sands, that were becoming visible as the tide fell, and others wildly tossed, in the frantic movements of helpless despuir The honest old scaman give a ery of joy as he saw Barnstable [the commander, whom I om had forced into the boat] issue from the surf, where one by one several seamen soon appeared also, dripping and exhausted Many others of the crew were carried in a similar manner to places of safety, though, as Tom returned to his sext on the bowsprit, he could not conceal from his reluctint eyes the lifeless forms that were, in other spots, driven against the rocl's with a fury that soon left them but few of the outward vestiges of humanity

Dillon and the cockswam were now the sole occupants of their dreadful station. The former stood in a kind of stupid despur, a witness of the scene, but as his curdled blood began again to flow more warmly to his heart, he crept close to the side of Tom, with that sort of selfish feeling that makes even hopeless misery more tolerable, when endured in participation with another

'When the tide falls,' he said in a voice that betraved the agony of fear, though his words expressed the renewal of hope, 'we shall be able to walk to land'

'There was One, and only One, to whose feet the waters were the same as a dry deck,' returned the cocl swain, 'and none but such as have His power will ever be able to walk from these rocks to the sands'. The old scaman paused, and turning his eyes, which exhibited a mingled expression of disgust and compassion, on his companion, he added with reverence 'Had you thought more of Him in fair weather, your case would be less to be pitted in this tempest'

'Do you still think there is much danger?' asked Dillon

'To them that have reason to fear death. Listen! Do you hear that hollow noise beneath ye?'

"Tis the wind driving by the vessel 1"

"Is the poor thing herself," said the affected cock swain, 'giving her last groans. The water is breaking up her decks, and in a few mututes more, the hand somest model that ever cut a wave will be like the chips that fell from her in framing 1.

'Why, then, did you remain here?' eried Dillon wildly 'To die in my coffin, if it should be the will of God,' returned Fom 'These waves are to me what the land is to you, I was born on them, and I have always meant that they should be my grave'

'But 1-I,' shricked Dillon-'I am not ready to die '-I cannot die l-I will not die t'

Poor wretch!' muttered his companion, 'you must go like the rest of us when the death watch is called, none can skull from the nuster'

I can swim,' Dillon continued, rushing with frantic cagerness to the side of the wreck. 'Is there no billet of wood, no rope, that I can talle with me?'

'None, everything has been cut away, or earned off by the sea. If we are about to strive for your life, take with we a stout heart and a clean conscience, and trust the rest to God'

'God' echoed Dillon, in the madness of his frenzy,
'I I now no God! there is no God that knows me!'

'Peace' said the deep tones of the cockswin, in a voice that seemed to speak in the elements, 'blasphemer, peace'

The heavy grouning produced by the water in the timbers of the Iricl, at that moment added its impulse to the raging feelings of Dillon, and he cast himself headlong into the sea. The water thrown by the rolling of the surf on the heach was necessarily returned to the ocean, in eddies, in different places favourable to such an action of the element. Into the edge of one of these counter currents, that was produced by the very rocks on which the schooner lay, and which the watermen call the 'under tow,' Dillon had unknowingly thrown his person, and when the waves had driven him a short distance from the wreck, he was met by a stream that his most desperate efforts could not overcome. He was a light and powerful swimmer, and the struggle was hard and protracted With the shore immediately before his eyes, and at no great distance, he was led, as by a false phantom, to continue his efforts, although they did not advance him a foot The old seaman, who at first had watched his motions with careless indifference, understood the danger of his situation at a glance, and, forgetful of his own fite, he shouted aloud, in a voice that was driven over the struggling victim to the ears of his shipmates on the sands 'Sheer to port, and clear the under tow! Sheer to the southward 1'

Dillon heard the sounds, but his faculties were too much obscured by terror to distinguish their object, he, however, blindly yielded to the call, and gradually changed his direction until his face was once more turned towards the vessel. Tom looked around him for a rope, but all had gone over with the spars, or been swept away by the waves. At this moment of disappointment his eyes met those of the desperate Dillon. Calm and inured to horrors as was the veteran seaman, he involuntarily passed his hand before his brow to exclude the look of despair he encountered, and when, a moment after wards, he removed the rigid member, he beheld the sinking form of the victim as it gradually settled in the ocean, still struggling with regular but impotent strokes of the arms and feet to gain the wreck, and to preserve an existence that had been so much abused in its hour of allotted probation 'He will soon meet his God, and learn that his God knows him!' minimized the cockswain to himself. As he yet spoke, the wreck of the Arad yielded to an overwhelming sea, and after a universal shudder, her timbers and planks gave way, and were swept towards the cliffs, bearing the body of the simple hearted cockswain among the ruins. Loansbury s Life of Fenimore Cooper (1832) is the standard one, and contains a full hibliography, there is also a book on him by Clymer (1901).

Billiam Gilmore Simms (1806-70), the first notable man of letters in the Southern States, was born at Charleston in South Carolina, and had been both druggist and law-student when in 1828 he became editor of the City Gazette His first poetic venture, Lyrical and other Poems (1827), was followed by The Vision of Cortes (1829), The Tricolour (1830), and Atalantis (1832), but his poetry is almost uniformly mediocre, though Southern Passages and Pictures (1839) contains some good verse. - His essays, dramas, histories, and biographies are unimportant, he was a vigorous and successful journalist. But it is as novelist, the most capable of Fenimore Cooper's successors and imitators, that he has earned his place in literary history Martin Faber (1833), somewhat on Brockden Brown's lines, attracted notice Rivers (1834) was a tale of life in the Georgia The Yemassee (1835), dealing with Indians in colonial days, is an advance on these, and though it too plainly shows Cooper's influence, is usually accounted Simms's greatest work. Partisan (1835), The Scout, Woodcraft, and Eutaw (1856) are the most notable of a series dealing with adventure and warfare in the South during the revolutionary wars Richard Hurdis, Border Beagles, Helen Halsey, and Charlemont continued the Border series begun by Guy Rivers Pelajo, Count Julian, The Damsel of Darien, Vasconselos, are too ambitious historical novels on times and regions to which Simms could not do justice. Carl Werner, Castle Dismal, and Marie de Beimere are domestic novels, The Wigwam and the Cabin is a collection of short tales The Cassique of Kiawah (1860) would have been one of his triumphs but for the excitements of the Civil War, on which Simms wrote zealously as a fervid Southerner During the war he was ruined and his library was burnt, he never retrieved his losses or regained his eminence in the public viewfor 'at the North' his vehement partisanship had made him unpopular In his life he had founded or conducted some half-dozen literary serials, and to them and other periodicals he contributed largely, he did much hack-work on a vast variety of subjects, and he was highly thought of as lecturer and orator The illustrated edition of his works (1882-86) fills seventeen volumes See Lives by Cable (1888) and Professor Trent (1892)

Richard Henry Dana (1787-1879) was born at Cambridge, Massachusetts, educated at Hurvard, and admitted to the Bar at Boston in 1811 In 1818 he became associate editor of the North American Review, to which he contributed largely His Dying Raven (1821), The Buccaneer (1827), and some others of his poems were warmly praised by critics, but his best work was in criticism

His son, Richard Henry Dann (1815-82), graduated at Harvard in 1837, but during a break in his college career, occasioned in part by an affection of the eyes, he had shipped as a common sailor, and made a vojage round Cape Horn to California and back. This vojage he described in Two Years before the Mast (1840), on the whole, perhaps, the best book of its kind, in 1840 he was admitted to the Massachusetts Bar, and was especially distinguished in maritime law Among his works are The Seaman's Friend (1841) and To Cuba and Back (1859) He also edited Wheaton's International Law, and was a prominent Free-soiler and Republican There is a Life of him by Adams (2 vols 1890)

Joseph Rodman Drake (1795-1820), associated with Fitz Greene Halleck in The Croaker Papers, was born in New York city, and bred to medicine, but died of consumption in his twenty-sixth year. His most considerable poem, 'The Culprit Fay,' was written to show that American rivers also had just claims to the glories of fancy and romance. 'The American Flag' is even better known. The volume containing The Culprit Fay, and other Poems was first published in 1835, and has been repeatedly reprinted.

William Cullen Bryant (1794–1878), long the patriarch of American poets, was born of good New England stock at Cummington in Wassichusetts, his father being a distinguished medical practitioner, who sat in the State legislature, and his name commemorates the doctor's reverence for the great Edinburgh physician, William Cullen, then recently dead The precocious boy, keenly interested in literature, was trained to admire the poetry of Pope, and early encouraged to unitate him, the most noted fruit of these ittempts being a sature, The Limbargo, or Statches of the Times (1807)—a singular production for a youth of thirteen In 1810 he entered Williams College, but, the family finances being strutened, he after two sessions resumed his studies at home, and formed himself by loving study of his favourite poets (amongst them Blan and Kirke White, Couper and Campbell), while watching with a keen eye the quiet life of nature as he rimbled His quickened in igination among the woods found expression in the sonorous blank verse of Thanatopsis, which, published in the North Ameri can Review for September 1817 (though partly written as early as 1811), was unanimously greeted as having in it more of real poetry than anything hitherto written by an American It has been described as the culmination of the poetry of the churchyard school Meantime Bryant liad studied law, had been admitted to the Bar, and had settled at Great Barrington Invited to con tribute further to the Review, he sent both verse and prose, among the former 'Lines to a Water fowl,' and among the latter a criticism on Ameri can poetry. In 1821 he delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Harvird a patriotic poem on 'The Ages' in Spenserian verse. In the same year he was married to Miss I rances Pairchild, who inspired his poem 'O Fairest of the Rural Maids' In this year, too, he lost his father, to whom he paid a tribute in his 'Hymn to Death' Other noted poems of this time are 'The Rivulet,' 'The West Wind, 'Green River,' 'The Forest Hymn,' and 'June,' which were published in Boston periodicals. In 1825 the poet was induced by his friends to remove to New York to become editor of the New Yorl Review, and when it failed a year later, he was made assistant editor of the Evining Post In 1829 he had become editor-in chief, and by his various gifts of mind and character, by his dignity and high principle, did much to raise the tone of the daily press A collection of his poems was published in 1832, and, on its republication in England through Washington Irving, and with his warm commendation, received favourable notice from Blackwood's Magazine Bryant was now, however, absorbed in journalism. His paper was democratic in politics, but when the slavery question became prominent it inclined to the anti-slavery side, and in 1856 it assisted in forming the Republican party He was often called upon to make public addresses, and of these a volume was published in 1873. visits to Europe, the West Indics, and many parts of the United States gave occasion for several series of letters to his paper (republished in three volunies) Meantime his poems had tal en posses sion of the hearts of his countrymen, and several editions were issued, some of them finely illus-In his old age, when editorial duties were less absorbing, he again found time and temper for His later verse is strikingly similar in tone and manner to that of his wouth, sometimes, as in 'Robert of Lincoln' and 'The Planting of an Apple tree, he seemed to reach a higher level At seventy-two he commenced than of old translations of the Iliad and Odyssij in English blank verse, which proved as inadequate as those of many greater men before him. Almost his last poem was The Flood of Years, a worthy counterpart to Tharatopsis In May 1878 Bryant de Inered an eloquent address at the unveiling of a bust of Mazzini in the Central Parl of New Yorl, and as he was afterwards entering a house he fell on the doorstep, receiving injuries of which he died a fortnight later

Historically the earliest of the true poets of America, Bryant justly ranks amongst the great writers of his country. His poetry, though lack ing in fire and power and the essentially lyncal note, has in it a true vein of tenderness and sym pathy, and much restrained dignity, reflectiveness, and patriotic love of liberty, upon the whole more closely akin in temper to the work of Gray and Cowper than of contemporary English poets, it too often tends to be commonplace. The secret of its popularity was perhaps more its moral than its poetic attractiveness. Bryant deals lindly with the nobler side of the Red Indian, and he is hardly equalled in his descriptions of the larger aspects of American scenery. Most of his poems are short, and his verse forms are not very varied -he is most at home in blank verse 'The Death of the Flowers,' 'The Fringed Gentian,' 'The Crowded Street,' 'Oh, Mother of a Mighty Race,' 'Our Country's Call,' and 'The Battlefield' are He lind others of his most memorable poems little more than a nominal share in Braant and Gry's Popular History of the United States (1876-1880), and his books of travel, addresses and essays are little read

An Indian at the Burying-place of his Fathers.

It is the spot I came to seek—
My fathers' ancient burnl place,
Ere from these vales, ashamed and weak Withdrew our wasted race
It is the spot—I know it well—
Of which our old traditions tell.
For here the upland bank sends out
A ridge toward the river side,
I know the shaggy hills about,
The meadows smooth and wide,
The plans that, toward the eastern sky,

Fenced east and west by mountains he

A white man, gazing on the scene,
Would say a lovely spot was here,
And praise the lawns, so fresh and green,
Between the hills so sheer
I like it not—I would the plain
Lay in its tall old groves again.

The sheep are on the slopes around,
The cattle in the meadows feed,
And labourers turn the crumbling ground,
Or drop the yellow seed,
And prancing steeds, in trappings gay,
Whiri the bright chariot o'er the way

Methinks it were a nobler sight
To see these vales in woods arrayed,
Their summits in the golden light,
Their trunks in grateful shade,
And herds of deer, that bounding go
O'er rills and prostrate trees below

And then to mark the lord of all,

The forest hero, trained to wars,
Quivered and plumed, and lithe and tall,
And seamed with glorious scars,
Wall forth, amid his train, to dare
The wolf, and grapple with the bear

This bank, in which the dead were laid,
Was sacred v hen its soil was ours,
Hither the artless Indian maid Brought wreaths of beads and flowers,
And the gray chief and gifted seer Worshipped the God of thunders here.

But now the wheat is green and high
On clods that hid the varrior's breast,
And scattered in the furrows lie
The weapons of his rest,
And there, in the loose sand, is thrown
Of his large arm the mouldering bone

Ah, little thought the strong and brave,
Who bore their lifeless chieftain forth,
Or the voung wife that weeping gave Her first born to the earth,
That the pale race, who waste us now,
Among their bones should guide the plough!

They waste us—ay, like April snow
In the warm noon, we shrink away,
And fast they follow, as we go Toward the setting day—Till they shall fill the land, and we Are driven into the western sea.

But I behold a fearful sign,

To which the white men's eyes are blind,
Their race may vanish hence, like mine,
And leave no trace behind,
Save ruins o'er the region spread,
And the white stones above the dead

Before these fields were shorn and tilled, Full to the brim our rivers flowed,
The melody of waters filled
The fresh and boundless wood,
And torrents dashed, and rivulets played,
And fountains spouted in the shade.

Those grateful sounds are heard no more
The springs are silent in the sun,
The rivers, by the blackened shore,
With lessening current run,
The realm our tribes are crushed to get.
May be a barren desert yet!

Let not to thy eternal resting place Shalt thou retire alone, nor couldst thou wish Couch more magnificent Thou shalt he down With patriarchs of the infant world-with kings, The powerful of the earth, the wise, the good, Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past, All in one mights sepulchre The hills Rock ribbed and ancient as the sun-the vales Stretching in pensive quietness between, The venerable woods, rivers that move In majesty, and the complaining brooks That make the meadows green, and, poured round all Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste-Are but the solemn decorations all Of the great tonib of man The golden sun, The planets, all the infinite host of lierven, Are shining on the sad abodes of death, Through the still lapse of ages All that tread The globe are but a handful to the tribes That slumber in its bosom Take the vings Of morning, pierce the Barcan wilderness, Or lose thyself in the continuous woods Where rolls the Oregon, and hears no sound Save his own dashings-jet the dead are there, And millions in those solitudes, since first The flight of years began, have laid them down In their last sleep—the dead reign there alone. So shalt thou rest, and what if thou withdraw In silence from the living and no friend Take note of thy departure! All that breathe Will share thy destiny The gay will laugh When thou art gone, the solemn brood of care Plod on, and each one as before will chase His favourite phantom, yet all these shall leave Their mirth and their employments, and shall come And male their bed with thee As the long train Of ages glide away, the sons of men-The youth in life's green spring, and be who goes In the full strength of years, matron, and maid, And the sweet babe, and the gray headed man-Shall one by one be gathered to thy side, By those who in their turn shall follow them

So live that when thy summons comes to join The innumerable caravan that moves To that mysterious realm, where each shall take His chamber in the silent halls of death, Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night, Scourged to his dungeon, but, sustained and soothed By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave Like one who wrips the dripery of his couch About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

From 'The Death of the Flowers'

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year, Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sere Heaped in the hollows of the grove, the autumn leaves he dead,

They rustle to the eddying gust, and to the rabbit's tread,

The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrubs the iav.

And from the wood top calls the crow through all the gloomy day

Where are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprang and stood

In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?

Alas' they all are in their graves, the gentle race of flowers

Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fur and good of ours.

The rain is falling where they lie, but the cold Novem ber rain

Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones

From 'The Battlefield.'

Once this soft turf, this rivulet's sands, Were trampled by a hurrying erowd, And fiery hearts and armed hands Encountered in the battle cloud

Ah ' never shall the land forget

How gushed the life blood of her brave—
Gushed, warm with hope and courage yet,

Upon the soil they fought to save

Now all is calm, and fresh, and still,
Alone the chirp of flitting bird,
And talk of children on the hull,
And bell of wandering kine, are heard.

No solemn host goes trailing by
The black mouthed gun and staggering wain,
Men start not at the battle cry,
Oh, be it never heard again!

Soon rested those who fought, but thou Who minglest in the harder strife For truths which men receive not now, Thy warfare only ends with life.

Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again, Th' eternal years of God are hers, But Error, wounded, writhes in pain, And dies among his worshippers

Yea, though thou lie upon the dust,
When they who helped thee flee in fear,
Die full of hope and manly trust,
Like those who fell in battle here.

Another hand thy sword shall wield,
Another hand the standard wave,
Till from the trumpet's mouth is pealed
The blast of triumph o'er thy grave.

His son in law Parke Godwin, published Bryant's Life and Works in six volumes in 1883-84 the short Life in the 'American Men of Letters Series (1890) is by John Bigelow, and see also Wilson's Bryant and his Friends (1883) and Stedman's Poets of America

George Bancroft (1800-91), born in Worcester, Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard with high honours in 1817, and studied for two years at Göttingen in Germany He lived for a time in Berlin, visited Weimar, and went home tinctured with the new spirit of the world he had moved in-for he had seen and read, talked to or corresponded, with Goethe and Humboldt, Hegel and Schleiermacher, Heeren and Niebuhr For a year he was Greek tutor in Harvard, and in 1823 he and a fellow-tutor established the Round Hill School at Northampton, Massachusetts, with which he was associated until 1830. During these years he published a volume of poems, and made translations from the German of the minor poems of Goethe, Schiller, and others, and of some of the historico political works of Heeren In 1834 appeared the first volume of his History of the United States from the Discovery of the Continent, followed by the second and third volumes in 1837 Between 1852 and 1860 came the five and 1840 volumes narrating the history of the colonial period to the Declaration of Independence, and in 1866 and 1874 respectively the two concluding volumes, bringing the history to the treaty of peace with the mother-country in 1782 The History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States (2 vols 1882) afterwards formed a constituent part of the revised edition of the complete History of the United States (6 vols 1882-84)

Bancroft in early life was a Democrat. He served as collector of the port of Boston (1838-41), under President Van Buren, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the governorship of Massachusetts in He accepted a seat in the Cabinet of Presi dent Polk as Secretary of the Navy in 1845, and the following year was appointed minister to the court of St James, a position he filled with credit until 1849 Oxford made him D C L, and he was J U D of Bonn In the Civil War he was heartily in necord with the national Government, and in 1867 he was appointed by President Johnson minister to Berlin, serving with distinguished ability until recalled in 1874 at his own request. In his later years he In ed at Washington, contributing occasional articles to magazines. His history, it has been said, is not a history of the United States -it ends just where the history of the States as a nation begins, and it was calculated that to complete the history on the same scale would require seventy or eighty volumes Besides his copus magnum, he had written on the progress of the human race, addresses on Jackson and Lincoln, and a book on Van Buren The solidity of his work as historian, his acumen, insight, and common-sense, are more remarkable than his method of presentation-his style is laboured and often heavy, his rhetoric crude and tedious, and his generalisations somewhat too 'philosophical' and too discursive. But he faithfully followed a high ideal of the historian's responsibility, and in his day of popularity-now past-did much to cherish in America an ennobling conception of the national destiny

Boston in 1770

The king set himself, and his ministry, and parliarient, and all Great Britain, to suldue to his will one stubborn hitle town on the sterile coast of the Massachusetts Bry The odds against it were fearful, but it showed a life inextinguishable, and had been chosen to keep guard over the liberties of mankind.

The Old World had not its parallel. It counted about sixteen thousand inhabitants of European origin, all of whom learned to read and write. Good public schools were the foundation of its political system, and Benjamin Franklin, one of their grateful pupils, in his youth apprenticed to the art which makes knowledge the common property of maikind, had gone forth from them to stand before the nations as the representative of the modern plebeian class.

As its schools were for all its children, so the great body of its male inhabitants of twenty one years of age, when assembled in a hall which Fancuil, of Huguenot ancestry, had built for them, was the source of all muni cipal authority In the meeting of the town, its taxes were voted, its affairs discussed and settled, its agents and public servants annually elected by ballot, and abstract political principles freely debated A small pro perty qualification was attached to the right of suffrage, but did not exclude enough to change the character of the institution There had never existed a considerable municipality approaching so nearly to a pure democracy, and, for so populous a place, it was undoubtedly the most orderly and best governed in the world

Its ecclesistical polity was in like manner republican The great mass were Congregationalists, each church was an assembly formed by voluntary agreement, self constituted, self supported, and independent. They were clear that no person or church land power over another There was not a Roman Catholic altar in the place, the usages of 'papists' were looked upon as worn out superstitions, fit only for the ignorant But the people were not merely the fiercest enemies of 'popery and slavery,' they were Protestants even against Protestantism, and though the English Church was tolerated, Boston kept up its exasperation against Its ministers were still its propliets and its guides, its pulpit, in which, now that Mayhen was no more, Cooper was admired above all others for eloquence and patriotism, by weekly appeals inflamed alike the fervour of piets and of liberty. In the Beston Gazette, it enjoyed a free press, which gave currency to its conclusions on the natural right of man to self government

Its citizens were inquisitive, seeking to know the causes of things, and to search for the reason of existing institutions in the laws of nature. Yet they controlled their speculative turn by practical judgment, exhibiting the seeming controdiction of susceptibility to enthusiasm and calculating shrewdness. They were fond of gain, and adventurous, penetrating, and keen in their pursuit of it, yet their avidity was tempered by a well considered and continuing liberality. Nearly every man was struggling to make his own way in the world and

There are books on Bancroft and his historical work by Rives (1867) Green (1891) Wallis (1896) and West (1900) Professor Frent in his Americ in Literature (1903) 1 perhaps somewhat 100 severe on his defects as a historical writer

Amos Bronson Alcott (1799-1888) was the son of a farmer at Wolcott in Connecticut, and began life for himself as a pedlar in the southern In 1828 he established a school in Boston on highly reformed methods, which, laudable and psychologically sound as many of them were, pro voked so much opposition that erelong the school had to be dropped, and the transcendental (and somewhat nebulous) philosopher sought to propagate his original views on education, theology, social economics, and vegetarianism by lectures, for which his attractive personality secured attention if not much pecuniary success. A scheme to establish a community on an estate bought by a friend of his near Boston failed utterly, and he spent his later years largely as a peripatetie philosopher He contributed to the Transcen dental Dial, and published Tablets (from his diary), Concord Days, a collection of sonnets and canzonets, and an essay on Emerson

His daughter, Louisa Way Alcott (1832–88), born at Germantown in Pennsylvania, became a teacher somewhat on her father's lines, but wrote for the magazines, and published in 1855 Flower Fables. During the Civil War she served as nurse, and sent to a newspaper what were afterwards made into a book as Hospital Sketches. But it was her Little Women (1868–69), for children, that made her famous, and this, her chef d'auvre, she never equalled either in her Old-fashioned Girl, Little Men, and Jo's Boys (all 'juveniles'), or in her novels, Moods (1863) and Work (1873). Yet in all her writings (nearly thirty publications) there is an attractive strain of optimistic hope and faith in human nature and democratic freedom

Lydia Huntley Sigourney (1791-1865), the daughter of Ezekiel Huntley, a soldier of the revolutionary war, was born at Norwich in Connecticut, was well educated there and at Hartford, and, under her maiden name of Lydia Huntley, for five years taught a class of ladies in Hartford 1815 she published a volume of eminently Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse, and in 1819 she married Charles Sigourney, a Hartford merchant descriptive poem in blank verse on the Traits of the Aborigines of America (1822), and her Sletch of Connecticut Forty Years Since (1824), were followed by Pocahontas and other Poems, Lays of the Heart, Tales in Prose and Verse, and Letters to Young Ladies and to Mothers In 1840 she visited Europe, and on her return wrote her Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands A pureminded and lovable woman, an appallingly copious and oppressively sentimental writer of verse, she was a constant contributor of ballads, descriptive poems, epithalamiums, elegies, and occasional verses to inagazines and periodicals But her English prototype is hardly flattered when Mrs Sigourney is called 'the American Hemans' See her autobiographical—and not a little significant— Letters of Life (New York, 1866)

Lydia Maria Child (1802-80), born in Medford, Massachusetts, published her first novel, Hobomok, under her maiden name of Lydia Maria Francis, in 1821, and her second, The Rebels, a story of Boston before the Revolution, in 1822 1828 slie married David Lee Child (1794-1874), a journalist, with whom she edited the Anti Slavery Standard in New York in 1843-44. Her works, nearly thirty in number, include novels, the best of them relating to early New England history, stories for children, a biography or two, and an ambitious but rather inaccurate work on the history of religion (1855) Philothea (1836), sometimes described as her masterpiece, is an ambitious tale of the days of Pencles Her popularity died before her See her Letters (1882) and Higginson's Contemporaries (1899)

Sarah Margaret Fuller (1810-50), for the last three years of her life the Marchesa Ossoli, was the daughter of a Massachusetts lawyer and politician living at Cambridgeport, and by her father and other preceptors was injudiciously on couraged so to labour in all the branches of a liberal education that before she was well in her teens her health was permanently injured by the continued strain. After her father's death in 1835 she supported her seven brothers and sisters (she was the eldest child) both by private teaching and by school work in Boston and Providence Ere this she was familiar with what was best not merely in English but in French, Spanish, and Italian literature, and under the influence of Korner and Novalis, Goethe and Schiller, was one of the pioneers of New England Transcendentalism -that vigorous reaction as well against time honoured Puritan prejudices and humdrum orthodoxy as against eighteenth century philistinism and materialistic utilitarianism Sarah Fuller shared to the full in the vague idealism, pantheism, mysti cism, of the new movement, whose most conspicuous representatives were George Ripley and Theodore Parker, as also in its pedantic, paradoxical, and extravagant elements But though she was a frequent and welcome guest at Brook Farm, she did not cherish its communistic enthusiasms Emerson, Hawthorne, and Channing were her most intimate friends, and it was she who conducted the Transcendental organ The Dial (1840-42) She translated Eckermann's Conversations with Goithe and other notable German books, and she conducted a novel kind of conversation classes for ladies, comprising discussions of social and philosophical problems, in which some have sought the origin of the New England woman's rights movement. She was not prepossessing in face, figure, or manner, was somewhat obviously self conscious, though perfectly lady-like, but was gifted with a quiet exceptional power of conciliating sympathy, and in her talk and writing was rather clever and eccentric than really original or profound In 1844* she published her first volume, Summer on the Lakes, a record of a season's travel In the same year she went to New York as literary critic of the Tribune, and to that paper contributed a series of miscellaneous articles, republished as Papers on Literature and Art (1846) Having gone to Europe in 1846, at Rome she met the Marquis Giovanni Angelo Ossoli, a friend of Mazzini's, to whom she was married at the end of 1847. In 1849, during the siege of Rome, she, it Mazzini's request, took charge of a hospital, while her hus band fought on the walls, and after the capture of the city by the French she and her husband took refuge in the mountains of the Abruzzi, and then in Florence, till in May 1850 they could sail with their infant for America From the beginning the The captain of voyage was tragically disastrous the ship died of smallpox, and the Ossolis' child fell ill of the same disease. Finally, when the miserable voyage was all but over, on the 16th of Jul, the vessel was wrecked on Fire Island near New York, the child's body was washed ashore, but nothing was ever seen of mother or father Her Autobiography, with additional memoirs by Emerson, Clarke, and Channing, appeared in 1852 (nev ed 1884); there are also Lives by her brother A. B Fuller (1855), by Julia Ward Hove (1883), who also edited her love letters in 1903, and by T W Higginson (1884)

the most original and influential writer that America has yet produced, vas born in Boston, Massachusetts, on the 25th of Way 1803. flie centennial commemorations which in 1903 were celebrated throughout the United States, and in Great Britain as well, testify to the depth and extent of the influence which has been everted by this free thinking idealist and seer. Contemporary vith Carlyle, who accepted very much as a matter of course the homage which the distant New Englander paid to his genius, Emerson was from the first not less independent and self-centred than the iconoclastic Scotsman whom, expecting to find a master, he visited at Craigerputtock in 1833, and with whom, from that time, he maintained an affectionate, lifelong friendship. This friend ship was never disturbed either by opposition of views or b contrariety of character, for beneath their diversities, great as they were, each undoubtedly recognised in the other a fundamental love of truth, justice, and righteousness

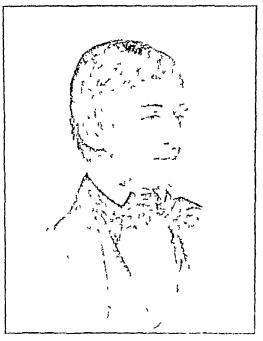

Emerson came of a family distinguished by a long succession of clergymen and college graduites His father, the Rev William Emerson, graduated at Harvard College in 1789, and at the time of Ralph Waldo's birth he was minister of the First Church in Boston He died in 1811, leaving a widow and six children, all under ten years of age, with but scanty means of support. But Mrs. Emerson was courageous and capable, and slie eked out her resources by taking boarders, her sons helping her with the house worl- It was the mother's ambition to have her boys educated, and her fond hope to see at least some of them ministers They were accordingly sent regularly to school, and at home, in the spare time which remained after doing the household chores, they were encouraged to read standard works of poetry, history, and oratory In this educational work and stimulus the mother was greatly aided by her sister in-law, Viss Mary Emerson, for whom Ralph Waldo entertained the greatest affection and vene-'She must always occupy a saint's place,' he wrote long afterwards, 'in my household, and I have no hour of poetry or philosophy since I knew these things, into which she does not enter as a genius' This early life of poverty, tempered with the delights of Plato and Plutarch, Shakespeare and Milton, Addison and Pope, Rollin and Robertson, left an meffaceable impress upon Ralph Waldo Emerson, and some of the descriptive passages of his essay on 'Domestic Life' are a reminiscence and biography of those days, though the form is strictly impersonal and objective.

The box was at a private school before he was three years of age, and at eleven he entered the Latin School. He was soon turning Virgil into readable English verse, he liked Greek and lustory, and he developed a considerable facility for rhyming. In 1817 he entered Harvard College, which, considering both the age of the students and the subjects of the curriculum, was then little more than a boys' school. Emerson did not in any way distinguish himself in college, and in mathematics he utterly failed, but to the more serious members of his class he was known as a studious reader and lover of the best literature.

After graduation lie taught school for a few years, but that profession was exceedingly irksome to lum, and nothing but the compensation it afforded would have kept him at the work. Already, too, he had looked forward to the ministry as the natural field for his life work, though now with less enthusiasin than when in boyish days he dreamt of drawing men to religion by the spell of his ortion Yet speculative difficulties (which, indeed, he always quietly shelved) did not bar his way to the pulpit, as happened with his elder brother, William, who turned to law Emerson began studying for the ministry, attend ing some lectures at the Divinity School at Cambridge, but on account of poor health not enrolling in the regular course. In 1826 lie was 'appro bated to preach' by the Middlesev Association of Ministers, and, after a winter in the South in search of health, he was in March 1829 ordained as colleague of the Rev Henry Ware, minister of the Second Church in Boston On the resignation of Mr Ware shortly afterwards, Emerson became sole pastor of this important church But he was not destined to remain a clergyman summer of 1832 he resigned his pastorate and, as it turned out, terminated his career as a settled minister, though he continued to exercise the function of preaching as late as 1847

The immediate occasion of this action was the maturing in Emerson's mind of a conviction that the Lord's Supper was never intended to be a perpetual rite, and that its sacramental observance was prejudicial to religion by emphasising forms instead of spirit, and by transferring the worship of God to Christ. Otherwise he had no hostility to the institution. He simply lacked sympathy with it, as indeed he did with public prayers But his Unitarian brethren had not yet travelled so far from traditional orthodoxy, and with friendly feelings on both sides they parted In the sermon he preached to them on the Lord's Supper-the only sermon to be found in his published works-Emerson had declared that 'the day of formal religion is past.' This was, indeed, a wider departure from current Unitarianism than a mere difference of opinion on the nature and perpetuity of the Lord's Support. It meant that the source of authority in religion was within, and not without, and that forms were matters of absolute indifference. And to be in official minister of such an inward religion seemed almost a desceration of it. I has Emerson wrote in his journal, under date of 10th January 1832. It is the best part of the man, I some times thinly that revolts most against his being a minister. His good revolts from official goodness.

llis für worldly prospects gone, Linerson was struggling under a lieuvy burden of affliction. His wife—'a bright revelation to me of the best nature of noman'—died of consumption in 1832 at the early age of twenty one. His younger brother Edward, a prodigy of talent and power, whom ! some of their contemporaries thought the most promising of the family, had brolen down, and sought restoration of health in Porto Rico, where he died in 1834 Charles, another counger brother, who had been an immate of Waldo's house and his friend and companion for many years, was already a victim of disease, from which he died in 1836 Now Waldo's own health gave way, and, sick in body and depressed in spirits, he sought rehef in a trip to Europe. He sailed from Boston on Christmas Day 1832, in a little trading brig bound for the Mediterrinean The sea voyage, the close quarters, the rations of pork and beans, the com plete physical and moral change, proved a most effective tonic to his health and spirits

A brief account of Emerson's European trip is prefixed to his English Trails. He visited Sicily, Italy, France, and Great Britain. He saw

Coloridge, Wordsworth, Lindor, and Carlylethe latter, says Emerson, to untable that I love him? He ob crives that all these four are deficient, though in different degrees, in insight into religious truth? Yet to see them had been the prime motive of his trip to Lurope had suffered disillusianment from personal intercourse with these gireit men, of whom his imigiuntion lind drawn idealised portraits, he had nevertheless been comforted and confirmed in his convictions, and he would 'judge more justly, less timidly of visc men forevermore. And to the friendship then formed with Cribble we one the correspondence since fixen to the world by Mr Norton-which began with Linerson's first letter in 1834, and closed with Carl less list letter in 1572

On his return from I mope, Emerson began to appear before the public is a lecturer. "My print is the Lyccum platform,' he once said. And for the test of his days he was I nown as a peripatetic lecturer, with Bo ton as headquarters. He seitled near by in 1834, in the quiet village of Concord the home of his forefithers. The subjects of his ketures tool a vide range-biograph literature, history, art, morals, philosophy, politics, year care some of them But in the choice of subjects Linerson betraved his affinitive. Thus, of the lectures given in 1834, two were afterwards pubone on Michael Angelo, the immored propliet of beauty in nature—hearts which is one with trith and virtue, and the other on Milion, who stood foremost 'of all men in the power to inspire' and who 'better than any other has discharged the office of every great man-namely, to raise the idea of minn! Both presentations embodied Emerson's own loftiest aspirations

But the first clear proof of Linerson's genius was afforded by the publication in 1836 of his little book entitled Nature, which may also be regarded as the apocalypse of New England Fran <ccndentalism = It had, however, almost as hard a fite as Hume's Frentise, for it took twelve years to sell five hundred copies. But nothing quite so mistical and incomprehensible land ever been presented to American readers, and who should it fare better than Carlyles Sartor Resarties in England? It is an attempt to see God, and nature, and min face to face, and not merely through the eves of tradition and history thenies are natures ministry to and discipline of man the world as a divine appearance to a human mind, spirit as the all inclusive reality, of which man thinking is also participant, and intuition as the receptiveness of the human mind to communications from the Divine If the book was carrare to the general, it gave true satisfac tion' to Cirlyle, who in a letter to Emerson described it as 'the foundation and ground plan on which you may build whatsoever of great and true has been given you to build?

In a more exoteric form Emerson's leading ideas found expression in his noble discourse on 'The American Scholar,' delivered at Cambridge on 31st August 1837 The first part deals with the education of the scholar by nature, by books, and by action, the list with the scholar's duties, which 'may all be comprised in self-trust.' It is another Fichte on American soil, absolutely original and independent, glorifying the vocation of the scholar as 'the world's eve' and 'the world's heart' With thought as profound as Aristotle's and as solid as Darwin's, the orator flashes out his central idea 'The main enterprise of the world for splendour, for event, is the upbuilding of a man'

Another address, delivered in the following year at the Divinity College, Cambridge, set forth Emerson's religious philosophy As Dr Holmes truly says, it 'was a plea for the individual consciousness as against all historical creeds, bibles, churches, for the soul as the supreme judge in spiritual matters' It made a great sensation, occasioning much discussion and controversy, in which, however, Emerson took no part And it was, indeed, thoroughly revolutionary, even in the high places of Unitarianism Thus, after declaring that Jesus Christ 'alone in all history esti mated the greatness of man' and was 'true to what is in you and me, Emerson goes on to say that 'churches are not built on his principles, but on his tropes,' and that they dwell 'with noxious exaggeration about the person of Jesus' The great reform needed is that men shall become acquainted at first hand, each for himself, with Faith, indeed, is an intuition, and cannot be received at second hand. The prophets and divine bards are a provocation and stimulus 'And thus, by his holy thoughts, Jesus serves us, and thus only

Emerson was now thirty-five years of age had won recognition as a man of letters and as a profound philosophical thinker, with deep moral and religious interests In lecturing he had found the means of an assured livelihood, in addition to some property left him by his wife. He had bought for thirty-five hundred dollars a house at Concord, which the seller alleged had cost him seventy eight hundred To this house in 1835 he had brought his second wife, Miss Lydia Jackson, of Plymouth And here he passed the rest of his life—a life devoted to meditation, reading, writing, lecturing, conversation with friends and visitors, and occasional public speaking

It was a life singularly uneventful, of which the best record are the titles of his successive works. But it was a beautiful, peaceful, and happy existence. Children were born, to whose truining Emerson gave much attention, and the death of the eldest in 1842 was a heavy sorrow to him. In 1847 Emerson sailed for Europe on his second visit. He spent a week with Carlyle at Chelsea, and then began a series of lectures in England and Scotland, some of which were afterwards published under the title of Representative Men The volume on English Traits, published in 1856, is a reminiscence of the same visit. In 1857 The Atlantic Monthly was estab lished under the editorship of James Russell Lowell, and Emerson, like many other old con tributors to The Dial (which from 1840 to 1844 had been the organ of the Transcendental move ment), wrote for the new magazine, his contributions including some of his best-known poems About the same time the 'Saturday Club' was founded in Boston, and to it Emerson went regularly till 1875, meeting for talk at informal dinners such distinguished contemporaries as Longfellow, Hawthorne, Motley, Lowell, Governor Andrew, and others of scarcely less renown In 1866 Harvaid conferred upon her illustrious son the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws In 1874 Enterson was nominated for the office of Lord Rector of Glasgow University, and he received five hundred votes against seven hundred for Disraeli, who was elected 'I count that vote,' he wrote to Dr Hutchison Stirling, 'as quite the fairest laurel that has ever fallen on me'

Such things, with a visit to California in 1871 and a third visit to the Old World in 1872, are the most noticeable external events in the later life of this meditative and home-loving thinker and But the inward life he lived is reflected in his writings and addresses The variety of the contents of the dozen volumes that make up his collected works is very inadequately indicated by the general titles These are (1) Nature, Addresses, Lectures, (2 3) Lssays, (4) Representative Men, (5) English Traits, (6) Conduct of Life, (7) Letters and Social Aims, (8) Society and Solitude, (9) Poims, (10) Lectures, Biographical Sketchis, (11) Miscellancous, (12) Natural History of Intellect

Emerson's working life, according to Dr Holmes, , did not extend much beyond the year 1867. There was a long but not unhappy twilight, and on the 27th of April 1882 he passed quietly away form of Emerson's writings was determined by his vocation As Shakespeare the actor wrote dramas, Emerson the lecturer wrote discourses and essays There is, indeed, a volume of poems, but though short passages of his poetry seem destined to immortality, and such poems as 'Each and All, 'The Humble Bee,' The Snow-Storm,' Wood-Notes,' 'The World Soul,' and 'The Problem' will long have appreciative readers, Emerson, with all his poetical feeling, insight, imagination and soar ing thought, did not, any more than Carlyle, find in poetry a natural medium of expression. His fame rests on those essays and discourses, covering a wide variety of subject and originating mostly in the lectures out of which he made his living that constitute the other eleven volumes of his collected works Emerson's style is as unique as the man clear, concise, beautiful, not infrequently poetic, abounding in quotation and allusion and often disconnected like a string of pearls. The language, however apt and striking, is only a medium of expression, and it is the thought that arrests the reader's attention Emerson's greatest gift as a writer is the power of inspiration and stimulus The independence and inviolability of every human soul is for him a cardinal doctrine, from which it follows that even the best teachers can only incite and provoke it to self development, and his writings possess in an extraordinary degree this stimulative potency It would be difficult to find a better intellectual or moral tonic. And as they embrace such a variety of range, every reader is likely to find something to meet his peculiar needs 'Hitch your wagon to a star' was one of his in spired precepts, and his writings tend to lift the soul from earth to heaven

It is best to think of Emerson as an inspired and inspiring seer. He was not an inductive investi gator or a deductive reasoner. His special gift was insight. As early as 1838 he formulated his life's function 'Seeing whatever I can, and telling what I see' He never wove the results into a connected system He never sought to be con sistent, indeed, he denounced consistency as the bane of little minds He believed that God spoke through the mind of every man, and that it was incumbent on each to report what he saw to day, without regard to what he had reported at any other *ime. The world begins afresh with each general tion and each individual, the present is not the prisoner of the past. And so Emerson looked strught into the deepest things-into the mind of man, nature, and God-and proclaimed what he saw as the everlasting, yet ever new and fresh, gospel of truth. In the best sense, therefore, he is a seer and prophet-inspiring because inspired by the spirit of truth Emerson had no 'system' He was, of course, an idealist, but he made no original contributions to philosophy For him as for others the world of nature is merely a symbol of the Universal Spirit. God is all and all Nor does Emerson shrink at the conclusion that human personality is a passing phase of the Infinite This pantheistic view, however, is not consistently presented, and, of course, it does not altogether square with his doctrine of the greatness of man, or harmonise with his strenuous insistence on the ethics of self-realisation But this is a conflict between the demands of the Speculative and the Practical Reason which, as Kant pointed out, is unavoidable It may be said that Emerson overcame the speculative difficulty by his life this free-thinking American was one of the purest and saintliest of men

From 'Nature'

A noble doubt perpetually suggests itself—whether this end be not the Final Cause of the Universe, and whether nature outwardly exists. It is a sufficient account of that Appearance we call the World, that God will teach a human mind, and so makes it the receiver of a certain number of congruent sensations, which we call sun and moon, man and woman, house and tride. In my utter impotence to test the authen ticity of the report of my senses, to I now whether the impressions they make on me correspond with ontlying objects, what difference does it make whether Orion is up there in heaven, or some god punts the image in the firmament of the soul? The relations of parts and the end of the whole remaining the same, what is the difference whether land and sea interact, and worlds revolve and intermingle without number or end,deep yawning under deep, and galaxy balancing galaxy, throughout absolute space,-or whether, without relations of time and space, the same appearances are inscribed in the constant faith of man? nature enjoy a substantial existence without, or is only in the apocalypoe of the mind, it is alife useful and alike venerable to me. Be it what it may, it is ideal to me so long as I cannot try the accuracy of my senses

From 'The American Scholar'

The scholar is that man who must take up into him self all the ability of the time, all the contributions the past, all the hopes of the future. He must be "? university of I nov ledges. If there he one lesson me than another which should pierce his ear, it is, The world is nothing, the man is all, in yourself is the law of all nature, and you know not yet how a globule of sap ascends, in yourself slumbers the whole of Reason, it is for you to know all, it is for you to dare all President and Gentlemen, this confidence in the nn searched might of man belongs, by all motives, by all proplices, by all preparation, to the American Scholar We have listened too long to the courtly muses of Europe. The spirit of the American freeman is alreads Public and suspected to be timid, imitative, tame. private avance male the air we breathe thicl and fit. The scholar is decent, indolent, complaisant. See already the tragic consequence. The mind of this country, taught to aim at low objects, eats upon itself

From 'Self-Reliance'

I read the other day some verses written by an eminent painter which were original and not conventional. The soul always hears an admonition in such lines, let the The sentiment they instil is subject be what it may of more value than any thought they may contain. To believe your own thought, to believe that what is true for you in your private heart is true for all men,-that is genius Speak your latent conviction, and it shall be the universal sense, for the inmost in due time becomes the outmost, and our first thought is rendered back to us by the trumpets of the Last Judgment. Familiar as the voice of the mind is to each, the highest ment , we ascribe to Moses, Plato, and Milton is that they set at naught books and traditions, and spoke not what men, but what they thought. A man should learn to detect and watch that gleam of light which flashes across his mind from within, more than the lustre of the firmament of bards and sages Yet he dismisses without notice his thought, because it is his work of genius we recognise our own rejected thoughts, they come back to us with a certain alienated majest) Great works of art have no more affecting lesson for us than this. They teach us to abide by our spon taneous impression with good humored inflexibility then most when the whole cry of voices is on the other side

Else to morrow a stranger will say with masterly good sense precisely what we have thought and felt all the time, and we shall be forced to take with shame our own opinion from another

From 'The Over-Soul'

Inestable is the iimon of man and God in every net The simplest person who in his integrity worships God, becomes God, yet for ever and ever the influx of this better and universal self is new and unsearchable It inspires ane and astonishment. How dear, how soothing to man, arises the idea of God, peopling the lonely place, effacing the scars of our mistakes and disappointments! When we have broken our god of tradition and ceased from our god of rhetoric, then may God fire the heart with his presence the doubling of the heart itself-nay, the infinite enlarge ment of the heart with a power of growth to a new infinity on every side. It inspires in man an infallible He has not the conviction, but the sight, that the best is the true, and may in that thought easily dismiss all particular uncertainties and fears, and adjourn to the sure revelation of time the solution of his private riddles He is sure that his welfare is dear to the heart of being In the presence of law to his mind he is overflowed with a reliance so universal that it sweeps away all cherished hopes and the most stable projects of mortal condition in its flood

From 'Politics'

Hence the less government we have the better,-the fewer laws, and the less confided power. The antidote to this abuse of formal Government is, the influence of private character, the growth of the Individual, the ap pearance of the principal to supersede the proxy, the appearance of the wise man, of whom the existing government is, it must be owned, but a shabby imitation That which all things tend to educe, which freedom, cultivation, intercourse, revolutions, go to form and de liver, is character, that is the end of Nature, to reach unto this coronation of her king. To educate the wise man the State exists, and with the appearance of the wise man the State expires. The appearance of character makes the State nnnecessary The wise man is the State. He needs no army, fort, or navy,-he loves men too well, no bribe, or feast, or palace, to draw friends to him, no vantage-ground, no favourable circumstance He needs no library, for he has not done thinking, no church, for he is a prophet, no statute book, for he has the lawgiver, no money, for he is value, no road, for he is at home where he is, no experience, for the life of the creator shoots through him, and looks from his eves He has no personal friends, for he who has the spell to draw the prayer and piety of all men unto him needs not husband and educate a few to share with him a select and poetic life. His relation to men is angelic, his memory is injerth to them, his presence, frankineense and flowers

From 'English Traits.'

The Anghean Church is marked by the grace and good sense of its forms, by the mauly grace of its clergy. The gospel it preaches is 'By taste are ye saved'. It keeps the old structures in repair, spends a world of money in music and building, and in buying Pugin and architectural literature. It has a general good name for amenity and mildness. It is not in ordinary a persecuting Church, it is not inquisitorial, not even inquisitive, is perfectly well bred, and can shut its eyes on all proper occasions. If you let it alone, it will let you alone. But its instinct is hostile to all change in politics, literature, or social arts. The Church has not been the founder of the London University, of the Mechanics' Institutes, of the Free School, of whatever aims at diffusion of knowledge. The Platonists of Oxford are as bitter against this heresy as Thomas Taylor.

Plato

Plato apprehended the cardinal facts He could pros trate himself on the earth, and cover his eyes, whilst he adored that which cannot be numbered, or gauged, or known, or named that of which everything can be affirmed and denied that which is entity and nonentity He called it super essential He even stood ready, as in the Parmenides, to demonstrate that it was so-that this being exceeded the limits of intellect. No man ever more fully acknowledged the Ineffable Having paid his homage, as for the human race, to the Illimitable, he then stood erect, and for the human race affirmed, 'And yet things are knowable!'-that is, the Asia in his mind was first heartily honoured—the ocean of love and power, before form, before will, before knowledge, the Same, the Good, the One, and now, refreshed and empowered by this worship, the instinct of Europe, namely, cul ture, returns, and he cries, Yet things are knowable! They are knowable because, being from one, things correspond (From Represer tative Men )

Napoleon.

I call Napoleon the agent or attorney of the middle class of modern society, of the throng who fill the markets, shops, counting houses, manufactories, ships, of the modern world, aiming to be rich. He was the agitator, the destroyer of prescription, the internal improver, the liberal, the radical, the inventor of means, the opener of doors and markets, the subverter of monopoly and abuse. Of course the rich and aristo cratic did not like him England, the centre of capital, and Rome and Austria, centres of tradition and genealogy, opposed him. The consternation of the dull and con servative classes, the terror of the foolish old men and old women of the Roman conclave-who in their despair took hold of anything, and would eling to red hot ironthe vain attempts of statists to amuse and deceive him. of the Emperor of Austria to bribe him, and the instinct of the young, ardent, and active men, everywhere, which pointed him out as the grunt of the middle class, make his history bright and commanding. He had the virtues of the masses of his constituents lie had also their vices I am sorry that the brilliant picture has its reverse that is the fatal quality which we discover in our pursuit of wealth, that it is treacherous, and is bought by the breaking or weakening of the sentiments, and it is inevit able that we should find the same fact in the history of this champion, who proposed to himself simply a brilliant career, without any stipulation or scruple concerning the means. (From Representative Men )

From 'Abraham Lincoln.'

His occupying the chair of State was a triumph of the good sense of manlind, and of the public conscience. This middle class country had got a middle class President, at last. Yes, in manners and sympathics, but not in powers, for his powers were superior. This man grew according to the need. His mind mastered the problem of the day, and as the problem grew, so did his comprehension of it. Rarely was man so fitted to the event. In the midst of fears and jealousies, in the babel of connsels and parties, this man wrought incessantly with all his might and all his honesty, labouring to find what the people wanted, and how to obtain that It cannot be said there is any evaggeration of his worth. If ever a man was fairly tested, he was. There was no lack of resistance, nor of slander, nor of ridicule. The times have allowed no State secrets, the nation has been in such ferment, such multitudes had to be trusted, that no secret could be kept. Every door was ajar, and we know all that befell

Then, what an occasion was the whirlwind of the war! Here was place for no holiday magistrate, no fair weather sailor, the new pilot was hurried to the helm in a tornado. In four years—four years of battle days his endurance, his fertility of resources, his magnanimity, were sorely tried and never found wanting There, by his courage, his justice, his even temper, his fertile counsel, his humanity, he stood a heroic figure in the centre of a heroic epoch. He is the true history of the American people in his time. Step by step he will ed before them, slow with their slowne's quickening his march by theirs, the true representative of this continent, an entirely public man father of his country, the pulse of twenty millions throbbing in his heart, the thought of their minds articulated by his tongue

In May, when sea winds pierced our solitudes, I found the fresh khodora in the woods, Spreading its leafless blooms in a damp nook, To please the desert and the shiggish brook The purple petals, fallen in the pool, Made the black water with their beauty gay, Here might the red bird come his plumes to cool, And court the flower that cheapens his array Rhodora' if the sages ask thee why This charm is wasted on the earth and sky, Tell them, dear, that if eves were made for seeing, Then Beauty is its own excuse for being Why thou wert there, O rival of the rose ' I never thought to ask, I never I new But, in my simple ignorance, suppose The self same Power that brought me there brought you

George Ripley (1802-80), born at Greenfield in Massachusetts, graduated at Harvard, and until 1841 was pastor in Boston — In 1836, with Emerson and Alcott, he was one of the founders of the Transcendental Club, which Theodore Parker and Margaret Fuller joined in the following year—He was perhaps more closely identified than any of the rest with the Franscendental innovement, and it was he who, leaving the pulpit, started the Brook I arm experiment. This came to an end in 1847, and Ripley from 1849 engaged in literary work at New York, to Horace Greeley's New Fork Iribine he contributed a long series of incisive and scholarly reviews which made their marl on contemporary American thought, and helped to raise the literary standard for such work through out the country. He was joint editor of Appletons New American Cyclopædia, his own writings are practically forgotten. There is a Life of him by Frothingham (1882).

Theothere Parker (1810-60) was born at Lexington in Massachusetts, graduated at Har vard in 1836, and settled as Unitarian minister at West Rosbury, now in Boston. As a boy and is a student he liad been an industrious and omnivorous reader biblical criticism and German theological speculation specially attracted him, he translated De Wettes 'introduction' to the Old Iestrment, and was not unaffected by Strauss's Leben Jesu He gradually came to disbelieve in the infallibility of the Bible, the truth of miracles, the exclusive claim of Christianity, the perfection of the revelation in Christ The permanent element in Christianity was absolute morality, pure religion, the love of God and the love of man, and the fundamental articles in his creed were God the moral law, and immortality rationalistic views which separated him from conservative Unitarians were expounded in A Discourse of Matters pertaining to Religion (1841), followed by Ten Sumons of Religion (1852), and Theism, Atheism, and the Popular Theology (1853) As the orthodox Unitarians east him off, he was warmly taken up by the educated luty, the most ardent and modern spirits of the time, and was easily able to stand outside of sects. From 1844 he preached to a congregation of three thousand, besides incessantly writing on social and theo logical questions. He lectured also throughout the States, and took a large and influential share in the anti-slavery cause. His contributions were perhaps the weightiest published in the Tran scendental Dial, he was an industrious writer of reviews and critical articles His strenuous labours broke his health prematurely, and he died in Florence. Parker was rather a powerful orator than an accomplished writer, and moved by the wealth of his knowledge, the strength of his con viction, and the warmth of his feeling, rather than by the logic of his system, the consistency or clearness of his views. He had no grace of expression, and was not seldom defective in good taste, but was always vigorous, and often picturesque collected English edition of his works was edited by Miss F P Cobbe (14 vols 1863-71) There are Lives by Weiss (1864), Frothingham (1874), Dean (1877), Cooke (1889), and White Chadwick (1900), see also Dr Martineau's Essays (1890)

William Hickling Prescott.

born in Silem, Massachusetts, 4th May 1795, wis sixth in account from John Prescott, who came to Massachusetts from Laurashire about 1640. Succuseive contrations of Presports and of Hicklings, the historian's maternal ances ors, bore effective share in public affines during the development of the colons into the Commonwealth of Massachusetts At William's birth his fither was practising liw in Sileni, thence he removed to Poston in 1805, and at fifteen Prescott entered the Sophomore or second year class at Harvard University Possess me exceptional good looks and much personal thirm, with a fund of high spirits which stood him in Lood stend throughout his life, the lad was very popular, but should no special proficiency in his studies, and was even decidedly backward in mathematics. In the second year of his college, experience occurred the prinful accident which affected his whole life. As he was leaving the dming hall, where a group of undergraduates were amusing themselves with rather rough play, he turned suddenly at some sound, and was struck full in the open eve by a piece of haid bread, thrown at random by a careless hand mediate effect upon him was like concussion of the birin. He recovered quickly from the general shock, but the immed eve had lost its sight for ever. But after a few weeks he resumed his studies, and did better work with one eye than he had ever done with two

After leaving college he entered his fathers ofthe, and was beginning legal studies when acute rheumatism in his unimpared eve cut short his legal enter (1814), and by medical advice he went to the Azores, where his material grand father Hickling was consul for the United States. When next year he came to London the medical experts agreed that one eye was completely parallesed. embarked on the new book on 'The Conquest of Mexico and the anterior civilisation of the Mexicans, a beautiful prose epic, for which rich, virgin materials teem in Simancas and Madrid, and probably Mexico' The Spanish historian Navarrete placed at his disposal all his MS material gathered for his Colection de Viages y Descriptionientos, but there came at a later date a moment when this choice was almost abandoned, Prescott having heard that Washington Irving had turned his attention to Mexico as a natural sequence to his Columbus Happily, the great courtesy of the elder author encouraged the younger to proceed Irving had already made a rough draft of his story of the Mencan conquest when he learned accidentally of Prescott's plan, whereupon he immediately relinquished his own project, though, as he confessed later, at a great personal sacrifice. Letters from Sismondi, Thierry, and Patrick Fraser Tytler encouraged Prescott in his new enterprise, and in addition to splendid supplies sent to him from Spain, Don Pascual de Gayangos examined the British Museum and the State Paper Office on his behalf, and had transcripts made of all matter bearing on his subject which could not be purchased

In August 1843 the History of the Conquest of Mexico was completed, and was published in December 1843, six years after 'Ferdinand and Isabella made their bow to the public.' The second work was greeted with a chorus of applause, five thousand copies were sold in about four months. In England the first edition was speedily exhausted, and on the Continent also the book was exceedingly well received. The brilliant story of Hernando Cortes' expedition appealed to the public, and opened up a new field of research to scholars Prescott gathered his materials from the accounts of Cortes and of his contemporaries, of Spanish historians and of Mexicans like Fernando de Alva Ixtlilvochitl, who wrote at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and out of them wove a new web From these all but unknown and inaccessible writings a spirited narrative sprang into life, which reads like a historical romance with Hernando Cortes In one sense it is a historical romance and nothing more Descriptions of scenery called up vivid pictures in the writer's mind, which, sketched upon his pages, are often far from The Aztec civilisation as described by accurate Cortes 'caught the imagination and overcame the critical judgment of Prescott, our most charming writer,' wrote Morgan, the first scientific American ethnologist

The preparation for the story of the first Spanish inroad into the American continent covered much of the ground of the second, The Conquest of Peru The author's zest in his new work was checked and saddened by the sudden death of his father (8th December 1844), always a close sympathiser in all his work, but Prescott soon roused himself to activity, cheered by an appreciative letter from Alexander von Humboldt about the Conquest of A few months later he was honoured in Paris and in Berlin by election as corresponding member of the French Institute and of the Royal Society of Berlin This foreign encouragement was a great refreshment to his spirits, for, in addition to mental depression, he suffered greatly from an access of inflammation in his eye March 1847 saw the Conquest of Peru finished, two years and nine months after the author put pen to Success was great and immediate on both sides of the Atlantic. Reviews were laudatory, and private letters from scholars and friends-Thierry, Gavangos, and others—full of warm appreciation. The adventures of the Pizarros are related with somewhat less dash than those of Cortes sources are perhaps less ample Francesco Pizarro, unable to write his own story, could not vaunt his exploits as did Cortes As in the Conquest of Meaico, here also ethnological and historic research has taught us to read a different interpretation into many of the facts seen by Spanish eyes with sixteenth century spectacles.

Even while busied with Peru, Prescott began to prepare for his Plulip II, and Motley was almost discouraged from his Rise of the Dutch Republic by learning that Prescott had gone back from the Spanish colonies to the mother-country. In his turn Prescott encouraged the younger man to go on with his book. But in 1850 Prescott's health moved him to make his second voyage to England, more than thirty years after the first. Most cordial was the welcome extended to him, every door was opened to him, and he greatly enjoyed his social experiences. His letters to his vise fixe title et in, pie ares at In, he's somety in 1850, from the Quien, he whom he was practously received, to minor authors unlighted to claim him and colleague from across the eca.

In October 1°55 he returned home and began again to 'Philippine,' as he called it. Two volumes were published in November 1855, and not only were large sales made immediately, but interest is revised in Prescot's earlier books. Work on the third volume it is interrupted by Prescot's addition to Robertson's Claries I, published in 1856.

"M poor vife! I am so sorry this line come upon you so soon,' was his first conscious sentence on recovering from a sudden stroke of apopless m lebing 1858, but nearly a year more of comparitive I calth enabled him to publish the third volume of Pullip (April 1858), leaving his story at 1580. The sucreeding months were given to revision of Wextee. It is in the mide of this labour that a second attack dealt him his death blow, from which he died in a few hours, 28th Jinuary 1859. A man without enemies, he had commanded the attention and interest of his contemporaries at large, and been the life and soul of every circle, great and small, of which he formed a part. It is writers have I sed a life so uniformly hippy and serenc as that of Prescott, save for the one overwhelming missoriune of halt blindness. He lept wholly apart from the so-ral ! and political questions agitating America and Lurope

His last work was received with warm commen dition, and cannot even now be ignored, but it has a somewhat and quality, and is distinctly lack. ing in chirm. In its arrangement the majoral is disproportioned, thus more space is given to the Moors and less to the Netherlands than seems justified. sheets swept down the broad bay of Campeachy, fringed with the rich dye woods which have since furnished so important an article of commerce to Europe. He passed Potonchan, where Cordova had experienced a rough reception from the natives, and soon after reached the mouth of the Rio de Tabasco, or Grijalva, in which that navigator had carried on so hierative a traffic. Though mindful of the great object of his voyage—the visit to the Aztec territories—he was desirous of acquainting himself with the resources of this country, and determined to ascend the river and visit the great town on its borders

The water was so shallow, from the accumulation of sand at the mouth of the stream, that the general was obliged to leave the ships nt nuclior, and to embark in the boats with a part only of his forces The banks were thickly studded with mangrove trees, that, with their roots shooting up and interlacing one another, formed a kind of impervious scienn or network, behind which the dark forms of the natives were seen glancing to and fro with the most menacing looks and gestures Cortes, much surprised at these unfriendly demonstra tions, so unlike what he had reason to expect, moved cautiously up the stream. When he had reached an open place, where a large number of Indians were assembled, he asked, through his interpreter, leave to land, explain ing at the same time his amicable intentions. But the Indians, brandishing their weapons, answered only with gestures of angry defiance Though much chagrined, Cortes thought it best not to urge the matter further that evening, but with Irew to a neighbouring island, where he disembarked his troops, resolved to effect a landing on the following morning

When day broke, the Spaniards saw the opposite banks lined with a much more numerous array than on the preceding evening, while the canoes along the shore were filled with bands of armed warriors. Cortes now made his preparations for the attack. He first landed a detach ment of a hundred men under Alonso de Avila, at a point somewhat lower down the stream, sheltered by a thick grove of palms, from which a road, as he knew, led to the town of Tabasco, giving orders to his officer to march at once on the place, while he humself advanced to assault it in front.

Atahuallpa

Whether Atahnalpa possessed himself of every link in the curious chain of argument by which the monk connected Pizarro with St Peter may be doubted. It is certain, however, that he must have had very incorrect notions of the Frinity, if, as Garcilasso states, the interpreter Felipillo explained it by saying that 'the Christians believed in three Gods and one God, and that made four' But there is no doubt he perfectly comprehended that the drift of the discourse was to persuade him to resign his sceptre and acknowledge the supremacy of another

The eyes of the Indian monarch flashed fire, and his dark brow grew darker as he replied, 'I will be no man's tributary! I am greater than any prince upon earth Your emperor may be a great prince, I do not doubt it, when I see that he has sent his subjects so far across the waters, and I am willing to hold him as a brother. As for the Pope of whom you speak, he must be crazy to tall of giving away countries which do not belong to him. For my faith,' he continued, 'I will not change

Your own God, as you say, was put to death by the very men whom he created But mine,' he concluded, pointing to his deity—then, alas ' sinling in glory behind the mountains—'my God still lives in the heavens, and looks down on his children'

He then demanded of Valverde by what authority lichad said these things. The friar pointed to the book which he held as his authority. Atahuallpa, taking it, turned over the pages n moment, then, as the insult he had received probably flashed across his mind, he threw it down with vehemence, and exclaimed, 'Tell your comrades that they shall give me an account of their doings in my land. I will not go from here till they have made me full satisfaction for all the wrongs they have committed.'

The friar, greatly scandalised by the indignity offered to the sacred volume, stayed only to pick it up, and, hastening to Pizarro, informed him of what had been done, exclaiming at the same time, 'Do you not see that, while we stand here wasting our breath in talking with this dog, full of pride as he is, the fields are fill ing with Indians? Set on at once! I absolve you' Pizarro saw that the hour had come He waved a white scarf in the air, the appointed signal. The fatal gun was fired from the fortress. Then springing into the square, the Spanish captain and his followers shouted the old war erv of 'St Jago and at them '' It was answered by the battle cry of every Spaniard in the city, as, rush ing from the avenues of the great halls in which they were concerled, they poured into the plaza, horse and foot, each in his own dark column, and threw them selves into the inidst of the Indian crowd taken by surprise, stunned by the report of artillery and muskets, the echoes of which reverberated like thunder from the surrounding buildings, and blinded by the smoke which rolled in sulphurous volumes along the square, were seized with a panic. They knew not whither to fly for refuge from the coming ruin Nobles and commoners-all were trampled down under the herce charge of the cavalry, who dealt their blows right and left, without sparing, while their swords, flashing through the thick gloom, carried dismay into the hearts of the wretched natives, who now, for the first time, saw the horse and his rider in all their terrors. They made no resistance-as, indeed, they had no weapons with which to make it Every avenue to escape was closed, for the entrance to the square was choked up with the dead bodies of men who had perished in vain efforts to fly, and such was the agony of the survivors under the terrible pressure of their assailants that a large body of Indians, by their convulsive struggles, burst through the wall of stone and dried clay which formed part of the boundary of the place! It fell, leaving an opening of more than a hundred paces, through which multitudes now found their way into the country, still hotly pursued by the cavalry, who, leaping the fallen rubbish, hung on the rear of the fugitives, striking them down in all directions (From The Conquest of Peru)

In addition to the works mentioned, Prescott wrote a Life of Charles Broel den Brown (1834) and a series of reviews in the North American Review on literary subjects. A collection of his Biographical and Critical Essays was published in 1845. The standard edition of his works is that edited by J. Foster Kirk, long his secretary (15 vols. 1884, new ed. 1889, republished in London 1890) and the standard Life of him was written by his friend George Ticknor (1864).

Henry Wadsworth Longfellow,

best loved of his country's poets and best known of them abroad, was born in Portland, Maine, 27th February 1807 The English Longfellows were Yorkshire folk. William, the poet's first colonial ancestor, had the contemporary reputation of being 'a little wild' and 'not so much a Puritan as some' He married a sister of Samuel Sewall, witch judge and famous diarist

On his mother's side the poet was descended from John Alden, the hero of his Courtof Miles ship Standish, as was also the poct Bryant. His fither was a cultivated gentleman, a Harvard classmate of Dr Channing and Judge Story, bu to the mother he was indebted for his poetic temperament The atmosphere of the home was that of the best English books, the local influences are de scribed to perfection in the poem 'My Lost Youth' He began early to urite poetry, and his first published poem, written in his fourteenth year, was 'The Battle of Lovell's Pond,' the subject an Indian fight of local celebrity. In 1821 he entered Bowdom College, where he had Hawthorne for a classmate, barely making his acquaintance, perhaps because Hawthorne had been in the college a year when Longfellow entered his class During his college years he wrote many verses if not much poetry, publishing twenty-three pieces in two years, some of them side by side with Bryant's in the United States Literary Gazette, as if frankly confessing their imitation, sometimes successful, Only five of these pieces were of the elder poet tolerated in the collected editions of Longfellow's Immediately upon his graduation the college sent him to Europe for three years to fit himself for its new chair of modern languages The fruits of this travel, beyond its special end, were a senes of translations and the book Outre-Mer, as imitative of Irving as the early poems had been of Bryant, but with an individual note. It is a remarkable fact that from 1826 until 1837 he did not publish an original poem, and another, that he could so subordinate his natural gift to the work of translation. His proper hand, when he again found it, was obviously subdued to what he had been working in so long. The wonder is it did not take a deeper due. His talent for translation has not been surpassed for its uniform excellence. His first translations were from the Spanish, later he passed to German and other northern originals To the habit so definitely formed he frequently re curred, its culmi nation in his later life being his complete translation of Dante's Diama Commedia, a won der of fidelity, but strangely lacking in the verve of the original, and even in that of his own early experiments with the same material

Much had happened to Long fellowin the period during which his originality as a had been poet in complete abeyance For five years he had been a professor of the modern languages in Bowdom Col ln 1835, lege having been ap pointed to a similar chair at Harvard, he went to Europe for a two years' course of study In 1831 he had married Mary Storer Porter, a lovely and intelligent girl. She died in the first year of his second sojourn in Europe, November 1835, and his spirit was profoundly shaken by the event It made him a new creature. It reopened the fountain of poetry in his mind. What he had learned in sorrow, he now essayed to teach in song, but not until he had embodied in Hyperion the experiences of his second European journey, as he had embodied those of the first in Outre-The manner of the new romance reflected that of Richter as plainly as the former had reflected that of Iring Its allusions thinly veiled the sorrow of his personal loss, while on its verge arose the shape of a consoler, Frances Eliza beth Appleton, who in 1843 became his second

Hyperion at once achieved a popular wife Lovers were no longer in doubt what success book to give to the beloved, and every mel incholy Jaques sucked it to his heart's content Promising a succession of romances, it proved to be the last except Kavanagh (1849), which not Emerson's praise, nor even that of Hawthorne, haling it as 'n true work of genius, if ever there was one,' has saved from deep oblision The really significent book of 1839 was not Hyperion but Voices of the Night, a collection of original poems written in quick succession in the year of publication and the The first written was 'Flowers,' the preceding second was 'A Psalm of Life,' and there were a few more expressions of personal feeling with a didactic purpose that went far to commend them to the New England mind So intimate seemed the disclosure of 'The Pailm of Life' to its author that for some time he dared not even show it to a friend. A part of the little books success was doubtless owing to the success of Hyperun, but more to its appeal by its simplicity, its tenderness, and its pathos to the common heart. The Ballads and Other Poems of 1842 marked a distinct ad vance, especially in such poems is 'The Village Blacksmith,' 'The Wreck of the Hesperus' and 'The SI eleton in Armour'-only the first of which preserved the didactic quality of the carlier 'Voices' But he painted little here, or ever, with his eye upon the object. His birds and flowers are mainly such as sang and grew in bools. It was inevit able that he should take over from his long practice of translation a great deal of foreign matter, but his Sparish Student of 1843 was a distinct rever sion to the mood from which he had just tried to free himself. Aiming to be a play, it was rither a dialogue, the interlocutors but feebly individualised, while nevertheless there were along its course many lines and prissages of delicate beauty

Longfellow's relish for his academic work was slight, but he discharged it faithfully, genial with the students in the class room and gravitating slowly but steadily to a right appreciation of lins function as that of a sympathetic interpreter of foreign literature to American youth Passages from Hyperion in the making must have been a delight ful variation from the habitual college 'recitation' The year 1842 found him again in Europe, where Dickens's conversation and his American Notes quickened in him a sense of the iniquity of negro slavery in America, and on the return voyage he wrote eight Poems on Slavery Of less virile stuff than Whittier's and Lowell's, they committed him to the anti-slavery side. Too much has been made of their omission from a Philadelphia collection of his poems (1845), seeing that the collection did not aim at completeness. Almost simultaneously a New York publisher brought out a complete edition which contained the anti-slavery poems, and thereupon the pro slavery faction raged and the abolitionists rejoiced. Meantime Longfellow was established in a fine old colonial house in

Cambridge, now, with its double fame, a rival of Mount Vernon, Washington having made it his headquarters when he took command of the American forces in 1775 Before the purchase of the house for Longfellow by his vife's father, Longfellow lodged there with Mrs Craigic, a decayed gentlewoman of eccentric character and pathetic histor, to which Longfellow vas singu larly indifferent. Hawthorne yould have enjoyed his provocation. On the other hand, Hawthorne was indifferent to the story fundamental to Evangeline, and made it over to Longfellov, who was attracted by the same simplicity by which Havethorne was repelled Lyangeline (1850) is the best lo ed of Longfellow's major poems. The hexameter measure in which it is written had only gradually approved itself to the poet's taste In his introduction to Tegner's Children of the Lord's Supper he had described its mo ement as 'that of a prisoner dancing in his clinins? That it is not the classic herameter goes without saying, but that it is not a spontaneous. Linglish measure is disproved by the unconscious Typse of the Bible into it in many places, as, 'God is gone up with a shout, the Lord with the sound of a trumpet.' It is strange to have Professor Woodberry regretting its 'spondaic flatness' while Poe Limented its lack of spondees, its tendency to dactylic werkness Surch the story of L-angeline is infinitely pathetic, and it is told in a swift, streaming style. would have hid more local colour if Longfellow had been as well travelled in America as in Lurope, he had been neither to Nova Scotia nor to the scene of the story in the Mississippi v illev A contemporary panorama was his best resource after the literature of the Acadian episode, then more favourable to the French settlers than later in the liands of Parlinian and others there is no lack of the feeling of reality in any part. A poem of heart broken affection, it has appealed to multitudes of happy lovers chasten ing their jos with sympathy and quickening their gratefulness For young people and those remem bering their vouth, it has he promise of perennial

The futile Karanagh came next, and then (1850) The Seaside and the Fireside, a cluster of minor poems in which Longfellow's art in this kind took on its most engaging form, especially in the narrative pieces. The stroke was swift and sure and various, the measure in each case being apparently chosen by the subject and not for it The diductic note, which frequently recurred, was sharpest in 'The Builders' In 'The Building of the Ship,' where Longfellow was in full possession of his talent, this note was so mevitable and so pine as fully to justify itself. To hear this poem publicly read by I anny Kemble was an experience that could never be forgotten 'Resignation' in this series stands at the head of those 'poems of sorrow and comfort' for which many looked to Longfellow as for no other virtue of his crift. In 'The Fire of

Drift-Wood' we have that vem of pleasure sentiment, infused with tenderness, than which no aspect of his work was more characteristic Chrysaer is said to have been the short poem with which he was himself best pleased, sustaining his opinion with that of another poet, Bayard I islor It warres the habitual prace and flow of his versi ficution with that more subtle rhythin to which be consciously aspired but to which he infrequently attained. Always melodious, he does not often yield that harmony which is the resolution of parts distinctly individual into a formal unity. In The Golden Legend, obedient to a principle of oscillation between home and foreign subjects to which he furnished several illustrations, he saying back to a dramatic poem embodying his conception of Christianity under the stress of Middle Age conditions. His dramatic talents were not five or two, but one, jet he had no disposition to bury that one in the earth. For dialogue we hale a capping of poetic phrases and sallies mildly humorous He pounced on his own in the Middle Ages, the picturesque, the romantic, the grotesque its actual conditions did not exist for him at all 'I wen his devil and his erring monts are gentle and gracious souls! Yet his own engagement with this subject was immense. He conceived The Golder Legend as part of a trilogy to be called Christus a Wystery The other parts were The Divine Trageay and The New England Tragedies This conception was not an afterthought, as might naturally be inferred from the disconnection of the three dramatic poems. It was present to him in 1849 'as the subliner song whose broken melodies have for so many years breathed through [his] The Golden Legend was published without any intimation of its partial character New England Trazedies appeared in 1868, The Devine Tragedy in 1871. The former was first s ritten in prose, and something of that form ching to its singing robes. With prisinges of undeniable beauty touching the New England Qualers, the average course was almost uniquely flat and tame The Divine Tragedy was a cry noble paraphrase of the Nev Testament narratives, as such attric the even while suffering from the contrast with the Gospels that was not to be escaped

In 1054 he resigned his Harvard professorship, and the first fruit of his leisure was Herriall i, a luch was published in 1855. He had a good model, the Finnish Kaler ala, the measure of " hah, trochaic tetranieter, he followed, as well as the manner The form, abounding in inclodious repetitions and reverberations, lent itself to rapid compublition, and the five thousand lines, began 'ite in June, were published early in November poem pleased everybody except the draisdust professorite. To Emerson it seemed 'sweet and a hole some as maize,' and the rising generation read it with such zest as if 'Scott, the delight of plononboys, had come again. If it lacks something of vericity as an account of sa age life, it overflows with the beauty of Longfellov's own nature, the goodness of his heart, those elements in his pretra which have commended it to the general reader, and will hereafter, more than any of its formal beauties or its store of succe and fair associations with a world remote from our habitual toil and fict where, as he has written,

The Courtsnip of Mil's Stardish ranks with Evangeline and Hiawatha as one of the three crowning heights of Longfellows range of more ambitious things. It is in the measure of E- inge line, but the hexameters are better than those of the earlier poem. That it told a bright and happy story in contrist with the tragic sorror of Erange line was not an advantage with the main body of Longfellow's public but it is vitle some readers. This quality must ed his complete escape from the languors of German romanticism which siellied over the complexion of his early verse and higgered on in its maturer forms. That John Alden and Priscilly the lovers of his store, a ere his Planto the ancestors of the Maylewers company was a cir cumstance particularly pleasant for the post and lus friends

Such landmarks as his major poems must not be suffered to obscure the general significance of a multitude of minor poems of which no particular mention can be made. Many of these are included in his complete voils under the meneral tiles Tales of a II a side Irr and Bress of Lemis ... either series there are poems that talle rank in ong his best, such surring balands as 'Paul Pene as R de, such breezy ones as 'Lady Wenty orth,' while on the other hand, the habit of product on so a sint times to hive supplanted genuine inspiration 1861 he suffered in the death of his vife a cerebi ealim to Her light summer dress of fice and sae vas fatalic humed. and his old age had a benignity which William Dean Howells has described to perfection in his article, 'The White Mr Longfellow,' in his Literary Intends and Acquaintance No one in America had more of love or honour or a larger troop of friends. There was much slackening at the last of his creative energy, but not without occasional bursts of his proper melody. He died Maich 24, 1882. His last poem was finished on the 15th of the same month, and its concluding lines made a good end to a life that was compact of gentleness and peace.

Out of the shadows of night The world rolls into light, It is daybreak everywhere

Many will miss in Longfellow the intellectual force which is for them an essential factor in the character of a true poet, many others will conceive it a misfortune that he was so little affected by the religious agitations of his time, but a much greater number will imagine that they cannot be too grate ful for so much gentleness and reverence, so much sympathy and kindliness, and for a life which was related to its poetical expression as 'perfect music unto noble words'

Resignation.

(Writen in 1848 after the death of a little daughter I There is no flock, however watched and tended, But one dead lamb is there! There is no fireside, howeve'er defended, But has one vacant chair!

The air is full of farewells to the dying,
And mournings for the dead,
The heart of Rachel, for her children crying,
Will not be comforted!

Let us be patient! These severe afflictions
Not from the ground arise,
But oftentimes celestial benedictions Assume this dark disguise

We see but dimly through the mists and vapours, Amid these earthly damps, What seem to us but sad, finereal tapers, May be heaven's distant lamps

There is no Death! What seems so is transition
This life of mortal breath
Is but a suburh of the life elysian,
Whose portal we call Death

She is not dead,—the child of our affection,— But gone unto that school Where she no longer needs our poor protection, And Christ Himself doth rule

In that great cloister's stillness and seclusion, By guardian angels led,
Safe from temptation, safe from sin's pollution,
She lives, whom we call dead

Day after day we think what she is doing In those bright realms of air, Year after year, her tender steps pursuing, Behold her grown more fur Thus do we walk with her, and I cop unbrol on The bond which nature gives,
Thinling that our remembrance, though unspol on,
May reach her where she lives

Not as a child shall we again behold her,
I or when with raptures wild
In our embraces we again enfold her,
She will not be a child.

But a fair maiden, in her I ather's mansion, Clothed with celestral grace And leantiful with all the soul's expansion Shall we behold her face

And though at times impetuous with emotion And augusti long suppressed,

The swelling heart heaves meaning like the ocean,

That cannot be at rest.—

We will be patient, and assurge the feeling We may not wholly stay

By silence sanctifying not concealing,

The grief that must have way

Chryenor

Just above you sandy bar,
As the day gros s fainter and dimmer,
Lonely and lovely, a single star
Lights the air with a dosly glimmer

Into the ocean faint and far
I alls the trail of its golden splendour,
And the gleam of that single star
Is ever refulgent, soft, and tender

Chrisaor, rising out of the sea,
Showed thus glorious and thus emplous,
Leaving the arms of Callirhoe,
I or ever tender, soft, and tremulous.

Thus o'er the ocean faint and far Trailed the gleam of his falchion brightly
Is it a God, or is it a star
That, entranced, I give on nightly I

Holidays

The holiest of all holidays are those

Kept by ourselves in silence and apart

The secret auniversaries of the heart,

When the full river of feeling overflows,—

The happy days unclouded to their close, *

The sudden joys that out of darl ness start

As flames from ashes, swift desires that dart

I tke swallows singing down each wind that blows!

White as the gleam of a receding sail,

White as a cloud that floats and fades in air,

White as the whitest like on the stream,

These tender memories are,—a Fairy Tale

Divina Commedia.

Of some enchanted land we know not where,

But lovely as a landscape in a dream

Oft have I seen at some cathedral door,
A labourer pausing in the dust and heat,
Lay down his burden and with reverent feet Enter, and cross himself, and on the floor kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er,
Far off the noises of the world's retreat,
The loud vociferations of the street
Become an undistinguishable roar

So, as I enter here from day to day,
And leave my burden at this minster gate,
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait

This eroud of statues, in whose folded sleeves
Birds build their nests, while canopied with leaves Parvis and portal bloom life trellised bowers,
And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers!
But fiends and dragons on the gargoyled caves
Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
And, underneath, the traitor Judas lowers!
All! from what agonies of heart and brain,
What exultations trampling on despair,
What tenderness, what terus, what hate of wrong,
What passionate outers of a soul in pain,
Uprose this poem of the earth and air,
This mediaval miracle of song!

I enter, and I see thee in the gloom
Of the long aisles, O poet saturnine!
And strive to make my steps I eep pace with thine. The earlies filled with some unknown perfame.
The congregation of the dead make room.
For thee to pass, the votice tapers shine.
Like rools that haunt Ravenna's groves of pine. The hoveing echoes fly from tomb to tomb.
From the confessionals I here arise.
Rehearsals of forgotten tragedies,
And lamentations from the crypts below.
And then a voice celestial, that begins.
With the pathetic words, 'Although your sins.
As scarlet be,' and ends with 'as the snow'.

With snow white veil and garments as of flame,
She stands before thee, who so long ago
I illed thy young heart with passion and the woc
I rom which thy song and all its splendoms came,
And while with stern rebul e she speaks thy name,
The recaliout thy heart melts as the snow
On mountain heights, and in swift overflow Comes gusling from thy hips in sobs of shame
Thou makest full confession—and a gleam
As if the dawn on some dark forest east,
Seems on thy lifted forehead to increase Lethe and Funoe—the remembered dream
And the forgotten sorrow—bring at last
That perfect pardon which is perfect peace

I lift mine eyes, and all the windows blaze. With forms of saints and holy men who died, Here martryred and hereafter glorified. And the great Kose upon its leaves displays. Chart s Triumph and the angelic roun lelase. With splendour upon splendour multiplied. And Heatrice again at Dante's side. No more rebubes, but suites her wards of praise. And then the organ sounds, and inseen choir sing the old Latin humas of peace and to e. And benedictions of the Holy Ghost. And the inclodious bells among the spires. Our all the house tops and through heaven above. Pre claim the elevation of the Host.

O star of morning and of liberty!

O bringer of the light, whose splendour shines
Above the darkness of the Apennines, Forerunner of the day that is to be!

The voices of the city and the sea,
The voices of the mountains and the pines,
Repeat thy song, till the familiar lines
Are footpaths for the thought of Itals!

Thy fame is blown abroad from all the heights,
Through all the nations, and a sound is heard,
As of a nighty wind, and men devout,

Strangers of Rome and the new proselvte,
In their own language hear thy a ondrous word,
And many are amazed and many doubt

I we centuries old I plant my foo of stone
Upon the Arno as St Michaels own
Was planted on the diagon I old by fold
Beneath me as it struggles, I behold Its glistening scales - Twice hath it o erthiol in My kindred and companions. Me alone
It moveth not but is by me controlled
I can remember when the Medici
Were driven from Florence, longer still ago
The final wars of Glibelline and Gued
Florence adorns me with her rewellers
And when I think that Michael Angelo

From Evangeline'

Suddenly as if arrested by fear or a feeling of wonder, Still she stood with her colourless his apart, while a shudder Kan through her frame and forgotten, the flowerets dropped from her fingers,

And from ler exes and thee sethe light and closm of the morning

Then there escaped from her hips a cry of such terrible anguish,

That the dring heard it and storted up from their pillous.

On the pallet before her was stretche I the form of an all man.

Long, and thin an every were the locks that shared his temple

But as le lay in the morning I ght his face for im met-

Seemed to assume once more the forms of its earlier man hood.

So are wont to be changed the faces of those that are dying

Hot and red on his hips still burned the flush of the fever, As if life, like the Hebrew, with blood had besprinkled its portals,

That the Angel of Death might see the sign, and pass over Motionless, senseless, dying, he lay, and his spirit exhausted

Seemed to be sinking down through infinite depths in the darkness,

Darkness of slamber and death, for ever sinking and sinking

Then through those realms of shade, in multiplied reverberations,

Heard he that cry of pain, and through the hush that succeeded

Whispered a gentle voice, in necents tender and saint like,

'Gabriel! O my beloved!' and died away into silence Then he beheld, in a dream, once more the home of his childhood,

Green Academ mendows, with sylven rivers among them, Village, and mountain, and woodlands, and, walking under their shadow,

As in the days of her youth, Exangeline rose in his Tears came into his eyes, and as slowly he lifted his eyelids.

Vanished the vision away, but Evangeline knelt by his bedside

Vainly he strove to whisper her name, for the accents unuttered

Died on his hips, and their motion revealed what his tongue would have spoken

Vamly he strove to rise, and Evangeline, kneeling beside him,

Kissed his dying hip, and laid his head on her bosom Sweet was the light of his eyes, but it suddenly sank into darl ness,

As when a lamp is blown out by a gust of wind at a casement

All was ended now, the hope, and the fear, and the sorrow,

All the aching of heart, the restless unsatisfied longing,
All the dull, deep pain, and constant arguish of patience.

And, as she pressed once more the lifeless head to her bosom,

Meekly she bowed her own, and murmured, 'Father, I thank Thee!'

From the Prologue to 'Hiawatha'

I e who love the haunts of Nature,
Love the sunshine of the meadow,
Love the shadow of the forest,
Love the wind among the branches,
And the run shower and the snow storm,
And the rushing of great rivers,
Through their palisades of pine trees,
And the thunder in the mountains,
Whose innumerable echoes
Flap lile eagles in their cyrics,— Listen to these wild truditions,
To this Song of Hinwatha!

Ye who love a nation's legands,
Love the ballads of a people,
That life voices from afar oft
Call to us to pause and listen,
Speal in tones so plain an I child like,
Scareely can the car distinguish Whether they are sung or spol en,— Listen to this In han Legend,

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK

Sylvester Judd (1813-53), born at Westhamp ton in Massachusetts, was from 1840 Unitarian pastor at Augusta in Maine. He wrote against slavery, intemperance, and war, published a reli gious poem, Pnilo, and is remembered specially as the author of the transcendental romance Margaret (1845), justly claiming to be 'a tale of the real and ideal' Among the most real ele ments are charming descriptions of New England scenery and sketches of humble life there, warmly prused by Lowell, and attention is still from time to time drawn to it by American critics, though it is a strangely unequal work Ruhard Edmy was another romance, somewhat less transcendental A Rus-Urban Tale (1850) was a sort of counter part of Marganet He published also discourses There is a book on his and theological works Life and Character by Hall (1882)

John Greenkaf Whittier,

the New England Qual er poet, was born in Haverhill, Massachusetts, 17th December 1807, in a house built by his first colonial ancestor in the seventeenth century. One strain of his blood allied him with Daniel Webster, and both are said to have had 'the Bachiler eyes,' but Webster's were blacker and less piercing than Whittier's What the homestead and home life were can best be read in Snow-Bound, while 'The Barefoot Boy' is Whittier's full length portrut of himself in his happy childhood before the firm work pressed too hard upon his strength and planted in his constitution the seeds of that weakness which made the habit of his life valetudinarian education was that of the district school of the period, except for a brief course at a local academy There were books in the small family library that give direction to his triste, inclining it to legendary reminiscences and tales. There was an uncle in the family who contributed liberally to his stock of these. It was an eventful day which was marked by his first reading of Burns's poems, lent him by Later there came a 'wanone of his teachers dering Willie' from Scotland who could recite Burns's dialect poems in an entruicing manner Whittier was much impressed, ind was soon writing verses, some of them in the Burns dialect, which he managed very well, while to much in the spirit of Burns—his interest in simple jovs and careshe owed a listing debt. It is sound criticism that describes his Snow Bound as the New England Cotters Saturday Aight But his first published poem, 'The Exile,' was more in the manner of Moore than of Burns The paper con trining this was thrown over the wall into a field where Whitter was at work one day in June 1826, and his first triumph was enhanced by a laudatory editorial note The editor was William Lloyd Garrison, the great anti-slavers reformer, then twenty years of age. His admiration for Whittier's early poems, of which he accepted many for his paper, is hard to understand. They were for the most part feeble reflections of debased literary models, but they made up in abundance what they lacked in quality, nearly one hundred appearing in the vents 1827-28 In 1832 Whittier was quite justified in his resolve to give up poetry as something for which he had no gift, and settle to a firmer's But in that year he made a fresh start with an apostrophe to Garrison. Nothing before this i as north preserving or has been preserved, except in the appendix to his complete works to show from what weak beginnings he set out. The apostrophe to Garrison marked his definite adhesion to the anti-slavery cause, which for the ne t to enti-vers was the principal subject and inspiration of his verse. For these twenty years he describes him self as 'shut out from the facour of booksellers and i magazine editors' 'But I i is enabled' he sais, 'be rigid economy to live in spite of them, and to see the end of the infernal institution which proscribed me. This diversion of 'a dreamer bor's 'from the Muses' haunts' to 'the crant of an opinion mill,'

> Maling his rustic reed of song A weapon in the war with wrong, has furnished matter for regret to some of Whittier's entics. But there is every reason to believe that this diversion effected at once his moral and poli tical salvation It saved him from the career of an intriguing politician, to which his proclivity was so marked that, parallel with his anti-slavery course he for many vears ran another in partisan politics which might have been straighter than it vas. This made it easier for him to ally himself with those abolitionists who, parting company with Garrison as too exclusively moral in his agitation, instituted the Liberty party, which sought to reach the abolition of slavery by political means. But while on with this new party he was not quite off with the old, and in 1844 was barely shut out from a congressional election, with Whig help, by the serious condition of his health. It is an interesting reflection that but for this accidental circumstance we might never have had that body of personal and religious poetry on which Whittiers permanent reputation as a poet rests

It was principally as a journalist that he was effective on political and anti-slavery lines spent the winter of 1828-29 in Boston editing the American Manufacturer, the next very he was editor of the Haverhill Gazette, and the same year he went to Hartford, Connecticut, to edit the New England Review In 1831 he published his first book, Legends of New England, for single copies of which he offered eventually as much as five dollars that he might burn them up. In 1833 he attended in Philadelphia the first meeting of the American Inti Slavery Society, the most notable anti-slavery meeting ever held in America, with Garrison for its inspiring soul. Whittier was one of the score tames of the convention, and a member of the committee which drafted the famous Declaration of Principles He read to Garrison's face that tribute of admiration which he had written in 1832. His standing in the convention was fixed by his Justice and Expedier 3, a noble echo of Garrison's Houghts of African Celementary which, denouncing negro colonisation as frieidly to slaver, demanded immediate and unconditional emancipation. Returning to Haverhill in 1832, he again took charge of the Gaz if 1836 the farm was sold and the family removed some eight miles to Amesbury, where, but for summer outings and two vears in Philadelphia (1839-40) he henceforth made his home Philadelphia he edited the Pirns t was Freeman, an abolition st paper his most important cui or at charge. The office of the paper was in Pennsylvania Hall, which, just but, was hared he a pro slavera mob. Whiteer, disguising himself, sived some of his effects, and published his piper the next day with a defiant note. He had had previous experience with mobs in New England, where he went about holding abolition meetings in company with George Thompson, an English agitator who was peculiarly obnoxious to the proslivery mind. Some specimens of his journalism are preserved in the three volunies of prose writings included in his complete works. These are probably inferior to his editorials that dealt with the shifting aspects of the anti-slavery struggle, for his prose was always best when he wrote from inward heat, and worst when he was consciously endeavouring to write attractively

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTH K
After a Photograph

From his apostrophe to Garrison in 1832 to his Laus Deo / which hailed the constitutional end of slavery in 1865, he had a poem for every striking incident of the anti-slavery conflict-one here applauding some heroic word or deed, one there denouncing some new recreancy or perfidy most famous, at the time, was his 'Ichabod1' which denounced the defection of Webster from the anti-slavery side in 1850, in his 'Seventh of March Speech' The politician gaining on the reformer in Whittier's double consciousness, he passed by easy stages from the Liberty to the Free Soil, and thence to the Republican party, each new stage less consistently abolitionist than the last A man of peace in virtue of his Quakerism, he beat his songs into swords and muskets in the time of the great Civil War

His literary life hardly began in any proper sense until 1857, when the Atlantic Monthly was launched, and he was at once taken on board, having a poem,

'The Gift of Tritemius,' in the first number, and one oftener than not in the succeeding numbers for a score of vears Before this door was opened. the National Lra had since 1847 furnished him with a semi-literary vehicle for ballads and poems of a religious character, apart from the main antislavery stress As early as 1843 there were enough of these to constitute a little book, Lays of my Home, and other Poems, which brought in a few dollars, as did not the anti-slavery collections of 1837 and 1849. Other poems indicative of his widening scope were gathered up in Songs of Labour (1850) and in The Panorama, and other Poems (1856), notably in this last the popular favourites 'Maud Muller' and 'The Barefoot Boy' But the Atlantic offered more encouragement to his less strenuous disposition than it had before enjoyed, and besides, as the great war drew to its close, the energy generated by the long inti slavery structele sought and found new avenues of expres The most of Whittiers best remembered things were written in the decade 1857-67, ballads so different as 'Skipper Ireson's Ride' and 'Anix Wentworth,' and poems of the macr life in which the personal note was clear and sweet. Such were 'My Psalm,' 'My Birthday,' 'My Triumph' 'My Soul and I," The Master, and 'The Eternal Good ness,' in which this direction of his tilent reached its firthest goal All these were poems of the Quakers 'inner light,' and made for the softening of the traditional New England creed and for inter sectarian amenity Si ore-Bound appeared in 1866, and tool the New England heart by With much that was intimately specialised after the forms of Whittier's personal experience, there was much that was representative of the New Lingland farmers life, so vividly presented that the dullest could not but respond to the reality of its characters and scenes Besides, the tenderness that brooded over a little world that was hopelessly passing away was a beguiling note. The Tent on the Beach (1867), following, fir off, the lead of Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, grouped in geniously some of his most effective ballads with poems of a more subjective character. He never married, but a considerable number of his poems hint the romance of his affections in a fashion that has piqued and baffled much tender curiosity 'Memories' and 'My Playmate' are among the best of these With much sensibility to the lovely ness of women, he had such appreciation of their spiritual gifts and graces as assured them a preponderance in the order of those friendships which were his life's best satisfactions and delights. Many the tributes paid to these in his too facile verse l Whittier suddenly woke up to find himself famous, and now his anti-slavery record could not too boldly leap to light What had long retarded now increased his fame, and The Tent on the Beach sold at a rate which Whittier could only with difficulty reconcile to his sense of the right relition of the poet's work to his reward Similar volumes followed The Tent on the Beach, but inferior in distinct degrees, and leaving Snow Bound solitary in its homely charm. For all the delicacy of his health, he lived, an object of increasing reverence and affection, till 7th September 1892, when he was nearly eights file years old

Of contemporary American poets he owed least to culture and formal education. Hence the defects of his poetry-its lack of compression, its contracted metrical range, its faulty rhymes and ungrammatical He was more poet than artist, spontaneous to the verge of improvisation, with no self restraint, spinning too long a thread. Of verbal felicity he lind little, save in his effective use of sonorous proper names. His poetry was eloquence, as if he had caught the accent of the anti-slavery heralds and champions. He was pre eminently the singer of the anti-slavery crusade, proudly saluting its living heroes and its honoured dead, the most representative of New England's poets, affectionately reminiscent of her lore of superstition and romance, and, most significantly, the poet of religious sympathy and hope and trust. Though he vrote few hymns, many have been detached from his poems and sung in churches of all *Protestant denominations, to the great enhance ment of his fame. With a less general following than Longfellow, he has had a much more cordial welcome among 'the plain people' and those who subordinate all other interests to those of the religious life.

From 'Massachusetts to Virginia.'

We hear thy threats, Virginia thy storms words and high.

Swell Inrally on the Southern wands which melt along our sky,

Yet, not one brown, hard hand forgoes its honest labour here,---

No hewer of our mountain oaks suspends his ave in fear

Wild are the waves which lish the reefs along St George's bink,—

Cold on the shore of Labrador the fog her white and dank,

Through storm, and wave, and blinding mist, stout are the hearts which man

The fishing smacks of Marblehead, the sea boats of Cape Ann.

We hunt your bondmen, flying from Slavers's hateful hell,-

Our voices, at your bidding take up the bloodhound's yell,-

We gather, at your sammons, above our fathers graves From Freedom's holy altar horns to tear your wretched slaves!

The voice of Massichusetts! Of her free sons and daughter,—

Deep calling an o deep aloud,—the sound of many waters?

Again the birden of that voice what tyran' pawer shall stand?

No felters in the Bas Scale! Lost west in Ler land!

Lool to it well, Virginians. In calminess we have borne,

In answer to our faith and tru t, your insult and your scorn

You've spurned our kindest counsels,-you've huntel for our lives,--

And shaken round our hearths and homes your manacles and gyves!

We wage no war,—we lift no arm,—we fling no torch within

The fire damps of the quaking mine beneath your soil of sin

We leave ye with your bondmen, to wrestle, while ye can.

With the strong upward tendencies and godhle soul of man'

But for us and for our children, the vow which ve have given

For freedom and humanity is registered in Heaven, Ao slave hunt in our lorders,—no firate on our strand!

No fetters in the Bay State,—no slave upon our land!

Ichabod i

So fallen' so lost' the light withdrawn
Which once he wore!
The glory from his gray hairs gone
For evermore!

Revale him not,—the Tempter hath
A snare for all,

And pitying tears, not scorn and wrath, Befit his fall !

O dumb be passion's stormy rage,
When he who might Have lighted up and led his age,
I all back in night.

Scorn! would the angels lugh, to mark A bright soul driven Fiend gorded, down the endless dark,

From hope and heaven!

Let not the land once proud of him Insult him now,

Nor brand with deeper shame his dim, Dishonoured brow

But let its humbled sons, instead, I rom sen to lake,

A long lament as for the dead, In sadness male

Of all we loved and honoured, naught
Save power remains,—

A fallen angel v prade of thought, Still strong in chairs

All else is gore from il ose great eves The soul has fled

When faith is lost a hen honour dies, The man is dead

Then pay the reve ence of old nave To his dead frice Walk backward, ni h avertal give Ar I hide the shame?

In School-Days

Still sits the school house by the road, A ragged beggar sunning, Around it still the sumachs grow, And blackberry vines are running

Within, the master's desk is seen,
Deep scarred by rips official,
The wirping floor, the battered seats,
The jack knife's curved initial,

The charcoal frescoes on its wall,
Its door's worn sill, betrnying
The feet that, creeping slow to school,
Went storming out to playing!

Long years ago a winter sim
Shone over it at setting,
Lit up its western window panes,
And low eaves' rey fretting

It touched the tangled golden curls, And brown eyes full of grieving, Of one who still her steps delayed When all the school were leaving

For near her stood the little boy
Her childish favour singled,
His cap pulled low upon a face
Where pride and shame were mingled

Pushing with restless feet the snow Lo right and left, he hingered,— As restlessly her tiny hands The blue checked apron fingered.

He saw her hit her eyes, he felt The soft hand's light caressing, And heard the tremble of her voice, As if a fault confessing

'I'm sorry that I spelt the word
I hate to go above yon,
Because,'—the brown eyes lower fell,—
'Because, you see, I love you!'

Still memory to a gray haired man That sweet child face is showing, Dear girl! the grasses on her grave Have forty years been growing!

He lives to learn, in life's hard school, How few who pass above him Lament their triumph and his loss, Like her,—because they love him.

From 'My Birthday'

Better than self indulgent years
The outflung heart of youth,
Than pleasant songs in idle years
The turnilt of the truth

Rest for the weary hands is good, And love for hearts that pine, But let the manly habitude Of upright souls be mine Let winds that blow from heaven refresh, Dear Lord, the languid air, And let the weakness of the flesh Thy strength of spirit share

And, if the eye must fail of light,
The ear forget to hear,
Make clearer still the spirit's sight,
More fine the inward ear!

Be near me in mine hours of need
To soothe, or cheer, or warn,
And down these slopes of sunset lead
As up the hills of morn '

From 'My Psalm'

All as God wills, who wisely heeds
To give or to withhold,
And knoweth more of all my needs
Than all my prayers have told!

Enough that blessings undeserved

IInve marked my erring track,—

That wheresoe'er my feet have swerved,

His chastening turned me back,—

That more and more a Providence
Of love is understood,
Making the springs of time and sense
Sweet with eternal good,—

That death seems but a covered way Which opens into light, Wherein no blinded child can stray Beyond the Father's sight,—

That care and trial seem at last, Through Memory's sunset air, Like mountain ranges overpast, In purple distance fair,—

That all the jarring notes of life Seem blending in a psalm, And all the angels of its strife Slow rounding into calm

And so the shadows fall npart,
And so the west winds play,
And all the windows of my heart
I open to the day

From 'Snow-Bound.'

Shut in from all the world without, We sat the clean winged hearth about, Content to let the north-wind roar In baffled rage at pane and door, While the red logs before us bent The frost line back with tropic heat, And ever, when a louder blast Shook beam and rafter as it passed, The merrier up its rouring draught The great throat of the chimney laughed The house dog on its paws outspread Laid to the fire his drowsy head, The cat's dark silhouette on the wall A couchant tiger's seemed to fall, And, for the winter fireside meet, Between the andirons straddling feet,

The mug of cider simmered slow, The apples spattered in a row, And, close at hand, the basket stood With nuts from brown October's wood

What matter how the night behaved? What matter how the north wind raved? Blow high, blow low, not all its snow Could quench our hearth fire s ruddy glow O Time and Change !- with hair as grav As was my sire's that winter day, How strange it seems, with so much gone Of life and love, to still live on I 1h, brother! only I and thou Are left of all that circle nov ,-The dear home faces whereupon That fitful firelight paled and shone Henceforward, listen as we will, The voices of that hearth are still, I ool where we may, the wide earth o'er, Those lighted faces smile no more We tread the paths their feet have worn, We sit beneath their orchard trees, We hear, like them, the hum of bees And rustle of the bladed corn, We turn the pages that they read, Their written words we linger o'er, But in the sun they cast no shade, No voice is heard, no sign is made, No step is on the conscious floor I Let I ove will dream, and Path will trust (Since He who I nows our need is just), That somehow, somewhere, meet we must Mas for him who never sees The stars shale through his cypress trees! Who, hopeless, Trys his dead away, Nor looks to see the breaking day Across the mournful marbles play I Who both not learned, in hours of futh, The truth to flesh and sense unknown, That Life is ever Lord of Death, And Love can never lose its oan '

The complete works of Whittier are published in seven volumes in the 'Riverside Edition' (1883) and the poems complete in a one-rolume edition the 'Cambridge (1891). The Life and Letters by S. T. Lickard (1894) is the official biography an excellent piece of work. Other biographies are Higginson's in American Men of Letters (1892) and Burton's very brief in Beacon Biographics (1900). The best critical study is E. C. Stedman's, in the Poets of American

Nathaniel Hawthorne,

the most distinguished writer of American fiction, was born in Salem, a coast town of Massachusetts, some dozen miles from Boston, on 4th July 1804 His ancestors were American from the time of the Nathaniel, a ser crptrin, fither first settlements of the novelist, died in 1808 For forty year, of widowhood his mother scaluded herself and seldom left her room. Two sisters were only a little less Here was an influence that nursed a similar liabit in the boy An accident at play sent him for companionship to books, which ranged from Shakespeare through Bunyan to the Newgate Calendar. In tastes and temperament the boy was father of the man His first teacher vas Worcester, the distinguished levicographer In 1813 the family removed to Raymond in Maine, which was then a province of Massachusetts Hunting and skating on the beautiful Sebigo Lake, and fishing in its clear waters, with much desultory reading, went far to constitute his Raymond life In 1819 he was back in Salem, reading If are they, preparing for college, and issuing the Spectator, which ran through four numbers, its circulation limited to a single copy. In 1820 lie already con templated the profession of authorship. In 1821 he entered Bowdom College in Brunswick, Maine, then recently founded, and better equipped with courage than with a faculty or funds

On his way to Brunswick, through New Hamp shire, he made the acquaintince of a Boudoin sophomore, Franklin Pierce, one of his best friends thercafter With Longfellow the poet, a class mate, he had slight acquaintince, but was re membered by him as 'a handsome, brshful youth, with a low, musical voice? Longfellow was one of the more studious set, Hauthorne one of the less studious. He was indifferent to sports, but mildly convivial, and his gambling was made if subject of correspondence with his mother by the president of the college. The stales vere fifty cents worth of nine. At the conclusion of his college course we have the reflection of his netual feelings in Farshare, his first novel, where he says that in the inmost heart of his hero there was a dream of undying fame. In spite of his dissursion, his mother and sisters had returned to Salem, and he joined them there in 1825, and entered at once upon a period of seclusion that dragged its slow length along for a full dozen we re- He had no intimize even with his mother and sister-Often his meals were left outside the door of his Most of his walking a cept that or his longer excursions was done after da l was a good local library, in which he burrowed deep, and, had be not disdained hem, there were michigence and culture in the fire old town that might have served him well. The colour of his brooding solitude ared in the roof the texture of the funcies that he wove asside with, will little I hope of mal mg them attractive to his fellow men

His resolve to live by his pen must have seemed madness to his immediate family and other relatives, but something masterful in his nature prevailed over such opposition as was made. It is a natural incident of the dim, half featured life he led that much doubt attaches to the earliest productions of his pen Seven Tales of my Native Land, written while he was still at college or later, were burned in despair of finding a publisher they set the chimney on fire is probably a fanci ful suggestion of what they might have done the popular mind lanshawe was published anonymously in 1828, and was received coldly that Hawthorne's own regard for it was chilled, and he endeavoured to call in and destroy the purchased conics If the Seven Tales were actually burned, there soon rose from their ashes birds of like feather, eertain Provincial Tales, several of which were published in The Token, one of the many annuals of which there was a prolific growth in the fore part of the nineteenth century But Goodrich, the publisher of The Token. better known as

'Pcter Parley,' was for ten years so friendly to Hawthorne that he deserved better thanks than Hawthorne gave him when at length they parted company Yet Hawthorne might well feel himself ill used when he received $100 for Peter Parley's Universal History, and nothing additional when 100,000 copies had been sold In 1834 he found another vehicle for his stories, the New England Magazine, and further on the Knicker bocker Magazine, the Democratic Review, and other once flourishing periodicals. If 'he was for a good many years the obscurest man of letters in America,' as he wrote in 1851, it was partly his own fault Written under several pseudonams, his sketches made a slighter impression than if they had all gone to the credit of an acknowled, ed author The habit of anonymity was so strong with him that he often lapsed into it after I a friendly hand had gently snatched away hismask. The depth of his discouragement at this time was so great that Bridge, his best loved college mate, made a bold push to publish at his own risk a volume of his pieces, and the first volume of Truice Told Tales appeared in 1837 The response was not eager, but some of the reviews were favourable, Longfellow's the one most prized The twenty sketches, selected from a much larger number, represented sufficiently the breadth of Hawthorne's narrow range. More than three times as many were added in sub sequent volumes. a second series of Invice Told Tales in 1842, Mosses from an Old Manse in 1846, and The Snow Image and other Tales in 1851 By this time The Scarlet Letter was published, and the minor tales ac aured from this a sympathetics ogue The short stories reached their term when the first one longer าก peared The whole series is written in a pellueid style which, if not per fect from the start, was, in its most characteristic qualities, the free gift of Heaven delicate Α sometimes trivial

humour played over the surface of these stories or was inherent in their grain Cheerful they seldom were But the idea that their pervasive sadness was subjective is easily discredited The most gloomy flowers of his invention are those which blossomed on the stem of a most happy period, that of his first married years. The problems of sin and evil on which so many of the stories turn were not the fruits of Hawthorne's moral experience, but of his intellectual curiosity They were the plaything survivals of the Puritan engagement with the dark side of life. The per sonal aspect was less disclosed in such painful allegories as 'The Birth-Mark' and 'The Bosom Serpent' than in such pleasant pieces as 'The Old Apple-Dealer' and 'Little Annie's Ramble.' The whole series falls into three kinds those fancifully illuminating some biographical or historical inci dent, minute descriptions of things seen and heard, and those of an allegorical character Many tend to this, and in the best examples, such as 'The Snow Image' and 'The Great Carbuncle,' the story and the moral are perfectly assimilated, in others, such as 'The Bosom Scrpent,' the assimilation is less perfect or obviously mechanical the fanciful histories 'The Gray Champion' is a notable example Hawthorne is nowhere more satisfactory than when he attempts least, as in 'Sights from a Steeple' and 'Footprints on the Sea-Shore' But he is no realist Though he was a keen observer, everything observed was subject to the transfiguration of his fancy is very instructive to compare a certain walk in the American Note-Books with 'Footprints on the Sea-Shore' The Note-Books, American, English, Italian, are eloquent of Hawthorne's objectivity They were published after his death, in 1868, 1870, 1871, in the above order

While Hawthorne was musing on these simpler or remoter things, the circumstances of his life had varied much from the monotony of the period preceding his first collective publication. In 1837 he had fallen in love with Sophia Peabody, and they were married in 1842 She was one of three sisters remarkable for their culture and intelligence She was nothing if not enthusiastic and ecstatic A hole in her husband's dressing-gown was 'an appalling vacuum,' and her whole life was pitched to the superlative key, but she and Hawthorne loved each other with a great and never diminishing affection, and enjoyed the best things of literature and art together. She worshipped him, and he laid upon himself the lowliest duties to make her life less arduous She was a chronic anvalid when Hauthorne met her in her Salem home, but she did not even have to wait, like Mrs Browning, for marriage to effect her cure The prospect of it was enough. In 1839 Hawthorne's political friends found a place for him in the Boston Custom House It was a sharp transition from the imponderables he had been weighing to iron and coal, and salt which was not of the Attic kind His invention wholly failed, and even at Brook Farm, whither be betook himself when turned out of office by the triumphant Whigs, his literary production was singularly 'barren of new pride,' some children's Biographical Stories and The Grandfather's Chair being the chief gains Brook Firm was the most idealistic of the American attempts to establish an economic and ethical community It attracted Hawthorne because his disposition was social despite his isolating temperament. He justly described his short stories as 'attempts to open an intercourse with the world' His Brook Farm experiment was another and not more successful Pitching manure or milking a recalcitrating cow was little to his mind. The social conditions pleased him no better, and he left the community in disjust, having in his year's residence sunk about $1000 of his hard-earned money. His marriage followed soon, and he took his wife to Concord, where they made their home in the 'Old Manse' under whose roof Emerson had written Aature, and close by the bridge of revolutionary fame. The life here would have been idyllic but for the difficulty of making both ends meet panions he had Emerson, Thoreau, and Ellery Channing, whom he enjoyed as men while indifferent to their intellectual character It was easier for Hawthorne to meet people on the plane of his lower tastes than on that of his literary vocation And so it happened that when he was made surveyor of the Salem Custom-House in 1846 he was more at home with his subordinates and the old salts who hung about the place than he had been with the Concord set His introduction to The Scarlet Letter described the men and manners of the Custom House in a fashion little relished by the persons indicated and their friends. When he wrote this he had again been turned out of office. nominally for 'offensive partisanship' a fault of which he was incapable. He was much embittered by the transaction, fancying that, not having been appointed for political reasons, he should not be dropped for such reasons But his loss proved to be all men's gain. For three years his mind had been as fruitless as during his Boston weighing and gauging He now wrote The Scarlet Letter That genial publisher, James T Fields, deserves much credit for its ultimate form He sought Hawthorne out in his moping solitude and charged him with having a story or stories concealed in a set of drawers which stood in his chamber Hawthorne at first denied the charge, but as Fields was leaving, hurried after him with a manuscript, which was The Scarlet Letter in its original form It was con ceived as a short story, but as the longest one that Later Fields persunded him to he had written rewrite it on a larger scale. Published in 1850, it achieved at once a notable success, and soon after Hawthorne, with every expression of contempt, shook off the dust of Salem from his feet for ever

The Scarlet Letter is one of the most powerful It is unconand affecting stories ever written scionably dark and sad. The only bright spot in it is the scarlet letter upon Hester's breast Little Pearl, the offspring of Hester's and Arthur Dimmesdale's sinful passion, sheds but a strange, uncomfortable light upon the scene. The Puritan community is but faintly realised. The few leading characters appear against a background of un natural dark Nothing is told us of the rise and progress of the guilty passion. The tragedy, which runs its course less in an outward scene than in the breasts of the three principal dramatis persona, is the tendency of a secret sin to magnify itself by feeding on the better self, and 'the purifying influence of public confession,' so much insisted on by George Lliot, is the remedial note. If, as some complain, there is no di me forgiveness in the story, there is human pity for the sinful pair. The heart of the reader is more enlisted on their side than on that of the Puritan community, and their souls are white compared with that of Roger Chillingworth, the husband of the guilty woman, whose whole being is resolved into a principle of immitigable hatred and revenge

Public approval renewed Hawthorne's spirit, and the years 1850-53 were the most productive of his whole career For a part of this time he lived in Lenox, Massachusetts, amidst the beauty of the Berkshire hills and streams, of which, strangely But there he wrote The enough, he soon tired House of the Seven Gables and, for his children's 10). The Wonder Book and Tanglewood Tales, in which the old Greek myths took on the colour of his fancy for the perennial delight of boys and girls If The Scarlet Letter continued the tradition of the short stories by being a longer one of their kind, The House of the Seven Gables continued it in being more an aggregation of parts than an organic whole. Hawthorne loved the book because it was his 'Little Annie's Rambles' Of all his full and such things writ large grown romances it is the pleasantest, made so by Phœbe Pyncheon's comfortable sweetness final cause, determining the movement of the story, is the decay of a family under the stress of an inherited curse, inherent in the Pyncheon house. Here the house serves that symbolic purpose for which Hawthorne must always have one concrete The characters are seen more object or another 'in the round' than those of The Scarlet Letter But Judge Pyncheon is less a character than a malicious portrait of the Salem magnate by whom, in the matter of the Custom-House, Hawthorne considered himself wronged

If Hawthorne's stay at Brook Farm was immediately fruitless, it left seeds in his mind from which sprang The Bhthedale Romance, a novel generally relegated to the foot of the series, but one that has staunch friends. It took up into itself much of the scenery and some of the people of the farm, but neither with any aim at veri-That Zenobia was a faithful portrait sımılıtude of Margaret Fuller, a woman of brilliant and wayward genius, was denied by Hawthorne as flatly as by her friends There was certainly no portrait of Ripley, the noble founder of the community, in the repulsive character of Hollingsworth, who points the moral of the egotistic reformer who has no human heart by which he lives effect of this satire was to mark Hawthorne's divergence in reform matters from the other New England men of letters, and it prepares us to find him simultaneously writing a 'campaign life' of Franklin Pierce, then a candidate for the presi dency of the United States in the pro slavery interest A more sincere 'campaign life' was never written It was not written with an eye to the lucrative office which Hawthorne could not but know his friend's election would assure him, but as 1 token of gratitude for Pierce's unfailing kindness One of the least of presidents, he was one of the best of friends. He was elected, and he made Hawthorne consul at Liverpool, one of the best positions in his gift. This was in 1853, and he left Concord, where he had been living in a house called 'The Wayside' for a year, and his native country, and took ship for England, hoping he might never return, so out of tune was he with his anti-slavery friends. In Liverpool he hated his business as before in the Boston and Salem seats of custom, but discharged it faithfully, doing his best to right the wrongs of sailors in distress In England, as in America, his distaste for literary society was pronounced, and he met none of its leaders His English Note-Books exhibit him as keenly observant of English scenery and life. The best parts of these he condensed in Our Old Home, a book which gave much offence in England, though it had not more than Hawthorne's usual predilection for the seamy side, and more in America, because he dedicated it in a simple manly fashion to ex-President Pierce In 1857 he resigned his office and exchanged his 'black and miserable hole' in Liverpool for a residence in Italy of two years' duration There, at first, he felt more at home than he had ever been, and lived a social life with the Brownings and others But his daughter fell dangerously sick with Roman fever, and Rome was cursed for him by this expenence. 'I bitterly detest it,' he wrote, 'and shall rejoice to bid farewell to it for ever' Besides, he felt that he must breathe the fogs of England or the east winds of Massachusetts to be again in working trim Nevertheless he began The Marble Faun, and finished it in England, where it was published in 1860, entitled Transformation title gives the idea of the story, whereas the American title indicates the symbol to which Hawthorne fastened his ingenious fancy as to Hester Prynne's scarlet letter and Zenobia's flower It is a story of the development of spiritual character through experience, Donatello, the faun, being made a man by his destruction of Miriam's besetting fiend The passage describing the murder and what followed is not excelled in the whole range of Hawthorne's work. But there is a slackened grip on the characters from this psychological moment to the end Miriam, the principal character, is realised only less powerfully than Zenobia and Hester Prynne. Here as everywhere we are permitted to see the characters only from the point of view of Hawthorne's intense preoccupation Many whom the story alarms and repels enjoy it for its discursive treatment of Roman pictures, ruins, &c., a more curious than final aspect of the book. There was no such assimilation here as in the Salem work, but a difference from that as in George Eliot's Romola from her Adam Bede

The interval between his return to America in 1860 and his sudden death, 19th May 1864, was an unhappy time. There was the sense of failing health and failing intellectual power. Four fragmentary studies - The Ancestral Footstop, Septimius Felton, Dr Grimshawe's Secret, and The Dolliver Romance-are all painful gropings on the elusive track of a single idea that could not be firmly caught and held He had no power to 'see tt steadily and see it whole' Another burden was that of the Civil War and his mability to take either side with heartiness. He went to the front and looked upon the scenes transacted there, wrote of them with a singular detachment, and saw President Lincoln with as little penetration as the dullest in those times. He had lived so long with shadows that he had no vital apprehension of the nation's agony in the birth-throes of a new and better time. There is a striking incongruity between the moonlit or twilight scene and atmosphere of his books and the bright glare of our contemporary life, here so much noise and shouting, there low and whispered tones But even those who are well pleased with the immediate time should certainly be glad sometimes to draw apart with Hawthorne into a scene so different from that of their liabitual life as his mysterious world.

From 'The Great Stone Face'

[This allegory was suggested by the Old Man of Profile Mountain, in the Franconia Notch of the White Mountains, a remarkable resemblance in the high cliff to a human face.]

It was a happy lot for children to grow up to man hood or womanthood with the Great Stone Face before their eyes, for all the features were noble, and the expression was at once grand and sweet, as if it were the glow of a vast, warm heart, that embraced all mankind in its affections, and had room for more. It was an education only to look at it. According to the belief of many people, the valley owed much of its fertility to this benign aspect that was continually beaming over it, illuminating the clouds and infusing its tenderness into the sunshine. As we began with saying, a mother and her little boy sat at their cottage door, gazing at the Great Stone Face, and talking about it. The cliild's name vas Ernest

'Mother,' said he, while the Titanie visage smiled on him, 'I wish that it could speak, for it looks so very kindly that its voice must needs be pleasant. If I were to see a man with such a face I should love him dearly.'

'If an old prophecy should come to pass,' answered his mother, 'we may see a man, some time or other, with exactly such a face as that'

'What prophecy do you mean, dear mother?' eagerly inquired Ernest 'Pray, tell me all about it'

So his mother told him a story that her own mother had told to her when she herself was younger than little Ernest, a story, not of things that were past, but of what was yet to come, a story, nevertheless, so very old that even the Indians, who formerly inhabited this valley, had heard it from their forefathers, to whom, as they affirmed, it had been murmured by the mountain streams, and whispered by the wind among the tree tops. The purport was, that, at some future day, a child should be born hereabouts who was destined to become the greatest and noblest personage of his time, and whose counten ance in manhood should bear an exact resemblance to the Great Stone Face. Not a few old fashioned people, and young ones likewise, in the ardour of their hopes, still cherished an enduring faith in this old prophecy But others, who had seen more of the world, had watched and waited till they were weary, and had beheld no man with such a face, nor any man that proved to be much greater or nobler than his neighbours, concluded it to be nothing but an idle tale. At all events, the great man of the prophecy had not yet appeared

'O mother, dear mother '' cried Ernest, elapping his hands above his head, 'I do hope that I shall live to see him ''

His mother was an affectionate and thoughtful woman, and felt that it was wisest not to discourage the generous hopes of her little boy, so she only said to him, 'Perliaps you may'

[The story describes Mr Gathergold and a great general and statesman for whom a resemblance to the Great Stone Face was claimed and finally a poet in whom Ernest himself imagined a likeness. But the poet protested that he did not live the poems that he wrote ]

The poet spoke sadly, and his eyes were dim with tears So, likewise, were those of Ernest.

At the hour of sunset, as had long been his frequent custom, Ernest was to discourse to an assemblage of the neighbouring inhabitants in the open air. He and the poet, arm in arm, still talking together as they went along, proceeded to the spot. It was a small nook among the hills, with a gray precipice behind, the stern front of which was relieved by the pleasant foliage of many creeping plants, that made a tapestry for the naked rock, by hanging their festoons from all its rugged angles At a small elevation above the ground, set in a rich framework of verdure, there appeared a niche, spacious enough to admit a human figure, with freedom for such gestures as spontaneously accompany earnest thought and genuine emotion. Into this natural pulpit Ernest ascended, and threw a look of familiar kindness around upon his audience. They stood, or sat, or reclined upon the grass, as seemed good to each, with the departing sunshine falling obliquely over them, and mingling its subdued cheerfulness with the solemnity of a grove of ancient trees, beneath and amid the boughs of which the golden rays were constrained to pass. In another direction was seen the Great Stone Face, with the same cheer, combined with the same solemnity, in its benignant aspect

Ernest began to speak, giving to the people of what was in his heart and mind. His words had power, because they accorded with his thoughts, and his thoughts had reality and depth, because they harmonised with the life which he had always lived. It was not mere breath that this preacher uttered, they were the words of life, because a life of good deeds and holy love was melted into them Pearls, pure and rich, had been dissolved into this precious draught. The poet, as he listened, felt that the being and character of Ernest were a nobler strain of poetry than he had ever written eyes glistening with tears, he gazed reverentially at the venerable man, and said within himself that never was there an aspect so worthy of a prophet and a sage as that mild, sweet, thoughtful countenance, with the glory of white hair diffused about it. At a distance, but dis timethy to be seen, high up in the golden light of the setting sun, appeared the Great Stone Face, with heary mists around it, like the white hairs around the brow of Ernest Its look of grand beneficence seemed to embrace the world At that moment, in sympathy with a thought which he was about to utter, the face of Ernest assumed a grandeur of expression, so imbued with benevolence that the poet, by an irresistible impulse, threw his arms aloft and shouted, 'Behold! Behold! Ernest is himself the likeness of the Great Stone Face!'

Then all the people looked, and saw that what the deep sighted poet said was true. The prophecy was fulfilled. But Ernest, having finished what he had to say, took the poet's arm, and walked slowly homeward, still hoping that some wiser and better man than limself would by and by appear, bearing a resemblance to the Great Stone Face

The Minister's Vigil.

Walking in the shadow of a dream, as it were, and perhaps actually under the influence of a species of som nambulism. Mr Dimmesdale reached the spot where, now so long since, Hester Prynne had lived through her first hour of public ignominy. The same platform or scaffold, black and weather stained with the storm or sunshine of seven long years, and footworn, too, with the tread of many culprits who had since ascended it, remained standing beneath the baleony of the meeting house. The minister went up the steps

It was an obscure night of early May An unvaried pall of cloud muffled the whole expanse of sky from zenith to horizon. If the same multitude which had stood as eye witnesses while Hester Prynne sustained her punishment could now have been summoned forth, they would have discerned no face above the platform, nor hardly the outline of a human shape, in the dark gray of the midnight. But the town was all asleep. There was no peril of discovery The minister might stand there, if it so pleased him, until morning should redden in the east, without other risk than that the dank and chill night air would creep into his frame, and stiffen his joints with rheumatism, and elog his throat with catarrh and cough, thereby defrauding the expectant audience of to morrow's prayer and sermon No eye could see him, save that ever wakeful one which had seen him in his closet wielding the bloody scourge Why, then, had he come hither? Was it but the mockery of penitence? A mockery, indeed, but in which his soul trifled with itself! A mockery at which angels blushed and wept, while fiends rejoiced with jeering laughter! He had been driven hither by the impulse of that Remorse which dogged him everywhere, and whose own sister and closely linked companion was that Cowardice which invariably drew him back, with her tremulous grip, just when the other impulse had hurried him to the verge of a diselosure. Poor, miserable man! what right had infir mity like his to burden itself with erime? Crime is for the iron nerved, who have their choice either to endure it, or, if it press too hard, to evert their fierce and savage strength for a good purpose, and fling it off at once I This feeble and most sensitive of spirits could do neither, yet continually did one thing or another, which inter twined, in the same inextricable knot, the agony of Heaven defying guilt and vain repentance

And thus, while standing on the scaffold, in this vain show of expiation, Mr Dimmesdale was overcome with a great horror of mind, as if the universe were gazing at a scarlet token on his naked breast, right over his heart On that spot, in very truth, there was, and there had long been, the gnawing and poisonous tooth of bodily pain Without any effort of his will, or power to restrain himself, he shricked aloud, an outery that went pealing through the night, and was beaten back from one house to another, and reverberated from the hills in the back ground, as if a company of devils, detecting so much misery and terror in it, had made a plaything of the sound, and were bandying it to and fro

'It is done!' muttered the minister, covering his free with his hands 'The whole town will awake, and hurry forth, and find me here!'

But it was not so. The shrick had perhaps sounded with a far greater power to his own startled ears than it actually possessed. The town did not awake, or, if it did, the drows; slumberers mistook the cry either for something frightful in a dream, or for the noise of witches, whose voices, at that period, were often heard to pass over the settlements or lonely cottages, as they rode with Satan through the air. The elergyman, there fore, hearing no symptoms of disturbance, uncovered his eyes and looked about him

Shortly afterwards the like grisly sense of the humor ous again stole in among the solemn plantoms of his thought He felt his limbs growing stiff with the unic customed chilliness of the night, and doubted whether he should be able to descend the steps of the scaffold Morning would break, and find him there The neigh bourhood would begin to rouse itself. The earliest riser, coming forth in the dim twilight, would perceive a viguely defined figure aloft on the place of shine, and, half crazed betwixt alarm and curiosity, would go, knocking from door to door, summoning all the people to behold the ghost—as he needs must think it—of some defunct transgressor. A dusky tumult would flap its wings from one house to another All people, in a word, would come stumbling over their thresholds, and turning up their amazed and horror stricken visages around the scaffold Whom would they discern there, with the red eastern light upon his brow? Whom but the Reverend Arthur Dimmesdale, half frozen to death, overwhelmed with shame, and standing where Hester Prynne had stood!

Carried away by the grotesque horror of this picture, the minister, unawares, and to his own infinite alarm, burst into a great peal of laughter. It was immediately responded to by a light, airy, childish laugh, in which, with a thrill of the heart—but he knew not whether of exquisite pain or pleasure as acute—he recognised the tones of little Pearl.

'Pearl! Little Pearl!' cried he, after a moment's pause, then, suppressing his voice—'Hester! Hester Prynne! Are you there?'

'Yes, it is Hester Prynne!' she replied, in a tone of surprise, and the minister heard her footsteps approaching from the side walk, along which she had been passing 'It is I, and my little Pearl'

'Whence come you, Hester?' asked the minister 'What sent you hither?'

'I have been watching at a death bed,' answered Hester Prynne—'at Governor Winthrop's death bed, and have taken his measure for a robe, and am now going homeward to my dwelling'

'Come up hither, Hester, thou and little Pearl,' said the Reverend Mr Dimmesdale 'Ye have both been here before, but I was not with you Come up lither once again, and we will stand all three together'

She silently ascended the steps, and stood on the plat

The minister form, holding little Pearl by the hand felt for the child's other hand, and took it The moment that he did so there came what seemed a tumultuous rush of new life, other life than his own, pouring like a torrent into his heart, and hurrying through all his veins, as if the mother and the child were communicating their vital warmth to his half torpid system. The three formed an electric chain

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK

Abraham Lincoln (1809-65), President of the United States at the crisis of his country's fortunes, rose nobly to the occasion. His other services to the Republic need no comment in this place, but though he was as far as possible removed from what usually constitutes the man of letters, he has carned to all time a place in the literature of his country by his letters, his State papers, his speeches, and especially by his two inaugural addresses and the address, quoted below at the dedication of the Getty sburg National Ceme tery in November 1863.

The Gettysburg Address

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have conse crated it for above our power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember, what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedi cated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honoured dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devo tion, that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain, that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that govern ment of the people, by the people, and for the people, shall not perish from the earth

William Wetmore Story (1819-95), son of an eminent judge, publicist, and law professor, was born at Salem, Massachusetts, and trained for the Bar, but went to Italy (1848) and became a sculptor, and his writings rank him amongst American litterateurs-besides poenis, Roba di Roma (1862), The Tragedy of Nero (1875), The Castle of St Angelo (1877), He and She (1883), Frammetta (1885), Conversations in a Studio, Excursions (1891), and A Poet's Portfolio (1894) Life by Henry James is a masterpiece (1903)

Charles Godfrey Leland (1824-1903), des tined to be known to fame as 'Hans Breitmann,' was born of Quaker parentage in Philadelphia, graduated at Princeton, and continued his studies at Heidelberg, Munich, and Paris He was admitted to the Philadelphia Bar in 1851, but turned to journalism, and residing chiefly in England and Italy from 1869 on, made a special study of the Gypsies, the fruits of which appeared between 1873 and 1891 in four important and much discussed works. It was in 1871 that the famous Hans Brutmann Ballads, in the grotesque mixture of German and American-English known as Pennsylvania Dutch, first appeared, they were extraordinarily popular in America and Britain, and were constantly quoted, so that scraps of them are permanent parts of conversational English even now A continuation in 1895, however, fell Other works of Leland's, some of them results of serious research not unmingled with too confident speculation, are The Poetry and Mystery of Dreams (1855), Meister Karl's Sketch-Book (1855), Legends of Birds (1864), Egyptian Sketch-Book (1873), Fu-Sang, or the Chinese Discovery of America (1875), Algonquin Legends (1884), Etruscan-Roman Remains in Tradition (1892), a translation in prose and verse of Heine's works, a series of art manuals, Legends of Florence (1895), and Ilaxius, or Leaves from the Life of an Immortal, a humorous melange of Italian folk lore, ancient history, and prophecy, besides his own Memoirs (2 vols 1893)

His Nile Notes of a Howady: (1851) and The Howady: 111 Syrra (1852) were bright—and light—impressions of his travels, Lotus Lating (1852) was a series of letters from fashionable watering-places More famous in their day were The Potiphar Papers (1853), satires on the pretentious life of New York. He was a strong anti-slavery orator and publicist, and a zealous writer in the cruse of Civil Service reform See Lives of him by Winter (1893), Chadnick (1893), and Cary (1894)

Edgar Allan Poc,

poet, romancer, and critic, was born in Boston, Massachusetts, 19th January 1809 His grandfather was General David Poe, a distinguished Maryland soldier of the Revolutionary War His father and mother were actors of a travelling company which, spending three years in Boston, made possible the accident of his birth in a city which the grown man could not, as his dying The mother's talent and mother bade him, love character were superior to the father's, poverty and ill health they shared more evenly mother died in 1811, the father soon after, pro bably Here for the boy was, apparently, singular good fortune He was informally adopted by a Mr Allan of Richmond, Virginia, a tobacco merchant who had no children of his own From 1815 to 1820 the Allans lived in England, and the boy, though injured by their indulgence, hid good schooling at the Manor House School at Stoke Newington, and in Richmond from 1820 to 1826, when he entered the University of Virginia. The death in 1824 of a lady who had been particularly kind to him, and to whom he was devotedly attached, was the occasion of his first inclancholy brooding upon death, the fived idea of his life the university his habits were at once studious and convivial, he excelled in Latin, also in gainbling -so much so that his guardian, refusing to pay his 'debts of honour,' took him home and set him at work in his counting room. Thereupon he ran away to Boston, where, in 1827, he published Tamerlane and other Poems, a tiny book of forty pages in an edition of forty copies, as if prescient of the narrow chances of future bibliophiles He con cealed his name from his twoscore public and also from his publisher, as he had done a little earlier when enlisting in the United States arms, where for two years he did himself no discredit Allan dving in 1829, his quarrel with Mr Allan was superficially made up, and he was sent to the West Point Military Academy, on his way visiting Baltimore, and while there publishing Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Minor Poems It contained five poems which, in addition to three in the Boston bibelot, grew at length into something lovely under his pruning hand At West Point, where he entered 1st July 1830, he did well in mathematics and other studies, but was so recklessly neglectful of his military duties that he was expelled from the Academy in March 1831, 'the contriver of his own dishonour' While he had been roistering the poetic fire had burned, and a parting subscription of the students enabled him to print, if not publish, a new volume of poems. It was not what the students expected-sparks from their burnt-out revelries—but his earlier poems in their first revision, with some new ones, among these the perfect 'Israfel' This volume, like its two thinbodied herilds, was long since worth ten times its weight in gold to the collectors of rare books

The next two years are vaguer for the biographer than Poe's poetical geography Poe lumself filled them with an imaginary journey to Russia bably they were spent in Baltimore with his aunt Mrs Clemm, the good angel of his life In 1833 he entered gaily on that literary career which was to liave so many sharp vicissitudes, so much more of disappointment thris of encouragement and assured success. Answering an advertisement for a $100 prize story and poem, he won the former with his MS found in a Bottle, and would have won the latter with his Coliscum could both prizes have been given to one person. The lucly story lins now a place among the best of his stories of matter of fact impossible adventure, his lovest rank except the would be liumorous.

Meantime by forging Mr Allan's name he had hardened against limself that gentleman's heart, had later forced his way in a drunlen passion into Mrs Allan's cliamber (Mr Allan had tal en a second wife), and still later upon Mr Allan's dving hours, and was not so much as mentioned in his benefactor's vill Turning to thoughts of love for consolution, in September 1834 he tool out a license of marriage with his cousin Virginia Clemni, a lovely child who had just turned thirteen some years his pet, she had come to worship him and he nov responded to her worship with an affection that was without any shidow of turning until her melancholy end. It is doubtful whether there was a formal marriage in 1834, seeing that n new license was tal en out in 1836 in Richmond, followed by a marriage ceremony Poc had returned to Richmond in 1835, and there for a time his prospects as editor of the Southerr Laterary Messenger were bright Two volumes of his collected works are filled with his two years' work on the Messenger, including some of his most memorable things. His industry must have been remarkable, and now, as always, he had an evacting conscience for his work, in singular contrast with the weakness of his tempted will His employer was soon warning him of the danger of drinking before breakfast, so that the loss of his position in 1837 was not wholly mysterious After a brief stay in New York, during which he published the Narrative of Arthur Gordon Pym, another of his matter of fact impossibilities, he went to Philadelphia, a better literary market, and remained there six years, in the struggle for a living doing such doubtful hack-work as the Conchologist's First Book, while still the stream of his creative and critical talent flowed into every channel it could find. Making a good fight with his proclivity to drink, for some four years lie lived a more temperate life than ever before or after in his adult years. Of various engagements that with Graham's Magazine was the most stable, and did for it what his connection with the Richmond Messenger had done for that-bringing it thousands of subscribers and wide popularity. It was mainly as a critic that he made his mark, less but increasingly as a writer of tales, hardly at all as His early poems, however, were apt to reappear in the tales and to furnish their points of departure, as 'The Haunted Palace' in his most perfect tale, The Fall of the House of Usher, and 'Ligeia' in the powerful but ghastly tale of the same name. Here was legitimate economy, but no one ever utilised his 'funeral baked meats' more openly He warmed them over with sublime assurance that, however served, they made a The repetend, his favourite poetitempting dish cal device, was central to the manner of his literary and personal life, which had much that was highly significant and much 'damnable iteration' In 1840 Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, in two volumes, bound up a full sheaf of his tales, including many of the best but not any of the ratiocinative kind which The Golden Bug was soon to usher in Meantime, proud and ambitious, he fretted in subordination to his inferiors and aspired to have a magazine of his own, the Penn or Stylus, neither of which ever came to birth Could he have kept his besetting sin at bay, his success as a journalist, already enviable, would have become one of the proudest of his time, but this he could not do, especially after the beginning, with a broken blood vessel, of his childwise's fatal illness in 1842 This filled him with a passionate despair Though he was never an habitual drunkard, his periods of indulgence now became more frequent, each marked by wild excitement, followed by horrible lassitude and depression The conflicting accounts of his character and beliaviour mark the difference between Philip drunk and Philip sober The latter was gracious, gentle, and refined, the former bitter, sour, contentious, the victim of degenerate will To drink he added opium, which, if it sometimes touched his page to more ethereal fancs, exacted fearful penalties Rumours of 'other vices' are Even his most sensuous without foundation imagination was never sensual

In 1844 he removed to New York, where his principal editorial connection was with the Broadway Journal, of which for a short and brilliant period lie was the nominal owner In 1845 he entered with The Raven on a second period of poetical production, after a fallow period of fifteen years' duration, except for the refashioning of his The Raven did more for his early crudities reputation than all his reviews and tales Bells (1847) chimed in, and other poems followed, of less popular character, but of more invardness and more exquisite beauti. From 1846 his health ins utterly broken, and his poverty was made a subject of public notice and relief. Those who wonder at his chronic impecuniosity and inveterate borrowing should remember the miserable pay he got for his best work. The good aunt kept his home as next as it was bare, the neatness a neccssity of his personal refinement, as was the delicate hand in which he always wrote, as if never putting pen to paper when fallen from his best estate always had a genius for attracting friends, too frequently disappointing them and wearing out their kindly disposition. In January 1847 the crowning misery befell, the death of poor little Virginia had then two years to hye. These he so conducted that the most charitable, and probably the truest, explanation is that drink, opium, and sorrow had shaken sovereign reason from her seat long-drawn futility of his pseudo-scientific Eurela does not require this construction, what does is his vain insistence on a first edition of fifty thou sand copies and his claim for its worthless and vet powerful lucubrations of a revolutionary importance equal to Newton's theory of gravitation From his sorrow for his lost Virginia lie passed quickly to a series of sentimental consolutions, looking liere and there to marriage, and a union of sordid convenience had been negotiated in Richmond when a fatal lapse in Baltimore betraved him into the hands of certain vile politicians who, drugging him for their base uses, induced a brain fever of which he died, 7th October 1849 In the city of his first literary triumph he was followed to his grave by five persons, one of whom was the officiating clergyman

His mournful death effected his entrance on a posthumous career which has been marked by stranger vicissitudes than those of his life. The details of that life have been contested in many particulars, its general character no less. A host of petty critics, with others of great competency, have endeavoured to assign his rank, with results ranging through wide degrees of difference principal line of cleavage is between those who value most his poems and those who value most his tales, but some have set the highest value on his critical writings. These made his widest reputation in their day, but they have little value nov except for the literary historian. If they were not the best of their kind in America when written, they were near to that, while marred by envy, favouritism, and a distorting personal equation He made himself the measure of things - W lint he could not do must not be done Hence (face Homer) a long poem could not be written, nor (pace Scott) a long story Didacticism and plagrarism were the Paynim against whom he tilted with the grimmest joy of battle. former he was wholly innocent, of the latter often guiltier than those whom he assailed, while in his bravery of recondite learning he was frequently the ingenious charlatan

Passing from his criticism to his tales, we pass from transient reputation to enduring fame. Their style commends them all, while, bettering with time, it is, at its best, far below the level of Hawthornes more flexible medium. They exhibit the tendency to narrowness of range and iteration, which mail all the products of his mind, far less than the poems. A sentiment of horror is their prevailing trut, engagement with death and ruin running parallel thereto, the idea worked out with a concentration that subordinates every detail to the desired effect. In each kind there are various degrees, and the kinds have an ascension of their own. The lowest is the humorous, in which Poe comes near to making us laugh at him rather than with him. Let Duc de Omelette witness as a forlorn example. Of biting irony he had enough Higher up we have the psychology of intensive fear and horror in such things as Berenice, Ligita, and the House of Usher. He is at his best when he comes nearest, as in the last of these, to working in Hawthorne's spirit. In his great conscience stories, with William Wilson at their

EDGAR ALLAN POE.
After a Photograph by Whitehurst head, his experience of the pains of conscience does not serve him so well as Hawthorne's impersonal imagination He was more external than Hawthorne, more mechanical, but such a master of the curiously horrible as Hawthorne never was On the other hand, he descended into details of physical horror from which Hawthorne's finer spirit spontaneously recoiled, and while Hawthorne's taste was inferior to his fancy and imagination, Poe's was so to a more pronounced degree a florid sensuousness of decoration, as in Landor's Cottage and The Domain of Arnheim, compared with which Hawthorne's scenes were gray and cold, there were lapses into prettiness of word and phrase which for Hawthorne were impossible, as if the fumes of that censer which Poe swung for a swarm of feeble poetasters had dulled his sense of their defects

But, after all, it is as a poet that Poe enjoys the highest fame, and that which has the promise of most permanence. The meagreness of his product and the narrowness of his range may challenge this opinion, but it is that to which the tendency of criticism is clear and strong Hardly more than a dozen of his poems have survived the winnowing of time, and these, with two or three exceptions, are variations of a single theme, the death of a beautiful and beloved woman Poe formally announced this subject as the highest subject of the poet's art, seeking, perhaps unconsciously, a justification of his contracted range. That he was more artist than poet is suggested by the carefulness with which, for lack of novel germs, he matured his Reverent of his gift, he did not force early fruit his mood, however sorely he needed the money that his poorest verses would have brought. His work, then, was at once the product of a sacred spontaneity and an evigent elaboration The poet gave the impulse and the artist gave the form Israfel stands quite alone among his early poems as from the first so perfect as to require little The others in their first crudity gave meagre promise of their ultimate perfection. Even their musical quality, commonly thought inevitable, was carefully wrought out, and it now appears that Poe's ear was defective, and that his lines were made musical only by many revisions. That he was bent on making them so at all hazards is plain He sacrificed sense to sound, secured by meaning-There is little thought in his less alliterations poems, but there is what he intended, a sentiment, an emotion, to which everything is subordinate-1 sentiment of mystery, an emotion of infinite loss and horror and regret. The resurgence of his lyrical gift in 1845, after long silence, was one of the strangest incidents of his unhappy life. Five notable poems were its fruit The Raven, The Bells, Ulalume, For Annie, Annabel Lee They represent fuller if less exquisite moments than the early group We are not to believe that The Raven was written in the wilful and mechanical fashion described in The Philosophy of Composition any more than in his actual 'descent into the maelstrom' Inferior to Israfel and others, it stands alone in the quaint persistence of its pressure on the note of irremediable woe. The Bells has, perhaps naturally, a metallic ring which contrasts strangely with Ulalume, in which we seem to have the very step and moun of longdrawn musery To Annie gives us the recurrent theme of life in death in its most poignant manner, while Annabel Lee, published almost simultane ously with his death, sounds his most human note, as if 'the fever called living' were 'over at last,' and he were entering on a saner and a sweeter But it is one more regret for the lost delight of peerless womanhood. It was Poe's belief that beauty was a soothing influence. But the beauty of his monodies disturbs and lacerates our minds Their haunting melodies are not to be escaped, but they sound no note of health or joy We admire the brilliant power, the skilful art, but we are never comforted and cheered. Fruits of a sombre genius and a sad experience, his works make their appeal especially to those who can hardly find symbols too melancholy for their mental gloom, and to those who are so overstocked with happiness that they like to play with misery and to consort with gliosts and ghouls.

To appreciate Poe's power and range as a romancer, one should read four of his best stories in four kinds intensive horror, Fall of the House of Usher, outraged and retributive conscience, William Wilson, ingenious ratiocination, Murders in the Rue Morgue or Mystery of Marie Roget, pseudo scientific adventure, The Descent into the Maelstrom These cannot be effectively abridged, but nothing better renders the habitual spirit of his prose work than the 'Overture' called 'Silence,' quoted below The Raven is Poe's bestknown poem, his masterpiece of intensive iteration, but its present use would be exclusive of all other specimens, and consequently it has seemed best to renounce it in order that a more general view may be obtained.

From 'Silence a Fable'

'Listen to me,' said the Demon, as he placed his hand upon my head 'The region of which I speak is a dreaty region in Libya, by the borders of the river Zaïre And there is no quiet there, nor stience

'It was night, and the rain fell, and, falling, it was rain, but, having fallen, it was blood And I stood in the morass among the tall lilies, and the rain fell upon my head-and the lilies sighed one unto the other in the solemnity of their desolation. And, all at once, the moon arose through the thin ghastly mist, and was erim son in colour. And mine eyes fell upon a linge gray rock which stood by the shore of the river, and was lighted by the light of the moon. And the rock was grav, and ghastly, and tall,-and the rock was gray Upon its front were characters engraven in the stone, and I walked through the morass of water lilies, until I came close unto the shore, that I might read the charae ters upon the stone But I could not decipher them And I was going back into the morass, when the moon shone with a fuller red, and I turned and looked again upon the rock, and upon the characters, -and the char acters were DESOLATION And I looked upwards, and there stood a man upon the summit of the rock, and I hid myself among the water lilies that I might discover the actions of the man And the man was tall and stately in form, and was wrapped up from his shoulders to his feet in the toga of old Rome And the outlines of his figure were indistinct-but his features were the features of a deity, for the mantle of the night, and of the mist, and of the moon, and of the dew, had left uncovered the features of his face. And his brow was loft; with thought, and his eye wild with care, and, in the few furrows upon his cheek, I read the fables of sorrow, and weariness, and disgust with mankind, and a longing after solitude. And the man sat upon the rock, and leaned his head upon his hand, and looked out apon the desolation He looked down into the low unquiet shruhbery, and up into the tall primeval trees, and up higher at the rustling heaven, and into the crimson moon And I lay close within shelter of the lilies, and observed the actions of the man. And the man trembled in the solitude,—but the night wanted, and he sat upon the rock

'Then I grew angry and cursed, with the curse of silence, the river, and the lilies, and the wind, and the forest, and the heaven, and the thunder, and the sighs of the water lilies. And they became accursed, and were And the moon ceased to totter up its pathway to heaven-and the thunder died away-and the lightning did not flash-and the clouds hung motionless-and the waters sank to their level and remained-and the trees ceased to rock-and the water lilies sighed no moreand the murmur was heard no longer from among them, nor any shadow of sound throughout the vast illimit able desert. And I looked upon the characters of the rock, and they were changed, -and the characters were SILENCE And mine eyes fell upon the countenance of the man, and his countenance was wan with terror And, hurnedly, he raised his head from his hand, and stood forth upon the rock and listened But there was no voice throughout the vist illimitable desert, and the characters upon the rock were SILENCE. And the man shuddered, and turned his face away, and fled afar off, in haste, so that I beheld him no more.'

To Helen

(Written in Poes boshood to the beautiful friend whose death profoundly affected Poes imagination)

Helen, thy beauty is to me
Like those Nicean barks of yore
That gently, o'er a perfumed sea,
The weary way worn wanderer bore to his own native shore.

On desperate seas long wont to roam,
Thy hyacinth hur, thy classic face,
Thy Naiad airs have brought me home
To the glory that was Greece,
And the grandeur that was Rome.

Lo, in yon brilliant window niche How statue like I see thee stand, The agate lamp within thy hand, Ah, Psyche, from the regions which Are holy land!

Israfel.

In Heaven a spirit doth dwell
'Whose heart strings are a lute,' None sing so wildly well
As the angel Israfel,
And the giddy stars (so legends tell)
Ceasing their hymns, attend the spell
Of his voice all mute

Tottering above
In her highest noon,
The enamoured moon
Blushes with love,
While, to listen, the red levin (With the ripid Pleiades, even, Which were seven),
Pauses in Heaven

And they say (the starry choir And the other listening things) That Israfeli's fire Is owing to that lyre By which he sits and sings— The trembling living wire Of those unusual strings

But the skies that angel trod,
Where deep thoughts are a duty—
Where Love's a grown up God—Where the Houri glances are Imbued with all the beanty
Which we worship in a star

Therefore, thou art not wrong,
Israfch, who despisest
An unimpressioned song,
To thee the laurels belong,
Best bard, because the wisest!
Merrily live, and long!

The ecstasies above
With thy burning measures suit—
Thy grief, thy joy, thy hate, thy love,
With the fervour of thy lute—
Well may the stars be mute!

Yes, Heaven is thine, but this Is a world of sweets and sours,
Our flowers are merely—flowers,
And the shadow of thy perfect bliss
Is the sunshine of ours

If I could dwell
Where Israfel
Hath dwelt, and he where I,
He might not sing so wildly well
A mortal melody,
While a bolder note than this might swell
From my lyre within the sky

The Haunted Palace

In the greenest of our valleys
By good angels tenanted,
Once a fair and stately palace—
Radiant palace—reared its head
In the monarch Thought's dominion—
It stood there!
Never seraph spread a pinlon
Over fabric half so fair!

Banners yellow, glorious, golden,
On its roof did float and flow (This—all this—was in the olden Time long ago),
And every gentle air that dallied,
In that sweet day,
Along the ramparts plumed and pallid,
A winged odour went away

Wanderers in that happy valley,
Through two luminous windows, saw Spirits moving musically,
To a liite's well tuned law,
Round about a throne where, sitting (Porphyrogene!)
In state his glory well befitting,
The ruler of the realm was seen.

And all with pearl and ruby glowing
Was the fair palace door,
Through which came flowing, flowing,
And sparkling evermore,

A troop of Echoes, whose sweet duty
Was but to sing,
In voices of surpassing beauty,
The wit and wisdom of their king

But evil things, in robes of sorrow,
Assailed the monarch's high estate.

(Ah, let us mourn !—for never morrow Shall dawn upon him desolate!)
And round about his home, the glory
That blushed and bloomed
Is but a dim remembered story
Of the old time entombed

And travellers now, within that valley,
Through the red litten windows see Vast forms, that move fantastically Fo a discordant melody,
While, like a ghastly rapid river,
Through the pale door
A indeous throng rush out for ever
And laught—but smile no more

Annabel Lee

It was many and many a vear ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden there lived whom you may know
By the name of Annabel Lee.
And this maiden she lived with no other thought
Than to love and be loved by me.

I was a child and she was a child
In this I ingdom by the sea
But we loved with a love that was more than love—
I and my Annabel Lee,

With a love that the winged semplis of heaven Coveted her and me

And this was the reason that, long ago,
In this kingdom by the sea,
A wind blew out of a cloud, chilling
My beautiful Annabel Lee
So that her high born kinsman came
And bore her away from me,
To shut her up in a sepulchre
In this kingdom by the sea.

The angels, not half so happy in heaven
Went envying her and me—
Yes! that was the reason (as all men know,
In this kingdom by the sea)

That the wind came out of the cloud one night, Chilling and killing my Annabel Lee

But our love it was stronger by far than the love Of those who were older than we— Of many far wiser than we—

And neither the angels in heaven above, Nor the demons down under the sea, Can ever dissever my soul from the soul

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee

For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams

Of the beautiful Annabel Lee,
And the stars never rise, but I feel the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee,

And so, all the night tide, I he down by the side Of my darling—my darling—my life and my bride, In the sepulchine there by the sea,

In her tomb by the sounding sea

To One in Paradise.

Thou wast that all to me, love,
For which my soul did pine—
A green isle in the sea, love,
A fountain and a shrine,
All wreathed with fairy fruits and flowers,
And all the flowers were mine.

Ah, dream too bright to last '
Ah, starry Hope' that didst arise
But to be overcast '
A voice from out the Future cries,
'On ' on ' '—but o'er the Past (Dim gulf') my spirit hovering lies

Mute, motionless, aghast!

For, alas! alas 'with me
The light of Life is o'er!
'No more—no more—no more—' (Such language holds the solemn sea To the sands upon the shore)
Shall bloom the thunder blasted tree,

And all my days are trances,
And all my nightly dreams
Are where thy dark eye glances,
And where thy footstep gleams—
In what ethereal dances,
By what eternal streams.

Or the stricken eagle soar!

There are three excellent editions of Poe's works, one (10 vols.) edited by G E Woodberry and E. C. Stedman, another (10 vols.) by C. F. Richardson, a third, by J. A. Harrison, in seventeen volumes, to which are added a Life and Letters in two volumes. The Woodberry Stedman edition has a good biographical introduction and special introductions to the poetry criticism, and tales Professa Richardson makes large claims for Poe as a 'world-anthor A thoroughly good Life is that of G E. Woodberry in 'American Men of Letters and E. C. Stedman's study in his Poets of America is most admirable. An English Life by J. H. Ingram is n generous apology and glowing eulogy, disfigured by much maccuracy in its biographical details. JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Oliver Wendell Holmes,

humourist, essayist, novelist, and poet, was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, 29th August 1809, a year of splendid births. The lines of his descent from Dutch Wendells and Massachusetts governors, Dudley and Bradstreet, and the good Quincy stock ('Dorothy Q' his proudest boast), were a matter of real pride to him, embroidered with some humorous affectation His father was the minister of the First Parish Church in Cambridge, the seat of Harvard College, and his fine old house was well furnished with historical associations Here General Ward had made his headquarters before Washington took charge of the Revolutionary army in 1775 the defence of Bunker Hill was planned, and here Joseph Warren, pre eminently the hero of that defence, spent the night before the battle. The boy's favourite reading was Pope's Homer, and for Pope's pentameters he had ever a good word Not even Pilgrim's Progress could make Calvinism attractive to his mind the theology went far to spoil the story He might, he thought, have been a clergyman but for one who looked and talked like an undertaker Entering Harvard in 1825, he graduated in 'the famous class of '29,' doing much to justify its fame as time went on, both by his reputation and by the brilliant succession of his poems for the class's annual gatherings year of his graduation was marked by one of the best known of all his poems, Old Ironsides, as the frigate Constitution, which had made a splendid record in the war of 1812, was popularly called It was proposed to break her up, and Holmes's stirring lyric averted her impending doom year he studied law, then turned to medicine, and some further narrowing of the tes angusta donu made it possible for him to go to Paris and study for two years with Louis and other great teachers Here was a great advantage. Seeing much of Europe, and especially of Paris, he wore down his Puritan angles and his natural vivacity acquired a keener edge. Returning to Cambridge in 1835 with a good stock of knowledge, some experience, and two skeletons, one for himself, 'the more showy one' for a friend, he presently began the practice of medicine in Boston. This was never burdensome, his reputation as humourist and poet standing in the way, and the story goes that, being advised to divide his practice, he replied that he couldn't very well, as he had only one patient. The more welcome, therefore, was a chair of Anatomy in Dartmouth College, the 'little college' of Daniel Webster's love, which Holmes held for two years He had already published his first volume of poetry (1836), which included the long string of pentameters he had just read to the &BK Society of Harvard College, and 'The Last Leaf,' fluttering with tender gaiety in the jocund company of such 'heights of the ridiculous' as 'The Spectre Pig' and 'The September Gale, absurdates in which generations of schoolboys have had peculiar joy He soon distinguished himself by a series of medical prize essays, one of which, on the contagiousness of puerperal fever, excited violent opposition, and in 1847 he was appointed Parkman Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in the Harvard Medical School described his chair as a settee, so various were the duties of his professorship until 1871, when anatomy, always his chief delight, was assigned to him exclusively The poet and the humourist were bound to glide into his lecturing, and to be welcomed by the students with unfeigned delight His manner as a lecturer was subject to sudden changes from 'grave to gay, from lively to severe' In the dissecting-room his reverence for the poor body on the table was that of the man who wrote 'The Human Temple,' and who always stood ane struck upon the threshold of that temple's mystery The anti-slavery struggle, which engaged so

The anti-slavery struggle, which engaged so deeply the sympathies of Whittier, Lowell, and Emerson (Longfellow in a degree less positive), left Holmes only less indifferent than Hawthorne, though his aristocratic temper made him politically a Whig. Over against Whittier's 'Ichabod,' denouncing Webster's defection from the righteous cause, Holmes set a glowing tribute to the great statesman's worth His rank as a Lyceum lecturer. for all his promise of more popular qualities, was not with Emerson, and was far below that of Theodore Parker, Wendell Phillips, and Henry Ward Beecher But the establishment of the Atlantic Monthly in 1857, which was so encouraging to all the New England poets and writers, was for Holmes the beginning of a new career, outshin-But for that, his ing far the course already run purely literary reputation might now be that of a poet of one poem, 'The Last Leaf' Lowell divined his uncultivated powers, and made it a condition of his own editorship of the Atlantic that Holmes should be taken on as a principal contributor He was, and with The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table for his spring-board, vaulted at once into a reputation Which for some years was the most brilliant among those of the Boston galaxy In 1831 he had attempted something similar, and had published two numbers, and harking back to these across twenty six years, he now began, 'I was just going to say, when I was interrupted' --- The Autocrat was followed by The Professor at the Breakfast Table, and this by The Poet They were all good, but a descending series, Holmes himself comparing the Professor and Poet to the squeezing of the grapes after the first spontaneous running of their juice. Holmes in this series has been compared to so many writers that we are permitted to believe that it was as much his own as the work of a wellread man can ever be his own The essays were as frank in their self-disclosure as Montaigne's Essays or the Confessions of Rousseau, but, Holmes being what he was, without the slightest taint of their The series was as compact of New England sympathies and traditions as the poetry of Whittier and Lowell, while at the same time it had a more intensive local note than Lowell or Whittier ever struck. It was Dr Holmes who gave Boston its most popular name-'the Hub,' and the city had to his table-talk the centrality suggested by that designation He loved Boston as much as Charles Lamb loved London, its good blood and breeding best of all The great war of 1861-65 widened his sympathies, but as some old city is widened without the destruction of its original walls He had not been a good reformer. but the occasionalism of his verse had been good training for the songs required by the stern exigencies of rebellion and national defence. were 'A Voice of the Loyal North' and 'Voyage of the Good Ship Union' A boy at the front deepened the current of his verse, and when the boy was wounded he hastened to the front to look him up, and then wrote 'My Hunt for the Captain' with all a father's natural pride. But Holmes became more national without becoming less Bostonian, and the future antiquarian will find more of the essence of Boston in the Autocrat and its companion volumes than anywhere else The social Holmes was like a flitting bird, and as the 'Autocrat' he hovered restlessly from theme to theme, his knowledge of medicine, of books, of men, affording him a thou sand happy turns and illustrations Everywhere, or often, there was that infusion of the tear into the smile which makes humour possible and justifies its name, and through all the gaiety there ran a thread of serious purpose. He must be some thing of a Puritan even in his tilt against the Puritans There was so much of this in the Autogat and its sequels that not a little umbrige was taken, and it began to look as if Holmes would not prove such a good asset to the Atlantic as Lowell had surmised. He liked to run the parallel of his life with Dr Johnson's, who was born a century before him, and like Dr Johnson he was 'a good hater,' hating with a perfect hatred the Calvinistic theology, and more, if possible, the temper which he found associated with it in New England life. Like Longfellow, Bryant, Emerson, and Lowell, he was connected with 'the unsectarian sect called Unitarians,' but they all sat less tightly to it than he, were all less dogmatic than he in their opposition to the dogmas of the traditional theology

The Autocrat, Professor, and Poet did not give sufficient scope for the anti Calvinistic passion of the little doctor's heart. Some of it he expressed directly in an article on Ionathan Edwards, stern in its reprehension of that mighty theologian's words and works, one of three biographical ventures, the second a Life of his friend John Lothrop Motley the historian, the third, Ralph Waldo Emerson in the 'American Men of Letters,' wherein the habit of his mind, so foreign to Emerson's, gave piquancy to his delineation called Emerson 'an iconoclast without a hammer, who took down our idols from their pedestals so tenderly that it seemed like an act of worship' In 1861 he published a novel, Elste Venner, which his principal biographer has called, 'with the exception of the story of Eve, par excellence the snake-story of literature' His purpose was, under the cover of a suggestion of prenatal poisoning, 'to stir the mighty question of automatic agency in its relation to self-determination. He wrote to Mrs Stowe that it was 'conceived in the fear of God and the love of man' But it was not con ceived in the spirit of pure literature or pure science, and had, with some attractive aspects, others that were repellent, and these the more dominant It was in his second novel, The Guardian Angel (1867), that his antipathetic relation to Calvinism took on its boldest shape. His father's Calvinism had been liberal for its day, but in 1829 he was yoked with a colleague whose theology was made of sterner stuff A good son doesn't like to have his father hustled by a Mr Slope without sense or sensibility, and in the Guardian Angel he pilloried his father's persecutor for the contempt of a new generation But the virtue of the book was more in those discursive elements which allied it with the Autocrat than in its theological assault

Those elements were marked by an immense vivacity, a sparkle like the multitudinous laughter of the sea. A third novel, A Mortal Antipathy, appeared in 1885, but it added nothing to the author's better things

Meantime his lyric muse had not disdained his cordial invitation. For many readers the value of the Autocrat and the Professor, in a less degree the Poet, consisted less in the rambling humour of the prose lucubrations than in the poems which vere embedded in their fertile soil Here and there a malignant compared them to precious stones shaming the spangles of a courtly fool The poems so introduced took a wide range, 'The Chambered Nautilus' their top and crown for high nobility, 'The One-Hoss Shay' for rollicking humour, the 'Old Horse that won the Bet' not Of 'The Chambered Nautilus' he said, 'When I wrote that, I did better than I could' It is commonly accounted his best achievement, hut its didactic ending would have spoiled it for Edgar Allan Poe, and Holmes's official biographer is disposed to give to 'The Last Leaf,' which Abraham Lincoln loved, the highest place. Not many others approximate to the height of these, but one's heart must be dull indeed not to leap up to such poems as 'Avis,' 'Iris,' 'Under the Violets,' 'Homesick in Heaven,' 'The Crooked Footpath,' 'The Voiceless,' 'The Silent Melody' Moreover, in the table-talk and elsewhere there are good ringing ballads such as 'Grandmother's Story' and Come hither God be glorified, And sit upon my knee.

And what a picture is that of Captain Miles Standish of the Plymouth colony stirring a noble posset with his sword!—

He poured the fiery hollands in,—the man that never feared,— [yellow beard, He took a long and solemn draught, and wiped his And one by one the musketeers—the men that fought and praved— [afraid All drank as 'twere their mother's milk and not a man

There was a fine antique flavour about much of Holmes's verse He loved the Queen Anne men, their metres, their manners, the epigrammatic brilliancy of Pope, Sterne's slow meandering. It would have been pardonable in him if he had fancied himself bringing back not only 'the stretched metre of an antique song,' but much beside, like the good woman who wore her venerable bonnet till its style came in again, and fancied all were copying her mode Holmes's was her luck without her vanity He was a survival, not a pioneer He welcomed the return of 'the kneebuckle men,' but did not dream that he had brought them back. But is it certain that Locker and Dobson and others owed nothing to his inspiration? It is likelier that they owed him much is certain that he knew their art before they came, that interpenetration of gaiety with tenderness which is the open secret of all good vers de société general he was distinctly the artist among the New England poets, at the farthest remove in this respect from Whittier, filing his lines more consciously than Longfellow, and, as compared with Lowell, perhaps more the artist because having so much less of that poetical evuberance which is impatient of the delays of perfect form

In one field Dr Holmes was chief without a second among American poets-the poetry of festival and compliment. Who could so graciously welcome a coming, speed a parting guest? Who hide so tenderly with hurel the whitening temples of his friends? For poetry of this kind he had a wonderful facility, and what was so largely impromptu might well lack something of abiding It was enough that it touched some memorable occasion with a momentary gleam of tenderness and beauty It was at the annual meetings of his college class that he exercised this gift with the most daring playfulness. He was ready with a poem every year from 1851 to 1889, when 'After the Curfew' was the last. Sometimes he sang his It might begin with laughter, a sob was audible before it made an end 'The Boys' is one of the best of these for fun and tenderness, 'The Old Man Dreams' perhaps the best of all He died 7th October 1894, the last leaf on the tree of Boston's goodly brotherhood of lettered men 1890 there was a meeting of the class, three present, but 'no poem-very quiet-something very like tears' There were two or three more meetings, but no more poems. Three or four of his class survived him. He should have survived them all, and have read his last class poem to his own silent heart. It was a good work that he wrought for New England and America, and for a wider range With his joyous laughter he shook to its foundation the traditional distrust of the New England conscience in the undisguised enjoyment of life's various good. He heartily believed in human happiness, and he did much to make it more abound

The Chambered Nautilus

This is the ship of pearl, which, poets feigh, Sails the unshadowed main,—
The venturons bark that flings
On the sweet summer wind its purpled wings
In gulfs enchanted, where the Siren sings
And coral reefs hie bare,

Where the cold sea maids rise to sun their streaming hair

Its webs of living gauze no more unfurl;

Wrecked is the ship of pearl!

And every chambered cell,

Where its dim dreaming life was wont to dwell,

As the frail tenant shaped his growing shell,

Before thee lies revealed,—

Its insed ceiling rent, its sunless crypt unsealed!

Year after year beheld the silent toil
That spread his lustrous coil,
Still, as the spiral grew,
He left the past year's dwelling for the new,
Stole with soft step its shining archway through,

Built up its idle door, [more Stretched in his last found home, and knew the old no

While on mine ear it rings, [sings —
Through the deep caves of thought I hear a voice that Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,

As the swift seasons roll 1

Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,
Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea 1

The Deacon's Masterplece or, The Wonderful One-Hoss Shay'

Have you heard of the wonderful one hoss shay, That was built in such a logical way It ran a liundred years to a day, And then, of a sudden, it—ah, but stay, I'll tell you what happened without delay, Scaring the parson into fits, Frightening people out of their wits,—Have you ever heard of that, I say?

Seventeen hundred and fifty five Georgius Secundus was then alive,— Snuffy old drone from the German hive.
That was the year when Lisbon town
Saw the earth open and gulp her down,
And Braddock's army was done so brown,
Left without a scalp to its crown
It was on the terrible Earthquake-day
That the Deacon finished the one hoss shay

Now in building of chaises, I tell you what, There is always somewhere a weakest spot,-In hub, tire, felloe, in spring or thill, In panel, or crossbar, or floor, or sill, In screw, bolt, thoroughbrace, -lurking still, Find it somewhere you must and will,-Above or below, or within or without,-And that's the reason, beyond a doubt, That a chaise breaks down, but doesn't wear out But the Deacon swore (as Deacons do, With an 'I dew num,' or an 'I tell jeou,') He would build one shay to beat the tnown 'n' the keounty 'n' all the kentry raoun', It should be so built that it couldn' break dagwn - 'Fur,' said the Deacon, ''t's mighty plain Thut the weakes' place mus' stan' the strain, 'n' the way t' fix it, uz I maintain,

Is only jest
T' make that place uz strong uz the rest'

So the Deacon inquired of the village folk Where he could find the strongest oak, That couldn't be split nor bent nor broke,—That was for spokes and floor and sills, He sent for lancewood to make the thills, The crossbars were ash, from the strughtest trees, The panels of white wood, that cuts like cheese, But lasts like iron for things like these,

The hubs of logs from the 'Settier's ellum,'—
Last of its timber,—they couldn't sell 'em,
Never an axe had seen their chips,
And the wedges flew from between their lips,
Their blunt ends frizzled like celery tips,
Step and prop iron, bolt and screw,
Spring, tire, axle, and linchin too,
Steel of the finest, bright and blue,
Thoroughbrace bison skin, thick and wide,
Boot, top, dasher, from tongli-old hide
Found in the pit when the tanner died
That was the way he 'put her through'
'There l' said the Deacon, 'naow she'll dew!'

Do! I tell you, I rather guess
She was a wonder, and nothing less!
Colts grew liorses, beards turned gray,
Deacon and deaconess dropped away,
Children and grandchildren—where were they?
But there stood the stout old one hoss shay
As fresh as on Lisbon earthquake day!

EIGHTEEN HUNDRED,—It came and found The Deacon's masterpiece strong and sound Lighteen hundred increased by ten, 'Hahnsum kerridge' they called it then Eighteen hundred and twenty came,—Running as usual, much the same Thirty and forty at last arrive, And then came fifty, and FIFTY FIVE.

Little of all we value here
Wakes on the morn of its hundredth year Without both feeling and looking queer
In fact, there's nothing that keeps its youth,
So far as I I now, but a tree and truth.
(This is a moral that runs at large, Take it.—You're welcome.—No extra charge.)

FIRST OF NOVEMBER,—the Earthquake day—There are traces of age in the one hoss shay, A general flavour of mild decay, But nothing local, as one may say There couldn't be,—for the Deacon's art Had made it so like in every part That there wasn't a chance for one to start. For the wheels were just as strong as the thills, And the floor was just as strong as the sills, And the punels just as strong as the floor, And the whipple tree neither less nor more, And the back crossbar as strong as the fore, And spring and axle and hub encore And yet, as a whole, it is past a doubt In another hour it will be worn out!

Tirst of November, 'Fifty five!
This morning the parson takes a drive
Now, small boys, get out of the way!
Here comes the wonderful one hoss shay,
Drawn by a rat tailed, ewe necked bay
'Huddup'' said the parson—Off went they
The parson was working his Sanday's text,—
He had got to fifthly, and stopped perplexed
At what the—Moses—was coming next
All at once the horse stood still,
Close by the meet'n' house on the hill.
—Tirst a shiver, and then a thrill,
Then something decidedly like a spill,—

And the parson was sitting upon a rock, At half past nine by the meet'n' house clock,— Just the hour of the Eartbquake slock!
—What do you think the parson found,
When he got up and stared around?
The poor old chaise in a heap or mound,
As if it had been to the mill and ground!
You see, of course, if you're not a dunce,
How it went to pieces all it once,—
All at once, and nothing first,—
Just as bubbles do when they burst
End of the wonderful one hoss shay Logic is logic. That's all I say

The Last Leaf.

I saw him once before,
As he passed by the door,
And again
The pavement stones resound,
As he totters o'er the ground
With his cane

They say that in his prime, Ere the pruning knife of Time Cut him down,

Not a better man was found

By the Crier on his round

Through the town.

But now he walks the streets,
And he looks at all he meets Sad and wan
And he shakes his feeble head,
That it seems as if he said,
'They are gone'

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb

My grandmamma has said—Poor old lady, she is dead Long 190—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like 1 rose
In the snow

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff,
And a crook is in his back,
And a melancholy crack
In his laugh

I know it is a sin

For me to sit and grin

At him here,

But the old three cornered hat,

And the breeches, and all that,

Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring,
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling

The Long Path

I can't say just how many walks she and I had taken together before this one. I found the effect of going out every morning was decidedly favourable on her health. Two pleasing dimples, the places for which were just marked when she came, played, shadowy, in her freshening cheeks when she smiled and nodded good morning to me from the schoolhouse steps. I am afraid I did the greater part of the talking. At any rate, if I should try to report all that I said during the first half dozen walks we took together, I fear that I might receive a gentle lint from my friends the publishers that a separate volume, at my own risk and expense, would be the proper method of bringing them before the public.

Books we talked about, and education duty to know something of these, and of course she did Perhaps I was somewhat more learned than she, but I found that the difference between her reading and mine was like that of a man's and a woman's dusting a library The man flaps about with a bunch of feathers, the woman goes to work softly with a cloth. She does not raise half the dust, nor fill her own eyes and mouth with it,-but she goes into all the corners, and attends to the leaves as much as the covers -Books are the negative pietures of thought, and the more sensitive the mind that receives their images, the more nicely the finest lines are A woman (of the right kind), reading after a man, follows him as Ruth followed the reapers of Boaz, and her gleanings are often the finest of the wheat it was in talking of Life that we came most nearly together I thought I knew something about that,—that I could speak or write about it somewhat to the purpose

To take up this fluid earthly being of ours as a sponge sucks up water,-to be steeped and soaked in its realities as a lude fills its pores lying seven years in a tan pit,-to have winnowed every wave of it as a null wheel works up the stream that runs through the flume upon its float boards,-to have curled up in the keenest spasms and flattened out in the laxest languors of this breathing sickness, which keeps certain pareels of matter uneasy for three or four score years,—to have fought all the devils and clasped all the angels of its delirium,-and then, just at the point when the white hot passions have cooled down to cherry red, plunge our experience into the ice cold stream of some human language or other, one might think would end in a rhapsody with something of spring and temper in it. All this I thought my power and province

The schoolmistress had tried life, too Once in a while one meets with a single soul greater than all the living pageant that passes before it. As the pale astro nomer sits in his study with sunken eyes and thin fingers, and weighs Uranus or Neptune as in a balance, so there are meek, slight women who bave weighed all that this planetary life can offer, and hold it like a bauble in the pulm of their slender hands This was one of them Tortune had left her, sorrow had baptised her, the routine of labour and the loneliness of almost friendless city life were before her Yet, as I looked upon her tranquil face, gradually regaining a cheerfulness that was often sprightly, as she became interested in the various matters we talked about and places we visited, I saw that eye and hip and every shifting lineament were made for love,-unconscious of their sweet office as vet, and meeting the cold aspect of Duty with the natural graces which were meant for the reward of nothing less than the Great Passion

-I never spoke one word of love to the school mistress in the course of these pleasant walks. It seemed to me that we talked of everything but love on that particular morning There was, perhaps, a little more timidity and hesitancy on my part than I have commonly shown among our people at the boarding house. In fact, I considered myself the master at the breal fast table, but, somehow, I could not command myself just then so well as usual. The truth is, I had secured a passage to Liverpool in the steamer which was to leave at noon,with the condition, however, of being released in case circumstances occurred to detain me The schoolmis tress knew nothing about all this, of course, as yet. It was on the Common that we were walking or boulevard of our Common, you know, has various branches leading from it in different directions of these runs downward from opposite Joy Street southward across the whole length of the Common to Boylston Street We called it the long path, and were fond of it.

I felt very weak indeed (though of a tolerably robust habit) as we came opposite the head of this path on that morning. I think I tried to speak twice without making myself distinctly audible. At last I got out the question, —Will you take the long path with me?—Certainly, —said the schoolmistress,—with much pleasure—Thinl,—I said,—before you answer, if you take the long path with me now, I shall interpret it that we are to part no more!—The schoolmistress stepped back with a sudden movement, as if an arrow had struck her One of the long grante blocks used as seats was hard by,—the one you may still see close by the Gingko tree—Pray, sit down,—I said—No, no,—she answered, softly,—I will walk the long path with you!

The old gentleman who sits opposite met us walking, arm in arm, about the middle of the long path, and said, very charmingly,—'Good morning, my dears!'

The 'Riverside is an excellent edition of Dr Holmes's writings in fifteen volumes (Boston, 1892), including the official biography by J T Morse, jun. It does not include his Life of Emerson (1885), which is one of the 'American Men of Letters, nor his Life of Moiley (1875) The 'Standard Library edition includes these There are complete single volume editions of his poems, the Cambridge and 'Household, and there have been numerous English reprints. Morse's Biography and Letters is full of matter and admirable in tone. The best criticism is that of E C. Stedman in his Poets of America

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

Susan Warner (1819-85), born at New York, published under the pen-name of 'Ehzabeth Wetherell' The IVide, Wide World (1851), in its own day next to Uncle Tom's Cabin the most successful American story, not in virtue of literary style, originality, romantic interest, or profound insight into character. But its sympa thetic presentation of an exemplary heroine and her rather commonplace fortunes, its sentimental piety and didactic emotionalism, charmed for a time a large and admiring public. There followed Quechy (1852), The Hills of the Shatemic (1856), The Old Helmet (1863), Melbourne House (1864), Dairy (1868), and A Story of Small Beginnings (1872). Her other works were mostly religious

Henry David Thoreau,

naturalist, writer in several linds, and poet, was born in Concord, Massachusetts, 12th July 1817 No other town in the United States is so rich as Concord in literary associations, and to these Thoreau has contributed more than Hawthorne, and only in less degree than Emerson up more of the town than either of these into his mind and work. Its broad meadows, its 'sluggish artery,' the Musketaquid, its swift Assabet, its woods and pastures with their plants and creatures-these were the books and teachers that assured him a more liberal education than the Concord schools and Harvard College. On his father's side he was descended from Jerseymen of French extraction, but those who found French traits in him were obliged to reckon with the fact that his Saxon mother, Cynthia Dunbar, obviously supplied these She was vivacious, sprightly, talkative, the father stolid and taciturn, if not quite morose-a maker of good lead-pencils Henry at one time learned his father's art, but soon resolved that there were better things than pencils with which to make his mark In 1833 he entered Harvard College, and took the four years' course, a severe strain on his parents' means, and disappointing to their hopes, his graduation being without distinction, because he anticipated the elective system long in advance of its formal adoption. In the event he was an excellent Latin and Greek scholar, his classical reading far beyond any college requirements, while for knowledge of the older English poets he was not easily matched As naturalist he found his books mainly in the running brooks and along their banks, but knew well the printed kind He was, moreover, a diligent Orientalist, an English friend, Lord Cholmondeley, making him the rich possessor of a splendid set of Hindu books, original and translated The North-American Indians had for him a profounder fascination The literature of their manners and history he read exhaustively, digging deep in the Jesual Rela tions, when the translator had not made access to them the easy thing it is now

No profession or form of business life attracting him, for ten years after leaving college he made himself an idler, to men's view, that he might better nurse his secret growth 'Never idle or indulgent,' says Emerson, 'he preferred, when he wanted money, earning it by some piece of manual labour agreeable to him, as building a boat or a fence, planting, grafting, surveying, or other short work, to any long engagements With his hardy habits and few wants, his skill in wood-craft, and his powerful arithmetic, he was very competent to live in any part of the world' Meantime he was carrying on a business that had no lack of continuity or serious purpose—the business of his literary life. It is likely that he was inspired by Emerson's example to make the production of good literature his secondary purpose, the first, like Emerson's, the living of a simple, natural life after a fashion of his own. In 1837 he began that series of diaries which covered six hundred pages in three years, and in the course of ten years (1850-60) filled thirty manuscript volumes Here were no mere jottings of his observations, but the deliberate attempt to say what he had seen as exactly and as felicitously as possible. clination to verse was also strong, but (the pity of it!) discouraged by Emerson, so that, when thirty, he destroyed much, and afterward wrote little 1839 he made that excursion which is reported in his Week on the Concord and Merrimac Rivers, to write which was the main purpose of his retirement to a hut upon the shores of Walden Pond brother John was the companion of his voyage, but he is not mentioned in the book. The silent organ chants his requiem John died a tragic death (from lock-jaw) in 1842, and Henry, passionately attached to him, was deeply affected by his loss and by the horror of his death Loving a girl whom he found John also loved, he had silently sacrificed his own upon the altar of his brother's hope He wrote nothing more exquisitely beautiful than his poem of fraternal loss. In 1841 he hecame an inmate of Emerson's household, remaining for two years Thoreau's originality was much threatened by this intimacy, and that it triumphed over it is proof how deep it was ingrained But for a time he took on so much of Emerson that some noted an Emersonian note in his voice, while the less genial declared that he was 'growing an Emerson nose' He had traits which Emerson disliked, while his own more sensitive nature was wounded by Emerson's occasional retirement into his deeper self. During his stay with Emerson he was writing for the Dial and helping Emerson to edit that organ of the Transcendentalists, which counted many sun-bright and some moonshine hours Other Concord friends were Alcott, Hawthorne, and Ellery Channing, a poet of real but uncertain power, and person ally the most difficult of the Concord set-his Thoreau the Poet-Naturalist is a standing proof of his unique appreciation Hardly less was that of F B Sanborn, another of Thoreau's numerous biographers Much less was that of Margaret Fuller, one of the brilliant Concord women, but Elizabeth Hoar, who went near to realise Emer son's ideal of womanhood, said that Concord was Thoreau's monument, covered all over with inscriptions of his genius and his work.

In 1843 Thoreau did some teaching in New York, and in the second year after his return to Concord he engaged (1845) in that enterprise which has excited more vulgar curiosity than any other action of his life—his retirement (for two years and two months) to the solitude of Walden Pond. Its character has been misconceived, but its importance has not been exaggerated. It enabled him to write the Week in peace and quietness, and to gather material for his more popular, but hardly more precious, Walden It was a successful experiment in plain living, and a munly protest against the general opinion that a man's life does consist in the abundance of things that he possesses. The motive was not anti-social, much less misanthropic. At Walden, Thoreau kept in close connection with his Concord friends, much visiting and visited. There was no attempt to demonstrate the independence of the individual. He began by borrowing an axe, and he took with him much of 'the seasoned life of men' which is compacted in good books.

After leaving Walden, his next business was to publish the book which he had written there. One thousand copies of the Week were published, and in 1853 seven hundred of these were returned to him as unsalable, an experience on which his humour battened and which he seriously accounted valuable. Long since every copy of that edition was a collector's prize. In 1846 he had been to the Maine woods, and in 1853 and 1857 he went to them again, and his accounts of these excursions, partly published in his lifetime, made a posthumous volume, The Maine Woods, in 1864 In 1849 he made an excursion to Cape Cod, that sandy peninsu'a which, like a curled finger, beckoned the Pilgrim Fathers to their first landingplace on the New England coast This excursion also flowered into a series of articles, brought to completion in the posthumous Cape Cod of 1865 A Yankee in Canada had a similar history Walden appeared in 1854, and met with more favour than the Heek, a small edition selling before Thoreau's death An occasional lecture added something to his income, if little to his Emerson wrote of his lecturing reputation manner that his appearance of contempt for his audience only varied to express a more absolute scorn. In 1841 he refused to pay taxes in support of a Government implicated in war and slavery, and was put in fail for a few hours came to see him, and asked, 'Henry, why are you here?' 'Why are you not here?' said the The theory of this practice was exprisoner panded in 1849 in 'Resistance to Civil Government.' His whole heart and soul were in the anti-slavery reform When Emerson gave his first anti-slavery address in Concord, Thoreau rang the church-bell to summon the villagers as to a new Concord fight His Walden hut is rumoured to have been 'a station on the underground railroad'-a hiding-place for fugitive slaves In 1854 he made a vigorous and rigorous address to an abolitionist convention Meeting John Brown the revolutionist, he was fascinated by his character and spirit, and a fortnight after Brown's attack on Harper's Ferry, when the old hero had a month to live, Thoreau summoned his fellow-townsmen to hear his 'Plea for John Brown,' two days later giving the same address in Boston, and not even Emerson's good word for Brown was so entirely frank and bold

Atlantic Monthly, which made so many new openings for New England writers, was promising some enlargement for Thoreau with the rest, when some rash exposure brought on a sickness which was to have no favourable turn. Besides, he was, as he said, 'sick for his country,' protesting that he should not be better while the war went on It had yet three years to lengthen out its misery when he died, 6th May 1862

Thoreau was never better named than by his friend and biographer Channing, who called him the Poet Naturalist. Even his methods of observation were poctic rather than scientific thought a bird in the bush worth two in the He liked to study living things as undisturbed as possible by knife or glass. It is probably true that he made few fresh discoveries But he saw things with his own eyes, discovered for himself what others read and heard, and 'he was yet in some sort,' says Grant Allen, 'a vague and mystical anticipatory precursor of the modern school of functional biologists' 'His power of observation,' savs Emerson, 'seemed to indicate additional senses He saw as with microscope, heard as with ear trumpet, and his memory was a photographic register of all he saw and heard.' It was when he came to tell what he had seen and heard that the poet side of the naturalist was most plainly visible Few are his descriptions that do not flower into some metaphor or simile, confounding to the merely scientific. Paley was not more teleological 'What is man,' he says, 'is all in all, nature nothing but as she draws him out and reflects him? He thought the most important part of a description of any creature 'to tell what it is to man' He held a mirror up to human nature in animal and vegetable formsin the strutting turkey and the malodorous skunk fancying familiar aspects of humanity

This humanity of his nature-worship ill agrees with the opinion that he was misanthropic and lacked interest in men 'What is nature,' he said, 'if there be not an eventful human life passing within her? Many joys and many sorrows are the lights in which she shows most beautiful' He conceived himself as passionately devoted to the welfare of his fellow men. He could not imagine any possible service that he would not cheerfully render them, only stipulating that it should appeal to him as real His instincts were literary through and through Good books for him were nature's fairest flowers and birds of sweetest song write one or more was the thing nearest to his heart, so to say what he had seen, so to help other men to live To talk of his indifference to style is gross absurdity He would build sentences, he said, as durable as a Roman aqueduct. And Lowell, one of his harshest critics, testifies that there are sentences of his as perfect as anything in the language, and thoughts as clearly crys tallised' It is true that, with the beauty, there was much disfigurement. Hyperbole and paradox were the rhetorical forms into which his humour ran too easily 'I trust that you realise,' he said, 'what an exaggerator I am-pile Pelion upon Ossa to reach heaven so' But sometimes he got a fall His fondness for resemblances led him too far afield, as where in low-roofed houses he saw lowbrowed monkeys, and his conceits were often madly fanciful, as where the June morning was for him 'the bursting bead on the surface of the uncorked day' On the other hand, there is often a marvellous felicity of phrase, and there are ex tended passages of unfaltering charm roughness in his verses, he was often master of an exquisite music. It was for other qualities that Emerson declared his 'Smoke' to be better than any poem of Simonides His influence has been great and wide He has raised up a host of literary naturalists, and a much greater one of people for whom all natural things are different and better since he passed this way, while still his best service is that which has made for the simplification of life. If here his followers have been too few, there is promise of a multitude in the conditions of a society whose intolerable noise and hurry must bring some sane reaction before long

Building the Chimney

When I came to build my chimney I studied masonry My briels, being second-hand ones, required to be cleaned with a trowel, so that I learned more than usual of the qualities of brieks and trowels. The mortar on them was fifty years old, and was said to be still growing harder, but this is one of those sayings which men love to repeat whether they are true or not. Such sayings themselves grow harder and adhere more firmly with nge, and it would take many blows with a trowel to clean an old wisenere of them Many of the villages of Mesopotamia are built of second hand bricks of a very good quality, obtained from the ruins of Babylon, and the ecment on them is older and probably harder still However that may be, I was struck by the peculiar toughness of the steel which bore so many violent blows without being worn out. As my bricks had been in a chimney before, though I did not read the name of Nebuchadnezzar on them, I picked out as many fireplace bricks as I could find, to save work and waste, and I filled the spaces between the bricks about the fire place with stones from the pond shore, and also made my mortar with the white sand from the same place lingered most about the fireplace, as the most vital part of the house. Indeed, I worked so deliberately that though I commenced at the ground in the morning, a course of bricks raised a few inches above the floor served for my pillow at night, yet I did not get a stiff neel for it that I remember, my stiff neck is of older date. I took a poet to board for a fortnight about those times, which caused me to be put to it for room brought his own knife, though I had two, and we used to scour them by thrusting them into the earth shared with me the labours of cooking I was pleased to see my work rising so square and solid by degrees, and reflected that, if it proceeded slowly, it was cal The chimney is to culated to endure a long time some extent an independent structure, standing on the ground and rising through the house to the heavens, even after the house is burned it still stands some times, and its importance and independence are apparent. This was towards the end of summer. It was non November

What he Lived for

We must learn to remaken and keep ourselves awal e, not by mechanical aids, but by an infinite expectation of the dawn, which does not forsake us in our soundest sleep. I know of no more encouraging fact than the unquestionable ability of man to ele ate his life by a conscious endeavour. It is something to be able to paint a particular picture, or to carve a statue, and so to make a few objects beautiful, but it is far more glorious to carve and paint the very atmosphere and medium through which we look, which morally we can do To affect the quality of the day, that is the highest of arts. Every man is tasked to make his life, even in its details, worthy of the contemplation of his most elevated and critical hour. If ve refused, or rather used up, such paltry information as we get, the oracles would distinctly inform us how this might

I went to the woods because I wished to live de liberately, to front only the essential facts of life, and see if I could not learn what it had to teach, and not, when I came to die, discover that I had not hived did not wish to live what was not life, living is so dear, not did I wish to practise resignation, unless it was quite necessary. I wanted to live deep and such out all the marrow of life, to live so stardily and Spartan like as to put to rout all that was not life, to cut a broad swath and shave close, to drive life into a corner, and reduce it to its lowest terms, and, if it proved to be mean, why then to get the whole and genuine meanness of it, and publish its meanness to the world, or if it were sublime, to I now it by experience, and be able to give a true account of it in my next excursion. For most men, it appears to me, are in a strange uncertainty about it, whether it is of the devil or of God, and have somewhat hastile concluded that it is the chief end of in in here to 'glorifi God and enjoy IIIm forever '

Still we live meanly, life ants, though the fable tells us that we were long ago changed into men, lile pygmies we fight with crimes, it is error upon error, and clout upon clout, and our last virtue has for its occasion a superfluous and evitable wretchedness. Our life is frittered away by detail An honest man has hardly need to count more than his ten tinger, or in extreme cases he may add his ten toes, and lump the rest Simplicity, simplicity, simplicity! I say, let your affairs be as two or three, and not a hundred or a thousand, instead of a million rount half a dozen and I eep your accounts on your thminb nul. In the anidst of this chopping sen of enabled life, such are the clouds and storms and quick sands and thousand and one items to be allowed for, that a man has to live, if he would not founder and go to the bo tom and not nale his port at all, by dead reckoning and he mut be r frost calculator indeed who succeeds. Simplify, aim plify Instead of three meds a day, if it he necessary eat but one instead of a hundred delies, five and reduce other things in proportion

Why should we live in his such harry and where of life? We are determined to be starved before are and Men say that a stitch in time saves nine, and so they take a thousand stitches to day to save time to motrow As for work, we haven't any of any consu quence. We have the Saint Vitus' dance, and cannot possibly keep our heads still. If I should only give a few pulls at the parish bell rope, as for a fire, that is, without setting the bell, there is hardly a man on his farm in the outskirts of Concord, notwithstanding that press of engagements which was his excuse so many times this morning, nor a boy, nor a woman, I might almost say, but would forsal e all and follow that sound, not mainly to save property from the flames, but, if we vill confess the truth, much more to see it burn, since burn it must, and we, be it I nown, did not set it on fire, -or to see it put out, and have a hand in it, if that is done as handsomely, yes, even if it were the panish church itself. Hardly a man talles a half hour's nap after dinner, but when he wakes he holds up his head and asks, 'What's the news?' as if the rest of mail inil had stood his sentincle. Some give directions to be waked every half hour, doubtless for no other purpose, and then, to pay for it, they tell what they have dreamed Ifter a night's sleep the news is as indispensable as the breakfist. 'Pray tell me anything new that has imprened to a man anywhere on this globe,'-and he reads it over his coffee and rolls, to at a man has had his eves gouged out this morning on the Wachito River, never dreaming the while that he lives in the dark unfathomed mammoth cave of this world, and has but the rudiment of an eye limself (From Il alien)

My Prayer

Great God, I ask Thee for no meaner pelf Than that I may not disappoint myself, That in my action I may sorr as high As I can now discern with this clear eye

And next in value, which The kindness lends, That I may greatly disappoint my friends, Howe'er they think or hope that it may be, They may not dream how Thou'st distinguished me.

That my weak hand may equal my firm faith,
And my hife practise more than my tongue saith,
That my low conduct may not show, nor my relenting

That I Thy purpose did not know, or overrated Thy designs

Nature

O Nature! I do not aspire
To be the highest in thy quire,—
To be a meteor in the sky,
Or comet that may range on high,
Only a zephyr that may blow
Among the reeds by the river low,
Give me thy most privy place
Where to run my airy race.

In some witndrawn, unpublic mead Let me sigh upon a reed, Or in the woods, with leafy din, Whisper the still evening in Some still work give me to do,— Only—be it near to you!

For I'd rather be thy child And pupil, in the forest wild, Than be the king of men elsewhere, And most sovereign slave of care To have one moment of thy dawn, Than share the city's year forlorn

The Fisher's Boy

My life is like a stroll upon the beach,
As near the ocean's edge as I can go,
My tardy steps its waves sometimes o'erreach,
Sometimes I stay to let them overflow

My sole employment 'tis, and scrupulous care,
To place my gains beyond the reach of tides,
Each smoother publie, and each shell more rare,
Which Ocean kindly to my hand confides

I have but few companions on the shore
They scorn the strand who sail upon the sea,
Yet oft I think the ocean they've sailed o'er
Is deeper known upon the strand to me

The middle sea contains no crimson dulse,
Its deeper waves east up no pearls to view,
Along the shore my hand is on its pulse,
And I converse with many a shipwrecked crew

There is a complete 'Riverside Edition of Thoreau's writings in eleven volumes (1893). His letters edited by Emerson were better edited with additions by F. B. Sanborn (1894) giving a less stoical impression. For the Poems see Sanborn's collection. A great body of literature biographical and critical has grown up about Thoreau's name and is augmenting steadily. Channing's Thoreau the Poet Naturalist (1873) is the best quarry. Sanborn's Henry D. Thoreau, in 'American Men of Letters (1883) gives the Concord setting and his Personality of Thoreau is an admirable study and recollection There are good English Lives by H. A. Page (1877) and H. S. Salt (1890 and 1896). There are many side lights in Lives of Emerson, Alcott, Hawthorne, and in E. W. Emerson's Emerson in Concord which best shows Thoreau as the children's friend. The critical essays are innumerable. Lowell's, in My Study Windows, the best known and least just, John Burroughs, In Literary Values and elsewhere solunds a truer note.

JOHN WHITE CHADWICK.

James Russell Lowell,

poet, essayist, publicist, humourist, scholar, and diplomatist, was born in Cambridge, Massachusetts, 22nd February 1819, fated, as it were, by his birthday (Washington's) to that lofty patriotism which was the most distinguishing feature of his Elmwood, his birthplace, was one of several spacious houses built before the Revolutionary War, and together constituting 'Tory Room' The builder and occupant in the troublous times before the Revolution was Thomas Oliver, lieu tenant governor of the colony and President of the Council, who was forced to resign his office by a visitation of four thousand citizens joined the loyalists that swarmed to Halifax, and his house being seized and sold, it was bought and occupied by Elbridge Gerry, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, for two years Governor of Massachusetts, and at the time of his death (1814) Vice President of the United States Thus the house had a variety of political associations to please the fancy of the growing boy and the grown man, and something better in the noble woods surrounding it, with their leafy 'choirs in which the sweet birds sang,' never when Lowell was at home to mattentive ears Harvard College was a little way off across the open fields, and, just as Lowell was entering on his studies there, Longfellow came to live in the Cragie house, a few rods from Elmwood, his early laurels no doubt dis turbing Lowell's sleep His father, Rev Charles Lowell, was a Unitarian clergyman, minister of the West Church in Boston, a man so sweet and gracious, and of so much simplicity, that his likeness to the Vicar of Wakefield did not escape the filial eye, so quick to mark resemblances and differences of any kind Dr Lowell's theological education was carried on in Edinburgh under Sir David Brewster and Dugald Stewart, but the son had forebears on his mother's side that gave him a much closer Scotch alliance The blood of Orkney Trails and Highland (or north country) Spences flowed in his veins, and it pleased him to imagine that Sir Patrick Spens and Minna Troil contributed some of its ruddier drops It is certain that his mother had an hereditary passion for the Scotch ballad poetry, and her recitation of 'Annie of Lochroyan' and other pieces was one of the influences that mixed his clay with heavenly fire. A local school fitted him for Harvard College, which he entered in 1834. He profited less by the regular course of study than by his miscellaneous reading, which tended, at first fitfully and then steadily, to the best English literature A tendency to waywardness was aggravated by his parents' departure for a long European journey The father's pecuniary bribes, nicely proportioned to degrees of possible distinction, seemed base compared with the allurements of frolicsome escapades which subjected him to private and public admonition. The worst offence was on the event of his election by his class to be its poet, when for his excessive gaiety he was banished from Cambridge to Concord for some weeks on the eve of his graduation Concord he made Emerson's acquaintance, and was invited to walk with him, but he was not prevented by so much graciousness from lashing out at him in his Class-Day Poem, debarred from reading which, he printed it with additions Emerson suffered in good company, that of Carlyle and Garrison and the advocates of total abstinence and Women's Rights As touching Emerson and the abolitionists, and in general, the satire was an inverted prophecy of the enthusiasms of the full-grown man

The last year of Lowell's college life and that succeeding had much deeper troubles than those following on neglected recitations and undue hilarity They coincided with a period of eager and joyous and then hopeless passion, its object a girl possessing every intellectual and personal attraction When he was separated from her by some untoward chance, there was no measure to the bitterness of Lowell's grief and rige. We have his miserable confession that lie put a loaded pistol to his head, but was too cowardly The fate that seemed so cruel was the friendliest possible, for without his love for and marriage with Maria White, the comfortress who helped him to forget the past and set a happy future in his eyes, it is conceivable that he would have achieved no honourable fame was the good genius of his life, leading him to quick repentance of his reactionary tendencies, enlisting him among the Transcendentalists and in the anti-slavery cause, making Lowell the reformer possible Lowell met her in 1839, and they were married on Christmas Eve, 1844. In the meantime he had chosen a profession, law, and abandoned it after taking his degree and entering a lawyer's office in Boston The turmoil of his affections added to the perturbation of his mind In 1841 he published A Year's Life, a small collection of poems, its motto, Ich habe gelebt und geliebet, a frank confession of its autobiographical character. Here, equally plain, was the inspiration of his new-found happiness and of Keats and Tennyson sixty-eight poems and sonnets, his 'after-appro bation' admitted nine to his collected works, where a less evigent taste would have spared more of the innocents If not so wide and deep as it might have been, it was enough to commit him to literature as the profession of his final choice, and the next step was the projection and publication of the Proneer, of which three numbers were published It was the best American magazine of the period, a prophecy fulfilled in the Atlantic Monthly But Lowell's eyes gave out, so did the credit of the publishers, leaving them deep in debt for printing and contributions Besides, at this time Lowell's mind was too intent on poetry for lum to think or care for anything beside. All his life long the making of poems was his supreme delight Scratch the publicist or diplomatist and you came at once upon the poet. In 1843 he published a second volume, which marked a sure advance in his powers of poetical conception and expression It had, too, intimations of the coming humourist, and it gave bonds of that allegiance to the anti-slavery cause which had its most distinct expression in the years from 1845 to 1849 Even those poems whose subject and treatment were remotest from the reformer's zeal could not escape it altogether Lowell's official biographer, H E Scudder, presses on us his opinion that Lowell's engagement with the anti-slavery reform was a misfortune to him as poet, distracting him from the main haunt of his peculiar power That he was poet in the first, reformer only in the second degree, there is no doubt. But for his high souled wife he might not have been the reformer in any manner or degree. Failing of her pure chrism he might have carried far the type of poetry of which his 'Legend of Brittany' (as sweet as Keats's Endymion, but far less exquisitely sweet) was typical, but in missing the anti-slavery poems we should have missed much of his best work, not only the splendid tributes to Wendell Phillips and Garrison, the 'Vision of Miles Standish,' and the ringing stanzas of 'The Prosent Crisis, but the Bielow Papers, the first series and the second, for if Lowell had not played the part he did as opposing the annexation of fexas and the Mexican War (a sequence of pro-slavery turnitude), he never could have risen to the height of his great argument in 1861-64, either in verse or prose. His contributions to the Anti Slaver. Standard were neither first rate literary nor antislavery worl, but they helped to train the 'prentice hand which later worked so efficiently in his politi cal articles in the Atlantic and North Imerican Review, and in such crowning glories of his prose as his 'Democracy' of 1881 and his 'Independent in Politics' of 1888. But it is not at all as if Lowell's literary energy was exhausted by his work on anti-slavery lines. Studying the bibliography of his writings for the years 1845-50, ye discover that these years were remarkably prolific of poetry of the less strenuous kind The vaters troubled by the reform spirit did more than strengthen han for his anti-slavery work They touched hi poetic genius in its most ethereal part to finer The shelling of the anti-slavery in pulse (1850-60) coincided with the minimum of a his poetical production

To one reading Lovell's Biogr plu, or Letters, a or his Writings in the order of their production, the period 1845-49 is the most engaging which his life presents. Then he was poor, then he was happy, then he was tingling with the consciousness of various power. Sorrow came to him (the death of his first child, 1847), but it could not depress him long. The Broad-vos Journal might offer him a dollar a page for his best thoughts, and refuse them as smalling too much of reform. Edgar A Poe and Margaret Fuller might touch sore spots, but none of these things could move him (if at all, for long) from the jocund temper of his habitual life. Never again is he so in teresting, so locable. His letters of this period lend themselves to the contention that letter writing was his rarest gift, but only those can be convinced of this who did not know the boundless affluence and effervescence of his talk. These years, all vivid and abundant, had their degrees, and 1848 was Lowell's annus mir t-The bibliography furnishes abundant proof From the multitude of the year's publications there stand out Poems, a third collection bettering the second but not shaming it, A Fable for Critics, The Biglow Papers, and The Vis on of Sir Launfal The Fable, on one side witty and excellent criticism of Lowell's literary contempo raries, the caricultures better than poor likenesses. on the other side fell away into execrable puns and fantastic tricks in rhyming that would make the most perverse of Browning's weep, finding them sches outdone. In the Vision he was the reformer, wearing a directise as thin as Vi len's samite robe, 's high more express than hid her' Its best parts were the introductions to the first and second sections of the poem, one a sinter piece, the other a rhaprod, of June Of Lovell's many variants of this theme, the be tas the prely sive part of Under the W. Horys Great was liss in in the world out of doors, and excellent his gift for noting and for naming every sugger ive aspect of the earth and sky. His beloved Keats was not more sensitive to the touch of natural beauty Burley Papers, now collected, had for two years been adding wit to sit satire to satire, score to scorn. Nowhere else dia I o vell siril e a note at once so por ciful and unique They printed the Mexican War just as it vas, a sordid crime Poetrs was the best vehicle of his politics. The Tankee dialect of the Paters as not an in cation nor an inquisition, but a reminiscence of that 'Cambridge Thirty Years Ago' of which he wrote Fears have been expresed that the apso well ness of the Pafers to their time sould be faul to their persistence. But the most recent listory has found them quotable to a remarkable degree and, so lon, a listory repeats the foll and the meanness of manland, here are boul ins to impale the one and swords to stule the other down ('The Courtin',' first published with the Ergi p' Patiers as 'an extract from a supported ballad by Mr Biglot,' was originall written to till a blank page, but was ulumately rounded off so as to make a connected and charming did or pastoral in twenty four verses)

Coincident with the mid century there vas a great divide in Lovell's life where it had been eager, joyous, and productive, it became wears sorrowful, spontineity and enthusiasm vanished and invention failed. He had good reason to be The 'resper v hose name is death' had been very busy in his field. Within a few years he had lost three children and his mother and in 1853 the gentle wife, impassioned and intrassioning, died A little property had come to them, and they had gone abroad, but their son Walter died in Rome, and after that the wife's decline went on with swifter pace. Bordering on her death there was for Lowell a region of thick darkness, a boding horror of intellectual ruin, in part excited by the spectacle of his father's miserable decay nately a plodding task made his life more endurable. In 1855 he succeeded Longfellow as Smith Professor of Belles Lettres in Hamard College. A course of Low Il Lectures on English Poetry marked him infallibly as the right man for this succession. It also marked the gain that he had made upon his early Conversations with sone of the Old Poets (1845) Lowell's confession of indolence meant that he had his 'drowsy days,' alter nating with seasons of furious activity all the loss of the first Lowell, there was with the second a grin of steady effort. With less forceto use his own distinction—there was more power

To say that Lowell the scholar was born of those mid century pains would be no gross mistake The strength of his professorial work went preeminently into studies of Dante and Shakespeare. Much of it enjoyed a second birth in the Atlantic Monthly and the North American Review, and is preserved in Among my Books, first series 1870, and second series 1876 The year 1857 was marked for Lowell by two notable events-his second marringe and his engagement as editor of the newly established Atlantic From the completeness of his second marriage there was one serious deduction his wife did not like his humour and detested his Biglow Papers A new series of these was a dangerous venture, the first had set the mark so high, but the poet proved himself equal to it. With less spontaneity than the first series, they have more intellectual substance. Lowell's temperament was not more sensitive to private sorrow than to public spirit, and the Civil War drew from him not only the lightning of the new Biglow Papers, shattering every fallacy and blasting every baseness of the time, but also a series of great political essays, the earlier in the Atlantic, the later in the North American Review, of which he became joint editor with Professor C E Norton in 1863. The war inspired poems besides those of the Papers, and, at its close, the Harvard Commemoration Ode (1865), the most significant product of his poetic faculty from a national point of view. The joy of its swift shaping (523 lines in six hours) made him feel young again. A great ode, it is not one of the most perfect in its form, having the defects of its improvisation. The splendid characterisation of Lincoln was not originally a part of it. Its reputation selected Lowell as the vriter of three other odes, celebrating great national anniversaries in 1875, 1876, but, while Under the Great Elm contained a tribute to Washington which was only less splendid than the earlier tribute to Lincoln, in general these were far below the height of the Ode of 1865 The years following the war were as prodigal of poems as a battlefield of flowers, and these, with earlier ones, were gathered up in Under the Willows (1869) In 1870 appeared The Cathedral, Lowell's brilliant poetic comment on the interrelations of science and religion, marred here and there by spurts of irrepressible jocosity final volume, Hearts ease and Rue (1888), was variously rich, not least in poems that were stern reflections on the political turpitude into which the country fell away too soon from the impassioned ardours of its most fearful hour. Giving great offence to the political Bourbons, these poems endeared him to reformers and independents in politics, and because of them, or in spite of them, he was made minister to Spain by President Hayes (1877), and to England in 1880, remaining in this position till 1885. The diplomatic situation was not evigent, but his social opportunities were great, and his success with them did much to commend his country to the British mind For one who had so long skirted the coasts of Bohemia, his skill in steering along those of Philistin was certainly immense His Birmingham address, 'Democracy,' was distinctly a bearding of the British lion in his den, but its noble frankness won him the respect which he would have forfeited by a less manly The address was as impromptu as the Harvard ode, but by this time Lowell's prose was pruned of all its earlier excess, if with some loss for things in lighter vein, with distinct gain for such addresses as the 'Democracy,' and the later (1888) 'Independent in Politics' In the former he had glorified American principles abroad, in the latter the defects of American practice at home invited the genial satire of his ripest power increasing sense that 'there is something magnificent in having a country to love' was on the reverse side a growing scorn of those who did political iniquity His own conception of patriotism was never better indicated than in his 'Epistle to his high minded friend George William Curtis, where he wrote

I loved my country so as only they Who love a mother fit to die for may, I loved her old renown, her stuniess fame,— What better proof than that I loathed her shame?

Lowell wished that he might die at Elm vood, and he had his wish, after much suffering, on the 12th of August 1891 He was a brilliant wit and a delightful humourist, a discursive essayist of unfailing charm, the best American critic of his time, a scholar of wide learning, deep also where his interest was most engaged, a powerful writer on great public questions, a patriot 'passionately pure,' but first, last, and always he was a poet, never so happy as when he was looking at the world from the poet's mount of vision and seeking for fit words and musical to tell what he had seen. But his emotion was not sufficiently 'recollected in tranquillity' Had he been more an artist he would have been a better poet, for he would then have challenged the invasions of his literary memory, his humour, his animal spirits, within limits where they had no right of way. If his humour was his rarest, it was his most dangerous, gift, so often did it tempt him to laugh out in some holy place. Accused of literary inspiration, for first-hand acquaintance with Nature he had no superior, nor did Thoreau rejoice in her companionship with more unaffected joy What is most subjective in his verse, its keenest notes of joy and sorrow, draws us by a yet stronger cord Less charming than Longfellow, less homely than Whittier, less artistic than Holmes, less grave than Bryant, less vivid than Emerson, less unique than Poe, his qualities, intellectual, moral, and æsthetic, in their assemblage and co-ordination assign him to a place among American men of letters which is only a little lower than that which is Emerson's, and his alone

From 'A Fable for Critics'

'There's Lowell, who's striving Parnassus to climb With a whole bale of isms tied together with rhyme, He might get on alone, spite of brambles and boulders, But he can't with that builde he has on his shoulders, The top of the hill he will ne'er come nigh reaching Till he learns the distinction 'twist singing and preaching, His lyre has some chords that would ring pretty well, But he'd rather hy half make a drum of the shell, And rattle away till he's old as Methusalem, At the head of a march to the last new Jerusalem'

She, thet ough' to ha' clung fer ever
In her grand old eagle nest,
She thet ough' to stand so fearless
Wile the wracks are round her hurled,
Holdin' up a beacon peerless
To the oppressed of all the world'

Haint they sold your colored scamen?

Haint they made your env'ys wiz?

Wut'll make ye act like freemen?

Wut'll git your dander riz?

Come, I'll tell ye wut I'm thinkin'

Is our dooty in this fix,

They'd ha' done 't ez quick ez winkin'

In the days o' seventy six

Clang the bells in every steeple,
Call all true men to disown
The tradoocers of our people,
The enslavers o' their own,
Let our dear old Bay State proudly
Put the trumpet to her mouth,
Let her ring this messidge loudly
In the ears of all the South—

'I'll return ye good fer evil Much ez we frail mortils can,
But I wun't go help the Devil
Makin' man the cus o' man,
Call me coward, call me traiter,
Jest ez suits your mean idees,— Here I stand a tyrant hater,
An' the friend o' God an' Peace!

Ef I'd my way I hed ruther
We should go to work an' part,—
They take one way, we take t'other,— Guess it wouldn't break my heart,
Man had ough' to put asunder
Them thet God has noways jined,
An I shouldn't gretly wonder
Ef there's thousands o' my mind

Jonathan to John.

It don't seem hardly right, John,
When both my hands was full,
To stump me to a fight, John,—
Your cousin, tu, John Bull
Ole Uncle S see he, 'I guess
We know it now,' see he,
'The hon's paw is all the law,
Accordin' to J B,
Thet's fit for you an me!'

We own the ocean, tu, John
You mus'n't take it hard,
Ef we can't think with you, John,
It's just your own back yard
Ole Uncle S sez he, 'I guess,
Ef thet's his claim,' sez he,
'The fencin' stuff'll cost enough
To bust up friend J B,
Ez wal ez you an' me!'

We know we've gut a cause, John,
Thet's honest, just, an' true,
We thought 't would win applause, John,
Ef nowheres else, from you
Ole Uncle S sez he, 'I guess
His love of right,' sez he,
'Hangs by a rotten fibre o' colton
There's natur' in J B,
Ez wal ez you an' me!'

The Sonth says, 'Poor folks down'' John, An' 'All men up!' say we—White, yaller, black, 'n' brown, John
Now which is your idee?
Ole Uncle S sez he, 'I guess,
John preaches wal,' sez he,
'But, sermon thru, an' come to du,
Why, there's the old J B
A crowdin' you an' me''

Shall it be love, or hate, John?

It's you thet's to decide,

Ain't jour bonds held by Fate, John,

Like all the world's beside?

Ole Uncle S sez he, 'I guess,

Wise men forgive,' sez he,

'But not forget, an' some time yet

Thet truth may strike J B,

Lz wal ez you an' me!'

God means to make this land, John,
Clear thru, from sea to sea,
Believe an' nnderstand, John,
The with o' bein' free.
Ole Uncle S sez he, 'I guess,
God's price is high,' sez he,
'But nothin' else than with He sells Wears long, an' thet J B
May learn like you an' me!'

From The Vision of Sir Launfal'

And what is so rare as a day in June?

Then, if ever, come perfect days,
Then Heaven tries the earth if it be in tune,
And over it softly her warm ear lays Whether we look, or whether we listen,
We hear life minimur, or ee it glisten, Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And groping blindly above it for light,

Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers,
The flush of life may well be seen Theritage beel over bulls and valley

Thriling back over hills and valleys,
The cowslip startles in meadows green,

The buttercup catches the sun in its chilice, And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean

To be some happy creature's palace,
The little hird sits at his door in the sun,
Atilt like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'errun

With the deluge of summer it receives,
His mate feels the eggs beneath her wings
And the heart in her dumb breast flutters and sings,
He sings to the wide world, and she to her nest,—
In the nice ear of Nature which song is the best?

Now is the high tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbed away
Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay,
Now the heart is so full that a drop overfills it,
We are happy now because God wills it,
No matter how barren the past may have been,
'Tis enough for us now that the leaves are green,
We sit in the warm shade and feel right well
How the sap creeps np and the blossoms swell, 155

We may shut our eves, but we cannot help knowing That skies are clear and grass is growing, The breeze comes whispering in our ear, That dandelions are blossoming near.

That maize has sprouted, that streams are flowing, That the river is bluer than the sky,
That the robin is plastering his house hard by,
And if the breeze kept the good news back,
For other couriers we should not lack,

We could guess it all by yon heifer's lowing,— And hark ' how clear bold chanticleer, Warmed with the new wine of the year, Tells all in his lusty crowing 1

Under the Willows

Frank hearted hostess of the field and wood, Gypsy, whose roof is every spreading tree, June is the pearl of our New England year Still a surprisal, though expected long, Her coming startles Long she hes in wait, Makes many a feint, peeps forth, draws coaly back, Then, from some southern ambush in the sky, With one great gush of blossom storms the world A week ago the sparrow was divine, The bluebird, sliifting his light load of song From post to post along the cheerless fence, Was as a rhymer ere the poet come, But now, O rapture ' sunshine winged and voiced, Pipe blown through by the warm wild breath of the West Shepherding his soft droves of fleecy cloud, Gladness of woods, skies, waters, all in one, The bobolink has come, and, like the soul Of the sweet season vocal in a bird, Gurgles in eestasy we know not what Save June! Dear June! Now God be praised for June

Abraham Lincoln.

Nature, they say, doth dote,
And cannot make a man
Save on some worn out plan,
Repeating us by rote
From him her Old World moulds aside she threw,

And, choosing sweet clay from the breast
Of the unexhausted West,
With stuff untainted shaped a hero new,

Wise, steadfast in the strength of God, and true.

How beautiful to see Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed, Who loved his charge, but never loved to lea-

Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead, One whose meek flock the people joyed to be, Not lured by any client of birth,

But by his clear-grained human worth, And brave old wisdom of sincerity!

They knew that outward grace is dust,

They could not choose but trust In that sure footed mind's unfaltering skill,

And supple tempered will

That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.

His was no lonely mountain peak of mind,
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sea mark now, now lost in vapours blind,
Broad prairie rather, genial, level lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all human kind,
Yet also night to heaven and loved of loftiest stars

Nothing of Europe here,

Whitman with 'a clear and unmistaken conviction to disobey all and go his own way.' This edition had some sale. In 1862 Whitman went to Washington, and for two years did patient and efficient service as a volunteer nuise in the soldiers' hospitals. Of these years there is ample and affecting record in his Drum Taps and in The Wound Dresser (a series of letters to his mother) and the prose Specimen Days. Appointed to a clerkship in the national Department of the Interior, he was dismissed by the Secretary as 'the author of an indecent book.' I rom this incident came W. D. O'Connor's splendid vindication, 'The Good Gray Poet,' and Whitman got another government appointment, which he held till he was stricken with paralysis in 1873. Apparently the emotional strain of the hospital service had sapped the foundations of his health The remainder of his life was spent in Camden, New Jersey, an unlovely extension of Philadelphia, where he had noble visitors and faithful friends, with some whose flatteries would have sickened him had his appetite for such ment been less robust New editions of his poems appeared from time to time, seed for the collector's harvest further on, a significant one in 1876, so broad the stamp on it of his individuality, and one in 1882, nearly complete, which his Boston publishers abandoned when threatened with prosecution by the Massachusetts Attorney-They begged Whitman to make some concessions to the official censor, but he stubbornly refused Luther at Worms was not more intrac table Here he stood he could no otherwise

I or some years of his homefaring his engagement with the thought of death was steady and profound, and embodied itself in much beautiful expression. He died as he had sung, with quiet confidence, 26th March 1802

Carlyle found his earliest clear response in America, contrariwise Whitman, another thairs man, lus in Lingland But it is too often forgotten or concealed that it was an expurgated edition that made for Whitman his first English friends it is perhaps true that, like Poc, he has his most enthusiastic following abroad Again, like Poc, his theories of versification seem afterthoughts. We may as easily doubt that his irregular dithyramlis were deliberately adopted as the form best suited to his thought as that 'The Raven' was as mechani cally set up and stuffed as Poe averred. Whitman wrote as he did because he could write in this way and could not write in the more formal rhythms The method was not a defect. It was the inevit able expression of his character, which he described as 'disorderly, fleshly, and sensual' It fitted him much better than his clothes- never a strong nomi with him. It was not by any means, mere form lessness. With less inclody than some other forms, buch poems as 'The it lind inore of harmony Mystic Irumpeter,' 'Out of the Cradle,' 'Passage to India,' have the genesis and evodus of great musical compositions. It was not mere fancy on Whitman's part that he and Wagner made one There are too, if not 'countless' particular felicities, as J. A. Symonds wrote, more than few Many of the titles are short poems, many initial lines as musical as the conventional Apollos lute Many phrases are as picture making is Carlyle. as vivid as Emicreon's a hile others are particularly bad, as where the grass is called the uncut hair of graves' and God's perfumed handkerchief which he has dropped with his name in the corner of these phrasus have been admired, but the first would be as had as possible were it not for the There are other defects which qualify but second do not neutralise the better parts The diction is often prostic, but a worse fault is its inventions of mongrel French and Spanish words, the monstrous phrenological terminology, the paste-jewels of Whitman's own manufacture, and the lapses into mere prettiness. With many noble cadences, he has cacophonies that he night easily have smoothed His catalogues of things innumerable, pitch forked together without order or congruity, have grieved his more judicious friends and inspired amusing parodies, but without them the total impression would be less powerful than it is now He carries us away as with a flood, and they are the scouring of its banks, swirled on its tossing A splendid anthology could be culled from Whitman's poems, but it would give us no iden of his prairial 'leagues of sun illumined corn,' bowed by a rushing wind The multitude of his particulars is necessary to his main effect prevails in virtue of the volume and momentum of his stream. At his best he gives us a sense of elevation and expansion which is to the spirit what the height and air of mountains is to the bodily sense.

The audicity of Whitman's treatment of sex relations has given pause not only to his detractors à outrance, but to his admirers here and there. It is permitted us to doubt his taste and wisdom, but not his brave sincerity. Despising the 'snickering pruriency' and innuendo which are the warp and woof of men's habitual regard for sexual things, he would redeem them by an absolute frankness But, pleading for their sacredness, he makes them so repulsive that his poems are discouragements of the normal relationships of sex, and he raises the question whether certain instinctive silences are not as sacred as the functions of the sexual man Morcover, there is no recognition of romantic love in his poems The procreative aspect swallows up every other

The section of the Leaves called 'Calamus' has troubled some of Whitman's friends for whom his blessing on things sexual in 'Children of Adam' is not too frank and bold. It celebrates the mutual friendship of man with man in terms that are too sweet and soft for the more manly sort. A manly man likes not to be caressed by one of his own sex. Such a prophecy as this ought not to be of any private interpreta ion, yet J. A. Symonds had to wait for Whitman's private assurance of his intention before he could read without misunderstanding It is at this point that we feel that Whitman, whose virility is so much vaunted by himself and others, has an invirile strain, a predilection for certain mushy words and sentiments and traits. His feeling for nature is involved in this, and there is in his natural descriptions a surplusage of such words as 'luscious,' 'voluptuous,' 'delicious' It should, however, be said of 'Calamus' that it is highly representative of that passion for comrideship which was ever one of the master-passions of Whitman's mind.

If Whitman were an 'art for art's sake' decadent, these considerations would be irrelevant, but his friends claim for him, as he for himself, that his work was one of moral elevation. Hence a difficulty, much greater than that inherent in 'Children of Adam,' obtruded by such poems as 'Native Moments,' and passages of similar import which seem to teach a doctrine of moral indifference.

What blurt is this about virtue and vice?

Evil propels me and reform of evil propels me—

I stand indifferent

And when he cries

O to be relieved of distinctions to make as much of vices as virtues, we wonder at his dissatisfaction with his achieved success. Here, we are told, is the high-water mark of Whitman's sympathy he is Terence's man to whom nothing human is foreign. But even though, 'if all were known, all would be forgiven,' it does not follow that it would be cordially assumed and re enacted, as Whitman seems to say

Before the face of Whitman's message, as this appeals to those who know him best and love him most, every defect of his manner, every evaggeration of his doctrine, hides a diminished head Let the character of his admirers plead for him, barring some foolishness, and in the court of fame he will be gloriously crowned. No admiration did him more honour than that of Anne Gilchrist, and it was typical of a wide range. It fed upon his confidence in God and man, the universe and the This confidence is not so much immortal life Whitman's as Whitman It might be written of the Leaves as of the Koran, 'There is no doubt in this book' This dauntless optimism attracts as does nothing else in Whitman's range. But that range is wide, and several points are salient in majestic rivalry One that emerges conspicuously is the importance of the individual, the worth of every individual soul Not Edwards nor Channing was more sure of this, and Emerson's 'First soul, and second soul, and evermore soul' might be a leaf of Whitman's grass It is as the soul's organ and minister that the body is so much to him is as nourishing the soul that the universe is most wonderful, while still the soul is ever more than it Swiftly I shrivel at the thought of God.

At Nature and its Wonders, Time and Spice and

But that I, turning, call to thee, O Soul, thou actual Me, And lo thou gently musterest the orbs, Thou matest 1 ime, smilest content at Death,

And fillest, swellest full the vistnesses of Space.

It is as the arena of individuality, as the soul's opportunity, that Democracy is so important and its 'vistas' so encouraging (It should be said, however, that in his prose Democratic Vistas (1871) there was much less brag than in the earlier poems. and a sure finger on some ailing spots ) It is because every individual is so precious that Whitman in his representative capacity-which qualifies at minny points his towering egotism, or what appears to be such-disdains companionship with no fellowbeing, even the most vile. The note of universal sympathy continually recurs and it is so cloquently written because it is so genuinely felt. finally, it is because the individual soul is so great a being, the pride and darling of the universe, all things subordinate to it, that it is secure of endless God is not surer, and of Him the meanest thing in nature is a proof that 'sextillions of in fidels' cannot confute.

The tragedy of Whitman's life and art is that, while he was so proudly and joyously the poet of the people in every aspect of their swarming life, they did not care for him. They preferred the cultivated Longfellow, the 'snow-bound' Whittier and Whitman is still the poet of a literary class, and there is little sign of his approaching recognition and adoption by the Democracy with which he identified himself so heartly. So heartly, and yet not perfectly, so indifferent was he to those attractions of material wealth which are so powerful for his countrymen. Here, possibly, we have the secret of his failure to engage their interest.

Hours for the Soul.

July 22nd, 1878 -Living down in the country again A wonderful conjunction of all that goes to make those sometime miracle hours after sunset—so near and yet so Perfect, or nearly perfect days, I notice, are not so very uncommon, but the combinations that male perfect nights are few, even in a lifetime Sunset left things one of those perfections to night pretty clear, the larger stars were visible soon as the shades allow d. A while after eight, three or four great black clouds suddenly rose, seemingly from different points, and sweeping with broad swirls of wind but no thunder, underspread the orbs from view everywhere. and indicated a violent heat storm. But without storm, clouds, blackness and all, sped and vanished as suddenly as they had risen, and from a little after nine till cleven the atmosphere and the whole show above were in that state of exceptional clearness and glory just alluded to In the north west turned the Great Dipper with its pointers round the Cynosure A little south of east the constell lation of the Scorpion was fully up, with red Antarcs glowing in its neck, while dominating, majestic Jupiter swam, an hour and a half risen, in the east-(no moon till after eleven). A large part of the sly seein'd just laid in great splashes of phosphorus. You could look deeper in, farther through, than usual, the orbs thiel as heads of wheat in a field. Not that there was any special brilliancy either-nothing near as sharp as I have seen of keen winter nights, but a curious general luminousness throughout to sight, sense, and sonl. The latter had much to do with it (I am convinced there are hours of Nature, especially of the atmosphere, mornings and even ings, address'd to the soul. Night transcends, for that purpose, what the proudest day can do ) Now, indeed, if never before, the heavens declared the glory of God It was to the full the sky of the Bible, of Aribin, of the prophets, and of the oldest poems. There, in abstrac tion and stillness (I had gone off by myself to absorb the scene, to have the spell unbroken), the coprousness, the removedness, vitality, loose clear crowdedness, of that stellar concave spreading overhead, softly absorb'd into me, rising so free, interminably high, stretching east, west, north, south-and I, though but a point in the centre below, embodying all.

As if for the first time, indeed, creation noiselessly sank into and through me its placid and untellable lesson, beyond—O, so infinitely beyond —anything from art, books, sermons, or from science, old or new. The spirit's hour—religion's hour—the visible suggestion of God in space and time—now once definitely indicated, if never again. The untold pointed at—the lieuvens all paved with it. The Milky Way, as if some superliuman symphony, some ode of universal vagueness, disdaining syllable and sound—a flashing glance of Deity, address'd to the soul. All silently—the indescribable night and stars—far off and silently.

Boston Common-More of Emerson

Oct 10-13—I spend a good deal of time on the Common, these delicious days and nights—every mid day from 11 30 to about 1—and almost every sunset another hour. I I now all the big trees, especially the old clins along Tremont and Beacon Street, and have come to a sociable silent understanding with most of them in the sunlit air (yet crists cool enough), as I saunter along the vide unpaved wall a. Up and down this breadth by Beacon Street, between these some old class. I wall 'd for two hours, of a bright sharp I change middly twenty one years ago, with I nierson, then in his prime, I cen, physically and morally may notic, arm dat every point, and when he chose, vaciding the emotional just as well as the intellectual. During the e two hours he was the till er and I the his ener. It is as in argument statement, reconnouring, revie, attacl, and pressing home (lile an army corps in order, artillers, enales, mifantry) of all that could be said against that part (and a mun part) in the construction of my poems, 'Children of Adam. More precious than gold to me that dister tation-it afforded me, ever after, this strange and paradoxical lesson, each point of L's statement was unanswerable, no judge's charge ever more complete or convincing I could never hear the points better pu -and then I felt down in my sail the clear and na mistakable conviction to disobey all, and pursue my own "What have you to say then to such things?" said I, pausing in conclusion Only that, while I can t answer them at all, I feel more settled than ever to adhere to my own theory, and exemplify it," i is my candid response. Whereupon we went and had a good dinner at the American House. And thencefors and I never waver'd or was touch'd with qualms (as I confess I had been two or three times before)

From 'Song of Myzelf'

I believe a leaf of grass is no less than the journer work of the sars,

And the pismire is equally perfect, and a grum of sand, and the egg of the wren,

And the tree tond is a chef decuvre for the highest, And the running blackberry would adorn the parlours of

heaven,

And the narrowest hinge in my hand puts to scorn all mirchinery, And the cow crunching with depress'd head surpasses any statue,

And a mouse is miracle enough to stagger sextillions of infidels

I think I could turn and live with animals, they are so placed and self contain'd

I stand and look at them long and long

They do not sweat and whine about their condition, They do not he awake in the dark and weep for their sins,

They do not make me sick discussing their duty to God.

Not one is dissatisfied, not one is demented with the mania of owning things,

Not one kneels to mother, nor to his kind that hved thousands of years ago,

Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth

So they show their relations to me and I accept them,

They bring me tokens of myself, they evince them plainly in their possession.

The City Dead-House

By the city dead house by the gate,
As idly sauntering wending my wav from the clangour,
I curious pause, for lo, an outcast form, a poor dead prostitute brought,

Her corpse they deposit unclaim'd, it lies on the dump brick pavement,

The divine woman, her body, I see the body, I look on it alone,

That house once full of passion and beauty, all else I notice not.

Nor stillness so cold, nor running water from fancet, nor odours morbific impress me,

But the house alone—that wondrous house—that deheate fair house—that ruin '

That immortal house more than all the rows of dwellings ever built '

Or white domed capitol with majestic figure surmounted, or all the old high spired cathedrals,

That little house alone more than them all—poor, des perate house '

Fair, fearful wreek—tenement of a soul—itself a soul, Unclaim'd, avoided house—take one breath from my tremulous lips,

Take one tear dropt aside as I go for thought of you, Dead house of love—house of madness and sin, crumbled, crush'd,

House of life, crewhile talking and laughing—but ah, poor house, dead even then,

Months, years, an echoing, garnish'd house—but dead, dead, dead

To the Man-of-War-Bird.

Thou born to match the gale, (thou art all wings,)
To cope with heaven and earth and sea and hurricane Thou ship of air that never furl'st thy sails, Days, even weeks untired and onward, through spaces, realms gyrating,

At dusk that look'st on Senegal, at morn America, 'That sport'st amid the lightning flash and thunder cloud, In them, in thy experiences, hadst thou my soul, What joys I what joys were thine!

Prayer of Columbus

A batter d, wreek'd old min,
Thrown on this savage shore, far, far from home, Pent by the sea and durk rebellious brows, twelve dreary months,

Sore, stiff with many toils, sieken'd and nigh to death, I take my way along the island's edge, Venting a heavy heart.

I am too full of woe!
Haply I may not live another day,
I cannot rest O God, I cannot eat or drink or sleep,
Till I put forth myself, my prayer, once more to Thee, Breathe, bathe myself once more in Thee, commune with Thee,

Report myself once more to Thee.

One effort more, my altar this bleak sand,
That Thou O God my life hast lighted,
With ray of light, steady, ineffable, vouchsafed of Thee,
I ight rare untellable, lighting the very light,
Beyond all signs, descriptions, languages,
For that O God, be it my latest word, here on my knees, Old, poor, and paralysed, I thank Thee.

My terminus near, The clouds already closing in upon me,

The voyage balk'd, the course disputed, lost, I yield my ships to Thec.

My hands, my limbs grow nerveless,

My brain feels rack'd, bewilder'd,
Let the old timbers part, I will not part,
I will cling fast to Thee, O Gou, though the waves buffet me,

Thee, Thee at least I know

Is it the prophet's thought I speak, or am I raving? What do I know of life? what of myself? I know not even my own work past or present, Dim ever shifting guesses of it spread before me, Of newer better worlds, their mighty particular, Mocking, perplexing me.

And these things I see suddenly, what mean they?
As if some miracle, some hand divine unseal'd my eyes, Shadowy vast shapes smile through the air and sky,
And on the distant waves sail countless ships,
And anthems in new tongues I hear saluting me

The Death of Lincoln

O Captain' my Captain' our fearful trip is done, The ship has weather d every rack, the prize we sought is won,

The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting, While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring,

But O heart! heart! heart!
O the bleeding drops of red,
Where on the deek my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead

O Captain ' my Captain ' rise up and hear the bells, Rise up—for you the fing is flung—for you the bugle trills,

For you bouquets and ribbon'd wreaths—for you the shores a crowding.

For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning,

Here Captain! dear father!
This arm beneath your head!
It is some dream that on the deck,
You've fallen cold and dead.

My Captain does not answer, his hips are pale and still; My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will. The ship is anchor'd safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,

From fearful trip the victor ship comes In with object won,

Exult O shores, and ring O bells I
But I with mournful tread,
Walk the deck my Captain lies,
I allen cold and dead

From 'Passage to India.'

Swiftly I shrivel at the thought of God,
At Nature and its wonders, Time and Space and Death,
But that I, turning, call to thee O soul, thou actual Me,

Thou matest Time, smilest content at Death,
And fillest, swellest full the vastnesses of Space

Harriet Beecher Stowe.

the author of Uncle Ton's Cabin, was born in Litchfield, Connecticut, 14th June 1811 father was Lyman Beecher, a powerful preacher of Nev England orthodoxy with some personal variations, who in 1826 was called to Boston to check the rising flood of Unitarianism there, and met with some success. Harriet was the sixth of eight children by Rovanna Foote, after whose death Dr Beecher went on marrying and increasing his family The seventh child of the first marriage was Henry Ward Beecher, the most popular preacher America has produced, mingling much poetry and humour with a profound spirituality, and carrying much farther his father's tentative reforms of the traditional theology was a remarkable family, not only for its ultimate size, but for the ability of its members Harriet and Henry were its most shining lights, and their two hearts had but one beat as children and lifelong, especially in the anti-slavery struggle The mother, a bright and beautiful spirit, contributed their finer parts The father found her reading Sir Charles Grandison when he went to woo, and Evelina was another of her early joys She died when Harriet was hardly four years old When twelve the poor child wrote an essay on Immortality, and about the same time was as deeply affected by Lord Byron's death as young Tennyson by the same event, but his was grief for the dead poet, hers for the lost soul. During her father's Boston ministry he became aware of her as an individual and not merely one of his many children, and when in 1832 he removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, she joined his caravan object was to found the Lane Theological Seminary, hers to assist her sister Catherine in a female She remained in Cincinnati eighteen academy years, a period of chronic illness and low spirits, poverty, anxiety, and domestic drudgery ing Calvin E Stowe, a teacher in her father's school, in 1836, she bore six children in swift succession, her husband, meantime, less the supporting oak than the dependent vine. His most brilliant moment was in 1842, when he advised his wife to drop her original middle name (Elizabeth) and go in for literary fame. The next year a volume of her stories was published, but they For her tract of this period, were not much Larthly Care a Heavenly Discipline, she had but to look into her own heart and write

The year 1850 was signalised by her removal to Brunswick, Maine, the seat of Bowdoin College, where Hawthorne and Longfellow had been classmates at an earlier date, and where now her husband was to occupy a professor's chair. The labour of moving and getting settled fell largely to her share, so that she was 'really glad of an excuse to lie in bed'—the birth of her seventh child, with whom in arms, and full of household care, she wrote Uncle Tont's Cabin in 1851–52, publishing it in the National Era, a semi-literary and anti-slavery paper issuing from Washington, District of Columbia. She had no clear idea at the start how she was going on or coming out. She expected to finish it in twelve numbers, and it run through forty-three. The first part written was 'The Death of Uncle Tom,' which came to her as a kind of vision while she was in church. In the course of its appearance in the Era it excited little attention. Nevertheless, a Boston publisher thought there was something in it, and offered to publish it, giving her a half share of the profits. She declined the offer because her husband was 'altogether too poor to assume the risk.' The publisher assumed this and gave her 10 per cent. royalty, which brought her $20,000 in the course The Era had given her $300 of six months The wonderful fortunes of the book are related by Mrs Stowe in the 'Illustrated Edition' of 1879 when there were forty three Figlish editions in the British Museum and nineteen translations literature of imitation, criticism, and counterblast sprang up around the book, above which it easily towered A little later a circulation of 1,500,000 was reckoned in Great Britain alone, and still it multiplies its readers and editions More than two hundred copies are (1903) in constant demand in the New York Public Library

After a Photograph

Even more remarkable than the external fortunes of the book is the author's lack of intellectual and moral preparation for it and pre-engagement with it. Her first knowledge of slavery on its own ground was in 1833, when she visited a Kentucky plantation, which became Colonel Shelby's in the She saw something of pro-slavery riots in Cincinnati, and something of runaway slaves, only the Ohio's width intervening between Cincinnati and slave territory. Once she had a slave-girl as a servant in her house, and when the manhounds were on the girl's track Mrs Stowe's husband and brother spirited her away towards Canada, so furnishing Mrs Stowe with one of her strong incidents Had her own scent upon the trail of slavery been keen, her opportunities for intimate knowledge of it would have been adequate to lier demands. But living for eighteen years next door to slavery, and, as it were, in the first station of the 'underground railroad,' she does not appear to have had any deep interest in the matter during those years. She probably sympathised with her father when, at the dictation of the slaveholding interests, he silenced the discussion of slavery in his school and forced the withdrawal of the anti-slavery students liked the abolitionists and was still a 'colonisationist' when she wrote Uncle Tour's Cabin Apparently she waited, as did many others, for the operation of the Fugitive Slave Law (1850) to wake her sleeping heart, and it was first through another's eyes that she saw the horror of the situa Her brother Edward's wife in Boston had a close view of the slave captures and renditions, and she wrote to Mrs Stowe commanding her to 'write something that would make this whole nation feel what an accursed thing slavery is' Mrs Stowe read the letter in her little Brunswick parlour, and then crushing it in her hand, as if it were the monster, said, erecting her tired body, 'I will write something I will, if I live' No yow was ever kept more sacredly. Once launched upon the tide of her story, she was swept along with passionate sympathy Much of it was written in the small hours of the night, after the baking, mending, child-nursing, house-printing, and other drudgery of the day The book written in this fashion had the defects of its qualities The plot was loose and rambling, the style had ailing spots. the knowledge of Southern life and character and situation had its defective side. But the author had the divine gift of imagination, and her book was Every character had reality, so had the scenery of the book, so had its main effect It did not evaggerate the horrors of slavery confessed the better side. But that its general truth was not too harsh the Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, published in 1853, furnished irrefragable proof It is difficult to estimate the effect of the book on the anti slavery cause. It has generally been accounted its most powerful instrument. Lincoln said to Mrs Stowe in 1862, 'Are you the little woman that made this great war?' On the other hand, we have to reckon with the fact that the anti slavery vote fell off nearly one-half in the presidential election of 1852. Shortly the book had 'great allies'—the repeal of the Missouri compromise in 1854 and the Kansas conflict following But, however modified or enhanced, its effect on the great struggle, now rapidly approaching its climax, must have been deep and wide

It helped to liberate the slave, it entirely liberated Mrs Stowe's own genius and in part her spirit. After 1852 she seemed a different woman In her letters the dignity of great events sup planted her domestic miseries. Her book made her an abolitionist. The grand of poverty was over, while still she must somehow be always scraping her brains for money as if there were still a wolf at the door. In England she was the object of an ovation which would have spoiled a nature less entirely simple than her own. In Dred (1856), a second anti-slavery novel, and in The Minister's Wooing, and especially in Old Town Folks, she attained an artistic excellence denied to her great improvisation. Had Uncle Tom's Cabin rendered Southern life as perfectly as Old Town Folks rendered New England life and character, without loss of lyrical passion, it would have been a greater book. In Dred there was some waking to the perception of the ex-slaveholder, James G Birney, that the American churches were 'the bulwark of slavery' In the Minister's Wooing Mrs Stowe's moral nature was more deeply engaged than in Uncle Tom, for slavery never shook her soul with its enormity as did the doctrine of endless future punishment. Agries of Sorrento and The Pearl of Orr's Island, agreeable stories, suffered from the exigencies of simultaneous production To drive her spontaneous soul in publisher's harness was always difficult. She anticipated no permanent reputation for her writings subsequent to Old Fown Folks The closing period of her life crowned her with great reverence and affection, while burdening her with domestic sorrow, a fierce attack upon her brother's character, the painful episode of her own attack upon Lord Byron's, and the slow but sure breaking down of her mind some years before her death, which occurred 1st July 1896

Mrs Stowes works, as published in the 'Riverside Edition in seventeen volumes, include a Life written by her friend Annie Fields in one volume. This, an excellent book, is also published separately (1898). There is another Life, 'compiled from her journal and letters, by her son Charles Edward Stowe (1890). It is not well done but is fuller than Mrs Fields s.

JOHN WHITL CHADWICK.

Henry Ward Beecher (1813-87), Mrs Beecher Stowe's brother (see page 809), graduated at Amherst College, preached for eight years at Indianapolis, and in 1847 became pastor of Plymouth (Congregational) Church in Brooklyn, where, practically ignoring formal creeds, he preached what he held to be the gospel of Christ, contended for temperance, and denounced slavery to an immense congregation. He was a strenuous politician, at the close of the war in 1865 he became an earnest advocate of reconciliation He long wrote for the Independent, and after 1870 edited the Christian Union charge of adultery (1874) was not proved. Of his vittings, many of them first published in journals, the principal are Star Papers (1855), Summer in the Soul (1858), Eyes and Lars (1864), Lectures to Young Men (1844, revised ed 1850), Aids to Prayer (1864), Norwood (1867), Lecture-Room Talks (1870), Yale Lectures on Prinching (1872-1874), Evolution and Religion (1885), and a Life Many collections of his serof Christ (1891) mons, lectures, and speeches were published, two volumes of sermons selected by Lyman Abbot in Other volumes were called 1868 are of his best Life Thoughts and Comforting Thoughts . He was a most eloquent and effective orator in pulpit and on platform, and wrote largely for journals, his sermons and prayers were phonographically Besides his Autobiographical Reminiscences (1898), there are more than half a dozen independent Lives of him, that by Scoville and others (1888) is the most authoritative.

John Lothrop Motley,

New Englander to the backbone though he was, did not trace his paternal line of ancestry to the Puritan settlers His great-grandfather, John Motley, who emigrated from Ireland to Maine in the early eighteenth century, may have contributed a new element to the original Massachusetts stock Still, the typical blood of the American Boston also ran in the historian's veins, lus mother was descended from John Lothrop, a Nonconformist minister, who fled to Massachusetts in the seventeenth century to escape imprisonment in England It was Anna Lothrop who gave his distinguished appearance to her son (one of her eight children), who was born 15th April 1814, at Dorchester, now part of the city of Boston. From a preliminary school, Lothrop went to a school where George Bancroft, one of the head masters, moved him to acquire German In 1831 he graduated at Harvard University, where one of his college friends was Oliver Wendell Holmes, later his biographer From Harvard the eighteen-vear-old student passed to Göttingen, where he began an intimacy with Bismarck which continued unbroken to his death, at Berlin the two were fellow-lodgers. Two years of German university life were followed by law studies in Boston During this period Motley met and married (1837) Mary Benjamin, who for thirty-seven years was an inspiration to him vears later (1839) was launched anonymously his first literary venture, a crude and vouthful romance called Mortor's Hope, into which were worked in modified form many of the author's experiences

At the age of tventy seven Motley was sent to St Petersburg as Secretary of Legation, but he disliked the place, and resigned after a very brief experience. By the summer of 1842 he was again in America, and took part in the unsuccessful presidential campaign of Henry Clu (1844). For the North American Review he wrote in 1845 and 1847 two papers, one on Peter the Great, the other on the Puritans, which surprised the critics In 1849 he served one term in the Massachusetts legislature, and in the same year he published his second novel, Merry-Mount, artistically an improvement on Morton's Hope, in Holmes's opinion it is less suggestive of Pelham and Vivian Gray, and has more in common with Woodstock and Kemlworth By the time Merry-Mount saw the light Motley was well embailed on his preliminary exploration of the sources of Dutch history When Motley heard that Prescott was preparing to follow up his Conquest of Peru with his Philip II, he went to him at once to tell him of his own plan, which covered so much of the same ground, and Prescott not only assured the young man that there was room for both enterprises, but offered him all the printed matter he had at so much pains and cost collected Erelong Motley felt he could not do justice to his subject in America, and in 1851 he went to Europe with his family to continue his preparations

Over four years were spent in researches at

Dresden, the Hague, and at Brussels, and in 1856 The Rise of the Dutch Republic, the fruit of ten years' work, appeared In the Westmirster Revuse Froude wrote 'A history as complete as industry and genius can make it now hes before me of the first twenty years of the Revolt of the United Provinces It has been the result of many years of silent, thoughtful, unobtru sive labour, and unless ve are strangely mistaken, unless we are ourselves altogether unfit for this office of criticising which we have here undertaken, the book is one which will take its place among the finest histories in this or any language All essentials of a great writer Mr Motley emmently possesses His mind is broad, his industry unwearied. In power of dramatic description no modern historian, except perhaps Mr Carlyle, surpasses him, and in analysis of character he is elaborate and distinct.' Prescott wrote with warm appreciation, his only criticism being, 'You have laid it on Philip rather hard Indeed, you have whittled him down to such an imperceptible point that there is hardly enough of him left to hang a newspaper paragraph on, much less five or six volumes of solid listory, as I propose to do But then you make it up with your own hero, William of Orange, and I comfort myself that you are looking through a pair of Dutch spectroles often! The crit cism was doubt less just. Orange was seen b. Motley through a rose coloured medium, and was the hero of the story as truly as if he had been deated for a more successful no el than the two early efforts. Dutch and French versions of the book were made by Bakhuiren van den Brint, archivist of Holland, and by M. Guizot. Bal huizen commended Motley's work as an excellent basis for the history of the rise of the republic, and other scholars in he Netherlands bore testimony to the thoroughness with which the American had examined the sources of their national history

In London, in Rome, and in Boston Motley continued his researches and wrote industriously, and the second harvest of his labours appeared in 1860 in the form of the first two volumes of The United Netherlands. The period treated was only five years (1584–89), but the area dealt with was vast. So closely did the new state come into touch with France and England, its poise as a balance of power was so delicate, that in discussing its history an understanding of conditions in adjacent lands was essential. And even at the time

By permission of Mr John Murray

it was fully recognised that Motley had availed himself of many sources of information not used by any earlier writer

In 1860-61 Motley was busied in the State Paper Office and the British Museum, and lived with his family in London. His letters give delightful pictures of the social recognition his reputation had won for him, Oxford honoured him with an honorary degree. Meanwhile he was watching events in his own country closely Absentee though he was, he was keenly and in telligently patriotic, a firm believer in Republican government, and in order to correct the mis conceptions of American affairs which he heard constantly expressed, he wrote two long letters to the Times, reprinted later under the title of The Causes of the Civil War.

In the spring of 1861 lie returned to America, intending to remain there, but he accepted Lin coln's appointment to represent the United States at the Court of Austria, and the autumn found him established in Vienna at a time when complications in Europe rused many difficult problems, irrespective of events at home, from the early stages of the war to the assassination of Lincoln While Motley was straining every nerve to main tain the honour of the Union, a Southern writer (John B Adger in the Southern Presbyterian Review, July 1862) used his Rise of the Dutch Republic as a text to urge the righteousness of the Confederate cause, drawing a close parallel between the condition of the seceding states and the revolting Netherlands Motley's comments on European affairs in his personal letters are spirited and charming, though sometimes oddly colloquial in phrase. The correspondence between him and Bismarck often sounds as if the grave statesman and the scholarly diplomat were still under graduates without responsibilities to the world Motley's long and pleasant official residence in Vienna came to an abrupt close in 1866 mulicious attacks of an unknown person, noticed by Secretary Seward, caused Motley to resign the post that he had filled with dignity and honour, and President Johnson accepted his resignation

Fortunately for him, his historical work demanded continuous attention He went on steadily with the concluding volumes of the United Netherlands, published in 1868, in which the narrative is brought down to 1609 As a whole the second work is less interesting than the story of the revolt against Spain—it is looser in construction, and has not the special advantage of presenting two contrasting characters like Philip II and William of Orange. Furthermore, the author was too much affected by the Civil War in America, and drew his parallels between the situations in the United Netherlands and the United States more closely than was war During a brief residence in America that same year he delivered two noteworthy addresses, one at Faneuil Hall, Boston, on 'Your Questions for the People at the Presidential Election,' and the other before the New York Historical Society on 'Historic Progress and American Democracy'

One of the first acts of the administration of President Grant was Motley's appointment as minister to the Court of St James's (1869) unexpected recall in the summer of 1870 was a painful experience to the man whose disinterested devotion to his country was patent in every word he thought and uttered The question as to whether, in his preliminary conversation with Lord Clarendon on the question of the settlement of the Alabama claims, Motley overstepped his definite instructions is beyond the scope of a brief summary of his historical work. The sympathy of his contemporaries was with the minister, but in more recent treatment of the history of Grant's administration there is some tendency to hold that, from a diplomatic point of view, Motley was possibly indiscreet.

The remaining seven years of the historian's life were devoted to the continuance of his Netherland history, which he hoped to bring through the Thirty Years' War From the central figure he called his next two volumes The Life and Death of John of Barneveld They covered the period of the Truce in the Netherlands (1609-21), were published in 1874, and proved the conclusion of their author's life work. If Morton's Hope is autobiographical in suggesting some of Motley's youthful aspirations, if the Umted Netherlands reflects the crisis through which the writer lived as he wrote, his last work must also be regarded as coloured by his personal experience, President Grant, like Maurice, was a military man in civil affairs. Motley's sympathy with Barneveld is pronounced More than his other works this aroused Dutch writers to dissent, they hastened to defend Maurice, whom they think the American failed to understand, too obviously he had no liking for him

The last seven vears of Motley's life were passed between England and the Hague, with one visit to America. His stay in Holland was peculiarly pleasant. His services to Dutch history were recognised by the King and Queen of Holland as well as by the people. But his hopes of carrying his work through the Thirty Years' War were frustrated by ill-health. Mrs Motley's death in 1874 gave her husband a shock from which he never recovered, and he followed her in 1877. He died (29th May) at Kingston Russell in Dorsetshire, in the house of his daughter, Lady Vernon Harcourt, and was buried in Kensal Green Cemetery near his wife Motley's character is plainly to be traced in his work. His laborious researches and his vivifying imagination enabled him to make the past live again, and, within certain limits, he was wonderfully true to his materials. But his keen and eager temperament made it impossible for him to attain to the historian's virtue of judicial impartiality, he hardly conceals the fact that he is a partisan. His picturesque and cloquent style sometimes attains real splendour, but is apt to fatigue, perhaps his work is best where it is least adorned with rhetorical ornament.

The Beggars

The board glittered with silver and gold The wine circulated with more than its usual rapidity among the band of noble Bacchanals, who were never weary of drinking the healths of Brederode, of Orange, and Egmont It was thought that the occasion imperiously demanded an extraordinary carouse, and the political events of the past three days lent an additional excite ment to the wine. There was an earnest discussion as to an appropriate name to be given to their confederacy Should they call themselves the 'Society of Concord,' the restorers of lost liberty, or by what other attractive title should the league be baptized? Brederode was, however, already prepared to settle the question He knew the value of a popular and original name, he possessed the instinct by which adroit partisans in every age have been accustomed to convert the reproachful epithets of their opponents into watchwords of honour, and he had already made his preparations for a startling theatrical effect Suddenly, amid the din of voices, he arose, with all his rhetorical powers at command recounted to the company the observations which the Seigneur de Berlaymont was reported to have made to the Duchess upon the presentation of the request, and the name which he had thought fit to apply to them Most of the gentlemen then heard the collectively memorable sarcasm for the first time Great was the indignation of all, that the state councillor should have dured to stigmatise as beggars a band of gentlemen with the best blood of the land in their veins. Brederode, on the contrary, smoothing their anger, assured them with good humour that nothing could be more fortu-'They call us beggars ' said he, 'let us accept the name. We will contend with the Inquisition, but remain loyal to the King, even till compelled to wear the beggar's sack '

He then beckoned to one of his pages, who brought him a leathern wallet such as was worn at that day by professional mendicants, together with a large wooden bowl, which also formed part of their regular appurtenances. Brederode immediately hung the wallet around his neek, filled the bowl with wine, lifted it with both hands, and drained it at a draught. 'Long live the beggars!' he cried, as he wiped his beard and set the bowl down. 'Vivent les queulx.' Then for the first time, from the hips of those reckless nobles rose the famous cry which was so often to ring over land and sea, amid blazing cities, on blood stained decks, through the smoke and carnage of many a stricken field.

The Siege of Antwerp

With Sainte Aldegonde came the unlucky Koppen Loppen, and all that could be spared of the English and Scotch troops in Antwerp, under Balfour and Morgan With Hohenlo and Justinus de Nassau came Reinier Kant, who had just succeeded Paul Buys as Advocate Besides these came two other men, side of Holland by side, perhaps in the same bont, of whom the world was like to hear much from that time forward, and whose names are to be most solemnly linked together so long as Netherland history shall endure, one a fair faced, flaxen haired boy of eighteen, the other a square visaged, heavy browed man of forty-Prince Maurice The statesman had and John of Olden Barneveldt been foremost to urge the claim of William the Silent's son upon the stadholderate of Holland and Zeeland, and had been, as it were, the youth's political guardian had himself borne arms more than once before, having shouldered his matchlock under Batenburg, and marched on that officer's spirited but disastrous expedition for the relief of Haarlem But this was the life of those Dutch rebels Quill driving, law expounding, speech making, diplomatic missions, were intermingled with very practi cal business in besieged towns or open fields, with Italian musketeers and Spanish pikemen And here, too, young Maurice was taking his first solid lesson in the art of which he was one day to be so distinguished a professor It was a sharp beginning Upon this ribband of earth, scarce six paces in breadth, with miles of deep water on both sides—a position recently fortified by the first general of the age, and held by the famous infantry of Spain and Italy-there was likely to be no prentice To assault such a position was in truth, as

Alexander had declared it to be, a most daring and desperate resolution on the part of the States. diers, citizens, and all,' said Parma, 'they are obstinate as dogs to try their fortune.'

With wool sacks, sand bags, hurdles, planks, and other materials brought with them, the patriots now rapidly entrenched themselves in the position so brillimitly gained, while, without deferring for an instant the great purpose which they had come to effect, the sappers and inners fastened upon the iron bound soil of the duke, tearing it with piek, mattock, and shovel, digging, delving, and throwing up the earth around them, busy as human beavers, instinctively engaged in a most congenial task

But the beavers did not toil unmolested The large and determined force of Antwerpers and English, Hol landers and Zeelanders, guarded the fortifications as they were rapidly rising, and the pioneers as they were so manfally delving, but the enemy was not idle. From l ort Saint James, next beyond Saint George, Camillo del Monte led a strong party to the resene a tremendous action, foot to foot, breast to breast, with pike and pistol, sv ord and dagger. Never since the beginning of the war had there been harder fighting than now upon that narrow isthmus "Twas an affair of most brave obstinacy on both sides,' said Parma, who rirch nsed strong language. 'Soldiers, eitizens, and all—they were lile mad bulldogs' Hollanders, Italians, Scotchmen, Spaniards, Englishmen, fell thick and fast The contest was about the entrenchments before they were completed, and especially around the sappers and miners, in whose picks and shovels lay the whole fate of Antwerp Many of the dake breakers were digging their own graves, and rolled, one after another, into the breach which they were so obstinately creating that slender thread of land the hopes of many thousands were hanging. To tear it asunder, to roll the ocean waves up to Antwerp, and thus to snatch the great city trumphantly from the grasp of Philip-to accomplish this the three thousand had come forth that May To prevent it, to hold firmly the great treasure entrusted to them, was the determination of the Spiniards And so, closely pent and packed, dis charging their carbines into each other's faces, rolling, coiled together, down the slimy sides of the dyke into the black waters, struggling to and fro, while the cannon from the rebel fleet and from the royal forts mingled their roar with the sharp erack of the musketry, Catholies and patriots contended for an hour, while still, through all the confusion and uproar, the miners dug and delved At last the patriots were victorious They made good their entrenchments, drove the Spiniards, after much slaughter, back to the fort of Saint George on the one side, and of the Palisade on the other, and cleared the whole space between the two points. The centre of the dike was theirs, the great Kowenstyn, the only key by which the gites of Antwerp could be unlocked, was in the deliverers' hands. They pursued their victory, and attacl ed the Palisade Fort. Gambon, its commandant, was severely wounded, many other officers dead or dying, the outworks were in the hands of the Hol landers, the slender piles on which the fortress rested in the water were rudely shaken, the victory was almost complete (From The United \esterlands)

RUTH PUTNAM

Francis Parkman

belongs to the 'picturesque school' of American writers of history, of which Prescott and Motley and, in so far as he was a historian, Irving also, are conspicuous representatives He was born 16th September 1823, the eldest son of the Rev Francis Parkman, minister of the New North Church (Unitarian) in Boston, and died there on the 8th of November 1893 Frail in youth, he was allowed by his parents to roam at will in the splendid woods of the Middlesex Fells, then standing near his maternal grandfather's home at Medford, and there he learned to love the forest. In 1844 he graduated from Harvard College. To gratify his father, who dis approved of his literary and historical projects, he proceeded to a degree in the Harvard Law School, but without intending to practise at the Bar While a student he had notably increased his physical strength by systematic exercise in the open air, and it was partly for the purpose of further improving his uncertain health that he joined a young kinsman in an adventurous trip beyond the Rocky Mountains. As a tonic the expedition proved a failure. The hardships to which Parkman recklessly exposed himself in hope of building up his constitution in fact broke it down, putting an end for ever to his 'boyish fancy of a life of action and a death in battle.' But the account of his adventures, first printed in the Knickerbocker Magazine in 1847, and published two years later in the book now known as The Oregon Trail, shows that the journey had also another purpose. It was, in part, a conscious preparation for historical work already planned. In an autobiographical sketch, written in 1886, he says 'Before the end of the sophomore [second undergraduate] year my vari ous schemes had been crystallised into a plan of writing a story of what was then known as the "Old French War"—that is, the war that ended in the conquest of Canada—for here, as it seemed to me, the forest drama was more stirring and the forest stage more thronged with appropriate actors than in any other passage of our history It was not till some years later that I enlarged the plan to include the whole course of the American conflict between France and England, or, in other words, the history of the American forest, for this was the light in which I regarded it. My theme fascinated me, and I was haunted with wilderness images day and night' The precise degree in which the formation of these plans may be traced to the influence of Cooper's tales and of Irving's Astoria, or their development to the appearance, in 1843 and 1847, of Prescott's histories of the Spanish conquest of America, is still a matter of doubt But there can be no doubt that Parkman's fitness to execute them was vastly increased by his summer on the prairies The frontier changes its longitude far more readily than its life. For the young historian, the trip to the Medicine Bow was also a journey backward in time The St Louis of 1846 revealed to him much that was not unlike the Montreal of a century before. Fort Laramic was in some respects the counterpart of Etherington's Michillimackinac. The Oregon pioneers helped him to understand the Scotch-Irish backwoodsmen of the Alleghenies, the fur-trader and the French half-breed trapper were still the same, and, above all, life in a Sioux village gave him insight into the character of the American Indian His experience was unique. No student can now repert it has impressed upon Parkman's histories certain characteristics which give them, in some measure, the quality of sources

The first of Parkman's historical works, The Conspiracy of Pontiac (1851), is in reality an appendix to the main story which he was to tell He chose the period (1763-69) 'as affording better opportunities than any other for portraying the forest life and the Indian character,' and he never saw reason to change that opinion Pontiac was written under conditions which would have discouraged a less resolute man In the preface Parkman says -and none of the later histories makes such explicit allusion to his lifelong infirmities—that 'for about three years the light of day was unsupportable, and every attempt at reading or writing completely debarred 'Under these circumstances the task of sifting the materials and composing the work was begun and finished The papers were repeatedly read aloud by an amanuensis, copious notes and extracts were made, and the narrative written The process, though down from my dictation extremely slow and laborious, was not without its advantages, and I am well convinced that the authorities have been even more minutely examined, more scrupulously collated, and more thoroughly digested than they would have been under ordinary circumstances' Although he burned to continue work, ten of the next fourteen years were passed in absolute separation from his historical labours, and there were long periods when even the slightest mtellectual effort was possible only at the risk of most serious mental disturbance During his stronger hours he produced a romantic novel, Vassal Morton (1856), now forgotten, and devoted himself with much success to gardening experience thus gained he afterwards embodied in his Book of Roses (1866) Meanwhile, his health having slightly improved, he was able to issue in 1865 The Proneers of France in the New World, which announced the matured design of a history of 'France and England in America.' The first part of the Psoneers narrated the history of the Huguenot settlement in Florida and its destruction by the Spanish, the second described the beginnings of the French dominion in the north settlement of Acadia and the labours of Champlain and his companions In 1867 came The Jesuits in North America, carrying the narrative on from 1635 to 1652 Two years later appeared La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West, treating an episode which had promised consequences of vast importance to New France In The Old Régime in Canada (1874) the history of the transitional period from 1652 to 1672 was told, and there followed an elaborate survey of the political, social, and ecclesiastical organisation of the colony Frontenac and New France (1877) continued the narrative to 1701, and then, turning to the dream of his youth, Parkman told in Montcalm and Wolfe (2 vols 1884) the dramatic story of the great contest (1748-63) which brought French power in America to a close The confused period from 1700 to 1748 remained. In 1892 that gap was bridged by A Half-Century of Conflict (2 vols.), and Parkman's work was done.

Parl man was fortunate in choosing a subject at once fresh and congenial Famous historians had, indeed, touched incidentally upon it, but their accounts, generally fragmentary, were invariably They felt perhaps that happenings in the American forest must be somehow beneath the dignity of history In any event, the types of man and the sorts of conflict which the forest knew lay outside the range of their experience and needed still to be made real to the world To that task Parkman devoted his life. He performed it with ever-increasing thoroughness. From the outset he had studied with care the more accessible sources. He soon began to search diligently, and with much success, for unpublished materials which might illustrate his theme. A faint clue to the whereabouts of Montcalm's confidential letters to Bourlamaque was pursued for fifteen years before they were unearthed In the case of the La Salle papers, improperly withheld from use by a jealous archivist, obstacles even more serious were at length overcome. Fortunately Parkman's means were ample to procure copies of all needed papers, and the Massachusetts Historical Society now possesses nearly two hundred folio volumes of the manuscripts from which he drew the details that crowd his pages Still, his was by no means 'that pallid and emasculate scholarship of which New England has had too many examples' For him life out-of doors was a necessary condition of work within From Louisburg to Sault Ste Marie he examined the scene of every important event knew the Indian and the frontiersman at first By the synthesis of a sympathetic imagination he fused the results of his studies, his observations, and his experience into a narrative of such realism as proceeds more frequently from the novelist than the historian tion was fresh and vivid But otherwise his early style, influenced perhaps by the prevailing stan dards of the time, was often florid, the images formal, and the illustrations commonplace power of more spontaneous expression developed slowly, in part, it may be, because of his illness He was seldom able to read more than five minutes without rest, or to listen to reading more than twenty, and the limitations of safety which his nervous condition placed upon his efforts at composition were not less cramping. Still, there is no sign of physical weakness in his manner of writing not even the tenseness which intermittent dictation might be expected to produce. His style seems rather to reflect the increasing moral strength with which he adhered to the purpose of his youth Losing nothing of its vividness, it becomes fluent and direct, an adequate medium for the expression of his strong narrative impulse.

But Parkman was more than a mere narrative historian, a picturesque teller of romantic tales The boy, it may be, had conceived the obscure struggles of the wilderness as presenting matter of romantic interest only. The man soon realised that, unlike merely romantic events, they were the product of potent historical forces determining the destiny of a continent European civilisation implicably overpowering aboriginal barbarism, the rooted liberty of the common law unconsciously supplanting the absolutism of the Bourbons evidence of this realisation is not to be sought in elaborate reflective passages Parkman did not preach. He had the skill to make his narrative carry its own moral From the superficial reader that moral may be concealed by profusion of incident But the more thoughtful will find implicit in his pages a political philosophy not unworthy of his theme

He was, moreover, a lover of truth for whom no pains were too great that might establish a fact. But he made no parade of his efforts. In the introduction to the Pioneers of France in the New If or ld he describes his ideal method, and his work reached in fact a close approximation to his ideal 'In this, and still more must it be the case in succeeding volumes, the amount of reading applied to their composition is far greater than the citations represent, much of it being of a collateral and illustrative nature. This was essential to a plan whose aim it was, while scrupulously and rigorously adhering to the truth of facts, to animate them with the life of the past, and, so far as might be, clothe the skeleton with flesh. If at times it may seem that range has been allowed to fancy, it is so in appearance only, since the minutest details of narrative or description rest on authentic documents or on personal observation Faithfulness to the truth of history involves far more than a research, however patient and scrupulous, into Such facts may be detailed with special facts the most minute exactness, and yet the narrative, taken as a whole, may be unmeaning or untrue The narrator must seek to imbue himself with the life and spirit of the time. He must study events in their bearings near and remote, in the character, habits, and manners of those who took part in them. He must himself be, as it were, a share or a spectator of the action he describes?

Not only was he ever on the watch against the temptations offered by the picturesqueness of his theme and by his own love of striking effects, his sincerity rose above this primary need of accuracy, and reached, in spite of his strong prejudices in contemporary affans, to a high degree of historical impartiality Dealing at large, as he did, with a subject into whose recesses many antiquarians and not a few zealots, Canadian and American, had peered, a subject embittered by a century of American conflict, and involving at almost every turn the imported prejudices of English and French, and the inherited animosities of Puritan and Catholic, it was inevitable that his work should be assailed by extremists in both camps But these attacks have only served, in general, to reveal the thoroughness of his research and the sincerity of his judgments He has gained appreciation, both at home and abroad, more slowly than some of his contemporaries But his present reputation as a writer of history is, probably, not inferior to that of any other American Professor Bourne, of Yale, suggestively says 'In his conception of the great drama of two rival and diverse civilisations contending for the mastery of the New World, in his nearness to the action and his personal exploration of the scene, and not least in the varied charm of his story, Parkman is the Herodotus of our Western World'

The Heights of Abraham

Meanwhile a deep cloud fell on the English. Since the siege began, Wolfe had passed with ceaseless energy from camp to camp, animating the troops, observing everything and directing everything, but now the pale face and tall lean form were seen no more, and the rumour spread that the General was dangerously ill He had in fact been siezed by an access of the disease that had tortured him for some time past, and fever His illness, which began before the had followed twentieth of August, had so far subsided on the twenty fifth that Knox wrote in his Diary of that day 'His Excellency General Wolfe is on the recovery, to the inconceivable joy of the whole army' On the twenty ninth he was able to write or dictate a letter to the three brigadiers, Monckton, Townshend, and Murray 'That the public service may not suffer by the General's iodisposition, he begs the brighdiers will meet and consult together for the public utility and advantage, and consider of the best method to attack the enemy ' The letter then proposes three plans, all bold to audacity

The brigadices met in consultation, rejected the three plans proposed in the letter, and advised that an attempt should be made to gain a footing on the north shore above the town, place the army between Montealm and his base of supply, and so force him to fight or surrender. The scheme seemed desperate, but so did all the rest, and if by chance it should succeed, the gain was far greater than could follow any success below the town Wolfe embraced it at once

Admiral Saunders lay with the main fleet in the Basin of Quebec. This excellent officer, whatever may have been his views as to the necessity of a speedy departure, aided Wolfe to the last with unfailing energy and zeal It was agreed between them that while the General made the real attack, the Admiral should engage Montcalin's attention by a pretended one. As night approached, the fleet ranged itself along the Beauport shore, the boats were lowered and filled with sailors, marines, and the few troops that had been left be hind, while ship signalled to ship, cannon flashed and thundered, and shot ploughed the beach, as if to clear a way for assailants to land. In the gloom of the evening the effect was imposing Montcalm, who thought that the movements of the English above the town vere only a feint, that their main force was still below it, and that their real attack would be made there, was completely deceived, and massed his troops in front of Beauport to repel the expected landing But while in the fleet of Shunders all was uproar and ostentatious menace, the danger was ten miles away, where the squadron of Holmes lay tranquil and silent at its anchorage off Cap Konge

The day had been fortunate for Wolfe Two deserters came from the camp of Bougainville with intelligence that, at ebb tide on the next night, he was to send down a convoy of provisions to Montealm. The necessities of the camp at Beanport, and the difficulties of transportation by land, had before compelled the French to resort to this perilous means of conveying supplies, and their boats, dirfting in darkness under the slandows of the northern shore, had commonly passed in safety. Wolfe saw at once that, if his own boats went down in advance of the convoy, he could turn the intelligence to good account Towards two o'clock the tide began to ebb, and a fresh wind blew down the river. Two lanterns were rused in the maintop shrouds of the Sutherland. It was the appointed signal, the boats east off and fell down with the current, those of the light infautry leading the way. The vessels with the rest of the troops had orders to follow a little later.

For full two hours the procession of bouts, borne on the current, steered silently down the St Lawrence. The stars were visible, but the night was moonless and sufficiently dark. The General was in one of the foremost boats, and near him was a young midshipman, John Robinson, afterwards Professor of Natural Philosophy in the University of Ldinburgh. He used to tell in his later life how Wolfe, with a low voice, repeated Gray's Llegy in a Country Churchyard' to the officers about him. Probably it was to reheve the intense strain of his thoughts. Among the rest was the yerse which his own fate was soon to illustrate—

'The paths of glory lead but to the grave'

'Gentlemen,' he said as his recital ended 'I would rather have written those lines than take Quelec.' None were there to tell him that the hero is greater than the poet

As they neared their destination the tile bore them in towards the shore, and the nuglity wall of rock and forest towered in darkness on their left. The dead still ness was suddenly broken by the sharp 'Qui == e'' of a French sentry, invisible in the thick gloom. 'Irm e'' answered a Highland officer of Fraser's regiment from one of the boats of the light infantry. He had served in Holland, and spoke French fluently.

'I quel régirient?'

"De la Reine," replied the Highlander He knew that a part of that corps was with Bougainville The sentry, expecting the convox of provisions, was satisfied, and did not ask for the password

Soon after, the foremost boats were passing the lieights of Samos, when another sentry challenged them, and they could see him through the darkness rnnning down to the edge of the water, within range of a pistol shot In answer to his questions the same officer replied, in French 'Provision boils Don't make a noise, the English will hear us' In fact, the sloop of war limiter was anchored in the stream not far off. This time, again, the sentry let them pass. In a few moments they rounded the headland above the Anse du Foulon There was no sentry there. The strong current swept the boats of the light infantry a little below the intended landing place. They disembarked on a narrow strand at the foot of heights as steep as a hill covered with trees can be. The twenty four volunteers led the way, climbing with what silence they might, closely followed by a much larger body

Montealm was amazed at what he saw. He had expected a detachment, and he found an army. Full in sight before him stretched the lines of Wolfe the close ranks of the English infantry, a silent wall of ied, and the wild array of the Highlanders, with their waving tartans, and happipes screening defiance.

It was towards ten o'clock when, from the high ground on the right of the line, Wolfe saw that the crisis was near The French on the ridge had formed themselves into three bodies, regulars in the centre, regulars and Canadians on right and left. Two field pieces, which had been drugged up the heights at Anse du Foulon, fired on them with grape-shot, and the troop-, rising from the ground, prepared to receive them. In a few moments more they were in motion. They came on rapidly, uttering loud shouts, and firing as soon as they were within range. Their ranks, ill ordered at the best were further confused by a number of Canadians who had been mixed among the regulars, and who, after hastily firing, threw themselves on the ground to reload The British advanced a few rods, then halted and stood still. When the French were within forty prices the word of command rang out, and a crash of mushetry answered all along the line. The volley was delivered In the battalions of the with remarkable precision centre, which had suffered least from the enemy's bullets, the simultaneous explosion was aftervards said by I reach officers to have sounded like a cannon shot. Another volley followed and then a furious elattering fire that lasted but a minute or to When the smoke rose a miserable sight was revealed the ground cumbered with dead and wounded, the advancing masses stopped short and turned in on frantic mob, shouting cursing gentien lating The order was given to charge. Then over the field rose the British cheur, mixed with the ficree yell of the Highland slogan. Some of the corps pushen forward with the bayonet, some advanced firing. The clans men drew their broadswords and dashed on Leen and swift as bloodhounds. At the Frgl shenght, though the attacking column was broken to pieces a hie vite still kept up, cluelly it scenie by sharpshooter from the bushes and corn fields, where they had lain for an hour or more. Here Wolfe himself led the charge, at the head of the Louisbourg grenadiers A shot shattered his He wrapped his handkerchief about it and kept Another shot struck him, and he still advanced, when a third lodged in his breast. He staggered, and sat on the ground Lieutenant Brown, of the grenadiers, one Henderson, a volunteer in the same company, and a private soldier, aided by an officer of artillery who ran to join them, carried him in their arms to the rear begged them to lay him down. They did so, and asked if he would have a surgeon 'There's no need,' he unswered, 'it's all over with me' A moment after, one of them eried out, 'They run, see how they run '' 'Who run?' Wolfe demanded, like a man roused from sleep 'The enemy, sir Egad, they give way every where '' 'Go, one of you, to Colonel Burton,' returned the dving man, 'tell him to march Webb's regiment down to Charles River, to cut off their retreat from the bridge ' Then, turning on his side, he murmured, 'Now, God be praised, I will die in peace!' and in a few moments his gallant soul had fled Monterlin, still on horseback, was borne with the tide of fugitives towards the town. As he approached the walls a shot passed through his body. He kept his seat, two soldiers supported him, one on each side, and led his horse through the St. Louis gate. On the open space within, among the excited crowd, were several women, drawn, no doubt, by eagerness to know the result of the fight. One of them recognised him, saw the streaming blood, and shrieked, 'O mon Dieu! mon Dieu! le Marquis est tue!' 'It's nothing, it's nothing,' replied the death stricken man, 'don't be troubled for me, my good friends' ('Ce n'est rien, ce n'est rien, ne zous affliges pas pour moi, mes bonnes amies.)

(From Montcalm and Wolfe)

All Parkman's historical books appeared in numerous editions during his life. Since his death collected editions have been published in twelve, in thirteen in seventeen and in twenty volumes. The I ioneers and The Jesuits and The Ancient Régime have been translated into German The Pioneers and The Jesuits translated (much garbled) into French. See A Life of Francis Parkman by C. CHARLES H HULL

Herman Melville (1819-91) was born in New York city, and, irresistibly drawn to a sailor's life, shipped at eighteen as cabin boy on a ship bound for Liverpool He took a spell at home as a teacher, but went to sea again in 1842, this time on a South Sea whaler At Nukahiva in the Marquesas he and a comrade, the 'Toby' of his story, deserted the ship, owing to the captain's harsh treatment. On the island he was kept four months as the prisoner of the not unkindly cannibals of the Typee Valley, whence he was rescued by an Australian whaler, in which he took service Returning to the United States in 1846, he pub lished Type, a spirited account of his residence in the Marquesas, and in 1847 Omoo, a continuation of his adventures in Oceania Mardi (1848), in another manner, was a much less happy effort White Jacket, or the World in a Man of War (1850), was in his better vein, and Moby Diel or the White Whale (1852), though not without flaws of style and construction, is a really great sea story, full of power and the incommunicable charm Melville was a most unequal writer, of the ocean and many of his stories, especially his later ones, were odd, chaotic, and unworthy of his earlier reputation, though Israel Potter (1855) was commended by Hawthorne for its portraits of Franklin and Paul Jones His poetry, such as that of the volume Battle Pieces and Aspects of War (1866), is wholly forgotten. For a time he held a post in the Custom-House, but for many years lived in seclusion, his mental faculties having given way R L Stevenson's praise revived the vogue of Typee and Omoo

Donald Grant Mitchell, who became known under the pen-name of 'Ik Marvel,' was born in Norwich, Connecticut, 12th April 1822, graduated at Yale, studied law, and was in 1853 appointed US consul at Venice He edited the Atlantic Monthly 1868-69, and from 1855 lived on his farm of Edgewood near New Haven, with which several of his books deal (Wet Days at Edgiwood, &c) Best known of his works, combining humour and a graceful element of sentiment and domesticity, were his Reveries of a Bachilor and Dream Life (1850-51, new eds 1889) Among the rest are a novel, Dr Johns (1866), English Lands, Letters, and Kings (2 vols 1889-95), American Lands and Letters (1897)

Bayard Taylo1 (1825-78) was born of Quaker and German ancestry at Kennett Square in Chester county, Pennsylvania, and was educated at a common school, and for five years at a high school He acquired a familiar knowledge of Latin, French, Spanish, and, later, German, and from his twelfth year he wrote essays, stories, and poems, and two years after he had become an apprentice in a printing office he published Ximena, a volume of poems, sold by subscription Disliking his trade, he bought himself off from his apprenticeship, arranged with the editors of several papers to write a series of letters from abroad, and with a hundred and forty dollars paid in advance for these contributions, he sailed for Liverpool on a pedes trian tour of Europe in 1844, and carried his knapsack through Scotland, England, Belgium, the Rhine countries, Austria, and Italy letters, for which he received in all five hundred dollars, were his sole means of support, and were in 1846 published as Views Afoot, or Europe seen with Knapsack and Staff After his return he edited a country newspaper, then went to New York, and obtained a post on the Tribune As its corre spondent he made extensive travels in California and Mexico, recorded in El Dorado (1850), and up the Nile, and in Asia Minor, Syria, across Asia to India, China, and Japan—recorded in his Journey to Central Africa, The Land of the Saracen (1854), and A Visit to India, China, and Japan (1855) Later explorations are recorded in Northern Travel (1858) and Travels in Greece and Russia (1859) He was a very successful lecturer on his travelling experiences, and on the outbreak of the Civil War warmly advocated the national cause. This led to his being sent in 1862-63 as secretary of legation to St Petersburg Much of his time after 1863 was spent in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy In 1870 he lectured on German literature at Cornell University he was again at work on the Tribune (of which he was a part-proprietor), in 1877 he was nominated United States ambassador in Berlin, but entering on his duties in May 1878, only lived to fulfil them till towards the end of the same year Over and above his own books of travel, he edited a library of travels, and with Ripley a handbook of literature and fine arts, and he did much miscellaneous literary work, editing and translating from German and other tongues His ambitions were to be remembered as a poet, and he ranks well to the front in the second rank of American poets. His early models were Byron and Shelley, Tennyson's in fluence is obvious in some of his work, and Goethe's is still more marked His Oruntal Poems are perhaps his most spontaneous and characteristic work, but some of his Pennsylvanian ballads also show him at his best, tender and simple rather than sonorous and rhetorical as much of his work His Faust is the book by which he is best known in England, and is one of the most success ful of all the attempts yet made to approach an adequate English rendering of Goethe's masterptece. His poetic works included Rhymes of Travel (1848), Book of Romances, Lyrics and Songs (1851), Poems of the Orient (1854), Poems of Home and Travel (1855), The Poets Journal (1862), Poems (1865), The Masque of the Gods (1872), Lars (1873), a Tenny sonian narrative poem, The Prophet, a Tragedy (1874), Home Pastorals (1875), The National Ode, which he was chosen to deliver at the Centennial Exhibition (1876), Prince Deukahon, a lyrical drama (1878), perhaps too directly modelled after Faust, and his exceptionally admirable translation of Faust (1870-71) He also wrote several novels, the best Hannah Thurston (1863) and The Story of Kennett (1866) His Life and Letters were edited by his (second) wife, daughter of an Erfurt astronomer, and Horace E Scudder

A Bedouin Love-Song

From the desert I come to thee
On a stallion shod with fire
And the winds are left behind
In the speed of my desire Under thy window I stand,
And the midnight hears my cry
I love thee, I love but thee,
With a love that shall not die
Fill the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold!

Look from thy window and see My passion and my pain,
I lie on the sands below,
And I funt in thy disdain
Let the night winds touch thy brow
With the heat of my burning sigh,
And melt thee to hear the yow
Of a love that shall not die
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Book unfold

BAYARD TAYLOR.

My steps are nightly driven,
By the fever in my breast,
To hear from thy lattice breathed
The word that shall give me rest
Open the door of thy heart,
And open thy chamber door,
And my kisses shall teach thy hips
The love that shall fade no more
Till the sun grows cold,
And the stars are old,
And the leaves of the Judgment
Bool infold!

From 'The Pines'

Ancient Pines, 'Ve bear no record of the years of man Spring is your sole historian,—Spring that paints These savage shores with hues of Paradise, That deeks your branches with a fresher green, And through your lonely far cañadas pours Her floods of bloom, rivers of opal die That wander down to lakes and widening seas Of blossom and of fragrance,—laughing Spring, That with her wanton blood refills her yeins,

And weds ye to your micy youth again With a new ring, the while your rifted bark Drops odorous tears Your knotty fibres yield To the light touch of her unfuling pen, As freely as the lupin's violet cup Ic keep, close locked, the memories of her stay, As in their shells the avelones leep Morn's rosy flush and moonlight's pearly glow The wild north west that from Alaska sweeps To drown Point Lobos with the icy seud And white sea form may rend your boughs and leave Their blasted antlers tossing in the gale, Your steadfist licarts are mailed against the shoek, And on their annual tablets naught inscribe Of such rude visitation Le are still The simple children of a guiltless soil, And in your natures show the sturdy grain I hat passion cannot jar, nor force relax, Nor aught but sweet and I indly airs compel To gentler mood No disappointed heart Has sighed its bitterness beneath your shade, No angry spirit ever came to male Your silence its confessional no voice, Grown harsh in Crime's great market place, the world, Trinted with blasphemy your evening hush, And aromatic air The deer alone.— The unbushed hunter that brings down the deer, The fisher wandering on the misty shore To watch sea lions wallow in the flood,-The shout, the sound of hoofs that chase and fly, When swift vaqueros, dashing through the herds, Kide down the angry bull, -perchance, the song Some Indian heired of long forgotten sires,-Disturb your solemn chorus

Stephen Collins Foster (1826-64), author of many of the most popular American songs, was born in Pittsburgh, and was for some time a mercliant's clerk or shop assistant in Cincinnati had a natural but untrained gift for writing ditties and composing tunes, found time for systematic musical study, and in 1842 published 'Open thy lattice, love,' which was at once taken up by negro minstrels. The popularity of his next ventures encouraged him to give up business and devote himself to music and song mostly in New York and Pittsburgh, and in New York he died He is credited with no less than a hundred and twenty-five pieces, words and airs being alike of his own composition, of these nearly a fourth are negro melodies. Among the best known are 'The Old Folks at Home,' 'Nelly Bly," Uncle Ned," Old Dog Tray," Gentle Annie," 'Old Kentucky Home,' 'Willie, we have missed vou,' 'Camptown Races' (which Mr Gladstone used to intone with such powerful effect), 'Massa's in de cold, cold ground,' 'Poor Old Joe,' and 'Come where my Love lies dreaming' It may safely be said that no other eleven songs by any one poet or composer are equally familiar in all English speaking countries How far the success of the songs depends on the taking tunes it might be hard to say 'The Old Folks at Home' otherwise "Way down upon the Swanee River," is per haps as acceptable to some when performed on a l street-pinno or barrel organ as when sung Some of the songs are mere doggetel, others are only sentimental jingles, the best of them hardly satisfy the usual poetic standards. But if to secure world wide popularity and to touch the heart of the people in two continents be proof of poetic power, S. C. Foster has safely passed the test. Musically, 'Come where my Love his dreaming' is his highest effort

Theodore Winthrop (1828-61) was the re presentative of a family that had been very distinguished in New England since colonial days, having produced governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut, a Harvard professor of physics, and a senator, orator, and publicist. Born at New Haven, Theodore studied at Yale, travelled in Europe and the Far West, did surveying for the railway across the Isthmus of Panamá, was ad mitted to the Bar (1855), and had prepared a large mass of-mostly unpublished-literary materials, when, having volunteered in the Civil War, he fell in battle at Great Bethel His novels-for which he had failed to find a publisher-were issued posthumously, and include Cecil Drieme (1861), a (somewhat crude) romance of New York, John Brent (1861), instinct with the spirit of the Wild West, and Edwin Brothertoft (1862), a story of the Revolution His tales were somewhat too spasmodic and unconventional in style The Canoe and Saddle and Life in the Open Air were sketches still later published, and in the eighties his Life and Poems appeared under his sister's supervision

Lewis Wallace, born in 1827 at Brookville, Indiana, served in the Mexican War gained distinction in the Civil War, and was governor of Utah (1878–81) and minister to Turkey (1881) General Lew Wallace became famous in popular literature by his remarkably successful religious novel Ben Hur (1880), and this was followed by The Fair God, The Prince of India, and The IVooing of Malkatoon, his next best-known stories, as well as by a book on The Boyhood of Christ and a Life of Benjamin Harrison

Richard Henry Stoddard (1825-1903) was born at Hingham in Massachusetts, the son of a ship's captain who was lost at sea, and the boy, after an education at the public schools in New York, worked in an iron foundry for some years, meanwhile reading widely in English literature, but especially in poetry. In 1849 he produced a small volume of poems, only to suppress it afterwards, but 1852 saw the birth of a sturdier collec-From 1853 to 1870 he served in the New York custom house, in 1870-73 was clerk to General McClellan, and for a year city librarian, and he did much reviewing and writing for the book sellers He wrote Lives of Washington Irving and Shelley, produced A Century After, picturesque glimpses of Philadelphia and Pennsylvania, and edited the 'Bric-'t Bric Series' and the 'Sans

Souch Series' But it is as a poet that he claims special remembrance. His poems include Songs in Summer (1857), The King's Bell, The Book of the East, Abraham Lincoln, a Horatian Ode, and The Lion's Cub and other I erse (1891). Some of his lyrics are bright and tender, his most characteristic work is rather reflective than original and spontaneous

Edmund Clarence Stedman was born in 1833, the son of a merchant at Hartford in Con necticut. He studied at Yale and early took to journalism, was for a time on the staff of the New I orl Tribune, was war correspondent of the New York II oild during the war, held a post under the Attorney-General of the United States, but from 1869 until 1900 was a stockbroker at New York He contributed actively to the more important magazines, and published his first volume of verse, Poems, Lyric and Idyllic, in 1860 Later poems or collections of verse have been Alice of Mon mouth, an Idyl of the Great War, The Blameless Prince, Hawthorne and other Poems, Lyrics and Idyls, and a collected edition of his poems appeared in 1884 His critical work on the Lictorian Poets, a handbook to the poetic literature of England for two generations, appeared in 1875, is recognised as a work of standard value, and has gone through The Poets of America, published many editions in 1886, hardly took the same rank even in America He wrote on The Nature and Llements of Poetry, and has edited, with or without collaboration, W S Landor, Austin Dobson, and Poe, besides A Lictorian Anthology and An American Antho The Library of American Literature, edited by him in conjunction with Miss E M Hutchinson, completed in 1890, fills cleven volumes his lyrics are very fresh and admirable, and most of his poetic v ork shows careful and artistic finish. As a critic he is less remarkable for profound insight and discrimination than for breadth and sympathy

Thomas Bailey Aldrich was born in 1836 at Portsmouth in New Hampshire. His father's death prevented his going to Harvard, but while engaged in his uncle's New York banking house he began to contribute verse to the newspapers, and soon after the publication of The Bells, a Collection of Chimes (1855), adopted literature as a profession He was associated with N P Willis's Home Journal, Every Saturday, and other magazines, and from 1881 to 1890 he was editor of the Atlantic Monthly Amongst his poems are The Ballad of Babic Bell, Pampinea, Cloth of Gold, Flower and Thorn, Mercedis, a complete collection appeared in 1882. He has written also stories, romances, and sketches, including Daisy's Necklace, The Course of True Love, The Story of a Bad Boy, Marjorie Daw, Prudence Palfrey He is an accomplished lyrist, and his more ambitious poems are at least graceful and well worded. In some of his stories and sketches he shows himself a , brilliant humourist.

Francis Richard Stockton (1834-1902), born at Philadelphia, was trained as engraver and journalist, and became assistant editor of St Nicholas He attracted notice by his fantastic stories for children, which fill several volumes, but he is best known as author of Rudder Grange (1879), the droll and humorous story of a holiday on a house boat, with much human nature and a good deal of burlesque The Lady or the Tiger, a short problem story, made also a great impres sion Other humorous or whimsical stories, notably unequal in interest, were The Late Mrs Null, The Casting Away of Mis Lecks and Mrs Aleshine, and The Dusantes, The Hundredth Man, The Schooner Merry Chanter, The Squiriel Inn, Pomond's Travels, The Shadrach, Captain Chap, The Story Teller's Pack, The Associate Hermits, and A Bicycle of To a different category belonged The Buccancers and Pirates of our Coasts (1898) Captain's Toll gate, finished just before his death, was published with a memorial sketch of him by his wife in 1903

Edward Eggleston (1837–1902), born at Veva, Indiana, became a Methodist Episcopil clergyman, and had held various pastoral and editorial posts when, about 1880, he withdrew from the ministry and devoted himself to literary work. He wrote many popular books on American history, but is best known for his stories of The Hoosier Schoolmaster, The Hoosier Schoolboy, The Mystery of Metropolisville, The Cultur Rider, Roxy, The Graysons, and The Faith Doctor

John Burroughs, born at Roybury in New York State on the 3rd April 1837, was brought up on a firm, and after some years of teaching, journalism, clerking in the I reasury department at Washington, and of periodic duties as a bankexaminer, settled down in 1874 on a farm in New York, to divide his time between literature and fruit-culture. His books mostly deal with natural history or country life, and include Wake Robin (1871), Birds and Poets, Locusts and Wild Honey, Pepacton, Signs and Seasons, and Riverly, Essays on Birds, Trees, Flowers Winter Sunshine and Fresh Fields are European travel sketches, Squirrels and other Fur bearers is more specifically zoological, and he published in 1866 a study of Whitman He is in some respects a continuator of Thoreau's work, but writes for the most part in a lighter vein

William Dwight Whitney (1827-94), a younger brother of the geologist Josiah Dwight Whitney, was born at Northampton, Massachusetts, studied at Williams College, at Yale, and in Germany, and was professor at Yale of Sanskrit and of Comparative Philology He waged war with Max Muller, and wrote Darwinism and Language, The Life and Growth of Language, and other philological works He was editor-in chief of the Century Dictionary

Charles Eliot Norton, born the son of a Unitarian minister at Cambridge, Massachusetts, in 1827, studied at Harvard, was for a while engaged in commerce, but eaclong devoted himself to literature and æsthetics, becoming known as a Dante scholar and an authority on art. From 1875 to 1898 he was Professor of the History of Art at Harvard. His prose translation of Dante is classical, he has written on church building in the Middle Ages and on recent social theories, but he is perhaps most widely known as an accomplished editor, having edited the letters of Lowell and G. W. Curtis, the correspondence of Carlyle and Emerson, and of Goethe and Carlyle, as well as the standard edition of Carlyle's letters

Silas Wein Mitchell, born in Philadelphia in 1830, studied at the Jefferson Medical College and Edinburgh University, and settling as a practitioner in his native city, became distinguished especially in the treatment of nervous diseases. Besides books on physiology and neurology and serpent poisons, he wrote articles in prose and verse for the magazines, and Hephzibah Guinnuss and other sories in 1880 gave him rank as a capable novelist. In War Time and High Wynne, Lie Quality, are amongst his best known works. Five several collections of poems (A Masque and other Poems, The Wager, &c) have been issued in one volume.

John William Draper (1811-82) was born at St Helens near Liverpool, and in 1833 emigrited to Virginia Having studied physics and chemis try in England and the United States, he taught these two subjects in a Virginian college, but from 1839 was associated with the University of the City of New York, first as Professor of Chemistry, and, after 1850 of Physiology wrote liquidbooks of chemistry, natural philosophy, and physiology, and a series of memoirs on radiant energy, but is chiefly remembered for his History of the American Civil War (3 vols 1867-70), for his History of the Intellectual Development of Europe (2 vols 1863), and, most of all, for his History of the Conflict between Religion and Science (1874), in which his attitude was frankly rationalistic.

Andrew Dickson White, born at Homer, New York, in 1832, studied at Yale, Paris, and Berlin, and has been Professor of History in the University of Michigan and President of Cornell, United States Minister to Germany and to Russia, and from 1897 ambassador in Germany. His best-known book is A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology (1876), but he has written studies in general, medieval, and modern history, on European schools of history, on comets, on currency questions, and on The New Germany

Horace Howard Furness, the son of a Unitarian minister in Philadelphia, was born in 1833, studied at Harvard, and was admitted to the Bar, but was early attracted to the studies in virtue of which he was to become America's greatest Shakespearian scholar. In 1871 he began his great life-work, the Variorum edition of Shakespeare's works, of which in thirty years lie had issued thirteen volumes. Latterly his wife and his son were associated with him in his labours.

Phillips Brooks (1835-93), born at Boston, Massachusetts, studied at Harvard and elsewhere, and in his cures at Philadelphia and Boston became known as one of the most eloquent and powerful preachers in America. In 1891 he wis made Bishop of Massachusetts in the Protestant Episcopal Church. Several volumes of his sermons and lectures show his independence of judgment and catholicity of spirit. There is a Life of him by A. V. G. Allen (1901)

John Hay, born of Scottish ancestry at Silem m Indiana, 8th October 1838, educated at Brown University, and admitted to the Illinois Bar in 1861, vas assistant private secretary to President Lincoln till his death, and during the war served for some months, attaining the rank of colonel 1865-70 he was secretary of legation at Paris and Madrid, and charge d'affaires at Vienna (1867-68), in 1870-75 he worked as a journalist on the staff of the New York Tribune and in 1879-81 he was first Assistant-Secretary of State Thereafter he was for a time mainly engaged in literary work, till in 1897 he was sent by President McKinley as ambassador to Great Britain, where both as man and as diplomat he won golden opinions Secretary of State at home from 1898, he showed in a critical time exceptional foresight, strength, and As an author he is known for his command of peculiarly American humour and pathos in pithy, simple verse His Pike County Ballads (1871) include 'Little Breeches' and 'Jim Bludso,' he has also published Castilian Days (1871), and, with Nicolay, a Life of Lincoln (1891) He is responsible for another volume of poems issued in 1890, and for an address on Sir Walter Scott popular anonymous novel The Bread-II inners (1883) was attributed to him, but not acknowledged by him as his

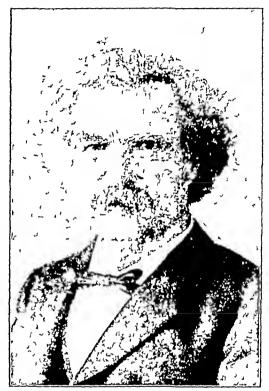

Edward Payson Roe (1838-88), born in New Windsor, New York, was chaplain in the volunteer service during the war, and afterwards pastor of a Presbyterian church at Highland Falls. The great success of his first novel, Barries Burned Away (1872), encouraged him to make literature his profession, and his fifteen novels include From Jest to Earnest (1875), Near to Nature's Heart (1876), Nature's Serial Story (1884), and He Fill in Love with his Wife (1886) He also wrote on gardening and fruit culture

Charles Rebei Clark, a Philadelphia Journalist, born in 1841 in Berlin, Maryland, is better known by his pen name of 'Max Adeler,' and as author of the somewhat boisterously humorous Out of the Hurly Burly (1874), Elbow-room, Randore Shots, and Fortunate Island (1881)

Charles Farrar Browne (1834-67), not so well known by his own name as by that of his creation, 'Artemus Ward,' was born at Waterford in Maine, worked at Boston and clsewhere as a compositor, became a reporter, and in 1858, under the style of 'Artemus Ward, showman,' wrote for the Cleveland Plaindealer a description of an imaginary travelling menagerie. This was followed by letters in which the original, characteristic, whimsical humour was enhanced by grotesque spelling and naïve moralising, and was brought to bear on business puffery with keenly satirical and highly entertaining effect. In 1861 'Artemus Ward' entered the lecture field, and started a panorama, whose artistic wretchedness furnished occasion for countless jokes, the success of his humorous lecture, 'The Babes in the Wood,' decided him to abide by lecturing It satirised the dull twaddle often foisted on the public by pompous bores a Californian manager telegraphed to lum, 'What will you take for forty nights in California?' his instant reply, 'Brandy and water,' secured him a welcome among the miners. In 1862 he was ig California and Utah, gathering materials for comic lectures on the Mormons, 'whose religion is singular but their wives are pluril. In 1864 he was disabled by pulmonary consumption, but in 1866, having rallied somewhat, he went to London, where he contributed to Punch, and was very popular as 'the genial showman,' exhibiting his panorama at the Egyptian Hall short sojourn in Jersey, he returned to England, only to die at Southampton. His publications were Artemus Ward, His Bool (1862), Artemus Ward, His Panorama (1865), Artemus Ward among the Mormons (1866), Artemus Ward in England (1867) M D Landon prefixed a Life to an edition of the Works (1875) He was the first American humourist to make a European reputation, for a decade or two he was the most outstanding representative of American humour His 'goaks' and his 'morril way-works' had even greater vogue in Britain than at home, and though his books are little read now, some of his jests and phrases have become part of the Anglo Saxon store of proverbial sayings

Samuel Langhorne Clemens, best known to his readers by his pen-name of Mark Twain, was born at Florida, Missouri, on 30th November 1835. After learning the trade of a printer and working as a pilot on the Mississippi, he eventually became a journalist in San Francisco. His Innocents Abroad (1869), the result of a foreign tour, had an enormous success, and thenceforward his reputation as a humourist was established. His subsequent books include Roughing It (1872), Tom Sawyer, A Tramp Abroad, The Prince and the Pauper, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, The American Claimant, The £1,000,000 Bank-Note, Pudd'nhead Wilson, The Man that Corrupted Hadleyburg, and A Double-Barrelled

Detective Story (1902) His share in an unfor tunate publishing house drove him to a lecturing tour round the world (1895–96), which enabled him fully to re-establish his fortunes. Mark Twain's humour has secured him a large audience not only in America and this country, but also in Germany and other Continental countries. It is the dry, incisive humour of a shrewd man of the world who, having gone through life with his eyes wide open, has cheered himself by laughing not merely at the foibles of his fellow men, but, by implication, at his own as well. He is not very reverent in his attitude towards what he considers worn out survivals of old.

beliefs and superstitions, and sometimes pokes fun without much discrimination, as in 4 Yankee at the Court of King Arthur and Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc, but when his humour is, as it generally is, at its best and freshest the result to his readers is delightful. In Fom Sawjer and Huckleberry Finn, perhaps, Mark Twain showed his power at its highest point, his humour and pathos developed with consummate ease and force in a succession of vividly adventurous episodes

Julia Ward Howe, born in 1819 in New York, was the daughter of Samuel Ward, and in 1843 she married Samuel Gridlev Howe, reformer and philanthropist, best known as the teacher of the famous deaf mute Laura Bridgman Mrs Howe shared many of her husband's fabours, not only assisting him in editing an anti slavery paper, but lecturing with him on social subjects, and even on occasion preaching in Unitarian pulpits By far her best-known achievement, however, was her 'Battle Hymn of the Republic,' inspired in 1861 by the sight of Northern troops marching to the tune of 'John Brown's body,' but she had before that published two collections of poems, as later, in 1866, she published Later Lyrics Mrs Howe was a conspicuous advocate of prison reform and of woman's suffrage. She published books on sex and society and on education, a Life of Margaret Fuller, a collection of Margaret Fuller's love letters to a Mr Nathan (1903), and a volume of her own Reminiscences (1899). From Sunset Ridge (1898) was a collection of her poems, new and old

Alice Cary (1820-71) and Phæbe Cary (1824-71), daughters of a farmer near Cincinnati, published poems jointly in 1851, attained great literary and social success through their gifts, secured the patronage and friendship of Horace Greeley and Whittier, and in their deaths were divided by only three months. Alice was the author of the Clovernook Papers and Clovernook Children, tales of Western life. Besides more than one collection of poems, she published several domestic novels, including Hagar, Married not Mated, and The Bishop's Son Phæbe's principal books were Poems and Parodies and Poems of Faith, Hope, and Love, besides some excellent hymns and occasional pieces. Her best-known hymns are 'Nearer Home' and 'One sweetly solemn thought.' There is a Memorial of the two sisters by Mrs Mary C Ames (1873)

Maria Susanna Cummins (1827-66), born at Salem, Massachusetts, began to write in 1850 for the Atlantic Monthly and other magazines. Her The Lamplighter (1854)—a rather sentimental and lachrymose tale of the fortunes of an orphan girl—had an amazing success, 40,000 copies sold in two months, and it was read and reprinted almost as zealously in Britain as at home. It is still read on both sides of the Atlantic, spite of its old fashioned air. Miss Cummins's later novels, Mabel Vaughan (1857), El Furcidis (1860), and Haunted Hearts (1864) did not meet with any such success or add at all to her reputation.

Affred Thayer Mahan, born in 1840 at West Point, the son of one of the professors there, studied at the United States Naval Academy, and from 1856 till 1896 served in the navy, as captain from 1885 on His writings on naval science and history are luminous and authoritative, and include The Gulf and Inland Waters (1883), The Influence of Sea Parcer on History (1890), The Influence of Sea Pawer on the French Revolution and the Empire, The Interest of the United States in Sea Power, The Problem of Asia, and Types of Naval Officers (1902), besides Lives of Admiral Farragut and of Nelson, and books on the war in Cuba and the South African War of 1899–1902 was born in Albany, New York, on 25th August 1839. As a boy of fifteen he went with his mother to California, and became in turn a schoolmaster, a miner, and a compositor, eventually in 1857 obtaining an engagement on the Golden Lia of San Francisco, to which he contributed his first sketches (Alliss amongst others) dealing with mining life. From 1864 to 1870 he was Secretary of the United States Mint in San Francisco. In the former year he wrote for the newly founded literary magazine. The Californian, which also numbered among its contributors C. W. Stoddard.

and S L Clemens ('Mark Twain') The Con densed Novels, parodies of celebrated novelists, which he began in the Golden Era, were continued m the Californian In 1868 he had founded the Overland Monthly, and to this magazine he contributed many of the stories that made him famous, The Luck of Roaring Camp, The Outcasts of Poker Flat, Miggles, Tennessee's Partner, and The Idyll of Red Gulch, as well as Plain Language from Truthful James (better known as The Heathen Chinee), a humorous poem that achieved a remark able popularity throughout the English speaking Later he became a contributor to the Atlantic Monthly, and spent much time in lecturing tours. In 1870 and 1871 he published three volumes of his collected poems. In 1878 he was sent to Crefield as United States Consul, and two years later in the same capacity to Glasgon

1885 he give up official work and came to London, where he resided until his death

Bret Harte did many things in literature, and did nearly all of them well He was a poet, often humorous, sometimes tender, and again nobly patriotic, his Condensed Novels show a power of parody unequalled in pungency and aptness by any writer since Thackeray, he could write romances distinguished by gentle and refined It is, perhaps, as the delineator of the life of Californian miners in the early days that he will chiefly be remembered His characters are rough and lawless men, and the language they speak suits their nature. But Bret Harte's magic touch shows the soul of goodness in things evil In his sketches the gambler, the outcast, the lost woman, even the ruffirn with the guilt of blood on his conscience, are capable of noble acts of selfsacrifice and devotion We are not allowed to forget that they are uncouth human beings, but then essential humanity rather than their uncouthness is insisted on. In Bret Harte's method there is no mawkishness From this defect he was saved by his abundant humour. This quality of his, rooted as it was in his deeper feelings, cannot be specially defined as American It is the humour of the great masters of literature all the world over Bret Harte was a most prolific writer up to the day of his death, but his later work, admirable as much of it is, lacks the freshiness of those earlier efforts of which it is, indeed, often a mere repetition. He died on 5th May 1902, and was buried at Frimley in Surrey His Life has been written by Mr T Edgar Pemberton (1903, with bibliography)

Joaquin Hiller is the pen name of Cincin-NATUS HEINE MILLER, an American poet, born in Wabash district, Indiana, in 1841 Removing with his parents to Oregon in 1854, he became a miner in California, was with Walker in Nicaragua, and afterwards lived with the Indians till 1860 He then studied law in Oregon, and set up in practice in 1863, after a Democratic paper that he edited had been suppressed for disloyalty He was a county judge from 1866 to 1870, and then visited Europe, in England his first volume of verse was published He afterwards settled as a journalist in Washington, and in 1887 in California, ultimately making his home in Oakland In 1890 he revisited England, and in 1897-98 was correspondent in Klondyke for a New York journal His pen name he adopted on the publication of his first volume of poetry from the baptismal name of a Mexican brigand in whose defence he had written a pamphlet His poems include Songs of the Sierras (1871), of the Sunlands (1873), of the Desert (1875), of Italy (1878), and of the Mexican Seas (1887), and Chants for the Boer (1900), his prose works, The Danites in the Sterras (1881), Shadows of Shasta (1881), and '49, or the Goldseehers of the Sierras (1884) He also wrote The Danites, The Stlent Man, '49 (dramatised from his story by himself), Tally Ho, and one or two other plays and melodramas, a Life of Christ, and My Life among the Modocs (1873) A collected edition of his poems first appeared in 1882, and in a long poem called As it was in the Beginning (1903) he claims to 'call aloud from his mountaintop as a seer'

Sidney Lanier (1842-81) was born at Macon in Georgia, of Huguenot stock, and graduated at Oglethorpe College before he entered the Confederate army His health suffered much in hardships endured as a blockade-runner, after the war he was a shopman, a teacher, and a lawyer in succession, and next, an accomplished musician, he carned his livelihood as first flute in the orchestras of Baltimore and New York romance, Tiger Lilies (1867), had proved a failure, but his literary ability was so manifest that he was asked to write the ode for the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia in 1876, and in 1879 he was installed as lecturer on English literature in the Johns Hopkins University A course of lectures on The Science of English Verse, original and suggestive, was published as a book (1881), another course on The English Novel (1883) was unfinished at his death Shakespeare and his Forerunners was not published till 1902 In spite of his ill health and the distractions of his laborious life, he wrote poems in virtue of which lie is by many regarded as the most important American poet of his time, 'Corn,' 'The Song of the Chattalioochee,' 'The Marshes of Glynn,' and the Centennial cantata being amongst the best known His adaptations of Proissart and of the Mabinogian have made him known to several generations of youthful readers, his Letters reveal the poet and the musician, and there is a memoir of him by W H Ward prefixed to his collected poems as edited by his widow in 1881 (new ed 1884)

John Fiske (1842-1901) was originally called Edmund Fiske Green, but at thirteen adopted the name of his maternal grandfather. Born at Hartford, Connecticut, he studied at Harvard, where afterwards he was lecturer, librarian, and member of the board of overseers He was admitted to the Bar, but never practised, he wrote much on philosophy and history, contributed to the development of the evolution doctrine, and was well known throughout the Union as a lecturer His first publication (on tobacco and alcohol) in 1868 was followed in 1872 by his work on My this and Mythmakers His Cosmic Philosophy was mainly an exposition of Herbert Spencer, his Darwinism and other Essays was eminently suggestive, he applied the evolution theory to historical problems, and in Man's Destiny, The Idea of God, The Origin of Evil, and Through Nature to God (1899) he defended spiritual religion His Discovery of America (1892) was but one of a long series of important works on American history, which included Old Virginia and her Neighbours, The Dutch and Quaker Colonies in America, Ne v France and New England, A Critical Period, The American Revolution, and The Vississippi Valley in the Civil Wai (1900). He wrote a work on Theodore Parker, A Century of Science, a history of the United States for schools, and with James Grant Wilson edited Appleton's Cyclopadia of American Biography.

William Dean Howells was born at Mutin's Ferry, Belmont County, in the state of Ohio, on 1st Murch 1837. His father, William Cooper Howells, a busy but not always prosperous printer and journalist, was of Welsh Quaker descent, and a Swedenborgian in creed, so that in that form of quasi theological belief the future novelist was brought up. According to his own statement he was 'self trught,' which must mean simply that may hoshood he had no regular schooling, since he appears to have been afterwards a student it Harvard and Yale, and at one or other of these colleges took the MA degree From the age of eleven he had worked under his fither as a compositor, and ten venrs, later he developed into a journalist, and wrote in the Cincinnati Gazette and the Columbus State Journal A I ife of Abraham Lincoln, written as part of the 'literature' of the momentous presidential election of 1860, won him the post of consul at Venice, where he lived from 1861 to 1865, acquiring a knowledge of the Italian language and literature, and receiving impressions which were reproduced for the public in 1866 in two volumes on Venetian Life, and were to mould some of his future work. Returning to America !

Mr Howells has had a nide and well deserved popularity both in his own country and Great Britain through his picture-que and amusing stories of New Pingland life. written more than seventy books in all, including trivels farces or plays, and many clever essays and criticisms Notable bool's vere Fusian Cities (1885), Modern Italian Poets Criticism and Fiction, Impressions and Experiences, Literary Fr ends aid Acquaintana (1900), and Letters Home (1903)

George Washington Cable was born in New Orleans in 1844 of Virginian and New England stock, and as a slenderly educated clerk at nuncteen volunteered into the Confederate service. After the war lie earned for some time a precarious living, and, laid up with malarial fever caught at survey work on the Atchafilana River, became an accountant in a cotton agency, and began to write for the New Orleans papers His Creole sketches in Scribner made his reputation, revealing as they did an interesting and as yet unexploited phase of American social life Old Creole Days (1879) was followed by The Grandissimes (1880), perhaps his best book, a tender and sympathetic rendering of the American Trench life of Louisiana, as also, in the same key, by Madame Delphine (1881), Dr Server, Bonaventure, and Strange True Stories of Louisiana (1889) The Creoles of Louisiana (1884), The Silent South (1885), The Aegro Question (1890) are political, social economic disquisitions Later novels are John March, Southerner (1895), The

Cavalier (1901), and By low Hill (1902) In 1885 he settled in New England—ultimately at Northampton in Massachusetts

Henry James.

at once an American and an English novelist, was born in New York on 15th April 1843. His father was Henry James (1811–82), a well-known original and theological writer and lecturer, whose doctrine is described by the latest historian of American literature as 'a sort of Ishmaelitish Swedenborgianism,' which only his two sons—'inheritors of his style'—the novelist and William James, Professor of Philosophy at Harvard, and Gifford Lecturer in 1901 at Edinburgh, are 'capable of analysing'. Yet he has expounded his views in a long series of works (Christianity the Logic of Creation one of them) which are admittedly acute, profound, suggestive, and sometimes entertaining

Henry, who until his fither's death in 1882 was known as Henry James, junior, was educated under the paternal eve in a cosmopolitan fashion at Aen York, Geneva, Paris, and Boulogne. In 1862 he became a student at the Harvard Law-School, but his bent was not to jurisprudence, and after the usual preparation of magazine work, he won public notice as a novelist with his Roderick Hudson in 1875 Six years earlier he lind gone for good to Europe, where his life has since been spent in England (in the Isle of Wight), with regular periods of sojourn in Italy His earlier novels dealt mainly with American life and character at home and abroad, and were produced with great In 1878 appeared The fertility and rapidity American, The Europeans, and Daisy Miller, the last a delightful sketch of the naiveté of the American girl. Even more keen and delicate are some of the shorter stories-The Pension Beaurepas, for example, with its contrasted vigneties of the Ruck family and the Churches mother and daughter, and A Bundle of Letters (1879), describing the expemences of some American maidens in France. Washington Square (1880) has its scene in New York, and its theme in a painful strife between father and daughter over the latter's love affair, the treatment of which shows the author at a higher and more serious mood than ordinary, handling a strong situation and treating it with relentless and even prinful rigour. In the following years appeared The Portrait of a Lady (1880), rather spoiled by its prolivity, The Bostonians (1886), The Princess of Casamassima (1886), a study of English society, A London Life (1889), and The Tragic Muse (1890)

In his analytical treatment of character and incident, Mr James seems to have been strongly influenced by the examples of Flaubert and his disciples, and of late he has carried that method to a degree of refinement which sometimes approaches to morbidity. This manner was developed in Terminations (1896), and even more strikingly in What Maisie Knew (1897), a perfectly pitiless analysis of the thoughts and feelings of an unfortunate child. A dexterous handling of the semi-supernatural gives a greater distinction and a stronger interest to the first story in the volume entitled Two Magics (1898). In the Cage, published in the same year, carries the art of abstraction to the farthest limit in the withholding of the herone's name. In his most recent works, The Turn of the Screw (1898), The Soft Side (1900), The Sacred Fount (1901), The Wing of the Dove (1902), The Better Sort (1903), a volume of short sketches, and The Ambassadors (1903), the method has become superlatively subtle, so that, while admiring the extreme cleverness of the performance, one is perplexed and irritated by the studious allusiveness of the narrative and the incessant rapier play of the elliptical dialogue, in which each interlocutor seems to be bent on anticipating the riposte of the other

Mr James has also distinguished himself as a critic, although in a less degree than as a novelist. His best achievement in this line is the volume of studies on French Poets and Novelists (1878), which displays an exceptional acquaintance and sympathy with modern French literature. Partial Portraits (1888) errs by too amply justifying its title, and the monograph on Hawthorne (1879) in the English Men of Letters' series is a dainty piece of work, though perhaps hardly weighty enough for its theme. America has produced many more powerful writers than Henry James, but none perhaps that has attained a greater delicacy of touch or a more perfect literary finish. In 1903 he published a delightful book on William Wedmore Story and his Friends, 'from letters, diaries, and recollections'

William James, son of Henry James, senior, was born in New York in 1843, and, educated at home and in Europe, took the Harvard MD, and from 1872 he lectured at Harvard on anatomy, physiology, psychology, and philosophy in suc-He became a professor in 1881 is a keen and pregnant thinker, a luminous and attractive writer, defends what have been thought theological paradoxes on non-theological grounds, maintains orthodox positions in an unorthodox and original manner, and combines empirical method with a strongly idealistic body of thought. As an analytical psychologist he has exercised even more influence in America and in Europe than as a metaphysician. His works comprise Principles of Psychology (1900), and a smaller manual (1902), The Will to Believe, Human Immortality, The Varieties of Religious Experience -the list named work being lectures delivered as Gifford lecturer at Edinburgh University in 1899-In 1884 he had with filial piety edited his father's Literary Remains

Richard Watson Gilder, born at Borden town, New Jersey, in 1844, studied law, served in the army, and did journalistic work on various papers in New Jersey before he became editor of Scribner's Monthly and then of The Century Magazine He has founded or promoted numerous literary and artistic clubs, leagues, and associations, and he ranks high amongst contemporary American poets in virtue of The New Day (1875), The Celestial Passion, The Great Remembrance, Five Books of Song (1894), In Pales time (1898), Poems and Inscriptions (1901), and other volumes or series of songs and poems

Edward Noyes Westcott (1846–98), born in Syricuse, New York, was a banker in his native town, and died before his first novel was published—David Harum, a story in which the interest turned on the shrewd, humorous, eccentric character of a country banker, probably no work of American fiction has had such instantaneous success. An unfinished work by him, The Teller, was published in 1901 with a short memoir

Julian Hawthorne, biographer of his famous fither (see page 755), was born at Boston in 1846, studied at Harvard and Dresden, and has done much journalistic work, and in addition to his Saxon Studies, his 'Confessions and Criticisms,' has written a history of the United States and a book on American literature. He has also published a score of novels and stories, longer and shorter, of which Garth (1877), Sebastian Strome, Dust, Beatrix Randolph, Fortune's Fool, Mrs Gainsborough's Diamonds, Prince Saroni's Wife, Archibald Malmaison, A Fool of Nature, One of those Coincidences (1899), have been notable.

Joel Chandler Harris, born in Entonton, Georgia, in 1848, was in turn printer, lawyer, and journalist. His Uncle Remus (1880), with its thoughts and sayings and doings of 'Brer Rabbit,' as conceived by the negroes of the South, opened a new field in literature, and quickly carried his name to the Old World, at once to children and to students of folklore. Later works are Nights with Uncle Remus (1883), Mingo, Daddy Jake, The Story of Aaron, Tales of the Home Folks, Plantation Pageants, The Chronicles of Aunt Minerry Ann (1899)

James Lane Allen, born in Kentucky in 1849, taught in Kentucky University and else where, but since 1891 has been famous for his novels, tales, and sketches illustrating various aspects of his native Blue Grass region—Flut and Violin, A Kentuely Cardinal (the cardinal bird), Aftermath, A Summer in Aready, The Choir Invisible, The Reign of Law (1900)

Eugene Field (1850-95), born at St Louis, Missouri, was a journalist at twenty-three, and gave much of his best work to the columns of a Chicago paper, his column of 'Sharps and Flats' being for years a characteristic feature. His work in prose and verse varies from tender pathos and delicate humour to the broadly farcical, he is best known as humourist and as poet of childhood. His best veises for children are those in With Trumpet and Drum (1892), A Little Book of Western Veise may fairly represent another type of work, and his humour is perhaps best illustrated in The Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniae

Edward Bellamy (1850-98), born at Chico pee Falls, Massachusetts, studied at home and in Germany, and was admitted to the Bar, but most of his life was devoted to journalism and authorship Looking Backward (1888), an imaginative toni de force, had a prodigious success at home and abroad, and was followed by a less brilliant sequel, Equality (1897) Other novels were Dr Heidenhoff's Process (1879), Miss Ludington's Sister (1884), and The Duke of Stockbridge (1898), and he wrote on sociological subjects

James Whitcomb Riley, born at Greenfield, Indiana, in 1853, painted signboards, cobbled plays for a theatrical troupe, and in 1875 began contributing verses to the papers—the verses in the local dialect that secured for him the sobriquet of 'the Hoosier poet.' He is equally well known for his poems for and of children To the first category belong The Old Swimmin' Hole and various other collections, to another, Old-Fashioned Roses, Rhy mes of Childhood, and A Child World

Francis Marion Crawford, son of a famous American Sculptor (Thomas Crawford, 1814-57) long resident in Rome, was born at Bagni di Lucca in North Italy in 1854, and studied at Concord in New Hampshire, at Trinity College, Cambridge, at Karlsruhe, and at Heidelberg At Rome he de voted himself to the study of Sanskrit, and during 1879-80 was engaged in press work at Allahabad, where he was admitted to the Catholic Church Of late years his home has been at Sorrento in Italy, though he often spends some part of the year in America His first novel, IIr Isaacs (1882), a story of Indian life, was succeeded by a long series of tales, including Dr Clandius, A Roman Singer, Loroaster, Saracinesca, Paul Patoff, Greifenstein, Sant' Ilario, Marzio's Crucifix, A Cigar maker's Romance, The Witch of Prague, Don Orsino, Pietro Ghisleri, The Ralstons, Casa Braccio, Corleoni, Via Crucis, In the Palace of the King, Cecilia, The Heart of Rome (1903) Descriptive or historical works are Constantinople, Ave Roma Immortalis, and The Rulers of the South (a history of Sicily), and in The Novel-What it Is, a biochure, he expounded the view he cherishes of his art earlier novels had more mystery or adventure, his later ones more careful character drawing, and in both series he moves easily to and fro between the sphere of fact and the occult world His American novels have proved on the whole the least popular, the Italian Saracinesca series comprises his most accomplished and artistic work

Harold Frederic (1856-98), born in Utica, New York, was bred a journalist, but before his premature death had proved himself a novelist of exceptional gifts and powers, keen insight, rich humour, satirical strength, and constructive skill Most of his novels, dealing largely with country life in New York State, were written after he settled in England Seth's Brother's Wife (1887) was his first important story, The Copperhead (1894) was a tale of the Civil War, and in Marsena (1895) were collected admirably humorous sketches of character The Damnation of Theron Ware (in England called Illumination, 1896) was a trenchant analysis of religious life, Gloria Munai (1898), strangely unlike, was equally a human document, In the Market-place and The New Exodus, the latter a realistic study of Russian anti Semitism, were posthumously published

Owen Wister, born at Philadelphia in 1860, graduated at Harvaid, and had been three years at the Philadelphia Bar when The Dragon of II ant les his Tail (1892), attracted notice to his literary gifts Red Men and White, Jim McLean, The Jimmy John Boss succeeded, and The Virginian made his name known in Britain. He wrote a Life of President Grant, besides many, contributions to the magazines in prose and verse

Richard Harding Davis, born at Alih-delphia in 1864, had made a name for himself as a correspondent of the New York papers ere he became known to another world of readers as an original and vigorous novelist by such stories or collections of stories as Soldurs of Fortune, Gallegher, I an Bibber, The Princess Aline, In the Fog Captain Machine (1902). He has also published books on his experiences in Cuba, Venezuela, South Africa, and elsewhere.

Paul Leicestei Foid (1865-1902), born in Brooklyn, edited the works of Jefferson, and wrote on Washington, Franklin, and other subjects in American history. But his fiction was even better known—The Honorable Peter Sterling (1894), The Great K and A Train Robbery, The Story of an Untold Love, Janice Meredith, Wanted a Matchmaker, Wanted a Chaperon. He was editor of The Bibliographer (which he founded) at the time of his death—by his own hand

Robert William Chambers, born at Brooklyn in 1865, became a painter, and after studies in Julian's studio in Paris, exhibited in the Salon His first considerable literary venture, In the Quarter, appeared in 1893, The Red Republic, a tale of the Commune, in 1894, Lorraine (1898) was a romance of the Franco-German War, Cardigan (1901) sought its subject in colonial experiences before the War of Independence, besides a play, Ellangowan, he has written a dozen other stories or collections of stories in various styles, and The Maids of Paradise was the work of 1903

Steplien Crane (1870-1900), born at Newark, New Jersey, and educated at Lafavette College and Syracuse University, became an active journalist, and showed special gifts as correspondent for a New York paper in the war between Turkey and Greece (1897) and in Cuba His first essay in fiction was Maggie, a Girl of the Streets (1891), but it was The Red Badge of Courage (1895), an episode of the Civil War and a mariellously lifelike study of the mind and thought of a soldier in action, that made him known to the Englishspeaking world Neither in The Third Violet, a story in dialogue and dialect, nor in collections such as The Menster and The Little Regiment, did he attain the same level, and his Irish story, The O'Ruddy, was completed by Mr Robert Barr Bowery Tales, Hounds in the Rain, and II hilomville Stories were published from his manuscripts after his death

Winston Churchill born at St Louis in 1871, was educated at the United States Naval Academy. In 1898 he made a success as an author with The Celebraty, even more popular was Richard Carvel (1899), a stirring story of American revolutionary times.

Elizabeth Stuart Phelps born at Andover in 1844, was the daughter of a professor, and began to write for the press at thirteen. Besides lecturing and working for social reforms, she became famous by The Gates Ajar (1868), and continued in some what the same vein with Beyond the Gates (1883) and The Gates Between (1887). Others of some thirty works are Hedged In and The Scient Partier (1870), The Story of Avis (1877), Doctor Zay (1884). In conjunction with her husband, Rev. Herbert D. Ward she wrote Come Forth (which to some
